

~~11. 11. 11.~~

[Ai.] 2.9.

Ex Libris

Bibliothecae Facultatis Juridicae Edinburgi.

255. a. 10

THE MODERN PART
OF THE UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

Compiled from ORIGINAL WRITERS; BY THE AUTHORS of the *ANTIEN*T.

Which will perfect the WORK, and render it A Complete Body of HISTORY.
FROM THE EARLIEST ACCOUNT of Time, to the PRESENT.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ κατανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ εὐρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως.
Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

VOL. III

L O N D O N :

Printed for T. OSBORNE, C. HITCH and L. HAWES, A. MILLAR, J. RIVINGTON, S. CROWDER, P. DAVEY and B. LAW,
T. LONGMAN, C. WARE, and S. BLADON.

M. DCC. LIX.

MODERN HISTORY:

BEING A CONTINUATION

OF THE

UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

BOOK IX.

A Description of Hindûstân, or the Empire of the GREAT MOGOL.

CHAP. I.

Name, Extent, Mountains, Rivers, and Produce, of Hindûstân.

- a INDIA, or the Indies (A), takes its name, according to some authors, from the river Indus; to others, from the inhabitants, named Indows, Hindows, or Hindûs. Hence it is called, by the Turks and Persians, Hindûstân, or the country of the Hindûs: of which Indostan, a name used by Europeans, is a corruption. In the geography of these latter, India, or the Indies, is a term of vast limits, extending over not only a great part of the continent of Asia, but also of the islands of the ocean lying to the south of it. The continent of India is situated between the 84th and 127th degrees of longitude; and between one degree 12 minutes and 36 degrees of north latitude; containing in length, from west to east, about 2315 miles, in breadth, from south north, 2110 miles. It is bounded on the north by the countries of Great and Little Tibet; on the south, with the Indian ocean; on the east, with China, and the Chinese sea; and on the west, with Persia, and the Indian sea.

b THIS large region is divided into three great parts. The peninsula of India within, or on this side of, the Ganges; the peninsula without, or beyond, the Ganges; and the main land. The two peninsulas contain several potent kingdoms; but the third part is, at present, under one sovereign, called the Great Mogol by Europeans. This is chiefly the part which at present we have to do with; and this only of the three is known to the orientals by the name of India or Hindûstân.

- c HINDUSTAN, or the Mogol's empire, is bounded on the north with Great and Little Tibet; on the east, with Tibet, and the farther peninsula of the Indies; on the south, with the hither peninsula, part of the Indian sea, and bay of Bengâl; and on the west, with Persia. It is situated between the 84th and 102d degrees of longitude, and between the 21st and 36th degrees of latitude; being in length about 1204 miles, and in breadth 960: though in some parts not near so much.

THIS is the part of India which consists of the greatest extremes. Towards the north it is very cold and barren; towards the south, very hot and fruitful, in corn, rice, fruits, and other vegetables. The northern provinces are very mountainous and sandy; while the southern are, for the most part, very level country, and well watered with good rivers.

(A) Commonly called the East Indies, to distinguish them from the West Indies.

Lib. Bib. Soc. Sur. Ind.

Mountains.

THE most remarkable mountains are those which surround it on three sides, and serve as a rampier against the bordering nations (B). Those on the west, which separate Hindûstân from Persia, are called in different parts by different names, and in general by that of Soleymân Kûb, or the mountain of Soleymân. These mountains are of a vast height as well as breadth; and are only passable in certain places, through which roads have been made for sake of commerce. The chief are those which lead to Kâbul, Gâzna, and Kandabâr. This great chain of mountains is inhabited by several different nations of hardy fierce people: the principal of whom are the Afghâns, or Patans, and the Balluchîs; who have extended themselves on the side of India as well as Persia. The mountains on the north are called Nagrakût, Hima, or Mûs Tâg (which has an affinity with Imaûs); and by other names, which are given also in common to the mountains on the east side, which separate Hindûstân from Tibet: but this is for want of due information procured by travellers, since we know that these mountains are differently denominated, both by their inhabitants and their neighbours. The northern part of this eastern chain is, for instance, called Kantel, Kentel, or Kenti, by the people of those parts. The very prospect of them is frightful, being nothing but hideous precipices, perpetually covered with snow; and not to be crossed without the greatest difficulty as well as horror ^a.

River Indus, or Send.

AMONG the rivers of Hindûstân two have been particularly famous from all antiquity, for their great length and capaciousness, as well as other reasons. These are the Indus and the Ganges. The Indus is called by the orientals Send, Sind, or Sindi. It rises in the mountains to the north or north-east of Hindûstân; but the exact spot is not yet known to us. From thence it runs southward by Kâshmîr and Attock to Multân, where it turns towards the south-west; and, having passed by Bukor and Tatta, falls into the Persian sea, below Lower Bander, by several mouths. In its course it receives several other large rivers, as the Nilâb, Jamâl, Bebât, and Lakka.

The Ganges.

THE Ganges, called in the Indies Ganga, rises in the kingdom of Tibet; and, having taken a large sweep towards the west, and then by the south and east, enters Hindûstân, or the Mogol's empire, about the 30th degree of latitude, and runs first thence, south-eastward, by the cities of Bekâner, Minapor, Halabas, Benâres, and Patna, to Rajah Mâbl, where it divides into two great branches. The eastern, having passed by Dâkka, the capital of Bengâl, enters the gulph of that name, about Chatigan. The western, descending by Koffum-Bazâr, and Hugley, falls into the gulph below Sbandernagor towards Pipeli. The Ganges in its course admits several other considerable rivers into its bosom, particularly the Chun, or Jemna, and the Gûderafu, on the west side; the Persilis and Lakia on the east side. This river ever has been held in great veneration, and as sacred, by the Indians, who think they are freed from their sins by washing in it at certain times. The Great Mogol also drinks the water of the Ganges, as being deemed lighter and purer than that of any other river.

The heats.

THE weather and seasons are for the general very regular in this spacious country. The winds blow constantly for six months southerly, and northerly for six months, with very little variation. The months of April, May, and the beginning of June, till the rains fall, are so extremely hot, that the reflexion from the ground is apt to blister one's face; and, but for the breeze or small gale of wind, which blows every day, there would be no living in that country for people bred in northern climates: for, excepting in the rainy season, the coldest day is hotter there at noon, than the hottest day in England. However, very surprising changes of heat and cold sometimes happen within a few hours: so that a stifling hot day is succeeded by a night cold enough to produce a thin ice on the water; and that night by a noon as scorching as the preceding. Sometimes in the dry season, before the rains, the wind blows with such extreme violence, that it carries up vast quantities of dust and sand into the air, which appear black, like clouds charged with rain; but fall down in dry showers, filling the eyes, ears, and nostrils of those among whom they descend, and penetrate every chest, cabinet, or cupboard, in the houses or tents, by the key-holes or crevices ^b.

Rainy season.

FROM Surat to Agra, and beyond, it seldom or never rains, excepting in one season of the year; that is, from the middle of June to the middle of September. They generally begin and end with most furious storms of thunder and lightening. During these three months it rains usually every day, and sometimes for a week together without intermission. By this means the land is enriched, like Egypt by the Nile. Although the land looks before like the barren sands of the Arabian deserts; yet, in a few days after those showers begin to fall, the surface appears covered with verdure; which shews the richness of the soil: on which occasion our author observes, that among many hundred acres of divers kinds of grain, he never saw any but what was prime good, standing as thick as the ground could well bear it. When this worst season is over, the sky becomes perfectly serene again, and scarce one cloud appears all the nine

^a Lettr. Edifiantes, vol. xv. p. 190.^b TERRY Voya. to E. India, p. 272, & seq. Folio edition.

(B) According to the Indian geographers, India is and is divided into two parts, the north and south, by environed almost on all sides by the mountains of Ghate; that of Balagate. The-not Trav. part iii. c. 46. p. 80. months a months after. However, a refreshing dew falls every night during that dry interval, which cools the air and cherishes the earth ^c.

THE produce of India is very rich, in every kind, whether the fossil, vegetable, or animal. Precious stones. With regard to fossils, we meet with here the most valuable precious stones, particularly diamonds. However, there is properly only one diamond mine in the Mogol's empire, and that is at the town of Soumelpûr, in Bengâl. The other diamond mines are in the hither peninsula of Ganges; and the mines of coloured stones chiefly in Pegu, a kingdom of the farther peninsula, and in the island of Ceylon^d. Quarries of Theban stone are so plentiful in some countries of the Râjabs, and elsewhere in the Mogol's empire, that Thevenot saw both mosques and pagods built intirely of it^e. Nor is Hindûstân destitute of lead, iron, or copper (C). Nay, it is said the country affords silver mines also^f. But, if so, they need not be opened, since the bullion of all other nations is sunk in this empire; which will take nothing else in exchange for her commodities, and prohibits the exporting it again.

THE soil being brittle, though fat, is very easily cultivated. They till it with oxen, and foot-ploughs; sowing their seed in May, and the beginning of June, that all may be over before the rains. Their harvest is in November and December; which are with them the most temperate months in the year. Their ground is no-where inclosed, excepting a little near towns and villages; which lie scattered very thick over this empire. Nor do they mow their grass to make hay; but cut it off the ground, either green or withered, as they have occasion to use it. Agriculture.

c WHEAT, rice, barley, and other grain proper for making bread, grow here in plenty, and are very good; the wheat especially is more white and full than the English. Grain.

THE country abounds no less with fruits. Besides pomegranates, citrons, dates, grapes, almonds, and cocoa-nuts, there are, among other plums, that called the mirabolan, of an excellent kind, and remarkable for its curious stone. Plantains, which grow in clusters, are long, like slender cucumbers; very yellow when ripe, and taste like a Norwich pear, but much better. The mango, another excellent fruit, in shape and colour like an apricot, but much larger. If rolled between the hands, when full ripe, the substance within the rind becomes like the pulp of a roasted apple, and is very delicious, being sucked out from the large stone which is left behind. But the best fruit of all in Hindûstân is the anana: it is like our pine-apples, and seems to the taste a pleasing compound of strawberries, claret, rose-water, and sugar. In the northern parts they have variety of pears and apples: limons and oranges are common here, but not so good as in other countries. Lastly, they have very good musk-melons, and water-melons; some as large as pompions, which they resemble in shape. The inner substance of this fruit is spongy; but exceeding tender, and well tasted. Its colour is a mixture of red and white; and in the middle is inclosed a liquor, which is extremely cooling and delicious^g. However, we are told by later authors, that those which are eaten at the Great Mogol's court are brought from Karazm and Great Bukhâria. Fruits.

BESIDES the woods and groves, which adorn the country, you find trees scattered over it; but none of the kinds known in England. They afford abundance of timber, firm and strong, fit for building, and other uses. Some bear leaves as broad as bucklers; and those of others are small, and divided like the leaves of fern: of this kind is the tamarind-tree, whose fruit grows in a pod resembling that of beans. There is one very remarkable tree among the rest: for out of its branches there shoot downwards little sprigs; which, taking root, in time become supporters to the branches which yielded them. So that the tree, by this means, grows at length to a very great height, and spreads so much in compass, that some hundreds of men may shade themselves under it, in any season; as the trees in those southern parts of India keep their leaves all the year^h. This is that which is called by Europeans the Banian, and war-tree. But, of all the trees of this part of India, the cotton and mulberry may be reckoned the chief, on account of the wealth they bring to the natives, arising from the manufacture of callicoes and silks. There are many other kinds of trees, which produce excellent fruits peculiar to the country. Woods and trees.

THEY plant abundance of sugar-canes here, as well as tobacco; both which are much used, and very cheap: but the latter, though good in itself, is not so rich and strong as that reared in America, for want of knowing how to cure and order it.

THE soil of Hindûstân affords plenty of roots known to us; as carrots, potatoes, onions, and garlick; besides some small roots and herbs for sallads. In the southern parts ginger grows almost every-where. These are all of a good kind: but their flowers are generally no Flowers.

^c TERRY, p. 361, & seq.

^f TERRY, ubi sup. p. 370. & seqq.

^d TAVERN. Trav. part ii. p. 139.

^e TERRY, ubi sup. p. 359, & seqq.

^g THEVENOT Voya. part iii. p. 146.

^h TERRY, ubi sup. p. 303.

(C) So says Terry; but Bernier affirms, that Hindûstân produces no metals: yet Thevenot avers, there is an excellent iron mine in the mountain Nizur, five days journey from Agia. Trav. Ind. part iii. p. 39.

better

better than painted weeds; for although their colours be beautiful to look at, they have no a scent; excepting roses, and some few other kinds; among which there is a white flower, like the Spanish jasmin, yielding a most fragrant smell. From this is extracted an excellent oil, wherewith they anoint the head, and other parts of the body^a.

Wild beasts.

HINDUSTAN abounds with animals, both wild and tame: of the former kind are elephants, rhinoceros's, lions, tygers, leopards, wolves, jackals, and the like. These last seem to be wild dogs; which run about in the night in companies, and disturb people with their hideous noise. They dig up and eat dead bodies (D). The rhinoceros is a large square beast, bigger than the English ox. The skin is extremely thick, and tough; all wrinkled, and without hair.

Rhinoceros's.

Elephants.

It has a strong, but short horn, with the point turned upward, just over the nose; from whence it has its name (E). This beast is not common in the Mogol's empire; but elephants b are very numerous¹. They are the largest of all creatures. Our author had seen some, which were twelve feet high; but was told there were others fourteen or fifteen in height. Their skin is black, thick, smooth, and without hair. Their eyes are full, but not proportionable to their bodies; their ears like those of oxen; their tails slender, and not very long. Their legs are like the trunks of small trees, cut off towards the roots; and the feet set round with thick short and broad toes. They are not without joints, as some have fabled; for the elephant can lie down and rise at pleasure. It walks slow; at most three miles an hour: is very sure-footed, and exceeding tractable, as well as sensible. Their trunk is a great length, hanging down between their tusks; and, being of a gristly substance, is endowed with so much strength, that the stroke of it will break the bones of a horse, or camel, and even kill him outright. With c it the elephant can likewise pull up great trees by the roots; yet it is so pliable, that with it he can convey victuals to his mouth; and, at the command of his rider, who sits on his neck, take up dirt, dust, or kennel-water, and dash it in the face of any body^k.

Game in common.

THERE is plenty of venison, or game of several kinds; as red deer, fallow deer, elks, antelopes, kids, hares, and such-like. All these are in common; for none are imparked, so that one sees them every-where on the road: but, as they may be any body's who will be at the pains to take them, they do not increase to damage the husbandman, or do other mischief. The elks are very large, strong, and fierce creatures. The antelopes also differ somewhat from those of other countries. They have even more courage, and are to be distinguished by their horns, which are blackish, and a foot and a half long; whereas the horns of antelopes elsewhere are greyish, and not half that length. Those of the former grow winding to the point like a screw. The Fakîrs and Santons commonly carry two of them joined together, and armed with iron at each end, which they make use of as a little staff^l.

Elks, Antelopes.

Musk cat.

AMONG the wild animals may be reckoned the musk-cat and monkey. The musk-cat is pretty common; particularly in the province of Azmîr. It is snouted like a fox, and no bigger than an hare: it has teeth like a dog, and is of the colour of a stag. The musk is contained in a kind of bladder, or purse, under the belly. The woods and groves, especially in the southern parts of Hindûstân, are full of apes, monkeys, and baboons; which live among the trees, and climb them at pleasure. Our author had seen some of them taller than the largest English greyhounds^m.

Beasts of carriage.

HINDUSTAN affords variety of beasts for carriage; as camels, dromedaries, mules, asses, horses, oxen, and buffalos. The camels here have an odd quality; for they cry and make a hideous noise at night when their burthens are taken off: but are very quiet when laid on.

Oxen used for Horses.

THE horses are very good, well-shaped, and high mettled. Some are black; but most of them white, and curiously dappled. Many are pied and spotted all over; nor are there wanting some which are of other bright colours. The oxen are not very large, and have a great bunch of gristly flesh between their shoulders. Their flesh is very sweet and tender, besides much whiter than that of the English breedⁿ. As they are very tame, many people use them as they do horses to ride on; though they commonly go but a slow pace. Instead of a bit, they put one or two small strings through the gristle of the nostrils, and fastening the ends to a rope, use it instead of a bridle; which is held up by the bunch he has on the fore part of his back. They saddle him as they do a horse; and, if spurred a little, he will go as fast. These are generally made use of all over the Indies; and with them only are drawn waggons, coaches, and chariots. They are yoked at the end of the pole, by a long yoke laid on their necks, and the coachman governs them by the rope before-mentioned. These oxen are of different sizes; but generally very hardy: so that some will travel fifteen leagues a day. There is one kind almost six feet high; but they are very rare: and another, called dwarfs; because not three feet in height: these have a bunch on their backs like the rest, go very fast, and serve

^a TERRY, p. 360. & seqq. THEVENOT, part III. p. 38.

^l TERRY, ubi supr. p. 366, 371.

^k Ibid. p. 380, & seqq.

¹ Ibid. p. 359.

^m TERRY, p. 368. THEVEN. p. 51.

ⁿ TERRY, p. 359, 360, 365, 375.

(D) Some say they are purveyors to the lion, marching before, and directing him to his prey.

(E) In some this horn is very long; and those of Africa have another horn upon the forehead.

a to draw small waggons. For this sort of carriage white oxen are in most esteem; but they are held at an extraordinary rate. In the province of Azmîr, or Asmîr, the roads being very stony, they shoe their oxen when they are to travel far^p.

THE buffalo is very large and strong, having a smooth skin without hair; which makes Buffalo. excellent buff. The female yields very good milk; but their flesh is neither so palatable nor wholesome as beef. They are much employed to carry water, for the supply of families, in large skins, which hang on both sides of them. The Hindûstân sheep differ from the English in their great fleshy tails; which are very weighty. The flesh is very good, but their wool coarse^q.

b HINDUSTAN is much infested with reptiles and insects; some of a noxious kind. Of the former are lizards, scorpions, snakes and rats. The lizards are of a dark-green colour, and Lizards. small; they often are seen in houses, but not hurtful, like the other three kinds of animals. Scorpions are very common, and frequently creep into houses; especially in the rainy season. Scorpions. They are of the shape and size of crayfish; they also are black, like them, before they are boiled. They have a little round tail, which usually turns up, and lies on their back: at the end of it is the sting; which they do not draw in and let out of their bodies, like other venomous creatures; Their sting. but it always appears ready to strike. It is very sharp and hard; not long, but crooked, like the talon of a hawk. Its sting is very painful, and mortal, if the patient has not some present remedy, such as oil of scorpions, to anoint the part affected; which is a sure and sudden cure. Or if the scorpion itself be taken and beaten to pieces, the oily substance which it affords is c a present remedy^r. However, we are told, that the best medicine is the actual cautery. They take a burning coal, and hold it as long and as near the wound as they can. The venom keeps the patient from being incommoded by the fire, while the poison is perceived to work out of the orifice by degrees; and in a short time after he is perfectly healed^s.

SNAKES and serpents are here sometimes used in executions. Our author gives an instance Snakes. in a man who had killed his mother. The Great Mogol ordered two snakes to be set upon him: each twined about one of his thighs, and bit him in the groin. After they were taken away, he complained of a violent fire that ran through all his limbs; and his whole body began to swell exceedingly. He kept his feet about a quarter of an hour, and then fell; and, near half an hour after, expired in grievous torture^t.

d THE rats here are very large, and so bold that they attacked some of Sir Thomas Roe, the Large Rats. English ambassador's retinue, in their beds at night; biting them by the fingers, toes, ears, and noses; or, in short, any part of their bodies, which they could get at.

THE most troublesome insects in this hot country are flies, musketoes, and chinchies (or Insects trouble- bugs). The first kind swarm so thick in the heat of the day, that they would fill their cups, some. and cover their meat, if it was not for servants; who, all the while they are eating, are employed to drive them off with napkins. And as they are annoyed with the first by day, they are no less plagued in the night with the two other sorts of insects; the last of which offend as much with their stench, as their bite^u.

e HINDUSTAN breeds plenty of peacocks, partridges, quails, geese, ducks, pullets, pigeons, Fowl. doves, and variety of other good fowl. They do not cut their chickens; so that they have no capons there, except the human^x: the inhabitants being less tender-hearted to men, than other animals. The partridges are smaller than ours. Among the hens there is a small sort, whose skin is perfectly black; but the flesh very white and delicious^y. The pigeons differ from ours only in colour; being all over green. These and parrots are taken in this manner. The fowler, marching behind a sort of shed, or screen, comes on the birds; who, seeing no man, never offer to fly away; and, without any difficulty, surprises them with a wand daubed with bird-lime. The Indians are no less dexterous at catching water-fowl; for, swimming after them, with a pot on their heads covered with feathers, they pull those they come up with by the feet; the rest, never suspecting the deceit, and imagining their companions f have only dived, are all by degrees taken^z.

g THERE are two kinds of bats in this country. One like those in Europe; the other of a Extraordinary singular make. It is eight inches long, and covered with yellowish hair: the body is round, bats. and as big as that of a duck. It has the head and eyes of a cat, and a sharp snout like a great rat: the ears prick-up, are black, and without hair. The wings are almost two feet long, and seven or eight inches broad; joined to the body along the sides from the shoulder downward. They are of a black skin, resembling wet parchment. The four legs, or arms, seem to be glued within the wings; each as big as a cat's thigh, and towards the joint almost as thick as a man's arm. The two foremost, from the shoulder to the fingers, are nine or ten inches long; and each is fleshed into the wing, perpendicular to the body, being covered with hair, and terminating in five fingers; which form a kind of hand. These fingers, which are black and without hair, have the same joints with those of a man, and serve the animal a to stretch out its wings, when it has a mind to fly. Each hind-leg, or arm, is but half a foot long; and, being fastened to the wing, parallel to the body, reaches to the lower part of the wing, out of which peeps a little hand, much like the human; only instead of nails it hath claws. The hinder-arms are black and hairy, like those before; but somewhat smaller. These bats have no tails; but under the wings appear two teats, each as big as the end of one's little finger. They stick to the branches of trees, with their claws; fly almost out of sight; and some, who had eaten of them, said they were good meat^a.

^p THEVENOT, part iii. p. 51. ^q TERRY, p. 359, & seq. ^r TERRY, p. 371, & seq. ^s THEVENOT, p. 51. ^t TER. p. 452. ^u TERRY, p. 372. ^x bid. p. 359. ^y BERNIER, part iii. p. 24. ^z THEVENOT, ubi supr. p. 38.

Little birds. AMONG the birds, which frequent the woods, there is a species less than the wren; which are very beautiful, being neatly shaped, and covered with curious parti coloured feathers, embellished with various little spots: nor do they delight the eye with their form more than the ear with variety of pleasing notes. Nature has instructed them to build their nests in the twigs at the extremities of the boughs of trees; where they hang like little purse-nets, out of the reach of the smallest monkeys^b.

Fishes. LASTLY, with regard to fish, not to mention crocodiles, which infest many rivers, there is variety of what is very good; especially two sorts, resembling our pike and carp^c. Both fish and flesh is very cheap all over India; which is owing in great measure to the Hindûs not eating animal food.

^a THEVENOT, p. 70. ^b TERRY, ubi supr. p. 363. ^c BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 25.

C H A P. II.

Provinces of Hindûstân.

Number of provinces. ALTHOUGH Hindûstân, or the empire of the Great Mogol, comprises many pro- a vines; yet they are not so numerous as the earlier authors represented them. Terry, for instance, reckons up no fewer than thirty-seven: but Thevenot was assured by an Indian, who was acquainted with the geography of his country, that the empire contained no more than twenty, exclusive of Viziapûr, and Golkonda; and that they who have counted more have been misinformed, since of one province they must have made two or three^a.

THIS remark is confirmed by a late writer; who has given two lists of the provinces from the Mogol historians, as they stood, one in the time of Shâh Jêhân^b, the other in that of Aureng zîb^c; as follows:

	Provinces.	Chief Cities.
Their names.	1. Dehli.	Idem.
	2. Agra.	Idem.
	3. Ajmîr.	Idem.
	4. Aleb abad.	Idem.
	5. Panjâb.	Labûr.
	6. Audib [or Haud.]	Idem.
	7. Multân.	Idem.
	8. Kabûl.	Idem.
	9. Kashmîr.	Sbrinâgr.
	10. Guzerat.	Abmed abâd.	c
	11. Babar [or Patna].	Pâtna.
	12. Send.	Tâtтар.
	13. Dawlat abâd.	Awrengabâd.
	14. Malvâ	Eujîn.
	15. Berâr.	[Shâpûr.
	16. Kbândîsh.	Brampûr.
	17. Bedr.	Zâffer abâd.
	18. Bengâl.	Dakka.
	19. Odissea.	[Jakanat.
	20. Heyder abâd.	Heyder abâd.	d
	21. Vijapûr.	Vijapûr.

Both different THIS list of cities differ from the other, not only in the order of placing the provinces, but in the number and names. In that of Shâh Jêhân, the provinces of Heyder abâd, for-

^a THEVENOT's Trav. Ind. part iii. c. 3. p. 5. ^b FRASER's Hist. of Nadir Shah, p. 26. ^c Ibid. p. 34. merly

- a merly know by the name of Golkonda, and Vijapûr, or Viziapûr, are wanting, as not having been conquered till the time of Aureng zîb; and, in the list of this latter prince, those of Bâlkh, Kandabâr, Buddakshân, and Buglâna, are wanting; the three first having been lost again, and the last perhaps joined to some other province, as to that of Dawlat abâd. On the other hand, the provinces, which in the above list are named Panjab, Send, and Bedr, are, in the list of Shâh Jeshân, called Labûr, Tâtta, and Tillingâna. In like manner, as these lists differ from each other in the respects before-mentioned, so they do from that of Thevenot, and other authors. What is worse, some of the provinces in Frazer's lists having changed at different times their names, or being called by names different from those given by other travellers, we are at a loss how to draw the parallel. Thus altho' we know that Heyder abâd is Golkonda, Bedr is Tellengâna, or Telenga, and Dawlet abâd, Balogât, joined perhaps with Buglâna, yet we cannot tell what province in Thevenot's list is the same with Alah abâd. We are no less at a loss to determine what provinces, in Frazer's lists, answer to those of Varad, or Varal, Bekar, and Halabâs, in the catalogue of Thevenot; and the rather, since Frazer has given only simple lists of the provinces, without any account of them (A). For this reason also we are obliged, in our description of Hindûstân, to follow the division as found in other authors; particularly Thevenot.

I. GUZERAT, formerly a kingdom, is a maritime province, and the most pleasant in all Guzerât Province. Hindûstân; though none of the largest. It is rendered fertile by the Nardaba, Tapti, and other rivers. The fields look green all the year round, on account of the corn and rice which cover them, as well as the various kinds of trees, which continually bear fruit. The most considerable part of Guzerât lies upon the sea-coast; on which stand the towns of Surât, Baroch, Brodâ, Kambaya, and Ahmed abâd; which last is the capital.

THIS province fell into the hands of the Great Mogol Akber, about the year 1565, on the following occasion. About the year 1545, or 1546, Soltân Mahmûd, king of Guzerât, being near his death, intrusted the tuition and regency of his only son Soltân Modaffer, to a great lord of his court. This nobleman, to support himself against the other great men of the kingdom, who were his enemies, at length called in Akbar, under pretence of protecting his pupil, though already of age, against his rebellious subjects. Akbar, having defeated the malecontents, instead of being satisfied with one city, and its district, which was promised him, seized the whole kingdom, and made both the king and governor prisoners. Modaffer, after this, made his escape, with a design to recover his kingdom; but, having been defeated and made prisoner a second time, he, in despair, slew himself^a.

THE inhabitants of Guzerât, who are Paragaus for the most part, continue their old trade of thieving and pirating; plundering all whom they can overcome both by sea and land: nor can the Great Mogol, whose subjects they are, restrain them: for their country is secure from the marches of armies into it, being so soft and muddy, occasioned by the many inlets of the sea, which overflows the low grounds, that in many places there is no travelling but by little boats.

THE first town next to Sindi is Kuchnâggben; which has some trade for cotton, corn, coarse Kuchnâg-cloth, and chonk; a large kind of periwinkle-shell, which, in Bengâl and other parts of India, they saw into rings, or ornaments, for the arms of women.

THE province and town of Kuchnâggben is governed by a queen, who is very formidable to the neighbouring states. They chuse to be governed by the female sex; because, in their judgment, they are more tractable and gentle than men, who, intoxicated with power and honour, become obstinate in their opinions, and insolent in their behaviour.

THE next province to Kuchnâggben is Sangânia, governed by a princess, for the same reason. It produces cotton and corn, like the rest of Guzerât; but, living wholly by piracy, admits of no trade, for fear of being civilized by example. Their chief sea-port is called Baët; and as they give protection to all criminals, such as commit offences deserving punishment repair thither, and become public robbers. Depending on their numbers, they board all the ships they can come at (B). Our author, Captain Hamilton, had several brushes with them. Before they engage, they drink Bang; an intoxicating liquor, made of a seed like that of hemp; which renders them quite furious. They wear long hair; and, when they let it loose, it is a sign they will give no quarter^b.

^a THEVENOT. Trav. Ind. part iii. p. 6.

^b HAMILTON'S New Account of the E. Ind. c. 12. p. 131, & seqq.

(A) All the provinces of this vast empire are full of towns and villages, according to Terry. Voy. to E. Ind. sect. 2. p. 362. fol. edit.

(B) Our author gives two or three instances of their attacking English ships. In 1717, they attacked the Morning-star, in her way from Gomrân to Surât, with eight vessels; one of five hundred tons, three others of between two and three hundred tons, the rest galleys, with above 2000 men on board; but although the English ship had no more than seventeen fighting men, she disabled and got clear of them.

THEVENOT observes of those pirates, whom he calls Zingânes, that they keep with their a barks on the bar of Sindi; and, when they see a merchant-vessel, get to windward. Then drawing pretty near, before they lay her on board, throw in a great many pots full of lime, reduced to a very fine powder; and, while the crew are blinded with the dust, leap into the bark, putting all to the sword: for they give no quarter till they are masters of the vessel.
The only way therefore for the sailors and passengers to save themselves is to jump into the sea, and keep above water till the pirates are sure of their prize; after which they shed no more blood, but spare all who remain alive. Yet death from them perhaps would be a greater favour than life; for, to prevent their prisoners from escaping, they cut the great tendon of their legs a little above the heel, which disables them even to walk; and in that condition set them to keep their flocks. Our author adds, that the Great Mogol sends them presents every b year, although they are his subjects, to oblige them to forbear their piracies; but, although they accept of his bounty, they still continue their robberies c.

Jigat port.

THE next port to Baët is Jigat, standing on a low point of land, called Cape Jigat. The city makes a good appearance from the sea, and is the seat of a Fouzdâr, or governor, for the Mogol: but has no trade. Yet Mangaroul, the next maritime town, admits of commerce; chiefly for coarse calicoes and provisions. It is inhabited by Banyans; so that deer, antelopes, and peacocks, are not afraid to enter into the very houses. Poremain, which follows on the shore, is a pretty large town. Its trade and inhabitants are of the same kind with the former:
but both places are obliged to maintain Râspouts (or Râjipoûs), who are natives of Guzerât, to protect them from the insults of the Sangâniâns. c city.

Diu, or Div

DIU (C), which is the next port, and most southern land of Guzerât, is a small isle, three miles long, and two broad, belonging to the crown of Portugal. The city is pretty large, surrounded with a high stone wall, flanked with bastions, well furnished with cannon; and a deep moat cut in a hard rock, to defend it on the land side; which is about one third part of the city. The other sides are fortified by the ocean, thick-set with dangerous rocks and high cliffs, which forbid any approaches that way; and a rapid, deep river, which affords a good harbour on the north-east side. The harbour is secured by two castles (D): one of them, which is large, can bring 100 great pieces of artillery to bear on its mouth, and obstruct the entrance of shipping. The other is but small, built on a rock in the middle of the river, and serves for a magazine of stores. d

Situation and strength.

DIU is one of the best built cities, as well as best fortified, both by nature and art, that our author ever saw in the Indies. It is situated in an ascent, beginning from the great castle; and as it hath five or six beautiful churches, which stand one above the other, facing the sea, the prospect from thence is extremely pleasant. The stately buildings of freestone and marble, which still remain, are evidences of its antient grandeur and opulence: but at present not above one fourth part of the city is inhabited. This fortress first baffled the power of the king of Guzerât (Bâdr); who, after granting them leave to build it, would have expelled them again, when he saw that it drew all the trade from his other ports: and then that of the Turks, in 1538; who brought a great fleet to dispossess them: but, about 1670, the Arabs of Muskât, with a fleet of Trankis, landed by night on the west end of the island; and, march- e ing silently up to the town, at break of day, when the gates were opened, entered without resistance. The enemy slew all the Portugueses, who could not get quick enough into the castle; and for three days loaded their vessels with rich plunder. They also mounted some cannon on one of the churches, and fired on the fort; but to little purpose. The governor could easily have made them remove farther off the castle, with his heavy artillery; but the priest forbade him, under pain of excommunication, to shoot a single bullet, for fear of hurting some holy image. However, that menace did not save the sacred trumpery; for the Arabs not only took away all the consecrated plate and cash, but did not leave a gold or silver image behind them: as for those of wood or stone, they broke them to pieces. These latter indeed were soon repaired again; but our author found none there of either of those metals d. f

Surprised by Arabs:recovered
again.

AT length, the Arabs growing secure and negligent, about 4000 soldiers and slaves, on promise of freedom, made a sally, with such success, that they killed 1000 of the enemy, and drove the rest out of the city; which still feels the dismal effects of that surprise. At present there are not above 200 Portugueses in both the town and castle. The rest of its inhabitants are Banyans, to the number of about 40,000: but few of them are rich; because it is unsafe for monied strangers to dwell among the Portugueses, who, for all their losses in India, still retain their pride and insolence. The king of Portugal receives about 12,000 pounds yearly by poll-tax, and 6000 by the customs and land-tax: but was Diu in the hands of some

c THEVENOT, Trav. Lev. part ii. p. 178.

d HAMILTON, ubi supr. ch. 2. p. 335, & seqq.

(C) Diu, or rather Dîv, signifies an island in the Malabar language.(D) Thevenot says it had three in his time.

a industrious nation, it would be the best mart town on the coast of India, on account of the neighbourhood of the Indians, both by the bay of Sindi and that of Kambaya.

ALL the country between Diu and Dand-point, which is about thirty leagues; admits of no Warrels traffick, being inhabited by free-booters, called Warrels; who often associate with the San-pirates. gánians, in their piracies and depredations. As soon as they get on board their prizes, they throw in showers of stones on the decks, in order to sink the crew, if they do not yield. They likewise cast in pots full of unquenched lime, well sifted; which breaking, there arises such a dust, that the defendants can scarce either breathe or see. At the same time they fling into the ship lighted wicks of cotton, dipped in a certain oil; which burns fiercely, and sets fire to the parts which it lights upon.

b THESE Warrels dwell in small villages. The best of which, called Chance, stands about Coast danger- sixty miles to the east of Diu, three miles within the mouth of a river; which has a small island rous lying athwart it, two miles from the sea, furnished with good springs of fresh water; but no inhabitants. In 1716, the English went to burn that village, and their pirating vessels; but were unsuccessful in the attempt. Though people occupy all the coast from Dand-point to Goga, which lies about twelve leagues within the gulf of Kambaya and the coast between; those limits are very dangerous, being not only thick-set with rocks and sand-banks, but a rapid tide of six or eight miles an hour runs among them, in a chanel twenty fathom deep in some places; which causes anchoring to be dangerous also.

c GOGA is a pretty large town, and has had some mud-wall fortifications; which still defend Goga. them from the insults of their neighbours the Kowlis; who inhabit the north-east side of Guzerát, and are as great thieves by land, as the former are by sea. Nor is there any getting at them to chastise them; for there are so many rivulets in their country (made by the sea and certain rivers), whose bottoms are soft and muddy, that neither men nor horses can penetrate into it. Besides, their towns are inclosed with such thick hedges of green bambús, which are not quickly burned, and the people so numerous, as well as valiant, that it would be a hard task to civilise them.

GOGA has some trade, and admits strangers to a free commerce. Its harbour is capable of receiving the largest ships, although they lie dry on soft mud at low-water; but the tides, rising four or five fathoms perpendicular, afford water enough at high-water. The place is governed by an officer from the Mogol, with about 200 men under his command; who are kept there d to guard it.

KAMBAYA, or, as the natives call it, Kambawt, lies about twelve leagues from Goga, at Kambaya the bottom of the gulf, or bay, of Kambaya, on a small river, made, as our author supposes, city: by the overflowings of the Indus (and from thence reckons it a branch of that great river). It is a large city, with high walls; and the capital of a kingdom, which bore the same name, when the Great Mogol Akber sent his son Jebán Ghír with a great army, who conquered it. This city lies about fifteen or sixteen leagues from Abmed abad, and is as big again as Surát; but not near so populous. The walls are of brick, defended by towers. The streets are large, with gates at the end; and the houses high. The castle is large, but not handsome: the town swarms with monkeys, who throw at passengers from the house-tops. The tides are so swift e in the north part of this gulf, that a horse at full speed cannot keep pace with the first waves. This, and the sea falling off from the city (E) a mile and a half, has much diminished the trade of the place f.

KAMBAYA is still a place of good trade, though not half inhabited; and contributes greatly its trade to the wealth and grandeur of Surát, to which it is subordinate: and its vicinity to Abmed abad makes it share the advantages of that large city; for most of what it exports comes to Kambaya, and is carried by the Surát shipping all over India; except what is transported to Europe.

f THE product and manufactures of this place are scarce inferior to any in the Indies and manufac- Indies. It abounds with grain and cattle, cotton and silk. The cornelian and agate-stones tures are found in its rivers, and no-where else in the world. Of the first they make rings, and stones for seals. They cut the agate into bowls, spoons, handles for swords and knives, snuff-boxes, buttons, and other curiosities. Our author has seen cabinets fourteen or fifteen inches long, and eight or nine deep, of one intire stone, excepting the lid, valued at thirty or forty pounds English. The people of Kambaya embroider the best of any in the Indies, and perhaps in the world: but they are much infested by their neighbours the Patáns, as well as the Ráspúts and Koulis; who have sometimes surprised and plundered the city. In 1716, they put a stop to trade; and, by their ambuscade, cut off 10,000 out of 20,000 men; sent against them by the governor of Surát g.

^a HAMILTON, ubi supr. p. 140, & seqq.

^e THEVENOT, part iii. p. 12.

^g HAMILTON, p. 144, & seqq.

(E) Baldæus, p. 1. says, the Indus falls into the gulf of Kambaya; and Hamilton, vol. i. p. 131, that the Indus reaches Guzerát, an island, by a branch, which runs into the sea at the city of Kambaya. Yet Thevenot, and other travellers, place no river there at all.

Baroch.

THE next maritime city to Kambaya is Baroch; it stands on the east shore of the bay, on the side and at the foot of a high and steep hill, looking southward to the river Nerdâba. It is long and square, encompassed with stone-walls, eighteen feet high, flanked with round towers. The fortress stands well, but is neglected: here the Bafta's are made^h. These are famous all over India, the cotton of this country being the best in the world. It depends on Surât, and was formerly a place of great trade; but it suffered much in the wars, which, about 1660, Aureng zîb had with his brothers. For, having held out obstinately against the forces of that prince, who lost many men for want of water and provisions, he put to the sword all he found in arms; and razed part of the walls, pronouncing a curse on him who should repair them: yet Sevaji's incursions obliged him to order them to be rebuilt; and he called it Sûk abâd, or the dry city, although it still retains the old name. The English and Dutch had formerly factories here, but of late have withdrawn them.

Surât city.

SURAT, or Surrât, is twenty Kos (or leagues) from Baroch, situate on the banks of the river Tâpti, or Tâpta; and the present city is not much above ninety years standing: for, about 1660, the Tâpti being incommoded with sand-banks at Ranîer, the then mart-town on this river, the English removed two miles farther down, on the opposite side, near a castle; which had been built many years before, to secure the trade from the insults of the Malabar pirates. Soon after, others following their example, within a few years the place became a large town; but without walls: and so continued till the Râjah Savaji (in 1664) came and plundered all but the European factories; which stood on their guard. After this, at the request of the inhabitants, Aureng zîb inclosed with walls a space of ground, about four miles in compass, to build their city in: but, the number of people increasing with the trade, several large suburbs were added for the convenience of mechanics. The wall was built of brick, about eight yards (F) high; with round bastions, 200 paces asunder, each mounted with five or six cannonⁱ.

Inhabitants:

SURAT is very populous at all times; and from December to April so full of people, that both in the city and suburbs lodging can scarcely be had. It is inhabited by Mohammedans, Hindûs, and Parsîs. There are very rich people here. The English have settled here the greatest staple of their trade: the Dutch also have a factory in the place. The castle stands on the river to the south of the town, is square, and pretty large, with a wet ditch. The houses are flat, and pretty well built of brick: the streets large, and even; but there is no considerable public building within the walls. Provisions here of all sorts are plenty^k.

Its trade:

THIS city flourished in trade till the year 1686, when the English company disturbed its tranquility, by an unjust war which they made on Surât; and which ended in three years, neither to their profit nor honour. In 1695, its trade was molested, by Captain Avery taking one of the Great Mogol's ships, with a booty of 325,000*l.* and a young Mohammedan lady, on her return from Mekka; whom he kept: and since then the city has felt many convulsions in its commerce. In 1705, the neighbouring Râjahs, with an united force of 80,000 horse, plundered all the villages in the plain country, and then besieged Surât; but, having no artillery, they could do it no great harm; and, the river being open, they had every thing they wanted from Guzerât. These free-booters are composed of Warrels, Koulîs, Râspûts, Pâtanners (or Pâtans), and Grasias; but go under the general name of Gannims. The Grasias were formerly the landed men of this country; who, on their submission to Akber, articed to have the ground-rents paid them: but, as the Nabâbs often defraud them, they levy it themselves in the manner above-mentioned. While this rabble army lay before the place, the inhabitants built sconces about half a mile without the wall, and afterwards joined them by curtains: so that this new wall, which incloses the suburbs, extends about five miles from the bank of the river above the town, to that part which terminates below the town; and all the inclosure is well peopled.

Gannims.

THE free-booters are composed of Warrels, Koulîs, Râspûts, Pâtanners (or Pâtans), and Grasias; but go under the general name of Gannims. The Grasias were formerly the landed men of this country; who, on their submission to Akber, articed to have the ground-rents paid them: but, as the Nabâbs often defraud them, they levy it themselves in the manner above-mentioned. While this rabble army lay before the place, the inhabitants built sconces about half a mile without the wall, and afterwards joined them by curtains: so that this new wall, which incloses the suburbs, extends about five miles from the bank of the river above the town, to that part which terminates below the town; and all the inclosure is well peopled.

Richmerchant.

THE inhabitants of Surât are computed to be 200,000; and among them are many very rich men, as well Mohammedans as Hindûs. Our author was acquainted with one of the former, named Abdol Gafour, who drove a trade equal to the whole English East India company. His only son dying, he left his estate to two grandsons: but the court had a fling at them, and got above a million sterling out of their fortune. The commerce of this city is very considerable; for the revenues, arising from the customs, land-rents, and poll-money, amount, one year with another, to 162,500 pounds^l.

The port.

THE port of Surât is Swalli; two leagues north of the bar, or entrance of the Tâpti. It is distant from the city four leagues and a half: and to go to it by land, you cross the river at the town. There is good anchoring here; but, because the customs have been often stolen, no ships have been suffered to put in there since the year 1660; excepting those of the English

^h THEVENOT, p. 6, & seqq.ⁱ HAMILTON, p. 146, & seq.^k THEVEN. p. 15, & seq.^l HAMILTON, p. 44. 147, & seqq.(F) Thevenot says, only nine feet high; but as many thick.

a and Dutch, who have their magazines in the place. Since that time, the vessels of all other nations come to an anchor at the bar of Surât, which is only a road, and that an incommodious one, by reason of the sand-banks; there not being water enough to carry vessels, though unloaded, over the bar, till the spring-tides: but small barks may get-up to the city at any time ^m.

THERE are in Gúzerât about thirty-five cities, or considerable towns; among which may be reckoned several of the ports already mentioned; and all the rest are near the sea: but we shall only speak of two inland places. The first is Brodra; which lies between Baroch and Kambaya. It is a large modern city, with pretty good walls, and has above 200 towns and villages within its district; where store of lakka, or gum-lak, is found ⁿ. The second place is,

b AHMED ABAD, or Ahmed's City, so called from a king of that name, was before denominated Guzerât. Shâh Jebân nicknamed it Gberd-abâd, or the Habitation of Dust; because it was much incommoded therewith. It was the seat of the Guzerât kings, as it is now of the Mogol governor. The city stands in a lovely plain, and is watered by the little river Sabre-metti; which, though not deep, in time of rains overflows the plains prodigiously. The walls are built with stone and brick, flanked at certain distances with great round towers and battlements. It has twelve gates; and, including the suburbs, is about four miles and a half in length. It is distant from Surât eighty-six Kos; which make about forty-three French leagues. The streets are wide. The Meydân Shâh, or King's Square, is 700 paces long, and 400 broad, planted round with trees. On the west side is the castle, well walled with free-stone, and as spacious as a little city; but not very fair within: the karawanfaray is on the south of the square, and its chief ornament. Near the Meydân also is the king's palace; whose apartments are richly ornamented: and in the midst of the city the English factory. The place from an eminence appears like a wood, it is so full of gardens, stored with trees; among which, without the town, is the king's, very large, and full of agreeable walks. The Hindûs have here an hospital for sick birds, and another for sick beasts ^o. A late author says; that for magnitude and wealth this city is little inferior to the best in Europe; and that the revenue which it yields, is generally reckoned to be ten times as much as that of Surât ^p.

c THE province of Agra is one of the largest in all Hindûstân; and its capital, of the same name, the greatest city in the whole empire; distant from Surât about 210 leagues. It stands on the river Jemna, or Jemini, as some call it (named also Chun); which, rising in the mountains north of Debli, becomes a very considerable river at Agra, and falls into the Ganges at Halabûs. It was no more than a country-town, with a little castle of earth, when the Great Mogol Akber, pleased with the situation, enlarged it, and made it the seat of his empire, in 1566, calling it Akber abâd, or Akber's City. The present castle, built by him in place of the former, is the biggest in all the Indies. The walls are of stone and brick, terraced in several places, and twenty cubits high. Between it and the river is a large space, left for drawing up troops, and other diversions, in the emperor's view. The palace is in the castle; containing three courts, set round with porticos and galleries, all painted and gilt; nay some pieces are plated over with gold. Under the galleries of the first court are the lodgings for the Imperial guards: those for the officers are in the second court: and the third contains the stately apartments of the emperor and his ladies.

e THIS palace is accompanied with twenty-five or thirty other very large ones, all in a line; belonging to the princes and great lords of the court. On the same line are several lesser palaces, and other buildings; for all are desirous to enjoy the lovely prospect and convenience of the Jemna: which is the reason that the city is very long, but not broad; and, excepting a few fair streets; all the rest are very narrow and without symmetry. Before the king's palace (of which more will be said hereafter), there is a very large square; besides which there are twelve others in the city. But the chief ornament, next the palaces, is the karawanfarays, above sixty in number; some of which have six large courts, with their porticos. There are at Agra above 800 public baths, and a great number of mosks, with very magnificent sepulchres. Among the latter is that of Akber; but especially another, erected by Shâh Jebân, in honour of his beloved queen Taje Máhl (otherwise called Nûr Máhl), which are extremely beautiful; and shew, that the Indians are not ignorant in architecture, although theirs differs much from the European.

f AFTER all, Agra is very incommodious for the heats in summer-time. It is extremely crowded when the court is there; but at other times not over-populous: besides, the greater part being taken up by the palaces and gardens, it cannot contain so many inhabitants as some have reported. The generality of the houses are low, and those of the inferior sort of people made only of straw. The Dutch have a factory there, but the English are withdrawn ^q.

^m TREVENOT, p. 26, & seqq.
ubi supr. p. 144; 149.

ⁿ Ibid. p. 31.

^o TREVENOT, p. 33, & seqq.

^p Ibid. p. 3, & seqq.

^q HAMILT.

Fetipûr.

THE province of Agra hath above forty cities, or large towns, dependant on it; and, as they say, above 340 villages. Among the cities is Fetipûr, before called Sikari, about six leagues from Agra. Akber, having at the beginning of his reign rebuilt the walls, made it the seat of his empire. It was then a lovely palace; but, removing afterwards to Agra, it was quite abandoned, and is now much decayed: yet there is still a large square to be seen, adorned with fair buildings. The stately entrance of Akber's palace is still intire; and has adjoining to it one of the loveliest mosks in all the east, with a great reservatory near it; which supplied the whole city with water. Biâna and Skânder abâd are famous for indigo. This latter was formerly several leagues in length, having been the capital of a powerful Patan king; and in its neighbourhood are the ruins of ancient palaces and other buildings^r.

Skânder
abâd.Dehli province.

THE province of Dehli lies to the north of Agra. The road betwixt the two capitals, and which reaches as far as Labûr, is that famous alley, or walk, 150 leagues in length, which Jebân Ghîr planted with trees. Each half-league is marked with a kind of turret, and at every stage there are little sarays, or karawanfarays, for lodging travellers. At that called Shekê Saray, six leagues from Agra, there is an antient pagod, one of the largest and fairest in the Indies; greatly frequented, before the Jemna, on which it stood, retired about half a league from it. The road, though tolerable, has many inconveniencies: it is not only frequented by wild beasts, but by robbers, so dextrous at casting a noose about a man's neck, that they never fail, if within reach, to seize and strangle him. They gain their point likewise by means of handsome women; who, feigning great distress, and being taken up behind the unwary traveller, choak him with the snare^s.

City of Dehli.

THE capital, Dehli, consists of three cities, built near one another. The first, now quite destroyed, is said, by the learned Indians, to have been the residence of king Porus, invaded by Alexander: they report also, that it had fifty-two gates. The second city is that which was taken by Humayûn. It was then beautified with several stately sepulchres of the Patan kings, and other monuments: but Shâh Jebân demolished it to build Jebân abâd; which makes the third city, and joins the ruins of the second. It stands in an open plain country, on the side of the Jemna; which rises in this province. The fortress, which is a mile and half in circuit, has good walls, with round towers, and ditches full of water, faced with stone. This citadel is surrounded with lovely gardens; and in it is the emperor's palace^t; of which more when we come to speak of the Great Mogol's court.

Fortress.

DEHLI, or Jebân abâd, is encompassed with walls, excepting towards the river. They are of brick, flanked with round towers; but without a ditch, and terraced behind four or five feet thick. The circuit of the walls may be about nine miles; but if you take into the city a very long suburb, through which the way lies to Labûr, with what remains inhabited of old Dehli, which is likewise a very large suburb, besides three or four other small ones, the whole would make in a line about a league and half^u.

Azmîr province.

THE province of Azmîr (or Ajmîr), lies south-west of Dehli, east of Sindi, west of Agra, south of Multân and Penjab, and north of Guzerât. It hath been divided into three provinces, of Bando, Jeselmîr, and Soret. The capital bears the same name with the province, and is about sixty-two leagues from Agra.

City of Azmîr.

THE city Azmîr stands at the foot of a very high, and almost inaccessible mountain, which has at the top an exceeding strong castle; to ascend to it, one must go winding about for above a league. The city has stone-walls, and a good ditch. Azmîr is pretty large; but when the Great Mogol comes here, there is no stirring in it. The place is famous for the tomb of Keja Mondî, a Mohammedan saint; to which they resort from all parts in pilgrimage. Great quantities of salt-petre are made in this city, whose chief trade consists in it^x.

Sind, or Sindi.

THE province of Sind, or Sindi, by some called Tâtta, has Azmîr on the east; Multân to the north; a desert and the Indian sea to the south; and to the west Mackrân, and Sejestân in Persia. It extends from north to south, on both sides of the Indus, called by the orientals Sindi, or Sind; from whence the province takes its name.

City of Tâtta.

THE chief city is called Tâtta, and the most southern town Diul, or Diul-sind, and heretofore Dobil. Some orientals name the country of Sind the kingdom of Diûl. It is a province of great traffick, especially at Tâtta, where the Indian merchants buy a great many curiosities made by the inhabitants; who are wonderfully ingenious in all kinds of arts. The Indus, towards the Tâtta, forms a great many little islands; which, being very fruitful and pleasant, render it one of the most commodious cities of Hindustan, notwithstanding it is exceeding hot there. A great trade is likewise carried on at Lowri Bânder, three days journey from Tâtta, upon the sea-coast; where there is a better road for ships than in any other part of the Indies^y.

^r THEVENOT, p. 39, & seq.
Mem. Mog. Emp. part iii. p. 5, & seq.

^s Ibid. p. 40.

^t Ibid. p. 41, & seq.

^u BERNIER,

^x THEVENOT, p. 48, 54.

^y Ibid. p. 52, & seq.

a A LATE traveller, who calls this port Larri Bundar, says it stands five or six leagues from Lowri, its the sea, on a branch of the Indus, capable to receive ships of 200 tons. This mart is no port. more than a village of 100 houses, built with crooked sticks and mud: but has a large stone fort, mounted with four cannon, to protect the merchandize, brought thither from the Bal-lowchis and Makkrâns of Persia, on the west; and the Jâms of Hindîstân to the east; who often rob the kasfilas, which pass between this port and Tâtta, although escorted by one or two hundred horse; the country being almost level, and overgrown with shrubs and bushes, fit to cover their ambuscades.

TATTA is the emporium of the province, a very large and rich city: it is about three Tâtta citadel. miles long, one and a half broad, and about forty miles from Larri Bînder. It has a large citadel at its west end, capable of lodging fifty thousand men and horses, with convenient stabling, and a palace for the Nabâb, or viceroy. The city stands about two miles from the Indus, whence canals are cut to convey water to it. In 1699, no rain having fallen for three years, a plague ensued; which, in the town only, carried off above 80,000 manufacturers in silk and cotton².

TATTA is famous for learning in theology, philology, and politics; there being above 400 Famous for colleges in the city for training up youth in those studies. A Seyd, who was a professor in learning. theology, told our author, that their histories mentioned Al xander and Porus, by the names of Shâb Hasânder (G) and Prorus. He added, that Hasânder, being a great magician, summoned above a million of wild geese, which swam his army over the Indus; and that the elephants of Prorus would never turn their heads towards the place where Hasânder was. The Portuguese had formerly a church at the east end of the town. The house is still standing; and in the vestry there remain some pictures of saints, and holy vestments; which they offered to sell to our author. They have plenty of black cattle, large and good; horses Cattle and small, but hardy and swift. They hunt with dogs, leopards, and a fierce creature, called a game. Shûgûs. It is as big as a fox, with ears like a hare, and the face of a cat. Being shewed the game, deer or antelopes, it springs after them, leaps on their shoulders, and scratches their eyes out³.

THEY have but few coaches at Tâtta; because the Europeans, who only use them, seldom Indian cha- go thither: but they have chariots, which are exceeding neat, and convenient enough for riots. travelling. They are flat and even at the bottom, having a border four inches broad, with pillars all round, commonly eight; that is, one at each corner, and one on each side. Leather thongs are interwoven from pillar to pillar, to keep one from falling. Some, who will go to the charge, have ivory ballusters instead of pillars. The bottom is covered with a neat carpet, on which the party, who is carried through the town, sits after the eastern manner. Some cover it above with a slight canopy, to keep off the sun, when they go into the country. This machine hath no more than two wheels, no larger than the fore-wheels of our coaches. They do not advance beyond the sides of the chariot, have eight square spokes, and many times are not hooped with iron. Hackney-coaches to travel in are hired for twenty-five pence, or half a crown, per day: but are not so easy as our coaches, because not hung. The wheels of waggons, or carts for carrying goods, are made of one solid piece of timber. They are drawn by eight or ten oxen.

THE finest palankîns in all the Indies are made at Tâtta. It is a kind of coach with four Palankîns. feet, having on each side ballusters four or five inches high, and at each end a back-stay, like a child's cradle. This machine hangs on a bambû pole, five or six inches thick, arched in the middle, by means of two wooden frames nailed to the feet at each end, with rings at top, for fastening it to the pole by ropes. The whole is covered with a piece of callico, or red serge, if a woman be in it; but velvet, if a lady: if it threatens rain, a waxed cloth is the covering. In the bottom are laid mats and cushions, to lie or sit on: some have their palankîns covered with plates of silver, others only painted with flowers, or set round with gilt balls. They are commonly very dear. The bambû alone costs sometimes 100 crowns: but porters, of whom there are required two at each end, may be had for nine or ten shillings a month; out of which they maintain themselves⁴.

THE Indus at Tâtta is about a mile broad, and measured six fathom deep from side to The Sindi, or side. The stream is not very rapid, its motion not exceeding two miles and a half in an Indus. hour. It produces many kinds of fish, and among them the best carp the author ever tasted. The country is made fruitful by the overflowing of the Indus, in April, May, and June. It is navigable as high as Kashmîr, for their vessels, called kaftîs, which are of several sizes; the largest containing about 200 tons. They are flat-bottomed, with cabbins on each side, from stem to stern, which hang over about two feet, each furnished with a kitchen, and place of exoneration. These are for passengers; and the hold is made into separate apartments a for traders. Our author never saw better conveniences for going by water, in all his travels. They have one mast, and a square sail: but hawl the ship up the stream when the wind is against them. So that they are six or seven weeks in a voyage from Tatta to Labûr: altho' they return in eighteen days, and sometimes in twelve. It would be difficult to find the mouth of the Sindi, were it not for the tomb of a Mohammedan saint, with a high tower over it, called Sindi Tower, and always kept white, to serve for a land-mark. The bar, going into the river, is narrow, and has not above two fathom and a half on spring tides: but this is only a small branch of the Indus; which appellation is lost in this country, where it is called Drivelli, or Seven Mouths: a though it discharges its waters into the sea by many more^c.

² HAMILT. p. 115, & seqq.³ HAMILT. p. 125, 128.⁴ THEVENOT, p. 53, & seq.(G) In other parts, as Tanjaor, he is known by the name of Javana Rajab, the king of the Javans, or Greeks. See Litt. Ediff. tom. xxvi. p. 230.

Multân province,

THE province of Multân, which includes that of Bukor, has to the south Sind, to the north Kâbul, with Persia to the west, and Labûr to the east. It is watered by many rivers, which makes it fertile.

and city.

THE city of Multân, which is by some ascribed to Sind, is but small for a capital; yet it is pretty well fortified, and of great importance as a frontier, since Kandabâr is in the hands of the Persians. It has many good cities under its jurisdiction, as Kozdâr, or Kordâr, Kandav. l., Sandur, and others. Multân furnishes the best bows, and nimblest dancers, in all Hindûstân. Being not far from the Indus, it had formerly a very good trade: but as at present vessels cannot ascend so high up, because the river is spoiled in some places, and the mouth full of shelves, the traffick is much diminished. However the province yields abundance of cotton, c sugar, opium, galls, brimstone, and camels. Multân is the chief resort of the Banîyâns, for sake of trading into Persia, by Gâzna and Kandabâr. They are very jealous of their wives, who are fairer than the men, yet still of a very brown complexion, and given to paint. This city is properly the country of the Kâtri (or Kutteri); who, from thence, disperse themselves all over the Indies. These two sects (or casts) have a famous pagod here, to which pilgrimages are performed. The idol worshipped there, is clothed in red leather, has a black face, and two pearls in place of eyes: but the Mohammedan governor takes the offerings, which are made to it^d.

Kâbulestân.

THE province of Kâbul, or Kâbulestân, is separated on the north from Tartary by Kâf Dâghi (that is, Mount Caucasus); Kashmîr lies to the east, Zâbulestân and Kandabâr to the west, and Multân to the south. The country, though watered by two of the rivers which fall into the Indus, yet, being very cold and mountainous, is not very fruitful: for all this, it is very rich, on account of its great trade with the rest of India, Persia, and the country of the Uzbeks; who alone sell there yearly above 60,000 horses. It is situated so conveniently for traffick, that nothing is wanting there, and all things are very cheap.

City of Kâbul.

THE city of Kâbul is very large, and has two strong castles, with a great many palaces; as kings have resided there, and princes successively have had it for their portion.

THIS province is full of aromatic trees and drugs, which are very profitable; and yields iron, which is fit for all uses. Mirabolans grow in the mountains, whence that fruit is called kâbuli by the orientals; and from hence especially come the canes, of which they make e halberts and lances. Kâbulestân is full of small cities, towns, and villages. As most of the inhabitants are heathens, there are a great many pagods there. At the full moon in February they celebrate the feast of Hûli, which lasts two days, in honour of Krushman (or Krishna) slaying a giant. This country supplies the Indies with physicians; who are all Banjâns (or Baniyâns), and some of them very skilful^e.

Kashmîr: its site;

THE province of Kashmîr, or Kishmîr, is bounded on the west by Kâbulestân, on the east by part of Tibet, on the south by Labûr, and on the north by Tartary (G). It is surrounded intirely by mountains, of very difficult ascent, and crossed (only in two or three places) by very narrow passages. It is one of those countries called Turk Hind, that is, the India of the Turks, or the Turkey of India; as having formerly belonged to the kings of Turkestân.

extent;

KASHMIR is a very fair champain, diversified by little hillocks, about thirty leagues in length, and ten or twelve in breadth (H). Their histories say, that it was once a great lake, till the holy man let out the waters, by a miraculous gap which he made in the mountain of Baramoule. The mountains which inclose this little kingdom consist of two ranges, the higher and the lower. The latter, which are next to the plain, are of a middle height, all green with trees or pasture; stored with all sorts of cattle and game, without any

^c HAMILT. p. 125, & seqq.

^d THEVENOT, p. 55, & seqq.

^e Ibid. p. 57, & seq.

(G) Sbarîfo'ddîn Ali, in his life of Timûr Bek, l. iv. p. 95. says Kashmîr is of an oval figure; that it has on the north Budakshân (in Great Bukharia) and Khorassân; with the hords of the Ougâni (Augân, or Afgâns), on the west.

(H) The flat country in the middle is twenty leagues in breadth, from mountain to mountain. In the whole province there are 10,000 flourishing villages, full of fountains and green plains: but according to the common opinion, there are no fewer than 100,000 in the plains and mountains. Tim. Bek, l. iv. p. 95, & seqq.

a wild beasts. Above these mountains rise others, exceeding high, and always covered with snow.

Out of all these mountains issue innumerable springs and rivulets; which, at last, meeting, ^{springs and} make a very fair river, as large as the Seine: and this river, having gently made the circuit ^{rivers.} of the country, and passed through the capital city, goes out of Kashmîr at Baramoule, between two steep rocks. After this, it receives many small rivers, from the mountains, and falls into the Indus towards Atok. The country, being so plentifully watered, looks like a great ever-green garden, intermixed with towns and villages. They have here all sorts of European fruit-trees, with many of their plants and flowers, besides those of the country^c.

THE capital, which bears the same name (I) (and is by some called Sirenâker), is ^{The capital} without walls, two miles and a quarter long, to a mile and half broad; about two leagues ^{Sirenâker.} from the mountains, and standing on a lake of sweet water, four or five miles in compass. It is made by the rivulets from the mountains, and falls, by a navigable canal, into the river, which passes through the city, where it is crossed by two wooden bridges. The houses are of wood, well built, and two or three stories high, with gardens. The lake is full of little isles, adorned with trees and shady walks. Beyond the lake, on the side of the hills, there is nothing but houses and gardens of pleasure, which make a charming prospect.

THE finest of all those gardens is that of the king, called Shâb-limar. From the lake one ^{Fine garden.} enters it by a great canal, which is above 500 paces long, and runs, between two alleys of poplars, to a great cabinet in the middle of the garden; where begins another more magnificent canal, which runs to the end of the garden to another cabinet, with a row of water-spouts in the middle, at every fifteen feet. These cabinets which are made like domes, in the midst of the canal, have each a gallery round it, and four gates; two facing the poplar alleys, with bridges to pass over them; the two others look towards the canals. Each cabinet consists of a great chamber in the middle, and four lesser ones at each corner, all painted and gilded within. The gates are very rich, made of great stones, finer than porphyry^f.

IT is not without cause that the Mogols call Kashmîr the paradise of the Indies; and that Jehân Ghîr was so enamoured with it, as to say, he would sooner lose all the rest of his empire than this little province; whose dominion once extended over all the neighbouring mountains (including the Little Tibet, the state of Râjab Gamon, Kâshgar, and Serenâgher), as ^d far as *Great Tatar*y, and over all Hindûstân, as far as the island of Seylân, or Ceylon.

THE inhabitants of Kashmîr have the reputation of being very witty, much more intelligent ^{Inhabitants} and dexterous than the Indians, and as fit for poetry and the sciences as the Persians. They ^{very witty,} are besides very industrious: they make Paleki's (or Palankîns), and various kinds of moveables, which they varnish very curiously, and vend all over the Indies; but their most profitable manufacture are the stuffs called shales. These are an ell and a half long to one broad, embroidered at the ends twelve inches deep. The Mogols and Indians, of both sexes, wear them in winter on their heads, passing them over their left shoulder, like a mantle. They make two sorts; one of the wool of the country, finer than the Spanish; the other of hair, finer than beaver, taken from the breast of a wild goat in Great Tibet. Of this sort some cost ^e 150 crowns; the price of the other sort seldom exceeds fifty.

THE Kashmîrians look as well as any Europeans; having nothing of the Tatarian flat nose, ^{and handsome,} and little eyes, like those of Kâshgar, and most of the people of Great Tibet. The women especially are very beautiful; and as fair as in any part of Europe^s. This beauty of the females is confirmed by a famous Persian author; who says, it has passed into a proverb among the Persian poets. There are three roads into the country; that from Khorassân, in Persia, is so difficult, that the passengers are obliged to carry their goods on their backs, which the beasts are not able to do. The road of Indic is equally difficult. That of Tobbot, or Tibet, is easiest^h. Akbar took this kingdom from Justaf Khân, its natural prince, after he had reduced his son Yâkûb by forceⁱ.

^f THE province of Labûr lies to the south of Kashmîr, and north of Dehli. Moltân lies to ^{the west,} the west, and to the east are high mountains, in many places inhabited by Râjabs; part of ^{whom are independent.} whom are independent. This is one of the largest and most plentiful provinces of the Indies. It is rendered fertile by the rivers, especially five; whence it takes the name of Panjâb; that is, ^{five rivers.} is, five rivers. Rice, corn, and fruits, abound here. It has pretty good wine, and the best sugars of all Hindûstân. All sorts of manufactures are found in the towns, which make it a rich country.

THE capital city, called Labûr, is 100 leagues from Dehli, and 150 from Agra, the whole Lahûr city; road being a lovely alley between shady trees. Multân lies threescore and odd leagues distant.

^c BERNIER, ubi supr. part iv. p. 83, & seqq. ubi supr. part iv. p. 90—97.

^f Ibid. ubi supr. part iv. p. 85, & seqq.

^s Ibid.

^h Hist. Tim. Bek, l. iv. p. 96.

ⁱ THEV. ubi supr. p. 59.

(I) In the time of Timur Bek, called Nâgaz, where the prince and his court resided. The river, though very rapid, comes from a single fountain. It had over it more than thirty bridges of boats, seven of them in the city. Tim. Bek, l. iv. p. 96.

It is situated on the Râvi, one of the five rivers above-mentioned, which all fall into the a Indus. This city, which is large, was very handsome when the kings kept their court in it.
 The castle, which still remains, is very strong; nor has the royal palace within it yet lost its beauty: there are a great many pompous paintings on the walls, representing the actions of the Great Mogols. It was only a borough before the time of Humayûn; who made a city of it, built the castle, and kept his court there. By this means it so increased, that, in a short time, it extended no less than three leagues in length. At present, there are streets above a league in length, full of ruinous palaces; and the houses run daily to decay.

THERE are a great many pagods on the road from Labûr to Debli, especially towards the town of Tanassar; where there is a convent of religious Hindûs, called Vartias^k.

Ayud, or Audih.

THE province of Ayud, or Hawd, contains the most northern countries belonging to the b Mogols, as Kakares, Bânkish, Nâgarkut, Siba, and others. It is watered by rivers which fall into the Ganges; so that, notwithstanding the mountains which are in it, it is exceeding fertile; and its trade with the countries to the north-east renders it very rich. There are many independent Râjabs in this province, and two pagods of great note, one at Nâgarkût, which is by far most famous, because dedicated to the idol Mâtta. The other at Kalamâk, which is venerated, because the Indians look on it as a miracle, that the water of the town should be very cold, and yet spring from a rock which continually belches out flames. This rock belongs to the mountain of Balagât^l. This province is written Audih by Frazer, who makes the capital of the same name.

Varad, or Varal.

THE province of Varad, or Varal, resembles in every respect that of Ayud, as to soil, fer- c tility, trade, and wealth. It contains the more north-eastern countries of Hindûstân; namely Gor, Pitân, Kandûâna, and some others^m.

Beker province.

BEKAR comprises the provinces of Dowâb (K), Jesuat, and Udesseb. It is watered also by rivers which fall into the Ganges, like Ayud and Varad. It lies east of Debli, and is the most eastern province of Hindûstân; which on that side is bounded by the mountains of Udesseb.
 It is large and very rich, containing several good cities; the principal of which are Sâmbal, Menapûr, Râjabpûr, Jebânak, and especially Bekâner, which is the capital, situate to the west of the Ganges. In this province, and the two above-mentioned, there are to be found some of all the casts and tribes of the Indians; which are said to be eighty-four in numberⁿ.

Halabâs province,

THE province of Halabâs, formerly called Purop, comprehends those of Narvar and d Mevât, which have on the south Bengâl. The chief city bears the same name (L), and is situate on the Ganges, at the mouth of the river Jemini (or Jemua). For a long time it was one of the bulwarks of the kingdom of the Patans. Akber having taken it, after he had subdued Bengâl, caused a strong citadel to be built there; which stands on a tongue of land, inclosed with three walls, whereof the outmost is of very hard red stone. In this castle is a very antient obelisk, above sixty feet high, with many inscriptions on it; but the letters are so defaced that one cannot distinguish the characters.

and city.

THE king's palace is a beautiful building; and underneath it there are places arched; where the pagods of the country are kept, which the people of the province ascribe to Adam and Eve; who, they believe, were created there, and whose religion they pretend to follow. e
 This brings, at certain times, incredible numbers of people in pilgrimage from all parts of the Indies; who, before they approach the sacred place, purify themselves in the Ganges, and shave their heads as well as beards.

THERE are a great many considerable cities in this province; among which are Narvâl and Jebûd: but the people are so various and extravagant in point of religion, that one can hardly tell what to make of it. Halabâs is pestered with Fakirs, a kind of religious mendi-cants, who perform strange penances, and are great knaves; but not quite so bad as the Mohammedan Fakirs^o.

Bengâl province.

THE province of Oulesser, which we call Bengâl, is named by the Hindûs, Jaganat, from f the pagod of Jaganat, which is there. It is inhabited mostly by Hindûs; who are as fantastical in their religion as those of Halebis, and a hundred times more numerous than the Mohammedans.
 They are, for the general, extremely voluptuous, have a piercing wit, and much given to stealing. The women themselves are bold and lascivious; using all sorts of arts to debauch young men, especially strangers, whom they easily trepan, because they are handsome, and go well-dressed. The people here live much at ease, because the country is so fruitful. One finds here above 20,000 Christians. This province was kept in far better order under the Pâtan kings, who reigned there before the Mohammedans and Mogols became masters of it;

^k THEV. ubi supr. p. 60, & seq.

^l Ibid. p. 62.

^m Ibid.

ⁿ Ibid. p. 63.

^o Ibid. p. 66.

(K) De Laet de magni mogolis imperio, p. 11. says Do ab signifies the country between the two rivers, as lying between the Ganges and Jemni, and seems to be the same called by others Sâmbal, or Sâmbel.

(L) Formerly called Praya; some write Praga.

a because there was then uniformity in religion. It has been found, that disorder was introduced with Mohammedism, and that diversity of religions hath caused corruption of manners^f.

BENGAL is by some travellers esteemed more fertile than Egypt. It supplies many foreign Fertility countries with rice, sugar, and sweetmeats. For half-a-crown one may have twenty good pullets; also ducks and geese in proportion. Kid, mutton, and pork, are in great plenty. No country affords such store of calicoes and silks, salt-petre, lakka, opium, wax, and civet. The worst of all to strangers is the air.

b BENGAL, taking it near a hundred leagues in length, on both sides of the Ganges; from Râjab Mâhl to the sea, is full of great canals, formerly cut out of that river, with vast labour, and reaching far into the country, for the conveniency of transporting commodities. These canals are on both sides lined with towns and villages; to which belong large fields, bearing rice, sugar-canes, corn, sesamum, small mulberry and other trees. These, joined to the vast number of great and small islands, made by those canals, give an incomparable beauty to the country^g.

BENGAL is full of castles and cities; as Philipâtan, Satigan, Patane, Kasan Bazâr, and Chatigan. As the Indians esteem the Ganges sacred, their chief pagods are built near it; among which the two chief are those of Jaganat and Banârûs. In short, here idolatry reigns triumphant^h. The chief towns on the west branch of the Ganges are, first, Hughli (or Ogûli), a place of great trade. The Dutch have a factory at Chinchura, which is contiguous to it, and Hughli. c another at Barnagur, twenty miles lower. A little below that, the English have a factory, called Fort William, at the town of Kalkutta; and about three miles below Hughli, at Char-nagur (or Cbandernagor), the French have a factory.

KASSEM BAZAR, or Kasan Bazâr, is a large and rich town, about 100 miles above Hughli. Kâstem Here the English and Dutch have factories. Twelve miles higher is Mâsfûd abâd, or Râjab Bazâr. Mâhl, formerly the greatest place for trade on the Ganges, before it removed to Kâstem Bazâr. Forty or fifty miles to the east of Râjab Mâhl is Mâldo, a large town, where the English and Dutch had factories. The next city is Pâtana, or Pâtna, where the prince of Bengâl, who is always of the royal blood, resides. About 100 miles farther up stands Bannâres (M) (or Banâres or Banârûs), which is celebrated for its sanctity, and being the university of the Indies. Kâshi.

d ON the easternmost branch of the Ganges, which is largest, lies Dâkka, or Dâak, under the tropic of Cancer, the largest city in all Bengâl, and properly the capital. It is narrow; Dâkka the capital but extends four miles and half along the river. Most of the houses are only of canes covered with earth. The English and Dutch houses are more solid. As the tide comes up as high as Dâkka, it renders trade there very easy. Fifty leagues lower this branch of the Ganges falls into the sea, 100 leagues distant from the western mouth, or branch, at Chittagoung, called by the Portugueses Xatigâm (or Sbatigâm), the last town of Bengâl, and the Mogol's empire, eastward; at present a very poor placeⁱ.

THE province of Mâlva lies to the west of Bengâl and Halabâs. It includes the countries Mâlva pro- of Râjab Rânas, Gwâliar, and Chitôr. This province is very fertile, and produces whatever vince is found in the rest. Ratispôr is the capital, and place of greatest traffick. It is situated on a Ratispôr the mountain. Traitors condemned to die are sent to the castle of this city; from the top of capital which they are precipitated. Mândo is a fine city, seated at the foot of a hill, on the top of which stands the castle. The ruins of temples and palaces shew it to have been a large and sumptuous place. Chitôr is likewise a famous city, but almost ruined. It stands on a Chitôr very high hill, which is plain at top, walled about at least ten miles. The remains of 100 pagods, many fair palaces, and above 100,000 houses, are still visible. There is but one ascent to it, cut in the rock, and secured with four gates. It was taken by Akber from Râjab Rânas^j. Row mentions, as the chief cities, Ujen, (or Eujin) the present capital, Nar, and Seringe.

f KANDISH (or Khandeysh) lies to the south of Mâlva; and they who reduced the number of Kandish pro- provinces joined to it Berar (N), and what the Great Mogol possesses of Orixa. The whole vince taken together is of vast extent; is full of populous towns and villages, and few countries in all the empire equal it for riches. It abounds with cotton, and manufactures of that produce^k. In the above-mentioned province of Berar (of which Row and Terry make Shâpûr; or Shâkpûr, the capital) Herbert places the fortrefs of Rota, or Roughâtâz, made impregnable both by Fortrefs of nature and art^l. It is seated on a hill, the sides of which are perpendicular. There is only Rotâs.

^f THEV. p. 67. HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 17, & seqq.

^g BERNIER, ubi supr. part iv. p. 149, & seqq.

^h THEV. p. 68.

ⁱ HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 19, & seqq. THEV. p. 68.

^j Ibid. p. 69. TERRY,

p. 82.

^k THEV. p. 71.

^l HERB. Trav. Ind. p. 63.

(M) Called also Waranâsi, and Vâna Râjab; and, by the Hindûs in the peninsula on this side Ganges, Kâfi, or Kâshi.

(N) Which before belonged to Bengâl, according to Herbert, p. 63, of his Travels.

one way of going up (O) to the top, where there is a plain sowed with rice and corn, half a league in compafs (P). He adds, that the castle is fortified with six bastions, and twenty-seven pieces of cannon, with three moats full of water, and replenished with good fish. The plain is watered by above twenty springs; but all the rest of the mountain is a steep precipice, covered with over-grown woods. The Râjabs formerly used to live in this fort with 7 or 800 men: but the Great Mogol took it by the policy of Amîr Jemla, although before it was never forced by any king of India^y. Herbert, who was in India in the year 1636, says, it was then in the hands of the Great Mogol, and was taken by stratagem, as will be related hereafter, by Mobeb Ali Khân in the reign of Akbar^z.

Brâmpûr the capital.

THE capital of Kandîsh is Brâmpûr, about eighty leagues from Surât. The governor is commonly a prince of the blood, of which Aureng Zib affords an instance. It is a great city, standing on such very uneven ground, that the low streets look like ditches, when viewed from the higher: and these inequalities occasion much fatigue. The houses are not handsome, being of earth; but, as they are covered with varnished tiles of divers colours, the roofs, seen through variety of green trees, make an agreeable prospect. The meydân is above 500 paces long and 350 wide: but the ugly huts where fruit and herbs are sold, of which it is full, makes it look unhandsome. Two karawânserays stand facing it; and from it you enter the castle; whose walls are six or seven fathom high, with battlements, and at intervals large round towers, jetting far out, above thirty paces diameter. The east front of it is washed by the Tâpti, which runs by the east side of the city; and in that part the walls are eight fathom high, with neat galleries at top. Whence the emperor, when at Brâmpûr, views the fighting of elephants, which is commonly in the midst of the river; where there is the figure of that animal in reddish stone, erected by Shâh Jehân, in memory of one which died fighting in his presence: for the palace is within the castle.

Great trade.

THE water of the river being brackish, the inhabitants are supplied from a large tank, or basin, which is in the meydân. Beyond the Tâpti is a pretty large suburb. The trade of Brâmpûr equals that of any other city. Besides chints, there are white calicoes mixed with gold and silver; whereof the rich make veils, scarfs, handkerchiefs, and coverings. The same trade is driven at Orixa (or Orîsha), Berar, and other towns of this province^a.

BESIDES the provinces already described, five more belong to the Mogol's empire; namely, Ballagât Proper, Baglâna, Telenga, Viziapur, and Golkonda; the description of which will be given, when we come to treat of the hither peninsula of the Indies, wherein they are situated.

^y TAVERN. Trav. Ind. part ii. c. 13, p. 139.

^z HERB. ubi supr.

^a THEV. p. 71, & seq.

(O) Herbert says, the way is cut obliquely in the firm rock for three miles together.

(P) Herbert says, the plain at top is eight miles in diameter, and twenty-four in circumference; abounding with water and necessaries: also that sixteen villages were inclosed within the castle-wall.

C H A P. III.

Inhabitants of Hindûstân.

Various nations.

HINDUSTAN is inhabited by several different kinds of people; as the Hindûs, the Pâtans, or Afghâns, the Baluchis, the Parsîs, and the Mogols, or Tatars; besides several foreigners, particularly Jews and Christians, of various sects. All, excepting the Hindûs, who are the antient inhabitants, have settled there by conquest, or accident; having been induced by commerce, or compelled by war, and persecution, to abandon their native countries.

The Hindûs.

THE Hindûs are the original occupants; and, though subject to the Mogol, still preserve the superiority in numbers: being at least a hundred to one (A) compared with all the rest.

The Parsîs.

THE Parsîs are the descendants of the ancient Persians (B), who worshipped the fire. These, to avoid the persecutions or oppressions of the Mohammedans, on their first conquest of Persia, fled in great numbers by sea to India; where they settled on the western peninsula, chiefly about Surât, and there they still remain.

The Pâtans.

THE Pâtans were those from whom the Mogols conquered Hindûstân (C). Authors are divided about their original. Some say, they came from Pâtna, or Pâtana, a province in

(A) Some say many hundreds to one.

(B) Parsi signifies one belonging to Pârs, or Persia.

(C) Thevenot makes the Pâtan kings to have reigned in Hindûstân, before the Mohammedans and Mogols conquered it. Trav. Ind. ch. 40. p. 68. Frazer says, the Pattans and Afghâns are the same people. Hist. of Nadir Shâh, p. 7.

- a Bengál, beyond the Ganges^a. But it is more likely they are the descendants of those Mohammedans, Turks, Persians, and Arabs, who, about the year 1000, first became masters of Dehli and Multán, under Soltán Mahmúd Gázni^b. These people are still very numerous throughout Hindústán, chiefly in the north-west parts, towards Kábul, Gházná, and Kandabár; from whence, in all probability, they originally came. They still inhabit the same provinces of the Persian empire, where they are chiefly known by the name of Afgháns (D). They have a great aversion to the Mogols, for having dispossessed them of their territories; and, being high-spirited, still entertain hopes of recovering from them what they seized. The meanest of them frequently use this expression, Let me never be king of Dehli, if it be not so. These people are fierce and warlike. They now possess many of the mountainous parts;
- b where some have erected petty sovereignties, like the Rájabs^c. They have, from time to time, given great uneasiness to the Mogols; and had no small share in the late revolution brought about in that empire by Nádir Sháh.

THE Baluchis are another nation who possess several parts of Hindústán, to the west of the Sind, or Indus; particularly the province of Hajakbán^d. But in Persia, where also they seem to have had their original, they are masters of a much greater dominion; for they are spread over all the large province of Makrán, and the neighbouring parts. They are a barbarous people, given to rapine: nor do they pay much obedience to either of the monarchs to whom they are reckoned as subjects.

- c THE Moguls, or Jagatays, are the present lords of Hindústán, where they reign over the rest, for the most part, with an absolute sway. To these five nations we may add the Europeans who have settled there; particularly the Portugueses, Spaniards, English, Dutch, French, and Danes. The first established themselves along the coasts of both peninsulas, and in the islands, chiefly by force; but were afterwards dispossessed almost every-where by the Dutch. The Spaniards also made some conquests, as that of the Philippine islands: but the other three nations settled in the Indies by treaty with the inhabitants, or permission of their kings.

Of the several nations above-mentioned, the Hindús and Parsís are pagans; but excel all the rest in modest deportment, and the practice of virtue. The Pátans, Baluchis, and Mogols, are Mohammedans. The two first being given to arms, and of a restless disposition, are subject on slight occasions to revolt, and plunder their neighbours, without distinction.

- d However, the Pátans and Mogols are pretty strict observers of their law, and the rules of justice, at least among themselves.

HAVING given our readers this general idea of the several nations inhabiting Hindústán, we proceed to treat more particularly of three of them, viz. the Mogols, the Hindús, and the Parsís.

I.

Of the Mogols, or Jagatays.

- e THE natives of Hindústán are like the Europeans as to stature: but generally very strait; for our author never saw or heard of any crooked or deformed person; nay, nor any idiot, or natural fool, among them. Their complexion is of a deep tawny, or olive colour: their hair jet black, very harsh, but not curled. They like not people who are very white or fair; because that is the colour of lepers, who are common in those parts.

Most of the Mohammedans, except their priests and antient men, keep their chins constantly shaven: but let the hair on their upper lip grow very long; and keep it of the natural colour, by means of black-lead combs. They likewise shave their heads all over, leaving only a lock on the crown, by which they expect to be drawn up to heaven by their prophet Mohammed. They wear, instead of hats or bonnets, a kind of turban, made with a piece of narrow callico, wound several times about the head^e.

- f THE inhabitants in general are very civil and courteous, as well to strangers as one another. They salute not by pulling off their head-attire, but by bowing their head, or their body, laying the right hand on their breast, and uttering compliments as they pass. The meaner people salute their superiors in a very submissive or abject manner; either by putting their right hand to the ground, and then laying it on their head, or else by falling on their knees, and then bowing their head to the earth. In their more familiar salutations, they take each other by the chin or beard (E), and cry, Bába, father, or Bij, brother. Their usual compli-

^a TERRY Voy. East Ind. sect. vii. BERNIER's Memoirs, c. 2. p. 17.

^c BERNIER, ibid.

^e TERRY Voy. Ind. p. 376. sect. 5.

(D) Or, as others write, Agwáns, Auguán: according to their different way of pronouncing the word. Frazer, in his history of Nádir Sháh, p. 7, says, the Pátans and Afgháns are the same. So do some of our old

^b See Hist. Turks, Moguls, &c. p. 754, & seqq.

^d TERRY Voy. Ind. p. 387. sect. 7. fol. edit.

^e TERRY

English travellers, such as Steel, and Crowther in Purchas Pilgr. vol. i. p. 521.

(E) This is an antient custom; for so Joab saluted Amaja.

ments at meeting are, God give health: I wish you the prayers of the poor, or that one good may arrive to you quick after another. Inferior people, whose dependance is on others, say, I eat your bread and salt; as much as to say, I am your servant, and at your disposal.

The mens dress. THE dress of the Hindûstâns is all the same, in great and small, rich and poor, differing only in the cost; for they never alter their fashions. Their coats to the waist fit close to their bodies, from whence they hang loose a little below their knees, the skirts sitting pretty full. These coats are fastened to their shoulders by slips of the same cloth, which is commonly white callico (F), and likewise to their waists, in the same manner, on both sides: besides, as they double over the breast, they are there also fastened, or made close, by such slips of cloth, thick set from the left arm-pit to the middle. The sleeves are long and tight, that they may ruffle from their elbows to their wrists. Under this out-coat they usually wear another slight one, of the same cloth, but shorter, in the nature of a vest: and this is all the cloathing generally worn on the upper part of their bodies. But some of the greater sort, in the cooler parts of the day, slip on loose coats over the other, made of quilted silk or callico, or else of English scarlet cloth: for that is the colour they most affect. Under their coats they wear long breeches, like trowsers, which fall down to their ankles, and ruffle on the small of their legs: for their feet are always bare in their shoes; but as clean as their hands.

Head attire. THE covering of their heads is made with a long piece of cloth, about half a yard broad, commonly white, and sometimes interwoven with threads of silk, gold, or silver, at least at one end, for ornament. This cloth, which they call a sash, winds round the head several times, and is a very great defence against the sun. However, as it must keep their heads hot, they endeavour to remedy that inconvenience by continual shaving. They have girdles of the same kind of sashes, which go twice at least about them, the ends hanging down before.

Womens dress. THE dress of the Mohammedan women differs but little from that of the men, wearing coats and breeches of the same fashion; only they bind their hair with long fillets, which hang down behind. They wear likewise on their heads mantles or veils of callico, which hang down over their other garments. They bore their ears not only in the flaps, but round the rims, in which they wear small pendants, made of thin and narrow pieces of gold or silver, brass or iron, according to the quality of the person. The lower part of their left nostril is also pierced, for putting in rings of those metals, at pleasure; the ends of their gold rings meeting in a pearl drilled for the purpose. As the women of prime quality never appear abroad, our author could not say in what manner they were adorned with jewels: but he observed, that some of the better sort, whom he had seen, wore great hollow rings of gold enamelled, silver, or brass, upon their wrists and the small of their legs, two or three on each limb; which make a tinkling when they move^f.

Their diet. ALTHOUGH Hindûstân affords abundance of flesh and fowl, which are exceeding cheap, yet the Mohammedans, who are very temperate, do not feed much on them; and when they do, it is sparingly, and in conjunction with other diet. They dress no kind of meat in whole joints, and seldom their fowls whole; boiling, baking, and roasting, being parts of cookery quite unknown to them. They stew all their flesh, cut into slices or small pieces, putting to it onions, herbs, roots, green ginger, and other spices, with some butter; which makes a mess exceeding palatable. They sometimes with their other flesh mince that of fowls; which is like the Spanish oleo, but more delicious. But their common dish is rice; which they boil plump, without letting it break; seasoning it with ginger, pepper, and butter. In this form it is very good. Sometimes they make pillaw, by boiling pieces of flesh, venison, mutton, or fowls, in their rice, which they manage with art^g.

Bread. THEY have several sorts of grain to make bread, especially wheat; which is more full and white than the English. The ordinary people use a coarser grain; which yet makes very good and hearty bread. They make it up like oaten cakes, and bake it on small round iron hearths (or plates); which they carry with them when they travel. Their butter, though soft, being cream beaten to a kind of thick oil, is very good. They have also plenty of cheese, made of milk taken from cows, sheep, goats, and buffalos; which last is very good.

Drink. THE common drink of the inhabitants of Hindûstân is water; which is rendered far more pleasant and sweet than ours by the heat of the sun. Hence all strangers choose it as well as the natives, and find it agree better with their bodies than any other liquor. Sometimes they boil feeds in it, to give it a flavour; and it is observed to be colder after heating than it was before. They have, besides water, two sorts of wine in the Indies, one natural, the other di-

(F) Although the *grande*s sometimes use silks, plain, or striped, of several colours, or slight silver or gold brocade; yet, for the general, they choose the pure white and fine callico lawn. The collars, and some other parts of their upper coats, being set off with needle-work.

^f TERRY Voy. Ind. p. 409, & seqq. sect. 11.

^g Ibid. p. 406, sect. 10.

a filled ^b. What we call natural wine is the juice of a tree, and called Toddi. It is drawn ^{Distilled from} from it by making incisions in the branches, which grow only towards the top, and hanging ^{gourds} underneath pots, made of gourds, to receive the juice. This is done over-night, and early next morning the pot is taken away, and the vents stopped up. The liquor which distils from the tree is very clear, pleasant, and wholesome. If drank before noon it is then diuretic and inoffensive, only a little windy, like wine upon the must; but if kept till the heat of the day, it becomes unwholesome, not well relished, and very intoxicating: on which account the European sailors are very fond of it; and it is very cheap. Their distilled wine is drawn from sugar, and the spicy rind of a tree called Jagra. The Indians call it Raak (or Arak). Our author says it is very wholesome, if taken moderately (G); and that there was no great quantity made of it. Although they have excellent grapes, they make no wine, as being forbidden by the law of Mohammed. Those who are strict observers of their religion drink no wine at all, but use coffee (H). To supply the place of it likewise, they use Betel, or Pawne; which is the leaf of a shrub, like the ivy leaf, but more tender. They chew the same along with a hard nut shaped like a nutmeg, and a very little pure lime mixed with the leaves: of this composition, when chewed, they only let down the juice. They ascribe to it many rare qualities, particularly to strengthen the stomach, comfort the brain, preserve the teeth, and cure or prevent a tainted breath. This our author observes, in confirmation hereof, that, when chewed in a close room, the breath of the person using it fills the place with a very agreeable scent.

c To give our readers the better idea of the diet, as well as manner of eating, in use among ^{Entertain-} the Mogols of Indiſtan, we shall insert an account of the entertainment made by Asif Khân, ^{ments.} in the reign of Jehin Gbir, for Sir Thomas Rowe, the English ambassador. The feast was served up in a very spacious and beautiful tent, well perfumed; the floor of which was covered over with very rich and large carpets. These were covered again, in the places where the dinner was served, with other carpets of stitched leather, which were spread with fine white callico cloths. On these were ranged a great number of silver dishes, with gilt brims, most part of them no larger than plates. To this entertainment none of the ambassador's retinue were admitted, excepting his chaplain, Mr. Terry. The three sat cross-legged on the ground, as it were in a triangle, facing each other, Sir Thomas being placed at a good distance from the Khân, on his right hand. Each had his meals to himself. The ambassador's d consisted of ten dishes more, and his chaplain's of ten less, than what the Khân had, which were sixty. All the dishes were set before them at once, and spaces left between, for the waiters to come and reach them to the parties one after another. So that our author tasted a little of each, and found them all well relished.

As to the provision itself, the larger dishes were filled with rice, dressed as before described, ^{Kind of dishes.} and tinged with different colours. Many others were furnished with flesh of several kinds, pullers, and other sorts of fowls, all cut in little pieces. To these succeeded variety of jellies, and culices: flour of rice boiled, and then sweetened with sugarcandy and rose-water, to be eaten cold. Among the rest was a very delicious dish made of the flesh of pullers, stewed e with rice-flour and almonds, pounded exceeding small; then, being beaten to pieces so fine that it could not be discerned, all was mixed together, and sweetened with rose-water and sugarcandy, and perfumed with ambergrise. The Portugueses call this Mangee real, food for a king. Other dishes consisted of cakes in several forms, made of the finest wheat-flower, mixed with almonds and sugarcandy; some of them perfumed, others not. Towards the end came potatoes, excellently well dressed; divers kinds of sallads, and the curious fruits of the country, some preserved, others fresh. To these succeeded roots candied, almonds blanched, raisins of the sun, prunellas, and other things, to make up the number of dishes appointed ^k.

f THE Mohammedans in this country are married with much the same ceremonies as else- ^{Marriage.} where: for after the Mullah, or priest, has done his office, which is in the evening, they go in procession through the principal streets of the city: the man on horseback, with his relations and friends about him, preceded by many lights, drums, and wind-music; with some drolleries, to increase the merriment. The bride follows with her women friends, in covered coaches: and, having made their tour, return to the house of the married couple; where the company is entertained: although the Mohammedans are allowed to marry four wives, very few, and those only of the richer sort, take more than one, in the more western parts under ⁱ Ibid. p. 361, 365. sect. 2.

^b TERRY Voy. Ind. p. 358, 364. sect. 2. seq. sect. 10.

^k Ibid. p. 407, &

(G) Bernier says, it affects the nerves, and breeds incurable disorder, if taken a little immoderately. Me- moires, part III. p. 26.

(H) Mr. Terry observes of coffee (which in his time was little, if at all, known in England), that it was made of a black seed, boiled in water, which it turned almost of the same colour; but did not much alter the taste of it. He adds, that this liquor was more wholesome than palatable; being very good to help digestion, quicken the spirits, and cleanse the blood.

their dominion : but our author tells us of a servant belonging to Sir Thomas Rowe, who had a for wages no more than five shillings a moon, and yet had four wives.

THEY who have most wives and women are most jealous ; so that they will not suffer either the brothers or fathers to speak to them, but in their presence : and custom has made it a high reflection for a wife to be seen by any man besides her husband (I). Adultery and fornication also are reckoned so criminal, that, rather than the offender shall escape punishment, their own brother will not scruple to take away their lives : for which barbarity they shall not be called to an account, but commended. Great men have eunuchs to wait on or guard their women.

Common women.

Common women are tolerated here : but they must be registered or licensed before they can have liberty to open a house. Some of the better sort of these prostitutes, at certain times, repair to court, to divert the Great Mogol, with singing their wanton songs, and playing on b their timbrels ¹.

Easy labour.

THE women are exceeding happy in this part of the world, in having easy labour ; for it is common to see them one day riding great with child, and the next day ride again, carrying the infants in their arms. The children of the poorer sort go naked for several years ; only now-and-then their mothers cover them with a slight callico mantle. The eldest son by a lawful wife has a privilege above the rest, who call him budda, or their great brother ^m.

Burials.

THE Mohammedans wash the bodies of their dead ; which they bury not in their mosks or churches, but in some open place out of the towns ; digging the grave very deep and wide.

Sepulchres.

Their mourning over the deceased is immoderate, and often renewed every year, especially by the women, in their houses, and at their graves, which they bedew with tears ; frequently ask- c ing the party, as if living, Why would he die ? since he had such loving wives, such loving friends, and other comforts in this life. The men of greatest quality often provide fair sepulchres for themselves and nearest friends. For this purpose they inclose, with a wall, a good piece of ground, near some tank, or spring of water, in order to make fountains : then they erect little mosks, and near them tombs ; which are either round, square, hexagonal, or octagonal, with cupolas of stone over them. They are raised upon pillars, or else piers, with arches, and within is the body deposited. The workmanship is exceeding good. The rest of the ground is planted with fruit-trees and the choicest flowers.

THERE are likewise many handsome monuments erected in memory of such as they esteemed pîrs, or saints : in which are lamps continually burning ; with votaries, who have salaries, to d attend them. These sepulchres are daily resorted to by devout people : and certainly no places in the empire afford more delight than their burying-grounds ; nor do they bestow so much cost on any other structures : witness the famous sepulchre at Sekandra, three miles from Agra, begun by Akber and finished by his successor ⁿ ; of which an account is given by travellers.

Languages.

THE common language of the empire, called the Hindûstân, has much affinity with the Persian and Arabik ; but is more smooth, and easily pronounced ; very significant and concise. The characters are also very different, and written from the left hand to the right, like the European. The Persian is spoken at court, and the Arabik is the learned language ; although all the learning of the Mogols amounts to read and write ; for they have no logic, e nor rhetoric, but what is natural. However, the people themselves are men of very strong reason, and will speak off-hand on any subject exceeding well ; so that, if there was literature among them, they might produce many excellent works : and as it is, they are said to compose witty poems, as well as histories of their own, and the neighbouring countries. For all this, they have not many books (K) in use ; among which may be reckoned that of Aristotle, whom they call Aplis, and the physician Avicenna (L) ; both in Arabik. Their chief science seems to be astrology ; in which there are many pretenders : because the generality are infatuated with the belief of it, which is encouraged by the example of the court : for the Great Mogol has his astrologers about him ; nor does he undertake any thing of the least moment without consulting them ^p.

Learning.

Their belief,

THE religion of the Mogols, Afghâns, and Pâtans, is the Mohammedan, of the Sunni sect, such as the Turks are of, who hold Abubekr for the true successor of Mohammed, in opposition to the Sbiya, who acknowledge Ali in that quality as the Persians do. These make the greater part of the emperor's court, and consequently must weaken his interest when at war with Persia : however, they appear outwardly to be of the same opinion with the rest of the gran- f

¹ TERRY Voy. Ind. p. 430. & sect. 17.

ⁿ TERRY, p. 431, & seqq. sect. 18.

^m TERRY, ibid. and THEVENOT, part iii. ch. 24. p. 47.

^p TERRY, p. 412. sect. 12.

(I) Thevenot says, the Mohammedan women are very wanton, the Indian women very chaste. Trav. Ind. part iii. ch. 25, p. 47.

(K) In this, no doubt, Terry was mistaken, for want of being able to read their books, or converse with the natives : at least, matters have altered since his time, as may appear by the catalogue of MSS. on various subjects, brought from India by Mr. Frazer, and inserted at the end of his account of Nâdir Shâh.

(L) A corruption of Ebn Sina. His name was Abu ali ebn Sina.

a dees. When the kingdoms of Golkonda and Viziapûr were in being, the Shiya sect prevailed in the former, and in the territories of the latter the Sunni and the Shiya were mingled together^q. As to the number of Mohammedans, compared with the Pagans, there are at least an hundred, if not several hundreds, of the latter to one of the former^r.

We need not here insert an account of the Mohammedan religion and way of worship, and practice, which do not differ from what they are in other countries, whereof an account hath been already given^s. We shall therefore confine ourselves to a few particulars, which may deserve to be taken notice of. One respects the great strictness and devotion of the Mohammedans in the practice of their religion: another is the temperance observed by far the greater b part of them, as well as by the Hindûs, or Pagans, to such a degree, that they will rather die than eat, or drink, any thing which their law forbids (M); and what they do of either kind is merely to satisfy nature. For they hate gluttony, and look upon drunkenness as another madness; infomuch, that they have only one word in their language, namely mest, for a drunkard and a madman. The Mohammedans are very charitable: some build inns in great cities and towns for lodging travellers; others make wells and tanks, a kind of reservoirs, or cisterns, for the public use: while some keep servants to attend on the most frequented roads, with water in great skins, carried by buffalos, to refresh passengers and their beasts, at free cost^t.

Among the Mohammedans, as well as Pagans, there are many, who, out of devotion (or Monks, under the pretence of it), voluntarily undergo very rigid penances, far exceeding all the Romanists boast of. Of these there are two sorts: the first called Dervishes, who spend their lives in solitude and contemplation, retiring to the tops of hills, shaded with trees; where they fix their habitation, from whence they never stir. They never cease crying out, God Almighty look upon me; I love not the world, but thee; and do all this for thy sake. After their retirement, they let their hair and nails grow to their full length; and will perish, sooner than go out of their cells, depending for relief on the charity of others, who send them clothing and victuals; but both must be of the coarser kind, and the latter only for their immediate sustenance, otherwise they will not accept of them. Some impose on themselves tasks of fasting, without any food, for so long a time, that their natural strength is almost quite spent for want of nourishment.

d THE second part of penitents (called Fakîrs), wear nothing about them but what is sufficient to cover their nakedness; and, like mendicant friers in the Romish church, make a profession of begging for their subsistence. They commonly dwell in the out-skirts of towns; and, making little fires in the day, sleep at night in the warm ashes, with which they besmear their bodies. They sometimes take intoxicating drugs, which make them talk wildly: this draws the common people about them, who mistake such jargon for prophecy. Some, out of devotion, put iron fetters on their legs, so heavy, that they can scarce move with them; and then, covered with a blue mantle (which is the mourning colour), walk many miles, as fast as they can, barefoot, on the scorching ground, in pilgrimage to the tombs of their saints^u.

e THEY reckon, that there are in the Indies no fewer than eight hundred thousand Fakîrs, vastly numerous: besides twelve hundred thousand idolatrous mendicants, or penitents (called Jaghis); who, according to another author, are all vagabonds and lazy drones, imposing on the credulous multitude by a false zeal, and abundance of idle words; which pass on them for oracles. Of these Fakîrs there are several kinds: the almost naked sort, whom we have been speaking of, have no certain abode, and give themselves up to all manner of uncleanness. There are others, whose garments are of so many different pieces and colours, that one can hardly tell what they are made of. These reach half-way down their legs, and hide the rags which are underneath. They generally go in troops, and have their superior, known by his habit; which is commonly more abject, and full of patches, than those of his gang. He draws after him go in companies: f a great iron chain, above two yards long: this he rattles all the while he says his prayers, which he does with a loud voice, and an affected gravity, which draws the veneration of the people; who in the interim prepare dinner for him on the spot, where he takes his stand; which is generally in some street, or other public place.

THERE he causes his disciples to spread carpets; and, sitting down, gives audience to the people: on the other hand, his disciples go about publishing through the country, that God reveals to him his most important secrets, and gives him power to relieve persons in affliction by his advice. The multitude, who swallow all this delusion, approach him with great devo-

^q TAVERN. Trav. Ind. ch. i. p. 159.

^r BERNIER Mem. part ii. p. 22.

^s See vol. i. p. 1. & passim.

^t TERRY, p. 417, sect. 14. and p. 429, sect. 16.

^u TERRY, p. 427, & seq. sect. 16.

(M) Terry extols the people of Hindûstân (Voy. sect. 14.) for the observance of moral duties: and, according to Ovington, they are so peaceable and honest, that there had not been a criminal put to death for twenty years together; although, when he was there in 1609, some European pirates were going up to court, to be tried. Voy. to Surât, p. 230, & seq.

tion, as a holy man, pulling off their shoes, and prostrating themselves to kiss his feet. Then a the Fakîr, to shew his humility, reaches out his hand to kiss, makes them sit down by him, and he hears every-one apart. They boast of having a prophetic spirit; and, above all, to teach barren women a way how to procure children, and be beloved by whom they please. Some of these Fakîrs have more than 200 disciples, whom they assemble by the sound of a horn, or beat of drum. When they travel, they have their standard, lances, and other weapons; which they pitch in the ground near their master, when he reposes in any place.

Another sort.

THE third sort of Fakîrs are they, who, being born of poor parents, and desirous to understand the law, in order to become doctors, retire to the mosks; where they live on the alms which are given them. They employ all their time in reading the Korân; which they get by heart: and, if to this study they can but add the knowledge of some natural things, together with an exemplary life, they come to be chief of the mosks, and to the dignity of mullahs, and judges of the law. These Fakîrs marry; and some have three or four wives, thinking they do God great service, in begetting many children to be followers of his law, as they account the Korân ^b.

Toleration.

ALL religions are tolerated in Hindûstân; which makes the tyrannical government more easy to be endured: and the people treat the clergy of any persuasion with much respect ^v.

II.

Of the Hindûs, or Hindows, as divided into tribes, or families.

Hindûs
tribes;

THE Hindûs are divided into four great tribes, or orders, of people; 1. The men of the law, or the priesthood; 2. The men of arms, to which belong their Râjâs, or kings; 3. The merchants, or men of traffic; 4. The commonalty; in which are included mechanics, husbandmen, and all inferior kinds of people. ^c

THE first class is called by the Indians Brahmans, Brammans, or Bramins, as some authors write it. The names of the other tribes seem to differ in different parts of the country. Roger, who resided at Paliakût, in the kingdom of Karnâta, on the coast of *Choremânda*¹, calls the second order Settreas (N): Bernier, who got his information at Agra and Banâres, in the Mogol's empire, calls them Ketteris; and Thevenot, Katri. Lord, who conversed with the Baniyâns at Surât, with some little variation, Kutteris. The third order is named by Roger, Weynias; by others, Vanias, and Baneans, or Baniyans: Bernier calls it Biskû; ^d Lord, Shudderis; and by Thevenot, Soudr, and Kourmi. The fourth class is named Sawdras, (O) by Roger; Sidra, by Bernier; Wise, by Lord; and Wens, by Thevenot ².

their names.

THE disagreement found in the two last articles is not easy to be accounted for. Both Roger and Lord make the merchants, or Baniyans, the third order: but whereas the first calls them Shudderis; the latter gives that name (for Soudras is doubtless the same) to the fourth order; and although Thevenot agrees with Lord, in terming the third order Soudr (which is the same with Shudderis), yet he agrees with Roger as to the signification, by making them the commonalty; and differs from them both, in placing the merchants last. As to the difference in the names, it seems to arise from hence, that those given by Roger and Bernier denote their profession, or some other mark of distinction belonging to the respective ^e tribes; whereas the names made use of by Lord are derived from their great ancestors, like those of the two first, and taken immediately from the Shâster, one of the Hindûs sacred books; consequently of most authority in this matter.

THESE four principal classes of the Hindûs are subdivided into several subordinate classes; of which it will be necessary to give our readers some account.

1. Of the Brâmmans, or Brâmins.

Brâmmans
name;

THE Brâmmans derive their name from Brammon, the eldest son of Pourous, the first man (according to the Hindûs); or else from Brema, or Bremaw (P), the first created being of the second age, to whom the law was delivered; and are divided into 82 sects, or families ^f.

THE Bramins themselves say, that there is no race or family of men more worthy, or agreeable in the eyes of God, than theirs; and all the other Hindû families allow the first place

¹ TAVERN. ubi supr. ch. 2. p. 160.

² TERRY, p. 475, sect. 30.

³ ROGER Mesures des Bram.

p. 2. BERNIER's Mem. Mog. Emp. part iii. p. 145. LORD's Account of Banian Relig. c. 9. THEVEN.

part iii. ch. 38. p. 63.

⁴ LORD, ubi supr. ch. 10.

(N) There seems to be some mistake, perhaps in the printing, of Settreas for Ketteris; tho' it is every-where printed so in that author.

(O) The Râmjo missionaries to Karnâta, and Madûra, name them, 1. Bramins, or the nobles; 2. Kebarris, or the Râjâs; 3. Shoutres, or the common people; and 4. Pariâs, or the basest sort of all. De Faria, with still less care, names the classes as existing in the coast of Malabar; 1. Brammans; 2. Chatrier, or Ejkatrî; 3. Baefri, or Vaigher; 4. Chadra. See Litt. Edifi. tom. v. p. 18, & alibi. and Port. Asia, vol. ii. p. 391, 408.

(P) The Brâmmans themselves say, they are descended from the latter.

- a in dignity to be due to them. The Vedâm, or book of the law, which the Hindûs hold to be sent from God, had declared its esteem for this family, by ordering that a Brâmin shall not be put to death for any crime he commits, how atrocious soever it may be. His punishment is to be the loss of his sight: for it is reckoned one of the five great sins to kill a Brâmin, not to be expiated by less than a twelve years pilgrimage: during that time also the homicide is to beg alms, with the Brâmin's skull in his hand, out of which he is to eat and drink what is given him. And when the time of twelve years is expired, he is then to bestow much in alms himself, and build a temple in honour of Eswâra (or Isburen); nay the Vedâm has made the person of a Brâmin so sacred, that if one of them will go to war, and happens to be slain, that he who killed him must build the temple, in case he be able^a. Besides these b express precepts of the Vedâm, or Wedâm, the Brâmins claim, and obtain, from the Hindûs, no small veneration, on account that this book was delivered to them, and that they are the keepers of it^b.

In some parts of India, as on the coast of Malabar, Brâmmans are kings: they are in other countries frequently made governors of provinces, or cities, and are generally farmers under the Râjahs; and this probably gave rise to the account we meet with in the Shâster, of the race of Kutteris being destroyed, and kings supplied out of the Brâmmans; of which more in the next article.

- c THE tribe of Brâmmans is among the Hindûs, as the tribe of Levi among the Jews: but we shall consider them as priests, when we come to treat of the Hindû religion hereafter, in our account of the hither peninsula of India.

2. The Kuttereys, or Settreas.

THE Kuttereys, or Kutteris, had their name from Kutterey, the second son of Pourous: Kuttereys. and, as dominion and government was given to him, therefore all kings and soldiers are of this tribe^c; which properly consists of the nobility, named Râjab, who have a chief, or king, styled Râjab of Râjabs, and the God of the Râjabs; which is to be understood of the king of Bisnâgar, or Narsinga, in Karnatika, or Karnata.

- d IN former times, this family of nobles was divided only into two branches; the first named Sowri Wanjam, so called from the sun, which in the Samskörtam, or learned language, is named Sowri; because they are the true nobility. The other branch is named Soma Wanjam, from the moon. But there are at present, besides these two, many other branches, who do no great honour to their order, as having intermarried with other families; for which reason the two first branches do not marry with them.

THE office of nobles is to govern and defend the country against enemies: they are like-wise to take care, that the Brâmins be not in want. However, a great many of them are poor themselves: and as they cannot trade, their families often increase to such a degree, that the income of their lands will not maintain them: hence it is, that their children, being left poor, are obliged, for a livelihood, to serve the richer lords for soldiers^d; and these are they who are called Râjapûts (and corruptly Râspûts); that is, children of the Râjabs.

- e THE Hindûs of this tribe eat the flesh of all sorts of animals, excepting the cow.

THE Shâster tells us, that the ill-government of the kings and rulers, having been the source of all the disorders which occasioned the destruction of the world in the second age (or the second time), therefore God quite rooted out the whole tribe of the Kutteris; and that it might be renewed from a more holy stock, appointed that the line of the Râjabs should be restored from that of the Brâmmans: which was performed in the person of Râm, youngest son of Duserat, chief of the Brâmmans, who was preserved from destruction^e. But this holy line proved no better than the other: for they grew so wicked, that they brought the third destruction on the world^f: and in the fourth age, which is the present, it seems the Kutteris some-how sprung up again, since they now exist.

- f As this tribe of kings has suffered many changes in course of time, it may therefore be considered in three different states; its flourishing, declining, and present condition.

DURING their flourishing state, the Kuttereys were the antient sovereigns and rulers in India; especially that part called Guzzerat, and were stiled Râjahs, which signifies kings. These Râjahs, whose dominions were large, or small, according to their forces, had about them chiefly four persons of eminence. The first was a Brâmmann; who, by soothsaying and augury, predicted the times most proper for the king to begin any enterprise, which was to be attended with success. The second was the Pârdon; who managed affairs of state, and dispatched all matters of judicature under the Râjah. The third was the Moldar, or high chamberlain; who was commonly present, and conversed with the king. The fourth officer was the Disnakke, or general of his armies; who was sent upon all his military expeditions.

^a ROGER, ubi supr. p. 3, & seq. p. 5, & seqq.

^b THEVEN. ubi supr. ch. 38. p. 64.

^c Lord, ch. 11.

^d ROGER,

^e LORD'S Banian Relig. c. 14.

^f Ibid.

THE Râjahs (or rather Kuttereys) were then divided into thirty-six subordinate tribes, or a noble families; as the Cbâwrab, the Solenkis, the Vaggela, the Dodepuchas, the Paramars; and so forth.

declining state: TOUCHING the declining state of the Râjah tribe; their history relates, that a certain Râjah, named Rawisaldî, dying, his son Sideraysaldî, to honour his father's memory, erected a costly temple, and monument, at a place called Sitbejopolalpûr; and, being desirous that it should last for ever, consulted his Brâmmān, named Madewnaugher, upon that subject: the Brâmmān's answer was, that one Soltân Alao'ddin (Q), a Pûtan king of Debli, should deface the same, and also gain some considerable conquest in Guzzerât. To prevent this misfortune, the Râjah sends both his Brâmmān and Pârdon to Debli, in order to purchase peace with the Soltân, by a sum of money. When they got thither, they could hear of no Alao'ddin (for the king was not of that name), but the son of a shepherd, a boy, whom they found feeding a kid. However, concluding him to be the person mentioned in the prediction, they acquainted him with the good fortune which was to betide him, and offered him the money to spare their master's monument. Alao'ddin resolutely answered, that, if it was the will of heaven that he should destroy the monument, he could not avoid executing its decrees; and refused the present, till his parents, who were very poor, persuaded him to accept it. Hereupon he gave them a written instrument, importing, that, although heaven had decreed that he should scatter some stones of that building, yet he would pick them out of its corners in such a manner as might fulfil the prediction, without breaking his promise to the Sideraysaldî.

ALAO'DDIN, with the money thus obtained, raised forces, and was so prosperous in arms, that he became king of Debli: after which, he invaded Guzzerât, made great conquests from the Râjahs of that country, and fulfilled his engagement to Sideraysaldî, by sparing his monument. At length, being weary of the toil, he gave the government of his new acquisitions to Futter Khân, his cup-bearer; who, on the Soltân's return to Debli, prosecuted the war in Guzzerât. The like did his Mohammedan successors; and thus was the power of the Râjahs in that province reduced very low.

their present state FROM that period we may date their present state. Some of them yielded to the invaders: others, retiring to inaccessible places on the borders of the country, there fixed themselves, and remain to this day. From thence they make incursions into the neighbouring territories, rob the kâffilas on the high-roads; and sometimes advance to the skirts of the strongest, as well as most populous cities, attended with their resolute soldiers, called Râshpûts (or Râjahpûts), that is, sons of Râjahs. For, being of the Kutterey tribe, it is likely they are nobly descended; and the descendants of those who were over-run when Guzzerât was conquered^e. It was intirely subdued in the time of the Great Mogol Akber, as other provinces more northward, and to the east, had been before, and the rest by degrees since: yet still many of the Râjahs maintain an independency in the heart of the empire. There were towards the beginning of Aureng zib's reign about one hundred dispersed over the whole; of whom fifteen or sixteen were so rich, and powerful, that three of them only, viz. Râna (whose ancestors were emperors of the Râjahs) Jesseyng, and Jessom Seyng, were sufficient to cope with him, did they but unite; each having been able to bring into the field 25,000 horse, better troops than the Mogol's: for they are all Râjahpûts, hereditary warriors, to whom the Râjahs allot land, on condition to be always ready, at their command, to appear on horse-back. They can endure much hardship, and want nothing to make good soldiers, but order and discipline.

THE Great Mogul is obliged to keep these, and several other Râjahs, in his service, for several reasons: first, because their militia is very good, and some of them very powerful; 2. to bridle the other Râjahs by means of them; 3. the better to sow differences among them; which is often done to great effect; 4. to employ them against his own rebellious governors, as well as foreign enemies, especially the Persians; not daring to trust his omrâs, who are mostly of the same nation^h.

3. The Shudderî, Weynjas, Vantias, or Baniyâns.

The Shudderî tribe. THE Shuddereys derive their descent from Shudderî, the third son of Pourous, the first man; and commerce having been the business appointed for him, for this reason all the people belonging to his tribe follow merchandize, or are brokers for the merchants. They are called Baniyâns; which, in the Brâmmāns language, wherein their law is written, signifies an innocent and harmless people; as they really are: for they cannot bear to see a fly, worm, or any other living thing hurt; and if they receive a blow, take it patiently, without returning it.

^e LORD'S Banian Relig. ch. 11.

^h BERNIER, vol. i. part 3. p. 20, 21, 27.

(Q) This must have been Masūt, surnamed Alao'd-din, king of Debli; or his nephew Alao'ddin, who reigned about the year 1250, during whose reigns great conquests were made in the southern provinces of India by the Debli kings.

a THE number of families, or branches, in the Shudderî, or Baniyîn tribe, is equal to that of the Brâmmân families (R); being in effect the self-same families: for they chuse to be under the discipline either of the Vish'nagra-naugbers; by whom they are directed in matters relating to religious worship: for their law having most resemblance to that of the Brâmmans (S), they more strictly follow their injunctions, than the two other tribes.

THE form used by the Baniyîns in buying and selling is very singular, and different from Form of bar- that of other nations: for the broker, taking his Pamerîng from about his waist, spreads it gaining on his knee, then both he and the seller putting their hands underneath, with the ends of his fingers he intimates the price, in pounds, shillings and pence, which the chapman is willing to give; and the seller, by the same method, acquaints him how much he expects to have. This form of making bargains is, they say, enjoined them by their law¹. By the same law they ought to deal justly, without either cheating or taking too much profit. They live much after the same manner as the Brâmmans: eating nothing which has had life.

Of this tribe there are some named Komîns; and others Weapari; each party affirming, that they are the true Weinjas, or Baniyîns^k.

4 Of the Wifes, or Sowdras.

THE tribe of Wife (or Weyz) took its name from the fourth son of Pourous, who was the Tribe of master of the mechanics, or handicrafts. The word Wife implies a person who is servile and weyz, instrumentary: doubtless, because they serve, and are helpful to those of the other tribes, or professions. These people, at present, are most commonly called Gentiles (or Gentewes), and are divided into two sorts; the pure, and the impure, or unclean, called Visserawn. This latter kind of Gentiles, of which are the husbandmen, or inferior sort of people, called Kowlis (or Kûlis), take great liberty in their diet; eating animal food, either fish or flesh. On the contrary, the purer Gentiles (who are the handicraftsmen) follow the rule of the Baniyîns, as to diet; abstaining both from flesh and wine, or using them but seldom. However, as in religious worship they agree most with the Kuttereys, so they do likewise in the number of their families, or classes, which are thirty-six; according to the number of trades, or professions, to be found among them. With regard to their handicrafts, it is observable, that they employ as few tools as may be; and that their method of working is in every respect contrary to the European^l.

As, besides the mechanics and manufacturers, this tribe comprises the husbandmen, labourers, porters, and those destined to the most servile offices, these seem to be such as bear the name of Visserawn, before-mentioned.

THIS tribe is the most numerous of the four. The principal families are those of the most numerous, Wellala and Ambria; besides which are others of note, as the Sitti; who are merchants. The Palli are poulterers, painters, and other trades. The Kay Kulle is an inconsiderable people: most of their women are whores; which, however, is no disgrace among them. The men are dancers, weavers, sowers, and soldiers, as some of almost all the other families are. But the most contemptible, or mean, of all is the Palla family; being regarded little more than e the Perreâs (or Parias), who are not reckoned among the tribes; and of whom we shall speak presently. These several families have each their peculiar customs, of which they are very jealous: so that if, in their entertainments, or marriages, those of one family do any thing more than is usual with them, or which is appropriated by another family, it proves matter of very great contest, and often sets a whole city in an uproar^m.

THE family of the Korrewâs have no fixed places of dwelling; but wander about the The Korrewâs. country, with their wives and children (like our gypsies). They lodge in little huts, which they set up without the towns; and, when they remove, put them, with their few moveables, upon little asses, which they keep for the purpose. They live by making fans, or vans, for winnowing the rice; likewise covers for pots: and carry salt from the sea-side up the f country, on their asses; which not being able to bear much at a time, they are exempt from all kinds of taxes, and never molested, on account of their poverty. The women of this family pretend to tell fortunes, and get more that way than any other.

5. Of the Perreâs, or Parias.

THE Perreâs (or Parias), before-mentioned, may be called a fifth tribe, distinct from the The Perreâs, other four: and as they are not thought worthy to be ranked among them, neither are they or Parias: ever suffered to dwell among them: so that they live by themselves in the out-skirts of towns;

^l LORD, ubi supr. ch. 12. p. 8, & seqq.

^k ROGER, ubi supr. p. 7.

^l LORD, ubi supr. ch. 13.

^m ROGER,

(R) Whose number is eighty-two: but Ovington says, the Baniyân casts, or sects, are reckoned to be only twenty-four.

(S) This seems to refer to the eight commandments, given to the four tribes; whereof the first two relate more particularly to the Brammans, and the fifth and sixth to the Shudderîs; as will be observed when we come to treat of the religion of the Hindûs.

and,

and, in the country, build their houses apart from the villages; or rather have villages of their own, furnished with wells: for they dare not so much as fetch water from those which other families make use of; and, lest these latter should inadvertently go to one of theirs, they are obliged to scatter the bones of dead cattle about their wells, that they may be known^a.

an abject people. THESE Perreâs in like manner dare not in cities pass through the streets where the Brâm-mans live; nor set a foot in the villages where they dwell. They are likewise forbidden to enter a temple, either of their god Wistnow, or Eswâra; because, being held to be impure, they would be thought to pollute it. They get their bread by sowing, digging, and building the walls of mud houses: most of those inhabited by the common people being raised by these Perreâs; who also do such kinds of dirty work, as other people do not care to meddle with. Nor is their diet much more cleanly; for they do not scruple to eat cows, horses, b fowl, or other carrion, which die of themselves, and even stink.

Two branches: ONE would scarce imagine, that contentions for precedency should ever enter into the thoughts of a people, who have renounced all cleanliness, and, like swine, wallow in filth; and yet pride has divided the Perreâs into two classes. The first are simply called Perreâs, the other Seriperes. The employment of these latter is to go about selling leather, which they dress themselves; also to make bridles, and such kinds of things. Some of them likewise serve for soldiers. The Perreâs, who reckon themselves the better family, will not eat in the house of the Seriperes: but the Seriperes will readily eat with the Perreâs. For this reason they are obliged to pay them respect, by lifting their hands aloft, and standing upright before them. This a Seripere refusing to do at Paliakâtta, in 1640, the Perreâs seized him, and c cut off his hair: which is the greatest affront, or mark of contempt, that can be offered to them.

Seriperes, or Halalchors: THESE Seriperes, when they marry, cannot set up a pandâl, a kind of garland, before their doors, made with more than three stakes, or trees. Should they exceed that number, it would be enough to put a whole city in motion. The Seriperes are likewise subject to some sort of slavery. For, when any person of credit, or authority, dies, in the families of the Komitîs, Sittîs, Palîs, farriers, or goldsmiths, and the friends have a mind to be at the expence of some clothes to give the Seriperes, these latter must suffer their beards to be shaven; and, when the corpse is carried out of town to be burned, or interred, they must do that office; for which each receives a fanum, or one piece and a half of silver, worth three sous and a d half^o. These are the same sort of people, who are called, at Surât, Halalchors (T); that is, in the Persian language, eat-alls, or eaters at large; for the reasons abovementioned. Nothing can offend an Hindû more, than to be called an Halalchor: yet these poor people take all in good part; cringe and bow to all they pass, and go through their drudgery without noise, or concern^p.

III.

Manners and Customs of the Hindûs.

Hindûs. HAVING given our readers some account of the Hindû tribes, and families, we proceed to speak of their manners and customs; in which, regard will be chiefly had to those of the two inferior tribes; the Shudderis, or merchants, commonly called Baniyâns; and the Wise, comprising the mechanics, husbandmen, and other lower classes of people.

Their character: THE Hindûs, in general, are extremely sober; and never commit any excess, either in eating, or drinking: they even seem to be born with a natural aversion to all intoxicating liquors (U). They are very reserved, with regard to women; at least outwardly; so that they never commit an indecent action in public. They are extremely charitable to the poor (X). It is an inviolable law, that all relations must assist one another; and share the little, which they possess, with those who are in want. They are of a very mild disposition; so that nothing shocks them so much as anger, and a hasty temper^q. This is particularly remarkable in the Baniyâns; owing to the abhorrence which they have to shedding of blood; which at the same time renders them wholly unfit for being soldiers, and gives them an aversion to war. Hence also it is, that they are not inclined to inflict any corporal punishments; but have a perfect detestation of those which are capital^r.

not easily offended: As the Baniyân is formed of so very mild a temper, he is not easily offended. He will bear almost any thing, without emotion, excepting slippering; that is, a stroke with the sole

^a ROGER, p. 12.

^o ROGER, p. 14, & seqq.

^p OVINGTON'S Voy. to Surât, p. 382, & seq.

^q LE

LANE ap. Lett. Ediff. tom. 10. p. 11.

^r OVINGTON'S Voy. Surât, p. 257. 277.

(T) Therwenot writes Halalkour, and says, they are also called Der; that they are the gold-finders of the Indies; that is, cleanse all the public and private houses of office, sweep the streets and houses.

(U) More of their temperance is spoken of in the article relating to the Mogols.

(X) Their charity extends to birds and beasts; for which they build hospitals. In a pagod at Surât, Therwenot saw a man distributing flour among ants, leaving a handful where-ever he found any. Trav. Ind. part ii. ch. 14. p. 26.

a of a slipper, after a person has taken it off his foot, and spit on it. This is dreaded above all affronts; and looked on to be no less ignominious, than spitting in the face, or throwing dirt, among us¹.

THE Baniyâns are extremely covetous, and greedy of gain. Our author knew some, who, ^{greedy of gain.} though reputed to be worth an hundred thousand pounds, would run from one end of Surât to the other, for the prospect of gaining six-pence. Their thoughts being thus continually bent on increasing their wealth, they generally secure a comfortable subsistence; and some of them amass a prodigious treasure². Their riches consist solely in cash, and jewels; which they keep as secretly as they can from the knowledge of the Mogol officers. This curbs them in their expences, and obliges them to great secrecy in their commerce; so that they pay and receive b their money in the night³.

INDIA is the only public theatre of justice and tenderness to brute animals: if a Baniyân ^{Kindness to animals.} happens to kill but a mite, or flea, the offence must be expiated by some considerable atonement. They condemn those of folly, as well as cruelty, who, for food, slay kids, lambs, chickens, or other young creatures; especially the calf, which is their darling animal, whose life they seldom fail to ransom⁴. Of this humanity to living things, the knavish Mohammedan Fakîrs often take advantage; threatening, in presence of a Baniyân, to kill some bird, or other creature, in order to extort money for its redemption. The Portugueses, and even the English, it seems, have practised this fraud upon those harmless Indians. Thus, the caterer of the factory at Surât buys a calf, as if for slaughter; but, in reality, to have it released by some c Baniyân. Sometimes the young factors go out with a gun, pretending to shoot birds in the fields adjoining to the habitations of the Baniyâns; who immediately run, as for life; and with a rûpi, or two, bribe the fowler to desist, and not defile the ground with blood.

THEY are likewise at considerable expences annually, for supporting animals; as we are here ^{Hospital for cattle.} for maintaining the poor. Within a mile of Surât, they have a large hospital for cows, horses, goats, dogs, and other diseased, lame, or decayed creatures. When an ox, for instance, is, through age and toil, become unfit for farther service, lest this should tempt the merciless owner to kill him for his flesh, the Baniyâns either beg, or buy him; and then place him in the hospital to be taken care of, till he dies a natural death. Once a year they prepare a set banquet for all the flies which are in their houses, of sweet milk and sugar mixed, in large d shallow dishes, set on the floor, or table, for that purpose. At other times, they walk with ^{and even} bags of rice under their arm, for two or three miles into the country, stopping at each ant-hill, ^{vermin.} to leave a handful of that beloved grain. But the oddest fancy of all, is their care for the preservation of fleas, bugs, and other vermin, which suck the blood of men: for in an hospital, near the former, built for their reception, a poor man is hired now-and-then to rest all night upon the kot, or bed, where the vermin are put; and, lest their stinging should force him to take his night before morning, he is tied down to the place, and there lies for them to glut themselves with human gore⁵.

THEIR affection for animals is such, that they even adorn them; fastening, for instance, ^{snakes and rats.} large rings of some metal about the legs of a favourite cow, or goat. They shew the same regard for trees⁶. This great fondness for animals is nourished by their doctrine of the metempsychosis: in consequence of which, the scrivener, or secretary to the English brokers, for a long time fed a large snake, which came into his house, with bread and milk, on a supposition, that the soul of his deceased father was lodged in it. He was no less indulgent to some rats, which he likewise lodged in his house, and grew as familiar as cats, on the belief that they harboured the souls of some departed relations⁷.

THE Hindûs, in general, are of a low and timorous spirit; excepting the Râjapûts, who ^{timorous, but} are the military tribe: but their other virtues make amends for that defect. The Baniyâns, ^{honest.} who serve as factors, or brokers, whether to natives, or strangers, discharge their trust with great integrity: in like manner they of the fourth tribe, who hire themselves as servants, are f so faithful, that, far from defrauding their masters on the road of a penny's-worth, they would die in defence both of them and their goods, if attacked by robbers (Y). Nor are they less diligent than faithful, being continually within call; nor are ever absent without leave. Thus, for five shillings a lunar month (which is their constant wages, provisions being cheap) they serve, and maintain themselves, with as much care, as if they had ten times the wages⁸. These are better than the Mohammedan servants, who are more proud, and less to be depended on for their diligence, or honesty⁹.

¹ Ovington's Voy. Surât, p. 357.

² Ibid. p. 277, & seq.

³ Ibid. p. 317.

⁴ Ibid. p. 296.

⁵ Ibid. p. 278, & seqq.

⁶ Ibid. p. 321.

⁷ Ibid. p. 287, & seq.

⁸ TERRY'S Voy. to

Ind. sect. 8. p. 396.

⁹ THEV. Trav. Ind. part iii. p. 72.

(Y) Our author Terry, on this occasion, thinks an Indian merchant, travelling in England with a guard of soldiers, would run in imminent danger of being murdered by them, that they might plunder his goods.

Shaving.

THE Hindûs wear little beards, and shave them, as they do their heads, all over. Their frequent shaving makes them excellent barbers. The people of this profession seldom keep shop; but go about with a chequered apron thrown over their shoulder, and a mirror in their hand. Their implements consist of a razor, not an inch long; a brass basin, as big as a coffee-dish; and a piece of hard soap, which they dip in the basin; and, with no more water than it takes up, rub about the lips and head: in shaving which, few outdo them, for either ease, or expedition. They have an iron tool also; one end serves to pick and clear the ears, the other to pare the nails; both which they do dexterously: and all for a gashik; which is much under a farthing.

Washing.

Anointing.

THE Hindûs often wash their bodies, and keep their feet as clean as their hands. The better sort anoint themselves daily with sweet oils; which give them an agreeable scent. The poor also anoint with cocoa nut oil; but that being rank, and themselves, both men and women, accustomed to eat hing and garlick, they smell so strong, that it is very offensive at first to strangers, in passing through places of resort^d.

How distinguished.

ALL the different tribes of Hindûs are distinguished from one another, by the cut of their beards, or different painting of their bodies and foreheads, as well as winding of their turbâns. A Brâmmân paints himself on the forehead, with a Pythagorean Y between his eye-brows, descending to his nose; and gives to every tribe its peculiar mark^e.

Shape.

Women.

THE male Indians are tall, and large-boned. Their colour varies according to the different parts they inhabit. The women are small, and for the most part plump; but short in respect of the men. They are neat, and well-shaped; they keep their breasts carefully bound up, which prevents their spreading. They are quick in labour, and affectionate to their children; bearing them naked on their hips astraddle. They are cleanly, as well in their cookery as their bodies; plucking up the hair by the roots in every part, excepting their heads; where they let it grow in tresses^f.

Dress.

THE garments, which the Indians wear, are generally made of white callico, fashioned into kabas, or out-coats, like our frocks, turning over the breast as far as the shoulders; and from thence tied with strings down to the middle, on the left side, to distinguish them from the Mohammedans, who tie them on the right side. As their breeches reach to their heels, they wear no stockings; nor have a name for them in their language^g. All the garb of the women consists in a lungbi, or piece of callico tied loose over the shoulders, and tucked between their legs, in nature of short breeches: besides a short waistcoat, or ephod, to keep up their breasts.

Ornaments.

To make amends for this plainness of dress, or rather want of clothing, in the females, they set themselves off with variety of trinkets. The rich adorn the tresses of their hair with gold, and jewels; the poor braid them with strings of jessamin-flowers; whereof they likewise make necklaces. The rich have their arms and feet adorned with gold and silver; the meaner sort with glass, brass, or tuttinague: besides rings at their noses, ears, fingers, and toes; which obliges them to go bare-footed, shoes being only allowed their midwives^h. The women have generally the lobes of their ears bored when young; which become in time so large, by means of the things put into the holes to stretch them, as to hold rings as broad as saucers, with a chanel on the outer circumference, for the flesh to enter and support itⁱ.

IN short, the main cost of the Hindûs, especially the Baniyâns, is expended on their wives; whose greatest joy consists in gaiety of dress, and the above-mentioned ornaments; which the very women, who carry water about the streets, will not appear without. Widows, who survive their husbands, are the only females incapable of this happiness: for they are restrained from wearing jewels, as well as shaven, being distinguished from others by a red lungbi^k.

Odd customs.

THE women scruple no more than the men to do their occasions in the public streets, or highways: for which purpose, at sun-rise and sun-set, they go out in droves to some dead-wall, if in the city; and, in case any pass by in the interim, they turn their bare backsides on them, but hide their faces. When they have done their business, they wash the parts with the left hand, because they eat with the right. The men, who exonerate apart from the woman, squat like them when they make water. The Mohammedans think hard of the Hindû females for this freedom; as they do of the English, when they see them saluted with a kiss, or walk with a man in a garden. Although their food is nothing but vegetables, concocted with fair water, yet they leave such a stink behind them, that it is but ill taking the air, either in the streets, or without their towns, near the rivers and ditches (Z). What is still more

^d TERRY, p. 376, sect. 5. FRYER's Trav. p. 194.
p. 197, & seq. ^e OVINGTON, ubi supr. p. 314.
sect. 19. ^f OVINGTON, p. 319, & seq.

^g FRYER, ibid. p. 194.
^h FRYER, ubi supr. p. 197, & seq.

ⁱ TERRY,
^k TERRY,

(Z) On the contrary, Ovington says, p. 316, that, although the streets of Surât are, in many places over-spread with the excrements both of men and beasts;

yet the passengers are never molested with an unfavoury smell, because the strength of the vapours is diminished by the attenuation of the sun's heat.

strange,

a strange, the cows watch the usual times to go lick up their ordure; which they are very fond of. Although this custom may seem indecent to us, yet it cannot be said to be uncleanly: Clearliness and industry. nor can the Hindús be charged with either sluttishness, or sloth; for, besides their constant washings at their times of devotion, they never eat nor drink, before they have cleansed themselves, with water poured all over them from head to foot. Nor will they suffer any parts of their body to harbour nastiness, they using depilatories for breast, arm pits, and groins; are always shaving their heads and beards, cutting their nails, washing their mouths, and rubbing their teeth, whereby they look like ivory¹.

THE life of the Hindús is a continued series of industry. These are they who till the ground, plant, sow, and breed the cattle: these are they who make and sell those curious manufactures, with the cloth and stuffs, which this part of the world affords^m.

For their diet, part of the Hindús, as those of the tribes of Kutteri and Wife (that is, Diet. of the soldiers and common people, including the mechanics and all downwards), eat animal food; those of the Bráhmans and Shudderi, or merchants, never touch any flesh-meat; feeding upon vegetables, milk-meats, fruits, and sweet meats.

THERE are two sorts of food very common among the Hindús; dye and kicheri. The first is sweet-milk turned thick, mixed with boiled rice and sugar. This is very effectual to restrain the violence of fevers and fluxes, the prevailing distempers of India. Kicheri is made of dol; that is, a small round pea and rice boiled together: and is very strengthening, although not very savoury.

c THE constant drink of the Baniyáns is rain-water; which, falling in the time of the monsoons (or monsoons), is preserved in tanks and cisterns, for the whole year: for they seldom drink of well, or river-waterⁿ. Although they never touch strong liquors; yet they indulge themselves with tea and coffee. This last, when rightly prepared, carries a kind of yellow oil at top; which gives it an agreeable relish; but it requires much art to bring it to that perfection. Tea is universally drank. And, although such hot liquor may not seem proper for so hot an air, yet the Europeans themselves find it very conducive to health^o.

As the Hindús never drink out of the same cup with a Christian, or any person of a different Way of drink- tribe, nor will defile their lips with water which has been touched by a stranger; they have ing. contrived to quench their thirst, like the antient Thracians, by holding the spouted vessel at a d certain distance, and pouring it into their mouths, without either shutting them, or drawing their breath^p. By this means a mixed company may drink out of the same cup, or phial; and some are so dexterous at it, as to lift a pretty large bowl above a span from their mouths, and pour in a torrent of water, without wetting themselves^q. However, for fear of the worst, they commonly carry with them jars of water, when they go abroad^r.

THEIR times of eating are about eight or nine in the morning, and at four or five in the Times of eat- afternoon: the heat of the day is spent in rest and sleeping, either upon kots, or beds; or ing. bechanabs, which are thick quilts, spread the whole breadth of a room and length of a man, with bolsters at the head, where eight or nine may sleep together. They seldom take their repose without a wench in their arms; that is, a small pillow upon their stomach, to defend it from the ambient vapours: and seldom use any covering, but their shirts and drawers; except it be a sheet, or slight callico, spread over them^s.

THE Indians are in many things of matchless ingenuity, and admirable imitators of whatever Mechanics they copy. The Baniyán, by strength of his brain only, will sum up his account with no less ingenuity: exactness, and quicker dispatch, than the readiest arithmetician can with his pen.

The silk-weavers will exactly imitate the nicest and most beautiful patterns, which are brought from Europe; and the very ship-carpenters at Surát will take the model of an English vessel, in all the curiosity of its building, and most artificial instances of workmanship about it, whether proper for the conveniency of burthen, or of quick sailing, as exactly as if they had been the first contrivers. The taylor here shape the cloaths for Europeans, of either sex, according to great artists: the mode which prevails (A); and fit up the towering head-dresses for the women with as much skill, as if they had been an Indian fashion, or themselves had been bred apprentices at the Royal Exchange. In some things, the artists of India out-do all the ingenuity of Europe; as in painting chites (commonly called chints); which in Europe cannot be paralleled, either in brightness, or duration, of the colours (B). The gold stripes likewise in their soofeys, and gold flowers in their atlasses, are imitated with us, but not to perfection. Likewise the cornelian rings, with double chains of gold about them, meeting at several distances, where

¹ FERRY, p. 200.

² Ibid. p. 205.

³ Ibid. p. 313, & seq.

^m Ibid. p. 19.

ⁿ OVINGTON, p. 310.

^o DE LA VALLE'S Voy. Ind. p. 43. fol. Engl.

^p Ibid. p. 305. & seq.

^q OVINGTON, ubi supr.

(A) Ferry says, they are very dexterous in making shoes and boots, cloths and linen, after the European fashion. Voy. to Ind. sect. v. p. 378.

(B) We know not how far this judgment may hold good at present; especially since the printing of linen hath been brought to such perfection in England.

sparks of diamonds, rubies, or sapphires, are set for ornament, surpass the skill of any other nation to perform^a.

THIS is the account we have of the Hindû mechanics and manufacturers, from Sarist; and, if we go to the extremity of the Indies eastward, we shall find it the same. The artificers of Bengâl, says a certain missionary, are surprisingly skilful. Their linen cloth is so fine, that pieces of a great breadth may be drawn through a ring. They will fine-draw a piece of torn muslin so curiously, that it is impossible to find the seam; and put together pieces of broken glass, or china, so artfully, that no eye can discover that they were ever severed. Their goldsmiths are extremely curious in filagree works; and imitate, to great perfection, those of Europe; although their forge and other implements do not cost above a French crown. The weavers, with looms of no greater price, sitting in their own yards, or by the way-side, weave the fine linens, which are so much sought after in all parts of the world. A hand-mill, which does not cost ten pence, is used for breaking the sugar-canes. A mason will lay the floor of the largest hall, with a kind of mortar composed of brick-dust and lime, in such a manner, that the whole shall appear as a single stone; much harder than sandy stone. Our author saw a kind of a pent-house, forty feet long, eight broad, and four or five inches thick, raised in his presence, and fixed to the wall by one side, without any other support. Their chemists pulverise all kinds of metal with great ease; and make use of the first vessel they meet with, to extract quicksilver out of cinnabar, and for other mercurial preparations; which they do in the most simple manner^b.

TO the foregoing remarks, in praise of the Indian mechanics, let us add a few more from others authors. Terry assures us, that they are excellent painters, and copy any picture so exactly, that it will be difficult to distinguish it from the original: however, painting is not encouraged in the Mogol's country^c. Bernier saw guns, and pieces of goldsmiths work, so well done, that he doubted if, in Europe, they could be executed better: but the workmen being despised, and ill-treated by the great men, few good ones are to be found^d. They have the art of working in gold upon agate, crystal, and other brittle matters; which the European goldsmiths and lapidaries have not. They fit gold rings to the brims, or middle, of drinking vessels. This work, though very nice, is performed by poor people, and sometimes by little boys; who do it with skill and dispatch. What helps much to perfect the manufacturers and mechanics in their several professions, is, that among the Mohammedans, as well as Pagans, every one breeds his children up to his own trade and occupation; and not to any other^e.

GREAT praise, doubtless, is due to the industry and genius of the Indian mechanics: let us now take a view of learning; and see if the Brâmmans, who treat them with such contempt, have acquitted themselves as well, with regard to the sciences, the care of which they claim wholly to themselves^f.

AS poetry is generally the first science, which any nation cultivates, the Hindûs have not neglected it; and to this day abound with poets. But, we are told, the unity of action is not so strictly observed in their Purân, and other poems, as in Homer and Virgil; although that rule is followed in some. The Indian fables, which the Arabs and Persians have so often translated, are a collection of five small poems, perfectly regular, composed for the education of the princes of Patnâ (C). It is true, eloquence never was much in use among the Brâmmans, much less has the art of discoursing well on subjects been cultivated by them: but they have a great number of books, containing rules with relation to the purity, beauty, and ornaments, of diction; which makes a particular science by itself^b.

OF all parts of literature, history seems to be that which has been least regarded by the Hindûs, who are excessively fond of the marvellous; to which vicious taste, the Brâmmans, for sake of interest, have conformed themselves. However, the princes, without doubt, have regular histories of their ancestors: especially in Hindustân, where they are more powerful, and Râjabpûts by tribe (D). There are likewise, in the north, books called Nîtak; which the Brâmmans affirm contain many antient histories, without any mixture of fable. There are likewise in their poems many precious remains of antiquity, relating to the antediluvian world, as well as the Affyrian and Macedonian empires: but they are to be acquired only at a vast expence, and by a perfect knowledge of the Samskret language^c.

THE Brâmmans have cultivated almost all the parts of mathematics; nor is algebra unknown to them: but astronomy, or rather astrology, was always the principal object of their mathematical studies; because the superstition, as well of the grandees as the people; made it turn p. 378. sect. v.

^a Ovington, p. 279, & 321.

^b P. PAPIN. Lett. Ediff. tom. ix. p. 420, & seqq.

^c TER.

^d BERNIER, part. iii. p. 30, 35, & seq.

^e Ibid.

^f LA LANE ap.

Lett. Ediff. tom. x. p. 400.

^b P. PONSAP. Lett. Ediff. tom. xxvi. p. 228.

^c Ibid. p. 229, & seq.

(C) Or the Pâtan princes, so often mentioned in the history of the Indies, who reigned in Hindustân before the Mohammedans.

(D) This seems to imply that the Râjahs in the southern parts, or peninsula of India, are of the Brâmmans tribe a most to their profit. They have several treatises of astronomy: with regard to which, there is room to believe, that some learned Greek, as Pythagoras, travelled formerly into the Indies, learned the Brámmán sciences; and, in return, left them his method of astronomy, with the Greek names of the planets, twelve signs, and other terms. This our author discovered at Debli, and shewed to the astronomers, who are very numerous in the famous observatory, built lately in that capital by Râjah Jaesing; who may be stiled the restorer of the Indian astronomy.

THAT which rendered the name of gymnosophists most famous in antiquity, was their philosophy; which, by way of excellence, they call shâstram, that is, science; which consists of logic, metaphysics, and a little physiology (E). The sole end, to which all the philosophic enquiries of the Brámmans tend, is the Moukti, or deliverance of the soul from the captivity and miseries of this life, by a perfect felicity; which essentially is, either the deliverance of the soul, or its immediate effect ^d.

As the Greeks had several schools of philosophy, so among the antient Brámmans there were six principal schools, or sects (F); named Niyâyam, Vedântam, Sankiam, Mimamsa, Pâsanjalam, and Bhâsiam. These are what are simply termed the sciences; each of which is distinguished from the rest by some peculiar sentiment on felicity, and the means of obtaining it ^e. The first of these schools is famous for logic, the second for metaphysics. With regard to the former, their rules for syllogism are exact, and differ chiefly from ours in this; that, according to the Brámmans, a perfect syllogism ought to have four terms (G). The school of Niyâyam; that is, reason, or judgment, is most famous for this art, which, however, at present, is employed about infinite questions, more subtle than useful; and is, in short, a medley of trifles; such as was the logic of Europe about two centuries ago ^f.

BESIDES the six sects, there are several others; which, in matters of religion, are so many heresies. Amongst these, the most remarkable are the Agama-shâstram, and the Baudda-mattham. The followers of the Agamam would have no difference of conditions amongst men (H), nor legal ceremonies; and are accused of magic. The Bauddists, whose notion of the transmigration of souls is universally received, are accused of atheism; and admit of no principles of knowledge but our senses. Baudda (I), (or Boudda) is the Fo-to among the Chineses; and the Bauddists, the sect of the Bonzas and Lamas; as the Agamists are the sect of the people of Mâba Sîn, or the grand Sîn; which comprehends all the kingdoms west of Persia ^g. From the school of Niyâyam formerly issued the most famous adversaries of the Bauddists; who, by their instigation, underwent a most horrible massacre, in several kingdoms. Batta, one of the two, who distinguished themselves most in this dispute, to purify himself from so much blood, which he had been the cause of shedding, burned himself with great solemnity, at Jagannat, on the coast of Orisba ^h, commonly written Orixa.

ALL these sects speak of the first principles of things; but very differently. Some say, that all is composed of bodies indivisible; not by their solidity and hardness, but their minuteness. Others say, all is made up of matter and form: but none of them explains himself clearly about the matter, much less about the form. Some hold, that all consists of four elements and a nothing: but do not explain themselves concerning mixtion and transmutation. And as for their nothing, which comes near to our privation, they admit many sorts, which they seem to understand no better than other things. According to some, light and darkness are the first principles; about which they utter a great deal of idle and confused stuff. Nor do those explain themselves better, who for the first principle admit privation, or rather privations; which they distinguish from nothing in a very uncouth manner. Lastly, some affirm, that all is composed of accidents; of which likewise they make odd and tedious enumerations (K). Touching these principles in general, they all agree that they are eternal: our production out of nothing not having come into their thoughts ⁱ.

WITH regard to morality, or moral philosophy, they have a very fine system, contained in many works of the Niti Shâstram, or Moral Science; which is usually comprised in sententious

^d P. PONS ap. Lett. Ediff. p. 235. seqq.

^e Ibid. p. 246.

^f Ibid. p. 239.

^g BERNIER, part iv. p. 163.

^h Ibid. p. 246.

ⁱ Ibid. p. 239, &

(E) The Danish missionaries at Tranquebar say, that the Malabars have their course of philosophical sciences, and treat them in as regular a manner as the schools in Europe. Propag. Gosp. in the East, part ii. p. 19.

(F) It is doubtless of these sects that Bernier speaks, part iii. p. 160, when he says, that among the Hindû philosophers, six have been very famous; who make so many different sects, which divide the Pendets, or doctors; each pretending his doctrine to be better than that of the rest, and more conformable to their sacred books; which, they say, contain the grounds of their sciences, as well as religion.

(G) For instance; where there is smook there is fire: there is smook on that mountain; therefore there is fire there.

(H) Possibly this ought to be understood only with regard to the distinction of tribes among the Hindûs.

(I) By Bernier called Bauta; which, he says, is a seventh sect; whence proceed twelve others: but that the followers of this sect are not numerous, being hated and despised, as irreligious and atheistical people.

(K) We must suspend our judgment, till we see their books.

verses, like those of Caro. In this branch of philosophy, which is communicated by the Brâmmans to the other tribes, several authors among the Shoutres, and even the Pârias, have acquired a great reputation^k.

Physic. MANY of the Brâmmans study physic; of which they have many little books: but they are rather collections of recipes than any thing else: the most antient and chief whereof are in verse. Their practice is very different from what, in our author Bernier's time, was observed in France: for they ground themselves on these principles, that one who is sick of a fever needs no great nourishment: that the main remedy in all kinds of sickness is abstinence: that there is nothing worse for a sick body than flesh-broth: nor which corrupts sooner in the stomach of a feverish patient: that no blood should ever be taken away, except in the greatest and most evident necessity; as when a delirium is apprehended, or some considerable part, as the chest, liver, or kidneys, is inflamed. This practice, which is attended with success in the Indies, is followed also by the Mohammedan physicians, especially as to meat broths^l.

Physicians. A PHYSICIAN is not allowed to visit a patient in Bengâl, unless he can point out his distemper, and discover the state of his constitution; which he does easily by feeling the pulse: a sure method (L), as our author has experienced. Most of them throw a drop of water into the patient's urine (M): if it spreads, they say he is very hot inwardly; but if it does not, it betokens want of heat^m.

Anatomy. FOR all this, the Hindûs understand nothing at all of anatomy. Nor is it to be wondered at, when they never open the body of man or beast; nor can bear the sight of such an operation. Yet they affirm, that there are 5000 veins in man, neither more nor less; as if they had actually counted them all.

Astronomy, or astrology. TOUCHING astronomy, they have their tables, according to which they calculate eclipses, pretty nearly as exact as the Europeans: yet account for them very absurdly; affirming, that both the solar and lunar are occasioned by Rab, a black Deuta, or demon; who, seizing those luminaries, blackens them as it were with ink, and so darkens their light. They hold also, that the moon is above 50,000 leagues higher than the sun: that she is lucid of herself; and from her we receive a certain vital water, which, gathering in the brain, descends thence into all the members, and gives them their respective functions. More than this, they believe, that the sun, moon, and all the stars, are Deutas: that it is night, when the sun is behind the imaginary mountain Someyra (N), and day, when he gets out from its shade. This mountain they say is in the middle of the earth, in form of an inverted cone, and many thousand miles highⁿ.

Hindû superstition, ON this occasion we cannot forbear to divert our readers with an account of the behaviour of the Hindûs, during the time of an eclipse, which happened at Debli in the year 1666. Bernier, from the terrace of his house, which was situated on the side of the Jemma, saw both sides of the river, for near a league in length, covered with Hindûs; who stood in the water, up to the girdle, demurely looking unto the sky, watching when the eclipse should begin, in order to perform their ceremony. The little boys and girls were stark-naked; the men had only a scarf about their waist; and the married women, with young maidens of six or seven, were covered with a single cloth. Their Râjabs, or sovereign princes, bankers, jewellers, and other great merchants, who were mostly beyond the river, in tents, had set up kanates, or skreens, in the water, to wash themselves, with their wives, and not be seen by others.

about eclipses. THE moment the eclipse commenced, those idolaters raised a great cry, and all at once plunged themselves into the stream, for several times successively: then standing up again, with lifted eyes and hands, muttered their prayers with great devotion; and, from time to time, threw up water towards the sun, bowing their heads very low, and turning their arms and hands sometimes one way, sometimes another. All these ceremonies they continued to repeat till the end of the eclipse; and then every one retired, casting some pieces of silver a good way into the water, and giving alms to the Brâmmans, who failed not to attend. Our author took notice, that, at their going out of the water, they all took new cloaths, which were laid ready for them on the sand; and that many of the devouter sort left their old garments for the Brâmmans. It must be observed, that this eclipse was celebrated after the same manner not only in the Indus, Ganges, and all other rivers, but also in the reservatories of water, throughout the Indies^o.

French panic. HOWEVER, Europeans have no reason to laugh at this folly and superstition of the Hindûs: they were formerly as deeply immersed in it as they. And the same author, speaking of a solar eclipse, which happened but twelve years before in France, tells us, that he was surprised at the childish credulity of the common people in France, who were seized with such a panic

^k PONS, ubi supr. p. 234.
ubi supr. p. 166, & seqq.

^l BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 165.
^o Ibid. p. 105, & seqq.

^m PAPIN, ubi supr. p. 426.

ⁿ BERNIER,

(L) Perhaps they had this method from the Chineses, who have formed the doctrine of the pulse into a science.

(M) Ovington mentions this practice, p. 351, used by a Brâmmān at Surat.

(N) Their best astronomers hold the sun to be in the center.

a on the occasion, that some bought drugs against the eclipse; others retired to dark caves and chambers: while multitudes fled for shelter into the churches; believing that the last day was come; and that the eclipse would not only shake, but overturn the foundations of nature: in spight of any thing which the Gassendis, Robervals, and many other philosophers, had written written to demonstrate, that the said eclipse was of the same nature with preceding eclipses, and would be attended with no worse effects than those had been ^p.

In geography the Brámmans are no better skilled than in astronomy. They hold the earth to be flat and triangular; and that it hath seven stories, all differing in beauty and perfection, as well as inhabitants; and that each is encompassed with its respective sea; one of milk, another of sugar, the third of butter, the fourth of wine, and so forth: that the mountain Someyra passing through the middle of these stories (which consist interchangeably of an earth and a sea), the first story begins at the foot thereof: that all these earths are inhabited by Deutas, lessening in perfection, till you come to the seventh, which is ours, peopled by men far less perfect than any of the Deutas: lastly, that this whole mass is sustained upon the heads of many elephants; which, when they stir, are the cause of earthquakes ^q.

BERNIER, reflecting on these absurdities, makes this just observation, that if those famous sciences of the antient Brahmans of the Indies were such as above set forth, and which their being written in the Sanskrit language seems to prove, great numbers have been deceived in the high opinion which they have entertained of them. An air of mystery, in things of this nature, ought always to be considered as a cloak to conceal the absurdities or imperfections which lie underneath. In short, we are told, the Brámmans affect this obscurity to such a degree, that, not content with having terms unknown to the vulgar, they have wrapped up the most common things in mysterious language ^r.

THE city of Bernâres, or Waranâsi, called also Kâfi, or Kâshi, situated in Bengál, in a rich country upon the river Ganges, is the general school, and, as it were, the Athens (O) of the gentry of the Indies. Here the Brámmans, and religious, who addict themselves to study, assemble together. They have no colleges, nor classes, as in Europe; but the masters (more after the school of the antient Greeks) are dispersed over the town in their houses, and especially in the gardens of the suburbs, where the great merchants permit them to teach. These masters have four, six, or seven disciples, and the most famous twelve or fifteen, who spend ten or a dozen years with them: for they are of a slow and lazy humour, to which the heat and diet of the country contributes much; nor have they the hopes of some good place to excite them to study. They first study is the Hanskrit (rather Sanskrit, but more properly Samskrtam, or Samskroutam); that is, a pure language; which is quite different from the common Indian, and known only to the Pondets, or doctors. As their betbs (vedam), or sacred books, which are of great antiquity, are written in this language, they call it holy and divine. They have many other books in this tongue: of which our author saw a great hall quite full at Banâres. Among them were several in philosophy and physick, both in verse and prose, with many poems.

AFTER they have learned this language, which is very difficult (P), they commonly apply themselves to read the purân, which is the interpretation and sum of the betbs; which are very large. After the purân, some study philosophy; wherein, says Bernier, they have made no great progress ^s.

THE Hindús never marry out of the tribe to which they belong. Thus a Brámmán is married to the daughter of a Brámmán: a merchant's son marries a merchant's daughter; and the son of a Kúli, who tills the ground, takes to wife the daughter of a Kúli. In like manner, the children are bred to the father's trade or business: so that although this is the way for them to become great proficient in every art, yet they have no opportunity of ever rising higher than they were at first. No man has more than one wife at a time: they marry at six or seven years of age, and bed by fifteen at farthest, often at thirteen. Their marriages are solemnized like the Mohammedan, with much company and noise: but with this difference; that the young people ride openly on horseback; bedecked with flowers fastened to their garments ^t.

As the Hindús reckon marriage one of the most happy actions of a man's life, and to die unmarried one of the greatest misfortunes, they therefore marry their children about seven years of age, that they may procure the one, and prevent the other. The match being made between the parents, messengers and presents are sent to those of the maiden, accompanied with drums and trumpets, as well as songs in praise of her accomplishments. In return for this, presents are sent back to the bridegroom, in token of their acceptance of the nuptial proffer.

^p BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 104.
ubi supr. p. 158, & seqq.

^q Ibid. p. 168, & seq.
^r TERRY Voy. Ind. sect. 19.

^s PONS, ubi supr. p. 227.
^t Oving. p. 322.

^u BERNIER,

(O) They have universities in several other parts of Hindústán, as well as the peninsula of India; but that of Benâres, or Kâshi, is acknowledged to be the principal.

(P) Bernier ascribes the difficulty of it to their having no grammar worth any thing: whereas the late missionaries say they have the most perfect grammars imaginable. See Lettres Edifiantes, tom. xxvi. p. 222.

Then, on the day appointed by the Brâmmans for the ceremony ^a, the bridegroom, attended by the sons of all the persons of the same trade in the town, some on horseback, others in palakîns and coaches, dressed in a shewy manner, proceed through the chief streets, accompanied with music and gilded pageants. The bridegroom is distinguished from the rest by a crown on his head, richly decked with jewels.

Marriage ceremony.

NEXT day the bride takes her turn, attended by all the maidens of the same family, in the same pompous way; and, towards evening, returns home to be joined in wedlock ^y, that being the time of performing the ceremony among the Hindûs ^z. It begins by kindling a fire, and placing it between the parties to be married, to intimate the ardency which ought to be in their affections: then both are inclosed with a silken string, to denote the insoluble bond of matrimony. After this, a cloth is put between them, to signify, that before marriage there ought to be no intimacy between them. This done, the Brâmmans pronounce a certain form of words, enjoining the man to allow the woman all things convenient for her, and charging the woman to be faithful to her husband: then pronouncing a blessing upon them, that they may be fruitful, the cloth is taken away, and the silken string unloosed; which puts an end to the ceremony. There is no dowry given, excepting the jewels which are worn on the bridal day: and to the feast none repair, but those who are of the same family ^a.

Marriage rules.

IN marriage they have certain legal injunctions, by which the tribes are differenced: first, that no woman marry a second time, unless she be of the tribe of Wife (or Weyz), who are the handicraftsmen. Secondly, that second marriage is permitted to the men of all the tribes, excepting that of the Brâmmans. Thirdly, that all marry within their own tribe; Brâmmans with Brâmmans, Kutteris with Kutteris, and Shudderis with Shudderis: but the Wifes are obliged to marry not only with those of their own tribe, but with persons of their own trade (Q); as the son of a barber to the daughter of a barber, and so of the rest ^b.

Baptism.

THE ceremony of baptism, or naming their children, is different among the Brâmmans from that used by the other tribes. The latter are only washed in water: after which, one of the relations, holding the point of a pen towards the child's forehead, prays, that God would write good things therein: then those present say amen, and give the infant its name (R). Lastly, the Brâmmans make a mark in his forehead with a red ointment, in token of admission into their church, and the ceremony is ended. The children of Brâmmans are not only washed with water, but anointed with oil: the priest, by way of consecration, saying, O Lord, we present unto thee this child, born of an holy tribe, anointed with oil, and cleansed with water. Then, having performed the former ceremonies, they all pray, that he may live a righteous observer of the law of the Brâmmans. After this they calculate the child's nativity, from the position of the twelve signs at the time of his birth; which they conceal till the day of his marriage, reckoned one of the happiest in his life; then publish the dangers past, and evils to come, as resulting from that scheme ^c.

Childbed.

THE mother, till ten days after childbed, is touched by none but a dry nurse: nor is allowed to have a hand in dressing victuals till the forty days of purification be over. The cradles for children are hung in the air, to a beam or post, by strings tied to each end, and so swing to and fro by the slightest touch, with a much gentler motion than ours, which are placed on the ground ^d.

Last sickness.

WHEN a person is past hopes of recovery, they enjoin him to invoke Narrawne, which is the name of God, importing mercy to sinners: then, as his spirits languish, they stretch out his hand, and, pouring water into it, pray to Kistneruppon, God of water, to present him pure to the sovereign Being, with that offering in his hand. As soon as his life is departed, they wash his body, in token of his cleanness and purity ^e.

Mourning.

If a Rajah dies, his subjects and dependants cut off their beards, and shave their heads, as tokens of the deepest mourning; which is never shewn but for a prince, a parent, or some nearest relation.

ON the death of any friend the Baniyâns make costly feasts, for the two or three days following: then they observe the twelfth, twentieth, thirtieth, and fortieth, days after, besides one day every quarter till the annual solemnity returns ^f.

Dead bodies.

THE generality of the Hindûs, instead of burying, burn their dead. The corpse being carried to the side of some river, approached to such purpose, and laid on the ground, the Brâmmans who officiate, pronounceth these words: O earth! we commend unto thee this our brother. Whilst he lived, thou hadst an interest in him. Of the earth he was made: by the blessing of the

^a Oving. p. 328.

p. 322, 328, & seqq.

^c Lord, ubi supr. ch. 9.

^y Lord, p. 319.

^b Lord's Banian relig. ch. 9.

^f Oving. p. 340.

^z Oving. p. 32.

^a Lord's Panian relig. ch. 9. See also Oving.

^c Lord, ibid.

^d Oving. p. 336, & seq.

(Q) Ovington says, p. 383, that the different sects (or families) of Baniyâns refrain both from intermarrying and eating in common: but this seems to be a mistake.

(R) Ovington, who, p. 335, says, this giving a name is performed ten days after the birth, describes the ceremony after another manner; which shews it differs on certain occasions.

earth he was nourished, and now he is dead we surrender him up to thee. After this, combustible matter is put to the body, and kindled by help of sweet oil : then aromatic odours are strowed thereon, and the Brámmán saith, O fire! whilst he lived, thou hadst a claim in him, by whose natural heat he subsisted : we return therefore his body to thee, that thou mayst purge it. This done, the son of the deceased setteth a pot of water on the ground, with a pot of milk upon it ; and, throwing a stone at the lower pot, breaks it to pieces, which brings the other down. This gives him an occasion to moralize thus : that as the stone, by its violent motion, caused both the vessels to shed their liquors ; so did the assault made by sickness destroy his father's body, and bring it to dissolution, like milk and water spilt on the ground, never to be retrieved.

b WHEN the corpse is consumed, they scatter the ashes in the air, while the Brámmán repeats ^{commonly} these words : O air! whilst through thee he lived, he breathed : and now, having breathed his last, we yield him up to thee. ^{burned.} Lastly, when the ashes are fallen into the water, the priest uttereth ; O water! whilst he lived, thy moisture did sustain him : and, now his body is dispersed, take thy part in him. Thus they give to every element its own : for as they affirm every man's life to be continued by the four elements, so, they say, he ought to be divided among them at his death. This funeral solemnity being over, the Brámmán presents the son, or nearest akin, a register of the times when his ancestors died ; and, at the same time, reads to him the law of mourners ; importing, that for ten days he must neither chew betel, oil his head, nor put on clean cloaths. Also, that for a whole year, every month, on the day of his father's decease, he must make a feast, and pay a visit to the river which received his parent's ashes ^g.

c ALTHOUGH burning in this manner is the common usage, yet it is not strictly followed by ^{Some broil} the Hindús : for some do no more than broil the corpse, with a little straw, on the river-side, ^{only.} and then cast them from a steep rock into the water ; as Bernier had often seen upon the Ganges. Some likewise, when they perceive a sick person near death, carry him to the side of ^{Dying persons} a river, and first putting his feet into the water, afterwards let him slip down as high as his ^{drown ed.} throat. When they think he is ready to expire, they sink him quite under water, and there leave him, after they have made a great clamour, and clapping with their hands. The same author was once present at this inhuman kind of burial. The reason for which, alleged by the learned, as well as vulgar, is, that the soul, leaving the body, may be washed from all the impu-

d rities she might have contracted during her abode in it ^h. In like manner the body is burnt sometimes before it is quite dead, when they think it past ^{Burnt before} recovery. A Baniyán, who was broker to the English at Surat, was thus hurried away to the ^{dead.} burning-place as he was just expiring : but, being happily met by the English surgeon, who felt his pulse, and gave some hopes of recovery, some kinder friend among the rest dissuaded the company from proceeding ; and, in a little time, he was restored to health ⁱ.

e SINCE the time when the laws for burning the bodies of the dead were made, it hath become ^{Widows fre-} a fashion for widows to accompany the corpses of their husbands in the funeral flames. They ^{quently} who cohabited with the deceased (S), marry not a second time : but, as they are obliged to cut ^{burn them-} their hair, and spend the remainder of their lives as creatures quite neglected ; some, as well to ^{themselves.} avoid this reproachful state, as out of love to their husbands, choose to burn themselves. For the general, there is no compulsion in the case ; except, when some great man dies, they oblige one or more of his wives to burn herself, to honour his funeral. Sometimes the wife engages of her own accord to bear her husband company at the pile. Sometimes he, loth to leave her behind (T), or for fear any other man should enjoy her after him, prevails on her to make him a promise to burn herself with his corpse, in case he dies before her. We are told also, that in those parts where the Rájahs, or Indian princes, have all the power, the Brámmáns, to keep up this antient but horrid custom, frequently constrain women, especially of their own tribe, to undergo this fiery trial. In like manner, we are told, that the Mohammedans, where-ever their dominion is established, have endeavoured to abolish this custom : on the other hand, we are

f informed, that some Mogul lords, for grandeur-sake, have imitated the Hindú fashion ; and ordered at their deaths that some of their Hindú wives should burn themselves ^k. THE manner of performing that dreadful ceremony is this : on the day appointed for burning ^{Manner of} the corpse, the wife sets out, dressed with her best ornaments, as if going to her wedding, and ^{performing} attended by her friends. To declare her joy, she proceeds dancing ; and sings songs in praise

^g LORD, ubi supr. ch. 9. sect. 19. OVING. p. 344, & DE LA VALLE, p. 136.

^h BERNIER, part iii. p. 129, & seq.

ⁱ OVING. p. 341.

^k See TERRY,

(S) According to Ovington, p. 324, those who do not cohabit are doomed to this severe kind of restraint ; nor must ever marry again, though widows at six or seven years of age. But this law does not extend to the tribe of mechanics, and others, as before remarked.

(T) Ovington says, p. 342, that sometimes the husband, unable to bear the loss of his beloved wife, burnt himself with her, in expectation of a future enjoyment of her.

of the deceased, and expressing a desire to be with him in the next world. Being arrived at the place where the funeral pile is erected, sometimes in a little hut, but generally in a square pit, about two feet deep, she renews her rejoicing, with the company, singing and dancing about the pit. At length, having taken leave of her relations, and disposed of her jewels amongst them (T), they pour oil over her head, and set fire to the wood, on the top of which the body is placed : then, taking a pot of oil in her hand, she throws herself at once into the flames ; or else, taking a few turns more about the pit, on a sudden, leaps into it ; the company at the same time throw in faggots and pots of oil, as much to dispatch her with the blows, as by the fierceness of the fire ; while drums are beaten, trumpets sounded, and a noise is made to stifle the hideous shrieks, which are generally sent forth by the wretched victim. Sometimes the wife mounts the pile before it is kindled, and seats herself by her husband's corpse, holding his head in her lap, and thus heroically parts with her life ^k.

BERNIER was often present when women burned themselves, with such resolution as was not to be described, any more than the dreadful spectacle which that tragedy represented. One time he came to a place, where he saw four or five Brâmmans putting fire to the pile, whereon sat the woman by her husband's corpse ; and five women, of a middle age, singing and dancing, hand-in-hand, about the pit, while a great croud of people looked on. Presently all was in a flame about the woman ; who yet seemed not at all disturbed : but what still was more surprising, of a sudden, one of the dancers threw herself headlong into the fire, and then the rest, one after another, without any apparent fear. These were five slaves, who, having heard their mistress promise her husband in his sickness not to survive him, out of affection and pity, engaged to burn themselves with her.

OUR author saw another burnt at Surât, who was of a middle age, and tolerably handsome. It was not possible to express the undaunted cheerfulness which appeared in her countenance ; the resolution with which she marched, washed herself, and spoke to the people ; the unconcernedness with which she looked on those who came to see her tragedy, viewed her little cabin ; and went into it, sat down upon the pile, and placed her husband's head in her lap ; took the lighted torch in her hand, and set fire to the hut within, while many Brâmmans were busy in kindling the fuel about her.

BERNIER saw some indeed, who, on sight of the fire, discovered some apprehension, and would perhaps have gone back, had they been left to themselves ; but it is often too late : for those demons the Brâmmans, who are there with their great sticks, astonish them ; and, if they cannot hearten them up, even thrust them in. This he saw done to a young woman, who retreated five or six paces from the pile ; and to another, who was much startled when she saw the flames take hold of her cloaths, those executioners thrusting her in with their long poles. On the other hand, he knew a handsome young woman who escaped out of their clutches, by falling into the hands of the Gadouts ; who sometimes meet there in great numbers, when they know that the woman who is to be burnt is young and fair, hath no great kindred, nor much company with her. For the women who are afraid of the pile, and fly from this kind of execution, knowing that they cannot be received again to live among the Gentiles, because reputed infamous, are usually the prey of those Gadouts ; who are also accounted infamous, and have nothing to lose. A Mogol durst neither rescue nor receive any, for fear of bringing himself into great trouble.

ONCE, at Labûr, the same author saw a very pretty young creature, not over twelve years of age, who appeared rather dead than alive, when she came to the pile. She shook, and wept bitterly. Mean time three or four Brâmmans, and an old hag, who held her under the arm, thrust her on, and made her sit down upon the wood : where, lest she should run away, they tied her hands and legs, and so burnt her alive. This piece of barbarity, among others, so enraged Bernier against the Brâmmans, that he could have strangled them, if he durst. But what they do in some other places of the Indies is still more cruel : for, instead of burning those women who are willing to die, upon the death of their husbands, they bury them alive in the ground, up to the very throat, and then two or three of them fall on at once and wring their necks about. Having thus choked them, they cover them hastily with earth, and then march backwards and forwards over their heads, to dispatch them outright ^l.

WE shall postpone our account of the religion of the Hindûs, till we come to treat of the peninsula on this side Ganges, where it appears in most lustre, and proceed to speak of the Parsîs.

^k LORD, ubi supr. p. 9.

^l BERNIER, ubi supr. part i. p. 119, & seqq.

(T) Ocwin. ton says, p. 343, that this burning was encouraged by the Brâmmans, who were always gainers thereby ; as all the jewels the woman put on were made their property : because they alone have power to touch the ashes, and rake for gold and silver.

IV.

Of the Parsîs.

- ^a THE Parsîs, which name implies a people come from Pârs, or Persia, are a colony They leave which retired from thence, soon after the Arabs had conquered that country, on the Persia; death of its last king Yezdegerd, in the 31st year of the Hejrab, and of Christ 651. For not caring to renounce their religion, and to avoid the persecution which the Mohammedans raised against them on that account, a number of them embarked at Jask, or Jaskes, in seven junks, as merchants; designing to trade to the Indies. Being safely arrived at Swalley, the port of Surât, the Parsîs on board five of the junks were hospitably received by the Râjah of Nunferri, on condition of paying tribute, and submitting to the government. Those of another junk were admitted, in like sort, by the Râjah who resided at Bariyaw, near Surât: but, soon after, being overcome by another Râjah, with whom he was at war, the Parsîs, as his subjects, were all put to the sword. The seventh junk, passing northwards, met with the same kind of reception at Kambaya: and from one of these three places, those who are to be found in any other part of the Indies, have dispersed themselves.
- In this state they continued for a long time, applying themselves to husbandry; and, with fettle in India. their religious books, lost the tradition of their original: till, at length, their name making them known to their brethren in Persia, these latter furnished them with copies of their law, and persons to instruct them in it^m. As these Parsîs then are the same, as to religion, with those who in Persia are called Gawrs, or Infidels, and Ateshpereft, or Fire-worshippers, of whom an account hath been given elsewhere, we shall in this place only mention certain customs concerning this Indian colony.
- ^c THE Parsîs go dressed like the other people of India; only they suffer their beards to Their aircs. grow long. Their profession is chiefly agriculture, sowing, planting, and dressing of vines; in short, all sorts of trees, particularly the palmito or toddy-tree. They are extremely industriousⁿ, and careful to train up their children in arts and labour. They are the principal weavers in all the country about Surât, where most of the silks and stuffs are made by their hands.
- It is customary with them to eat alone, and for every one to drink out of his own cup: Their diet. nor will they drink in the same vessel after strangers. By this means they think to keep themselves more pure; imagining, that if they eat or drink with others, they should contract some uncleanness. In these respects however they take more liberty than the Baniyâns; nor ^d are quite so abstemious. However, to avoid giving offence to either the Mohammedans or Hindûs, among whom they live, they forbear eating either pork or beef^o.
- THE cock is no less esteemed by them than the cow by the Hindûs; for this reason, that Cock esteemed. their junks being surprised by a storm, in their passage to India, as above-mentioned, they despaired of ever reaching the shore, till, hearing a cock crow, their hopes revived; and, discovering fire soon after, they by that signal reached land. This was still a more lucky omen, as fire is the principal object of their worship on earth, and which they keep continually burning in their Eggaris, or temples^p. They say, it was first brought from heaven by their Ho's fire great law-giver Zertûst, or Zerdûst, the Zoroastres of the Greeks; and that it hath been preserved unextinguished ever since: for that it would be a sin unpardonable were their Darûs (U), ^e or priests, to let it go out. Yet, in case it should go out, they are by their Zundevastâ, or book of the law, brought by Zertûst from heaven also, allowed to compose a fire of several mixtures, which they call their Antisbeherawon, or religious fire. The fire, however, kindled continually and fed with fuel in this manner, they consider as a part of God; who, they say, is of the burning. same substance; and therefore are commanded to worship it. Lord says, the fire in their temple at Nunferri, near Surât, has been kindled in this manner^q; but does not mention the form in which it appears there. Herbert affirms, that it is not composed of common combustibles, as wood, straw, coals, or the like, nor blown by bellows, but is compounded of sparks flying from red-hot steel, and kindled either by lightening or a burning-glass^r. This crude account seems to be taken from Lord's, which is not much more intelligible. ^f Terry says, they keep fires continually burning in their temples, in lamps fed with oil, which are perpetually attended by their priests^s.
- In regard to this holy fire, the Parsîs have a great veneration for that which they use in the Veneration for necessary services of life; and look on it as a sin to spill water on the fire, or spit in it unawares, fire, or nourish it with unclean fuel: so fearful they are, lest they should either defile it or put it out^a. So that, if their houses were on fire, they would sooner be persuaded to pour on oil, to increase, than water, to assuage, the flame. If a candle is once lighted, they would judge the breath of him more than pestilential, who durst attempt to blow it out : and a Parsî servant, who is commanded to bring a hot poker to warm any liquor, will desire to be excused from that office ; alleging, that he dare not hasten the extinction of the heat by such violent means. In short, they must not, on any account, quench fire ; but must leave it to go out gradually of itself^u.

^m LORD'S Relig. Parsîs, ch. 1. and TERRY Voy. Ind. sect. 21. ⁿ TERRY, sect. 21. Ovingt. p. 375.
^o TERRY, ibid. Ovingt. ibid. ^p Ovingt. p. 371. ^q LORD, ubi supr. ch. 8. ^r HERBERT'S Trav. Persia, p. 52. ^s TERRY, sect. 21.

(U) They are called also Harbûds; over whom is a high priest or archbishop, who is called Disfâr.

and marriage. THE Parsîs have great veneration for marriage ; and think it conducive to eternal happiness : for which reason, if a rich man's son or daughter happens to die before wedlock, he hires some person to marry the deceased. The matrimonial ceremony is never performed in their churches, but at home. The parties, being met at midnight, are placed together on a bed, with each a Darû, or Herbûd, attending, with rice in his hands. Then the Darû, or priest, for the bridegroom, laying his fore-finger on the bride's forehead, asks, If she will have that man for her wedded husband ? The bride's priest puts the same question to the bridegroom ; and, the parties having answered in the affirmative, the priests join their hands, and scatter the rice over them ; praying God, that they may be fruitful as the harvest, live in unity, and continue many years together. The ceremony being thus over, the parents of the woman give the dowry ; for the man gives none : and the marriage-feast continues for eight days^{*}.

Corpse exposed to birds of prey. THE manner of burying used among the Parsîs is very singular, as it is described by Mr. Ovington, who had seen the ceremony. The noblest sepulchre which they think they can bestow on their deceased friends, is that of exposing them to be devoured by the fowls of the air. After the body has lain dead for some time, the Halalchors, a kind of sordid Hindûs, carry it out upon a bier (X) into the open fields, near the place of burial, about a mile from Surât. There, having laid it down, some friend of the dead person hunts about in the neighbouring villages till he finds a dog, whom, with a cake, he intices, drawing as near the corpse as he can : for the nearer the cur approaches, the better hopes they have of the defunct's future happiness ; and if he can be allured to take a bit out of the dead man's mouth, it is an infallible sign of his going to heaven : but in case the dog, not being hungry, or loathing the object, refuses the morsel, they then consider their friend's state as truly miserable. This happened to be the case of the Parsî, whose corpse our author saw interred ; for the sturdy cur could not by any means be induced to come near it.

Place of sepulture, WHEN the dog has finished his part of the ceremony, two Darûs, at a furlong's distance from the bier, stand up, and, with joined hands, loudly repeat a form of prayer ; which, although they utter it with all the hurry imaginable, lasts for half an hour. All this while, a piece of white paper, fastened to each ear across the face, hung down two or three inches below the chin ; and, as soon as they finished their prayer, the bearers conveyed the corpse to the place of sepulture, which was round, inclosed with a wall, twelve feet high and one hundred in circumference. In the middle was a door of stone (Y), six feet from the ground, which was opened to admit the corpse. The ground with the (Z) walls is raised above four feet, and made shelving towards the center, where there is a sink for receiving the moisture, which continually drains from the carcases. The body being left here, the company betake themselves to a neighbouring rivulet, to wash ; after which they return home : but, a day or two after, some of the nearest relations come hither again, to observe another prognostic of the defunct's state in the next world. For if they find that the vultures have first plucked out his right eye, they take it for an undoubted sign of his soul's felicity ; if the left, they then conclude that his lot is miserable^y.

a horrible prospect. THE Parsîs are very careful to preserve their hair, and whatever is cut off their heads or beards ; that, once a year, those relics may be decently interred in their burying-place ; which affords a horrid prospect, and is much more shocking than a field of slaughtered men. It contains a number of carcases of very different, disagreeable colours and aspects. Some are seen there bleeding fresh ; but so torn by the vultures, which croud upon the walls, that they may truly be called raw heads and bloody bones, with the eye-balls out, and all the flesh on the cheeks picked off. The musculous parts of the body are full of great holes, and the skin on every part is mangled with the beaks of those ravenous birds. Here was a leg, there an arm : here lay half, and there the quarter, of a man. In this place one body appeared picked as clean as a skeleton ; and near it another, with the skin of several putrified colours. Some looked as if they were turned to jelly ; others were hardened like tanned

^a LORD, ubi supr.^u OVINGT. p. 372.^{*} LORD, ubi supr.^y OVINGT. p. 376, & seqq.(X) This bier, Lord says, must be of iron : for that the law forbids that the corpse should touch wood ; because it is a fuel to the fire, which they account holy.

(Y) Doubtless for the same reason that the bier was not of wood.

(Z) Perhaps it should be within the wall. In Herbert's draught the ground or floor seems raised within a foot of the top of the wall.

leather,

^a leather, by the various operations of the sun and air. Nor is the stench less intolerable than the prospect terrible; being sufficient to strike any man dead, who was to endure it but a little while. Yet the vultures sit on the wall, enjoying those loathsome vapours: some were so gorged with human flesh, that they seemed scarce able to take wing; and the feathers of others were much moulted away, by such kind of rank feeding ^z.

V.

Particulars relating to the Hindûstâns in general.

^b THE diversions used in Hindûstân are hawking and hunting; in which they employ Their exercises, leopards, as well as dogs. They likewise practise shooting, both with the bow and cifs, gun; and are excellent marksmen. Riding and managing their horses is also an exercise. For their domestic recreations they have pleasant gardens, accommodated with shady walks, and cooling tanks, or fountains; while variety of fruits and flowers regale both their smell and taste. In those tanks, which are small and round, they bathe themselves; and, in their garden-houses, which are very near, spend the heat of the day, sitting, or lying on carpets: where, if persons of quality, their servants give them air, and drive away the flies, with fans. This is commonly the place where they are attended by the barber; who shaves and rubs them all over; after which they usually go to sleep a while. The people here are fond of mount- and diversions, banks (A), and jugglers; who are very dexterous in their professions. One of their methods ^c to amuse the multitude, is to suffer themselves to be bitten by snakes, which they have in baskets for the purpose; and, when they are swelled considerably by the venom of the reptile, cure themselves by means of oils and powders; which they sell to the standers-by. Within-doors, they pass the time often in playing cards; which differ from ours, both as to the figures and greater variety of suits ^a.

THE Hindûstâns delight much in music, and have many sorts of instruments; most of them Music, blown: some few are strung. They have the use also of the timbrel; but their tunes were unpleasant to our author, favouring more of discord than harmony ^b.

THE common diseases found in Hindûstân are fluxes, hot fevers, and calentures; which Diseases, seize the head and brain more than other parts. But they are free from agues, as well as those Fevers, ^d two torments, rather than diseases, the gout and stone (B), so common in Europe. However, they are sometimes visited with an inflammation, or extreme burning (C), or rather a grievous pestilence; which, on a sudden, sweeps away thousands, when it gets into populous cities. The bodies of those who are seized with it, are set on fire, as it were, all over at once: it kills the party in twenty hours at most; tho' many of the English died in twelve. Just before their death, broad black and blue spots appeared on their breasts; and their flesh was so hot with the violence of the distemper, that one could scarce bear to lay his hand on it. Great blisters, filled with a thick yellow watery substance, rose on the bodies of those who survived it; which, on their breaking, issuing out, did scald and corrode their skin. Almost all the English, who arrive in the Indies, are seized with some violent sickness; but if ^e they escape, and live temperately, are very healthy afterwards.

In these hot diseases, the natives, as our author could observe, made very little use of physicians, although there are many of them; unless it be to breathe a vein sometimes: after which they starve out the distemper, by fasting, or a very low diet ^c.

AMONG other distempers is that called by the Portugueses mordechîn; which is a violent The morde- vomiting and looseness, caused most commonly by excess in eating; particularly of fish and chin. flesh together. It has been cured by a red-hot iron clapped to the heel of the patient, till he feels the smart; but some die of it. Another distemper, which afflicts the Europeans, is the barbeers, or a deprivation of the use of their limbs; whereby they are rendered unable to move either hand or foot. This arises sometimes from the neglect of guarding the limbs The barbeers, ^f from the cold vapours of the night, and moisture of those nocturnal mists, which now-and-then are felt in those parts. The most effectual remedy for this, is to frequent the hot baths ^d.

BESIDES the mortudchin (or mordechîn) the sonipât, and pilhay, are most common in Lethargy, Bengâl. The sonipât, or lethargy, is cured by putting chenopodium (D), pounded with

^z OVINGTON, p. 379, & seq.^a TERRY, Voy. Ind. sect. 9.^b Ibid. sect. 12.^c Ibid. sect. 13.^d OVINGTON's Voy. Surât, p. 350.

(A) Their tumblers far exceeded ours in suppleness and feats of agility. Trav. Ind. part iii. cap. 45. p. 77.

(B) To these Bernier adds aches of the kidneys and rheumatisms; which he attributes to the people's abstaining from wine, and great sobriety, joined to the constant evacuations by sweat; so that those, who bring those distempers thither, as he did, are at length freed from them. Neither is the pox so pernicious as in Europe. i'ernier's Mem. part iii. p. 28.

(C) Such as is spoken of, Deut. xxviii. 20.(D) A plant of the Chenoput, or goose-foot, kind.

vinegar, into the eyes. For the pilbay, or obstruction of the spleen, the Jaghis (or Hindû penitents), whose specific remedy this is, make a small incision over the spleen; then, drawing a long needle between the skin and flesh, apply a piece of horn to the wound; from whence they draw out a viscous matter like corruption.

Cholic.

Strangury.

THE common people use very simple remedies. To cure the cholic, arising from wind and phlegm, they give the party four spoonfuls of water, in which anise and a little ginger are boiled, till the water is half consumed. They likewise pound a raw onion, with ginger, and apply them cold to the part where the pain is felt. A stoppage of urine is cured by drinking a spoonful of olive-oil, well-mixed with an equal quantity of water. Our author has seen fevers cured, by giving the patient, before the fit comes on, three large pills, composed of ginger, black cummin, and long-pepper. Tertian agues are removed by administering three spoonfuls of tencrium-juice, or germander, mixed with a little salt and ginger, for three days together^c.

Longevity.

THE inhabitants of India not only live up to the greatest ages of the Europeans: but have more old people among them; which is owing to their temperance, both in eating and drinking^f. They are generally more healthy, but then not so full of vigour, as those who inhabit the cold climates; which feebleness and languor of body is a perpetual malady, very troublesome to all, in the great heats of summer; especially to Europeans, who are not inured to heat.

Computation of time.

THE Hindûs begin their year with the first day of March; the Mohammedans, on the tenth; when, as their astrologers compute, the sun enters into Aries. Their year is divided into twelve months, or rather thirteen moons; and their time distinguished in a different manner from that used in Europe. They divide the day into four parts, and the night into the same number; which they call pores: each pore is again subdivided into eight parts; which they name grîs. These parts of time are measured according to the antient method, by water dropping out of one vessel into another (E); and when the vessel is emptied, a man, who attends, fills it again, and then strikes the number of the pores and grîs which have passed, with a hammer, on a concave piece of metal, hanging by the brim on a wire: it has a deep sound, and may be heard very far. But these time-measurers are not common among them; neither have they the use of clocks, or sun-dials^g.

Buildings.

THE people of India are not infected with that plague of building, as the Italians call it. The poor cannot afford to erect sumptuous piles, and the grandees do not care to do it: partly, because, from the middle of September to the middle of April, they live in tents, removing from place to place, as often as they think fit, for change of air; and partly, because they have no inheritances, but subsist wholly on pensions from the emperor; whose favour is precarious. However, they have excellent materials for building; as timber, bricks, stone, and marble of various kinds and colours; with which their mosks and tombs are often raised.

Houses:

OF the houses to be found in cities and towns, some may be said to be handsome; others well to pass, such as are inhabited by merchants; and none very despicable. They are built low, not above two storeys, and many flat at top; which flat roofs, being made thick, and laid over with a plaister, like that of a Paris, keep both the sun and rains from penetrating. The upper rooms, in the houses of two storeys, are often very large, and furnished on the sides with folding doors, to let in fresh air; which is also introduced by the windows, always lying open, without glass, or any other shuttings, to keep it out. Neither have they any chimneys in their buildings; because they never use fire, but to dress their food, and that they do out of their houses, or tents, against a wall, or a bank of earth, to avoid the heat. In many places, they plant tall spreading trees about their houses; which are kept cool by their shade: so that in approaching some places, as Abmed abâd, in Guzerât, one seems to be entering a wood, rather than a city. Most of the houses there are of brick, and many with ridged roofs, covered with tiles: but the houses in their villages are generally very poor and mean. They are all contiguous; for our author never saw one standing by itself. The walls of some are of earth mixed with straw. They raise them immediately after the rainy season is over; so that, having time to dry thoroughly, they stand firm afterwards, and suffer little by the weather. But, for the generality, the cottages in those country villages are miserably small and poor; being raised at a very little charge, as sticks, rather than timber, are employed in building them^h.

Their form:

Several forts.

MANY houses, even in Debli itself, the capital of the empire, are not much better than these. There is in that city a great mixture of the good, passable, and mean. These last, of which there is a prodigious number, are made up only of mud and straw. They are inhabited by the common soldiers of the emperor's cavalry, and their servants, with the sutlers

^c PAPIN ap. Lett. Ediff. tom. ix. p. 426.

^f TERRY, sect. 13.

^g Ibid. sect. 13.

^h Ibid. sect. 9.

(E) A sort of clepsydra, or hour-glass.

- a who follow the court and the army. These thatched houses make Debli very subject to fires. In one year, while our author was there, above 40,000 were consumed, at two or three times that they took fire, when the winds happened to be stormy; in which many horses and women were burnt. On account of these pitiful houses, Bernier looked upon this metropolis ^{midling} almost no otherwise than as many villages joined together; and as a camp of an army, a little ^{house.} better and more commodiously placed than in the field. The houses of the second sort are inhabited by the Mansebdars, or little Omras, the men of the law, many of the great merchants, and other private men. Yet there are but few of them all built of brick, or stone; while no small number consist only of earth, and are covered with thatch. For all this, they are generally airy, and furnished with courts and gardens: the walls within are neatly plastered,
- b and apartments provided with fine moveables.

As to the houses of the first class, where dwell the Omras, it must be observed, that in those ^{the 1st sort:} hot countries, to entitle a house to the name of good and fair, it ought to be situated commodiously for receiving the air from all quarters, and principally from the north. It should have courts, gardens, trees, reservoirs, and little jets of water, in the halls, or at least at the entrance. It should be accommodated likewise with good cellars, and great flaps to keep the air in motion, during the time of reposing; which is from twelve o'clock till four or five, when the air under-ground begins to grow hot and stufing. In lieu of cellarage there should be little kas kbanays, that is, little houses of straw, or rather of odoriferous roots; which are very neatly made, and commonly placed in the midst of a grass-plat, near some c reservoir (or tank), for sake of watering them easily. It is required also for the beauty of a house, that it be seated in the midst of some large parterre; that it have four great divâns, or raised-ways, about six feet high, exposed to all winds. Lastly, a good house ought to have raised-terraces to sleep on in the night, on the same floor with some great chamber, for the conveniency of drawing in one's bedstead, in case of being surprised by storms of dust, or rain; or forced by the day-break breezes, or piercing dew, to seek for shelterⁱ.

THESE are the qualifications for the exterior part of a polite habitation, and the inside must ^{how furnished.} be furnished answerably to it. The whole floor must be covered with a cotton mattress, four inches thick, and that with a fine linen sheet during the summer, and with a piece of silk-tapestry in winter. In the most conspicuous part of the chamber, near the wall, there must d be one or two cotton quilts, set about with fine silk embroidery, wrought with gold and silver; with fine flowered coverings over them, for the master of the house, or visitors of quality, to sit on. Every quilt must have its cross-board purfled with gold, to lean upon; and several other such boards must be set round the chamber along the walls, covered with velvet, or flowered sattin, for standers-by to lean on. The walls, five or six feet from the floor, must be almost wholly taken up with niches, or little windows, cut in an hundred different figures, very fine, and well proportioned among themselves, with some china vessels and flower-pots in them. Lastly, the ceiling must be painted and gilded; but without any figure of man, or animals; their religion not allowing it. Thus there are houses in Hindûstân, which are truly handsome, although they be not like those in Europe^k.

e THE manufactures of India are chiefly silks and calicoes; of which there is great variety. ^{Manufactures.} Of the former you find velvets, sattins, taffetas, both plain and striped. Of the latter, calicoes, white, dyed, and painted; which last are called chints, being often very rich and beautiful. They likewise make curious silk, or cotton, carpets, with a silver or gold ground; cabinets, standishes, boxes, and the like; which are nicely inlaid, or varnished^l.

THE merchants of Hindûstân trade to several countries, according as the parts which they ^{Commerce.} inhabit are situated. Those in the western parts of the empire send their commodities to Mekka, in the Red Sea; whither the merchants of Egypt and Habâsh, or Abissinia, repair to traffic. The goods exported are chiefly cotton and calicoes of several kinds. They are carried in ships called junks, some of fourteen or fifteen hundred tons; built so large for the conveniency of pilgrims who go to Mekka. They are mounted with ordnance, but very sluggish, being broad and short like a lighter: so that, although the voyage is but short, they are a long time making it. One of these will carry 1700 passengers; and, at her return, her cargo may be worth 200,000 pounds, most of it in gold and silver. Besides the commodities before-mentioned, Hindûstân affords diamonds, indigo, lak, musk, and many others, with which foreign countries are supplied^m.

THE money current through the Mogol's empire are rupis of gold and silver. The latter ^{Coin.} is in value about half-a-crown English, and of the purest bullion; all silver which comes into the country being refined to the highest perfection, before it is sent to the mint. The gold rupi is equal in value to fourteen rupis of silver. These pieces are divided into half and quarter

g pieces. Their copper money varies in value from time to time: of it there are three sorts; the first worth about two pence, the second one penny, and the third six deniers. This last ⁱ BERN. Mem. Mog. Emp. part iii. p. 13. & seqq.

TAVERNIER, part iii. p. 120. THEVENOT, part iii. ch. 21.

^k Ibid. p. 17, & seqq.

^m TERRY, sect. 5.

^l TERRY, sect. 3. 5.

is called pesha, which may be changed into shell-money (or kori); fifty or sixty of which make a pesha. There is other money; as mahmúdi half mahmúdi, and almonds: but it is current only in the province of Guzerát. Five mahmúdi make about a crown. They have also the copper pesha, twenty of which go to a mahmúdi; and forty almonds for a pesha. As these almonds are extremely bitter, there is no danger that the children should eat their money^a.

Travelling.

THEY have several conveniencies for travelling in Hindústán; such as coaches and chariots, oxen, horses, mules, camels, and dromedaries; on which the women ride astride like the men. Of these several voitures an account hath been already given occasionally. The roads are for the general very good in this country, and much frequented on the score of trade; the karawáns consisting sometimes of 1000 oxen. But, besides wanting inns to lodge passengers, who find them for the general only in great towns, they are infested much with robbers; who lurk in some woods, or desarts, not far distant from the highways, and often attack whole karawáns, if they be not strong enough. They commonly kill those they overcome, before they fall to plundering; which obliges the merchants to hire soldiers, and go well armed^b.

^a TAVERN. part. ii. p. 2.

^b TERRY, sect. 6. 8, & 9. THEVENOT, part iii. p. 53, 54. 73.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Great Mogol's Court, his Forces, Revenues, and Government.

S E C T. I.

Of his Court, Women, and Eunuchs.

Fortress of Lehli.

THE fortress of Debli, in which is the Mábl, or Harám, and the other royal apartments, is built round on the river: yet there is between the water and the walls a pretty large and long sandy space, where commonly elephants are exercised, and often the militia of the Omrás and Rájahs is mustered, in the emperor's presence; who beholds them from the windows of one of his apartments. The walls are built partly of brick, and partly of a red sort of marble (or jasper), with round towers like those of the city: but these walls are much higher, stronger, and broader, so as to bear some field pieces, which are pointed towards the town; and, though sufficient to keep the Indians in awe, would make but small defence against European cannon. The fortress is encompassed on all sides: but, towards the river, with a fair ditch full of water and fish; and the ditch by a pretty large garden, at all times full of flowers, and green apricots; which, viewed at some distance, with the red walls, make a very agreeable prospect.

Place royal.

BETWEEN this garden and the city is a vast street, or rather place royal, to which the two principal gates of the fortress do answer; and to these two great gates, the two chief streets of the town. In this spacious place are set up the tents of the Rájahs, who are in the Great Mogol's pay, to keep there, each in his turn, their weekly guard; whereas the Omrás and Mansebdárs do duty within the fortress. In the same place the king's horses are exercised, and others in his service viewed. Here also a kind of market is kept, and players, jugglers, and astrologers, resort to tell people their fortunes; sitting in the sun, and all covered with dust, on a piece of tapestry, with some old mathematical instruments, and a book of figures, lying before them^a.

The entrance.

THERE is nothing remarkable at the entrance of the fortress, except two great stone elephants, with the Rájah of Cbitor on one, and his brother on the other. These are on the sides of one of the gates: which having passed through, you find a long and broad street, divided by a canal of running water, and having on both sides a wall five or six feet high, and four broad; and further-off some arches shut, which follow one another in form of gates. It is upon this long raised place, that the inferior officers of the court sit to dispatch their business, without being incommoded by the horses and people who pass beneath. There also the Mansebdárs keep guard at night. The water of the canal is brought from the river five or six leagues distant; and, having divided itself through the whole mábl, falls into the ditches; which are thus supplied.

Fair streets.

IF you enter by the other gate, you also find a long street, having its risings on the sides like the former; but with shops upon them, instead of arches. The street is properly a a bazâr, or exchange, very commodious in summer, and the rainy season; as being covered above, arch-wise, with great openings by intervals to let in the light. Besides these two streets, there are many other lesser ones on each side; which lead to the stately guard-rooms of the Omrâs, raised pretty high, with parterres and fountains before them. Here they keep watch for twenty-four hours, and are supplied with meat from the emperor's table. In divers places also, one meets with raised walks and tents; which are the offices of so many officers. There are besides many great halls, called kar khânays, where embroiderers, painters, goldsmiths, silk-weavers, and other artificers of all kinds, repair daily to work^b.

^a BERNIER, Mem. Mog. Emp. part iii. p. 6, & seq.

HAVING passed all these apartments, you come to the amkas, or place of audience; which ^{The amkas,} is a great square court with arches along the sides, separated by walls, with doors to pass from one to the other. Over the great gate, which is in the middle of one of the sides, there is a large raised-place, open towards the court, and called the nâgar khânay; for there the hautboys and cymbals play at certain hours of the day and night: which noisy musick, tho' disagreeable at first to an European, has something in it that is very majestic and melodious, when heard at a distance. Having passed through this gate, you enter into another court: where, on the opposite side, stands a large and stately salon, or hall, open on three sides ^{or audience-} toward the court; and supported by rows of pillars, which, as well as the ceiling, are painted ^{ball,} and gilded. The back-wall of this salon joins the mâhl; and has in the middle of it an opening, like a huge window, the bottom of which is seven or eight feet from the ground. It is here that the emperor appears seated on his throne, with his sons beside him, and several eunuchs attending to fan him, to drive away the flies with peacocks tails, and do other offices. From hence he beholds beneath him all the Omrâs, Râjahs, and ambassadors; and a little behind them the Mansebdârs, or lesser Omrâs, all standing upon a raised floor, inclosed with silver rails, with their eyes downwards, and their hands across their breasts. At a small distance from the rails, in the remaining part of the hall, and in the court, the people stand in crouds: for there, every day, about noon, the Great Mogol gives a general audience to his subjects of all degrees^c.

THIS assembly lasts about an hour and half; during which time that monarch is diverted ^{Emperor's af-} with seeing his horses, elephants, and leopards, besides other sorts of wild beasts, and birds of ^{fiduity} the game, pass before him. Sometimes he reviews the cavalry of one or two Omrâs: at other times, he orders the young Omrâs, Mansebdârs, and Gûrzberdûrs, or mace-bearers, to try their strength and skill, with cutlasses, on embowelled carcases of sheep; by cutting through the body, and the four legs joined together, at one blow. They who come thither to seek for justice, hold up their petitions; which the emperor observing, causes to be brought to him, and read: then, ordering the parties to approach, he examines them, and often causes justice to be executed on the spot. This is the more remarkable, because he is usually pre- ^{to administer} sent once a week at the adalet khânay, or chamber of justice, attended by his two prime Khâdis, ^{justices.} or chief justices; and another time in the week spends two hours in private, hearing the complaints of the common people. All this is truly great and royal: the worst is the abject flattery one hears in the amkas, from even the principal Omrâs; who, at every word almost which drops from the emperor's lips, lift up their hands, and cry, karamat! karamat! wonder! wonder! This kind of flattery passeth even to the common people; who, in applying to a physician, or painter, load him with fulsome praises, preferring him to the greatest master of the profession^d.

FROM the hall of audience, one enters into the court of the ghuzl khâneh; that is, ^{The ghuzl} the ball ^{to wash in;} which is very spacious and handsome, being painted and gilded, and its door ^{khâneh.} raised four or five feet high. There at night the emperor seated in a chair, with his Omrâs standing round him, gives audience to his officers, receives their accounts, and examines the most important affairs of state. His majesty never fails to be at these two assemblies, unless hindered by sickness, or some extraordinary business. In this second also, the same things pass before him in review; except the cavalry, which could not be seen at night. But, in place thereof, all the Mansebdârs who are on guard, salute the emperor, the Kours marching at their head. These are silver figures of diverse animals, carried on the tops of poles of the same metal, which make a pompous shew.

No lord of the empire can enter farther than the ghuzl khâneh into the mâhl (A); and ^{The mâhl im-} though Bernier was several times admitted to the apartment of a great lady, who was sick, to ^{penetrable.} attend her as a physician, yet his head was always covered, so that he could see nothing, as he was led by eunuchs. From these he learned, in general, that in the mâhl there are very handsome apartments, more or less large and stately, according to the quality of the women

(A) Mihl (or mâhal, as commonly written) signifies kept; and answers to the Harâm, or Saray, of Persia and Turkey.

^b BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 31, & seqq.

^c BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 36, & seqq.

^d Ibid. p. 40, & seqq.

who resided in them: that there is scarce a chamber, but has at its door plenty of running a water: that it is full of parterres, pleasant walks, shady places, rivulets, fountains, cascades, grottos, and great caves, to retire from the heat of the day. There are likewise large terraces, raised very high, for sleeping in the cool air. In a word you know not there what it is to be hot. They chiefly boast of a little tower facing the river; which they say is covered with plates of gold, like two others which are at Agra; all the inside is ornamented with gold and azure, as well as hung with costly pictures, and looking-glasses^c.

Classes of women. If you will believe the editor of Manuchi, this physician had access into the most inner apartments; which he describes. According to him, the mâhl contains more than 2000 women, which may be divided into six orders, or classes. 1. The queens, or women of the first rank; 2. the concubines, or his women of the second rank; 3. the princes and princesses; b 4. the ladies of the palace, who watch the conduct of the queens, and the governesses of the princesses; 5. the musicians of the court; 6. the women slaves and eunuchs.

The queens. WITH regard to the queens, or women of the first order, the Great Mogol has sometimes to the number of six; whom he marries according to ceremony. These usually are the daughters of Râjahs; though he sometimes raises to that dignity his favourite concubines, and even his female musicians and dancers, to whom on that occasion he gives new names. They are the sons only of these queens, who are looked on as legitimate, who bear the title of Soltân, and have a right of succeeding their father: but what our author says, that we never hear of the sons of concubines, or ever of more than four legitimate ones, is not fact.

The other ladies. THE women of the second rank are distinguished from those of the first in several respects. c Their apartments are not so fine, nor their pensions so great. Their cloaths are not so rich, nor their female slaves so numerous. They are likewise at the expence of their own victuals; the queens and princesses only being furnished out of the Imperial kitchen: and hence it is, that these latter are intitled Begûm; that is, without care or trouble^f.

The princes. THE princes and princesses of the blood are treated with the same magnificence as the queens. As soon as the Soltâns are born, they are assigned a pension; which is always more considerable than that of the greatest Omrâs. This revenue is kept for the young prince in a particular treasury, and he is put in possession of it on the day of his marriage; at which time also he quits the palace. When these Soltâns have attained the age of thirteen or fourteen years, they have separate palaces assigned them, and their court is scarce inferior to that of the emperor d himself. He only, who is nominated to the succession, remains at court. All the rest are sent in quality of viceroys into the remotest provinces. The eldest son of Aureng Zib had for his maintenance twenty millions of rupîs; which amount to about 1,500,000 l. English. While these princes remain in the palace under the eye of the father, an eunuch has the care of their education. They are taught to read, and sometimes to write, both in Persian and Arabic: their bodies are inured to military exercises, and their minds formed to principles of justice; being set to give their judgment upon the causes which daily happen, or on cases proposed for the purpose. Lastly, they are instructed in the Mohammedan religion, and the interest of the nation; which it may be their fortune one day to govern.

The princesses: As to the young Soltânas, their sisters, they are bred up with the greatest delicacy. Being e the principal amusement of the emperor their father, all their study is to please him; and by this means they often obtain more liberty than is becoming the condition of princesses: for his indulgence goes so far as to permit revelling; which spreads afterwards through the palace. However, the women live in great harmony. There are but few disputes among them; and, if any arise, they are soon suppressed by the governesses. The same dress is common to the queens, the ladies of the second rank, and the princesses of the blood. Their hair is made up in tresses, and perfumed, interlaced with pearls; some strings of which hang down the forehead, having a rich jewel in the middle. Some are permitted to wear turbâns, adorned with heron's feathers and jewels; or else scarfs, in form of pyramids, and hanging f behind down to the ground. About their necks they have collars of pearls, intermixed with jewels. Their habit is of silk, so fine, that the whole weighs not more than an ounce. They sleep in these gowns, which they never wear but one day. For the rest, they are loaded with precious stones. Two bands of diamonds, set with two rows of pearls in the middle, go round the neck of their robes, and cross over the stomach. Their ear-rings and bracelets are surprisingly splendid. Both their fingers and toes, which are uncovered, as they only wear sandals, are adorned with rich jewels. All the wives of the Great Mogol, as well as his daughters, wear on the right thumb a little mirror, set round with pearls, in which they are perpetually viewing themselves. But the ornament, which they most set-by, is a gold girdle, two inches broad, garnished with precious stones; from whence hang narrow plates of the same metal, set with diamonds, and terminating at the points with bunches of pearls. What g a is most surprising, each of these ladies has six or eight changes of such jewels. But this is no wonder, when one considers the immense riches of this court; which have been gathering since the time of Bâbr. It is incredible what expence is made in perfumes, which are burned both night and day in their apartments².

^c BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 45, & seqq.

^f MANOUCHI Hist. Gen. Emp. Mog. par Catrou, p. 334, & seqq.

THE ladies who are governesses to the young princesses, and spies upon the conduct of the queens, have indeed less share in the luxury and magnificence of the Harâm; but then they regis. have a great deal more in the government of the empire. It is by them that all intrigues are carried on; that peace and war is made; and that viceroyships and governments are obtained. These ladies, venerable for their age and wisdom, have each an office and name, correspondent to the employments and titles of the principal officers of the crown. One has the function of prime minister, another that of secretary of state, a third that of viceroy. Thus, she, who is stiled first minister, keeps a correspondence with the first minister, by means of eunuchs, who are continually carrying letters between them. It is by the intervention of the ladies of the palace, that matters, which were but slightly touched-on in the halls of audience, are instilled into the mind of the Great Mogol; so that they are, properly speaking, his privy-council. He learns from those, who bear the title of viceroys, all the news which come from the frontiers; whither they are permitted to send their couriers. From what has been said, it is easy to apprehend, that the chief care of all the great officers of the empire is to cultivate a good intelligence with each his lady in the palace, whose smallest displeasure may be the ruin of his fortune.

c THE female musicians and dancers are divided into bands; each of which has its mistress Singers and to teach them to sing, play on the lute, and dance. She is likewise the governess of those dancers. young creatures, who are chosen indifferently from among the Mohammedans and Pagans. The pension of the intendants of the musick is equal to that of the ladies of the palace, for whom they provide new airs and fancies. In short, all the Great Mogol's wives and daughters have each her band of musick (B); from whom they chuse their confidants: but all these bands unite on certain feast days, either to sing hymns to the deity, or celebrate the praises of the emperor. Their chief merit is to invent diversions to please their respective mistresses, especially comic scenes; one of which, well acted before the emperor, has often gained the actress a place among the women of the first or second order^h.

d THE women slaves of the palace do all the servile work belonging to the Harâm. They Women slaves; are divided into companies of ten or twelve, under the direction of a mistress. The emperor gives these names, as he does the other women; and distributes them among the rest at pleasure. He himself is served by none but women; and, what is not usual in other courts, is always guarded in the palace by a company of one hundred Tatar females, armed each with a bow, a poniard, and a simetar. Their conductress has the rank and pay of an Omrâh of war. This guard is a necessary defence to the Great Mogol against the fury and plots of so many rivals, which compose his court.

As to the eunuchs, who are very numerous in the inner apartments of the palace, some The eunuchs; serve for porters: a very nice and slippery post, it being equally dangerous to guard the entrances of the palace with too much or too little care. By too much rigour, they draw on themselves the aversion of the queens and princesses; while, by too much complaisance to them, they run a risque of losing their lives. Other eunuchs are the superintendants of the Harâm. He especially, who is called the Nâder, that is, Chief of the Harâm, is one of the principal officers of the crown. His business is to keep good order in the palace, which he effects by his severity. He regulates the expences of the emperor's women and daughters, is keeper of the imperial treasure, and grand master of the wardrobe. He is answerable for all the precious stones and jewels of the emperor: the providing of victuals, cloaths, linen, and perfumes, in short, the whole expence of the palace, is trusted to his management. The inferior eunuchs have all their offices under him. Some take care of the essences and perfumed oils; others, of the stuffs; a third party, of the furniture.

f THE eunuchs, most in favour with the princesses, are they who make and distribute the their employ- liquors which are drank in the palace: for, by their means, the ladies sometimes come at ments. wine, and other intoxicating liquors; which they are the fonder of, as they are forbidden. The eunuchs of the lowest class are employed solely to run on errands for the ladies of the court; and it is incredible, what a number of them are seen running about the streets on their occasions. Thus, every thing which is done in the city is known in the palace; and none are better acquainted with the news and intrigues of the town than these ladies, who are

² Manougian, ubi f. pr. p. 336, & seqq.

^h Ibid. ubi. supr. p. 341, & seqq.

(B) Bâbr does not speak of any women singers, or dancers, who reside in the palace. He says, there were some of the better sort, who were sometimes admitted into the palace, to divert the emperors; but that Aurang Zib would never suffer them to stay a night there, as his father used to do. Tom. iii. p. 60, & seqq.

so closely confined. The expences of the inner palace do not amount to less than fifteen millions of livres (C) every year¹.

S E C T. II.

The Forces and Armies of the Great Mogol.

Mogol soldiers.

IT is commonly said in Europe, that the armies of the Great Mogol are more to be feared on account of the multitude, than valour of their soldiers: but, in truth, they do not want courage, so much as the art of war, and skill to manage their arms. Although on this score they are much inferior to European troops, yet the subjects of this empire surpass in valour all the nations beyond the Indus. Military discipline, as well as the art of making war, are likewise better known to them than any of their neighbours; and it is owing to these advantages, that the predecessors of the present emperor so greatly extended the bounds of their dominions.

ALL the forces of this great empire may be reduced to three classes. The first is the army; which the Great Mogol keeps always in his capital, and which mount the guard every day before his palace. The second consists of the soldiers; who are distributed through the several provinces of the empire. The third class comprises the Indian auxiliaries; which the Râjahs, who are the emperor's vassals, are obliged to furnish.

Army at Dehli.

THE army, which daily encamp at the gates of the palace, whether the court be at Dehli, or Agra, amount at least to 50,000 horse; without reckoning that infinite number of infantry, which both capitals are full of. So that when the emperor takes the field, those cities look like two desert camps; which a great army had abandoned. Every body follows the court; and, excepting the quarter of the Baniyâns, or traders, all the rest of the cities become unpeopled. A prodigious number of victuallers, link-men, slaves, and pedlars, follow the army, to serve them in the same respects as they do in the cities. For the rest, this militia of the guard is not all upon the same footing. The most considerable among the Mogol troops are those called the 4000 slaves, to denote their attachment to the person of the emperor. Their commander, named Deroga, is an officer of such consideration, that he is often entrusted with the command of armies. All the soldiers belonging to this troop are marked in the forehead, by way of distinction; and out of them are taken the Mansebdârs, or subaltern officers; who by degrees rise to be Omrâs (D) of war, a title answering to that of generals.

The guards.

THE guards of the gold, silver, and iron mace, also compose three different companies; whose soldiers, marked differently in the forehead, are chosen for their valour, and have more or less pay, according to the metal with which their maces are covered. It is necessary for a person to serve, and distinguish himself in one of these troops, in order to arrive at the dignities of the state. As in the armies of the Great Mogol, not birth, but merit, only gives precedence, the son of a principal Omrâ is often seen in the lowest posts of the militia: nor is there any nobility among the Mohammedans in India, excepting those who pass for the descendants of Mohammed^k.

Garrisons in cities.

WHEN the court resides at either Dehli, or Agra, he keeps there in pay no fewer than 200,000 soldiers (E). But when the emperor is absent, there are commonly left in garrison 15,000 horse, and double the number of infantry. This proportion is observed in all the other provinces, which, though reckoned fifty-four, may be reduced to about twenty large ones; whose garrisons are as follow. In Labor 12,000 horse: Azmîr, 6,000: Guzerât, 10,000: Mâlwa, 7,000: Pâtan, 7,000: Moltân, 6,000: Kâbûl has always 60,000 to defend it, as being a frontier against the Persians, Tatars, and Pâtans: Tâtta, 4,000: Bâkar, 4,000: Uresha, 4,000: Kashmîr, 4,000: Dekan, 8,000: Bara, 7,000: Brâmpor, 6,000: Baglûna, 5,000: Rajemâbl, 4,000: Nânda, 6,000: Bengâl, being another frontier province on the east-side, has 40,000 horse: Ugen (or Eujen) surrounded by the most powerful Râjahs, 15,000: Visapor was the theatre of war against Sevaji, when our author wrote; therefore the garrison troops are not mentioned. Lastly, their number in Golkonda, which had been newly conquered, was 20,000.

Hindû troops.

THE auxiliary troops, which the Râjahs, who are the Great Mogol's vassals, are obliged to furnish, still add to his forces; although they are entertained more for grandeur than necessity,

¹ MANOUCHI, ubi supr. p. 343, & seqq.

^k Ibid. ubi supr. p. 345, & seqq.

(C) That is about 750,000 pounds English.

(D) According to Gemelli, the number of Omrâs is generally under forty: and there are generally two or three hundred Mansebdârs at court, besides such as are dispersed through the provinces. See Church. Cal. Trav. vol. iv. l. 2. ch. 7. p. 235.

(E) Gemelli says, the Great Mogol has dispersed thro' his empire 30,000 horse, and 400,000 foot; who have all great pay. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iv. l. 2. c. 6. p. 234.

a and to secure thereby the fidelity of those tributary princes. They reckon eighty-four of those Indian royalists, who still preserve a kind of sovereignty in their antient country. They have lands in property, which their children inherit: which is an advantage they have above the Omrâs, who have none, and yet treat them with much contempt. However, some of these pagan Râjahs still maintain a shadow of grandeur, even in the presence of the emperor himself; especially three of them, whose territories are well peopled, rich, and inaccessible¹.

THE first, who pretends to derive his original from Porus (F), and is called the son of him Commanded by who escaped from the deluge, is sovereign of the kingdom of Seduffia, whose capital is Ujêpûr. All the princes of this great state bear the name of Râna; which signifies the man with a good aspect. He keeps always on foot 50,000 horse, and 200,000 foot. He is the only Indian prince, who retains the privilege of marching, covered with an umbrella; an honour reserved solely for the monarch of Hindûstân. The Râjah of Rator is sovereign of nine provinces, and equals him of Seduffia, both in riches and power. He who lived in the time of Menuchi was named Jakout Sing; that is, the master-lion. The third sovereign prince, whose territory is named Chagha, and his capital Amber, is able to bring into the field 40,000 horse. The prince, who reigned there in the time of Aureng Zib, was called Ja Sing; often mentioned in their own Râjahs his wars.

BESIDES these principal Râjahs, there are thirty others, whose forces are not contemptible. Among the rest, four of them have each in pay 25,000 horse. All these princes, when they join the emperor's forces, command their own troops; give the Râjahpûts the same pay which is given to the soldiers of the empire, and receive appointments themselves equal to those of the first Mohammedan general. Such numerous forces spread through the empire procure security to the frontiers, as well as peace in the heart of the state. The smallest country-town has at least two horsemen and four foot soldiers to guard it, who are the spies of the court; which by that means is informed of all that passes throughout the empire.

THE emperor's stables are filled with horses and elephants. The former, it is said, amount to 12,000; whereof, however, only twenty or thirty are set apart for the emperor's use; the rest being kept either for pomp sake, or to bestow in presents: it being the custom with him to give a habit and a horse to all those, from whom he receives the slightest service. All these horses come from Persia, Arabia, and especially Tartary; for those bred in the Indies, besides being restive and apt to start, are sluggish and without vigour. For this reason above 100,000 are brought yearly from Bâlk, Bokhâra, and Kâbûl; which, at their passage of the Indus, pay twenty-five per cent. to the Great Mogol: for whose service the best are reserved, and the rest sold to those whose business it is to remount the cavalry. In these countries, where the forage is burned-up with the sun's heat, they feed the horses with paste. In the morning, they give them bread mixed-up with butter and sugar; in the evening, they have rice-milk, seasoned with pepper and aniseed^m.

As to the elephants, the Great Mogol has 500; which are kept in great porches, built for the purpose. The harness of these animals is surprisingly magnificent. That especially, which the emperor rides on, has on its back a throne, glittering all over with gold and precious stones. The rest are covered with plates of gold and silver, housings embroidered with gold, and with gold tufts and fringes. The throne-elephant is called the captain of the elephants: for to them the emperor gives names, as well as to his horses; and is always attended with a great train, and a considerable number of officers. Whenever he walks abroad, he is preceded by drums and trumpets, and banners are carried before him. He is allowed three times the maintenance of other elephants; each of which has twenty-five rupees a day, and ten servants to attend him. Two, called Kornakas, are to exercise and govern him: two others put on the chains; two supply him with the wine and water which he drinks: two carry the lance before him, and clear the way: two more are employed to accustom him to artificial fire: the ninth litters him; and the business of the tenth is to drive away the flies, and throw water on his body to cool him. These elephants are trained to slaughter, by attacking lions and tigers. They are taught also to break open gates; the method of which has something in it that is very military.

THERE are no public arsenals in the Indies, but every commander of a troop is obliged to furnish his soldiers with arms; among whom one sees a mixture of muskets, bows, swords, simeters, and lances, in the same corps: which disorder Aureng Zib in some measure rectified. As for the emperor's arsenal, nothing can be more magnificent. His javelins, bows, carquoises, and sabres, are ranged in order, all glittering with precious stones. Every Friday morning his majesty prays in the arsenal: where he intreats God, that with his sabres he may obtain victories, and make his enemies reverence the divine being.

¹ MANOUCHI, p. 349, & seqq.

^m Ibid. ubi sup. p. 352, & seqq.

(F) This must not be understood of king Porus, who lived in the time of Alexander; but of I'ouan, the first man, or Adam of the Indians, according to the Shâster, or explanation of their Fedâm.

his artillery:

THE Great Mogol's artillery is very numerous; and, for the most part, more antient than any to be found in Europe: it being certain (says our author) that cannon and powder were known in the Indies long before the conquest of Timûr Bek. The tradition is, that the Chineses, who they say invented those instruments of death, were once masters of Dehli, and founded some peices there. Each peice has its name, as well as the other arms. Formerly the cannoners of the empire were Europeans; but Aureng Zib ordered, that Mohammedans only should be employed in that service. At present no Franks are seen at court, excepting physicians or goldsmiths: the rest have left the country, where liberty of conscience is not as freely allowed, nor their service so much regarded, as heretoforeⁿ.

S E C T. III.

The Great Mogol's Revenues.

TO give our readers a just idea of the riches of this monarch, it will be necessary to consider, 1st. The fertility of Hindûstân. 2d. The wealth brought in by commerce from Europe, Africa, and the rest of Asia. 3d. The tributes which the emperor exacts of his subjects.

from the lands;

THE lands of Hindûstân produce abundance of grain, fruits, cotton, silk, cattle, diamonds, and other valuable commodities; but then of those lands many large tracts are incapable of culture; and the inhabitants of other parts neglect to till them. Besides, as the emperor is sole proprietor of those lands, in which the people have no share, no great care is taken to improve them. To remedy, in some measure, this inconvenience, Akber, who was the reformer of the finances of his empire, instead of paying the pensions of the viceroy and governors in money, as formerly, assigned them lands in their respective departments, to cultivate for their own advantage; obliging them to pay for the rest of their province a certain sum, in proportion to the fertility of the soil. These governors, who are properly no more than the farmers of the empire, farm it again in their turn. But as the husbandmen have nothing for their labour but their subsistence, it is difficult, without force, to get the peasants to work. This occasions them to fly into the territories of the Râjahs, who treat them with a little more humanity: and thus the dominions of the Great Mogol become dispeopled insensibly, and remain uncultivated.

from commerce.

HOWEVER, the gold and silver, which commerce brings into Hindûstân, effectually repair this defect, and extremely enrich the sovereign^o. According to Bernier, all the silver of Mexico, and gold of Peru, after circulating for some time in Europe and Asia, passes at last into the Great Mogol's empire, never to go out any more. One part of that wealth is transported to Turkey, to pay for the merchandizes brought from thence. From Turkey the money passes into Persia, by way of Smyrna, for the silks of that country. From Persia it enters Hindûstân, by the commerce of Mokka, Bâb al Mandel, Bâfrab, and Bander Abbâsi (or Gomrûn). Besides, it passes immediately from Europe to the Indies; particularly by the trade of the Dutch and Portuguese. Almost all the silver which the first of them bring from Japan, goes into the dominions of the Great Mogol, in exchange for commodities. It is true, that Hindûstân, for all its fertility, is obliged for some things to other countries; as, to Japan for copper, to England for lead; to Seylân for cinnamon, nutmegs, and elephants; to Arabia, Persia, and Tartary, for horses. But commonly the traders are paid in merchandizes: so that the greater part of the gold and silver of the world finds a thousand ways into Hindûstân, and has none to come out again.

Vortex of silver:

yet money not plenty.

WHAT is most astonishing, continues our author, for all this prodigious influx of gold and silver into India, one meets with no more plenty of it there, in the hands of private people, than elsewhere. It is true, that much gold and silver is consumed there in the manufactures; and that the Indians bury a great deal of it, in a belief, that they may stand in need of it in the other world: but, after all, that which contributes most to the scarcity of money, is the conduct of the emperors, who amass vast treasures, and deposit them in caverns under-ground, to prevent money being plenty; which they consider as pernicious. Thus all the treasure brought in by commerce falls at last into the coffers of the emperor^p. This being the case, no wonder this monarch should be immensely rich. In short, the whole revenue which he receives only from the produce of the provinces of his empire, farmed out, as aforesaid, amounts to no less than three hundred and eighty-seven millions one hundred and ninety-four thousand rupees (G).

BESIDES

ⁿ MANOUCHI, ubi supr. p. 356, & seqq. mem. Mog. emp. vol. i. part 3. p. 1, & seqq.

^o Ibid. ubi supr. p. 364, & seqq.

^p BERNIER,

(G) 387,194,000 rupees, at two shillings and sixpence each, amount to 48,399,250 pounds sterling; which differs only about 2,674,635 pounds from Mr.

Frazer's account. Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 35. Gemeib censures Thevenot for reducing the Great Mogol's revenue to thirty millions; and De Lact, for making it infinite: yet a BESIDES these fixed revenues, the casual revenues of the empire are another vast fund of wealth, being equal to, if not surpassing, the other. These arise from, 1. The annual poll tax, which the Hindús pay. 2. The duty of five per cent. on all commodities belonging to the Hindú merchants; from which Aureng Zib exempted the Mohammedan. 3. The duty laid on bleaching cloth. 4. The diamond mines; of which the most fair and perfect stones belong to him. 5. The vast customs from the ports of the Indian sea, and bay of Bengál. 6. The estates and effects of his Mohammedan subjects in his pay; of which he is the heir. 7. The tributes received from the Râjahs. Taxes and mines.

b GREAT part, however, of these casual revenues enter the emperor's treasury, only to pass out again among his subjects; half of whom subsist by his bounty, or at least receive wages from him. Besides that vast number of officers and soldiers, who subsist solely on his pay, all the peasants who cultivate the lands only for the sovereign are maintained at his expence; and all the mechanics of the cities, who work for him, are paid out of the imperial treasury. Vast expence.

S E C T. IV.

The Government and Police of the Great Mogol.

c WE have but little to say concerning the kind of government and police which the Mogols have established in the Indies. Nothing is more simple than the means which Officers of State. set this great empire in motion. The affairs of state are all at court in the hands of three or four Omrâs, of the first rank, who manage them under the authority of the sovereign. The Itemâdo'ddawlet is the first minister; a post like that of grand vizir in Turkey. But, as often a person of no experience, as a prince of the blood, or some favourite, is exalted to this dignity, the office is in effect vacant; in which case the burthen of affairs falls upon the two secretaries of state. One collects the treasures of the empire; the other pays them out of the officers of the crown, the troops, and the husbandmen. There is a third officer of the finances, whose business it is to get the effects of those who die in the emperor's service; a gainful but hateful employment. There is no arriving at these eminent posts but by the way of arms. The ministers who govern the state, and the generals who conduct the troops, are equally taken from among the officers of the army. Such as want them to speak to the emperor, in their behalf, must never approach them without a present; which the Omrâs expect, not out of avarice, but as it is looked on to be a mark of respect.

d THE command of the armies, when the emperor himself is not at the head of his troops, Commanders and soldiers. is often conferred on a prince of the blood: and, when no such prince is present, two generals are appointed by his majesty, one a Mohammedan Omrâ, the other an Indian Râjah, who command their respective troops: for the Râjapûts will obey none but a Râjah. It was the emperor Akber who regulated the state of his armies, and their pay. When a Mansebdâr's pension amounts to 50,000 rupees a year, he is accounted an Omrâ: who is out of it to maintain an elephant, and 250 horse, for the service; furnishing each with two horses. As the expence of each man is computed at ten rupees a day, the Omrâ's pay is not sufficient to maintain so large a company: but then the lands assigned those lords to cultivate, produce much more than what will answer the expence of his cavalry.

e THE Omrâs do not all receive the same pay of 50,000 rupees, which is called azari: that of some amounts to two, three, four, and five times as much. In short, those of the first rank receive even to six azari; that is, three millions of rupees per annum: so that their train is magnificent, and the cavalry which they maintain equal our little armies. By this means the Omrâs have sometimes become formidable to the prince himself. There are usually six Omrâs who enjoy this great pension; the Itemâdo'ddawlet, the two secretaries of state, the viceroys of Kâbul, he of Bengál, and the third of Ujen (or Eujen). The pay of the soldiers is at the discretion of the Omrâs who raise them. By the law, they are to be paid every day; but they put them off to once a month; and then oblige them often to take in part the old furniture of the Omrâs palaces, and cast-off cloaths of their wives. It is by such oppressions as these that the first officers of the empire accumulate great treasures; which, at their death, return into the coffers of the sovereign. how paid.

f NOTHING is more uniform than the exercise of justice in the Great Mogol's dominions. Justice well administered. The viceroys, governors of provinces, as well as those of cities and towns, do, in their respective jurisdictions, just what the emperor himself does at Agrâ or Debli. They alone yet says, he was told it amounted to eighty kror of rupees; and every kror being ten millions, the whole comes to one hundred millions sterling. He adds, that the daily expence at court, to maintain the eunuchs, musicians, dancers, elephants, and other beasts, is not less than 50,000 rupees, or 6,250 pounds. See Church. collect. vol. iv. l. 2 c. 6. p. 234.

¹ MANOUCHI, ubi supr. p. 370, & seqq.

² MANOUCHI, ubi supr. p. 373, & seqq.

administer justice, and give judgment with regard both to the effects and lives of the people. a
It is true, that in all cities a Kotwâl, and a Kâzi, have been established to determine certain matters: but then the parties are at liberty, whether they will bring their affairs before their tribunals or not: for every body has a right to have recourse immediately, either to the Great Mogol himself, in the place where-ever he resides, or to the viceroys, and governors, in their respective cities.

Police in cities. THE Kotwâl discharges the function both of civil and criminal judge. The chief duty of this magistrate, as judge of the police, is to prevent drunkenness; to punish all those who distill arrak, to suppress taverns, and, in general, all places of debauchery. As he is obliged to give the emperor an account of all dissensions in private families, as well as nocturnal assemblies; he therefore has in all parts of the city a vast number of spies, whose business b it is to sweep the houses every morning, and set the moveables in order. They at the same time pry into the secrets of the family, put questions to the slaves, and then make their report to the Kotwâl; who, in quality of grand provost (or judge criminal) is answerable for all the robberies committed within his district: for this reason he has always soldiers in the country, and men disguised in the city, to keep things in good order. With regard to the Kâzi, his jurisdiction is confined to matters of religion, divorces, and the like. For the rest, neither of these two judges is permitted to pronounce sentence of death upon any person whomsoever, without making a report to the emperor; who must confirm the sentence on three different days, before it can be put in execution. The same rule is observed in the province, where only the viceroys, or governors, can condemn to death. e

Care of life. THERE is no delay in administering justice in the Mogol's dominions. Without any of those formalities and rules which protract causes in our courts, every one opens his own case, or gets one of the Omrâs to do it for him. Immediately, the witnesses being called and examined, judgment is pronounced on the spot, almost always as equitable as it is speedy. It is not to be denied, that the bribery of judges, and subornation of witnesses, is to be found in Hindûstân as well as other countries: but then both false witnesses and corrupt judges are punished there with death: which is a great check upon both. Iniquitous judgments seem to be an universal disorder, which the length of proceedings is not likely to remedy. For the rest, this small number of judicial officers, who are never more than three in the great cities, as well as the small, have not so much business on their hands as the least of our judges in d Europe; who yet are so very numerous. Although the customs observed in this great empire may not all be free from exception, yet we have remarked a mixture of barbarity and uprightness; which, taken all together, renders the government of the Great Mogol not inferior to that of many other of the best of nations^s.

Excellent form,

in law-suits.

^s MANOUCHI, ubi sup. p. 376, & seqq.

C H A P. V.

The History of the Descendants of Timûr Bek, who have reigned in Hindûstân, under the Names of Jagatays and Mogols.

Historians of India. THE history of this branch of Timûr's family has been written by a great number of a Asiatic historians; of which as yet only a few extracts have been transmitted to us, by those skilled in the eastern languages. The best of these is that short history of the Moghol emperors, inserted by Mr Frazer, by way of introduction, in his history of Nâdir Shâh. A piece very valuable in its kind, but too concise to give the reader a satisfactory information concerning the first princes who founded the empire; or indeed of any who preceded the present monarch. It is true, we meet with some account of them all in the several travellers who have visited India, from time to time: but the memoirs, which, during their short residence, they have collected, chiefly from the report of Europeans residing in that part of the world; are so imperfect and uncertain, and, for the most part, relate to such trivial matters, that they contribute very little to form a good history of the Hindûstân b emperors.

Manouchi censured.

As for the general history of the Mogol empire from its foundation, by Catrou, the Jesuit, said to be composed from the Portuguese memoirs of Manouchi, a Venetian physician, written about the year 1695, and taken from the registers of the empire, it is a mere romance; at least, with regard to the first Mogol monarchs: wherein the few hints, to be gathered from Texeira and D'Herbelot, are worked-up with the copious product of invention, to supply the deficiencies. Nor are the reigns of the latter monarchs free from fiction, altho' the

- a the travellers, such as Tavernier and Bernier, have afforded the author pretty large supplies of facts. Yet, as they carry their history no lower than the end of the reign of Shâh Jêhân, Manouchi's memoirs, it seems, end there too; although, when he left India, Aureng Zib had sat on the throne above thirty years. But the contriver of the history, whoever he was, was in the right not to run the risk too far of being detected, by entering upon a history so near his own time, since he had no good guides to conduct him, and might be reproached with imposture by many persons who had really been in India; where, in all probability, he never was. If there be any thing in the whole, which may be depended on, it seems to be the remarks relating to the court of the Great Mogol: in which, however, it is easy to perceive a great mixture of matters taken from the above-mentioned authors, if they be not his principal funds.
- b

I.

The reign of Soltân Bâbr, surnamed Zehîro'ddîn Mohammed (A).

- THIS prince, as hath been already observed^a, was the son of Omar, or Aumar, Sheykh, fourth son of Abusaid Mirza, son of Mohammed, sixth son of Mirân Shâh, third son of Timûr Bek, Bâbr. or Tamerlan. He was born the 12th of February, 1483; and, by the death of his father, on the 8th of June, 1494, became sovereign of the country of Andekbân, or Andjan, in Mâwara'nâhr, or Great Bukhâria: at which time he was eleven lunar years, seven months, and twenty-nine days old. On the death of Soltân Ahmed, son of Abusaid Mirza, which happened in 899 of the Hejrab, he ascended the throne in Samarkant, the capital of all that region. But five years after, viz. in 904, Shaybeg Soltân, invading Great Bukhâria, with an army of Uzbeks, from beyond the river Sibân, or Sîr, drove him out of his kingdom, and took possession of it himself. Hej. 899. A. D. 1493.
Bâbr, or Bâbor, being thus driven out, retired to Gâznen, or Gâzna; from whence he began his expeditions into India. Thus some writers give an account^b: but according to others, after his expulsion from Mâwara'nâhr, he conquered Gosnari (or Gazna), with the other provinces of Kâbul, Kandabâr, Biddukshân, and the places dependant on them: after which he invaded Hindûstân five times. In the first four, he was unsuccessful; but in the fifth, on the first of May, 1526, he gave battle, near the village of Maltia, to Soltân Ibrâhîm Lawdi, who had with him 100,000 Afghâns (B), besides 1000 armed elephants. And, although he had scarcely 12,000 effective men in his army, yet he intirely defeated those numerous forces. A. D. 1498. invades Hindûstân.
- d

ELATED with this great success, Bâbr, pursuing his good fortune, in a short time subdued all that empire, excepting the kingdoms of Dekkân, Guzerât, and Bengâl. Eleven months and five days after the above-mentioned battle, he came to an engagement with Râna Sînga, the most powerful of the Indian princes; and, although the army of the latter was incredibly numerous, as well as strengthened with many armed elephants, yet he at length obtained the victory. Great conquests there.

- Bâbr* died on the 25th of December, 1530, in Charbâghi, near Agrâ, on the banks of the river Chun (C): from whence his body was carried to be interred at Kâbul; after he had lived forty-nine lunar years, four months, and one day. Of this time he reigned in all thirty-seven years, eight months, and two days; thirty-two years, ten months, and three days before the conquest of India; and four years, nine months, and twenty-nine days after the conquest. The best history of his actions are the commentaries written by himself, called Vakeat Bâbri; that is, Bâbr's Occurrences. His death.
- e

- THE Indians relate, that Bâbr, before his expeditions into India, to discover the condition which it was in, as to strength, entered that country, accompanied with thirty of his lords, in the disguise of pilgrims. But that, at Debli, they were discovered by Sekânder, the Potan (or Pâtan) king, and arrested: but, on Bâbr's taking an oath, not to attempt the conquest of Hindûstân, during either of their lives, Sekânder pardoned them. This story is painted at Lahûr. The oath was inviolably kept: but when both were dead, Homayûn, invading the country, dispossessed Ibrâhîm, and Shâh Selîm, Sekânder's son, of their dominions^d. His good fortune.
- f

^a See before, Vol. II.

^b D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. p. 38, and 163. art. Abusaid Mirza, and Miran Shâh. ^c FRASER Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 6. & seqq.

^d D'HERBELOT Bibl. orient. p. 58, art. Bâbr; and DE LAET de Imper. Mag. p. 166.

(A) Soltân Bâbr assumed the title of Zehîro'dîn, which signifies the supporter of religion; and the name of Mohammed, which signifies praised, is prefixed (or supposed to be so) to every Musfulman's name. Frazer.

(B) Afghans are the several tribes of Mohammedans who inhabit the northern parts of India; over the whole of which some of them are spread. They are known often by the name of Pattans, and are esteemed the best soldiers in the country. Frazer.—The Afghans are called by some authors Angans, Augwans, and Ougans. Some travellers, as Bernier and Thevenot, make the Patâns, or Pataus, natives of the country about Patna, to the east of the Ganges; and to have reigned in India before the Mohammedans conquered it.

(C) The Chun is often called Jamna. Frazer.—Jamna, and Jemini; written also Gemny.

II.

The reign of Hemayûn.

² Soltân, Hemayûn, BABR being dead, his son Hemayûn, by some called Homaiun, and Hemayon, surnamed Nefsîro'ddîn (D) Mohammed, succeeded him. This prince was born in the castle of Kâbul, on the 4th of March, 1508; and, on the 26th of December, 1530, sat on the throne at Agrâ. In November, 1534, he set out to conquer Mâlva, and Guzerât, then possessed by Soltân Babâdr (E); who prepared to meet him. The two armies met; and the Soltân, having been defeated, fled to Mandow; whither being pursued by the victor, he retired to Chanpanûr (F); from this place to Kambait (or Kambaya), and from thence to Diu (or Dîv). Hemayûn followed him as far as Kambait; where he stopped a while^c, with a design to attack Diu: but the Soltân having in the same time made a peace with the Portugueses, and obtained their assistance, by granting them leave to build a fort there, Hemayûn, despairing to take the place, returned to his own dominions^f. However, this prince, the next year, entering Mâlva and Guzerât a second time, made an intire conquest of those provinces^g, excepting Diu, and a few other places.

conquers Bengal. HEMAYUN, encouraged by this success, in 1538, turned his arms against Bengâl; which he subdued: but, in 1540, being forsaken by his good fortune, he was driven out of his dominions by Shîr Khân, the Afghân, and obliged to fly into Persia; where he remained five years, five months, and fifteen days. The particulars of this transaction, with his reception by Shîh Tahmasp, son of Shîh Ismail Sîfi, is related at large in several histories (G). At length (by the assistance of that monarch) on the 1st of September, 1545, he took Kandabâr from Mirza Askeri, who governed it as deputy to Mirza Kamrân; and, on the 15th of November, 1545, took Kâbul from Mirza Kamrân himself. Hemayûn, pursuing his good fortune, in the spring, 1546, marched into Biddukhsbân, and recovered that province from Mirza Soleymân, who had revolted, and usurped the government of it.

AFTER so many prosperous enterprises, Hemayûn for some time laid aside the toils of war, to take a little repose, and settle the reconquered provinces. At length, in December 1554, he began his march from Kâbul to Hindustân; and, on the 22d of February, 1555, arrived at Labûr; in May, he came to Serbend, and, on the 20th of June, encountered and defeated Sekânder Sowr, son-in-law to the usurper Shîr Khân. His first name was Ahmed, and he governed Panjâb, or Labûr, under Selîm Khân: after whose death he assumed the government of that state, which extended from the river Send, or Indus, to the Ganges, and called himself Sekânder^h.

Shir Khân attacks THIS in brief is the history of the reign of Hemayûn, or Homayûn, as given by Mr. Frazer: the conciseness of which we shall supply from a curious fragment, communicated by De Laet (H); and beginning with that prince's first expedition into Bengâl, which was in 1558, as before remarked. Hamayon (or Hemayûn), departing from Agrâ with an army, entered that country; and, having defeated the Pâtan forces, soon conquered it, and changed the name to Senetabâd. But the fruits of his victory did not last long: for Ferried (I) Khân, who assumed the name of Shîr Khân, one of the Pâtan kings, departing from Naw with 65,000 troops, quickly recovered the province of Babar (K), with the castle of Râjah Rotas, and compelled Hemayûn to fly hastily out of Bengâl in Pâtan. Shîr Khân followed him, and, overtaking him at Tzioka, obliged him to retreat back to Agrâ; where having gathered his scattered troops, and augmented them with supplies from several provinces, he marched a second time towards the Ganges. As soon as Shîr Khân had notice of his coming, he set forward, sending before 20,000 horse, to prevent his passage of the river.

and defeats him. THE Mogols were there incamped; but, relying perhaps on their own strength, spent the night in revelling, and took no care to keep a guard. This being made known to Shîr Khân, ^c FRASER Hist. Nadir Shah, p. 6. ibid. p. 9.

^f DE FARIA Asia Port.

^g FRASER, ibid.

^h FRASER,

(D) Nefsîro'ddîn, or Nafsîro'dîn, signifies the assister, or helper, of religion.

(E) Called Badur in the European histories.

(F) Called Champanel by De Faria y Sousa, in his Asia Portuguesa. According to whom it was Badur's capital.

(G) As Akber Namâ, Pâdshâh Namâ, Tebkat Akber Shâhi, Tarikh alim Aray, and Montekheb al Tawarikh Beda'uni: they all five treat of the Mogol emperors, excepting the fourth, which contains the history of the Shâhs of Persia. Frazer.

(H) In his tract, De imperio Magni Mogolis, sive India vera, commentarius, inserted in the Respublicæ, printed by Elzevir, 1631. This fragment, supposed by De Laet to be extracted from the historians of Hindustân, was given to him by the famous Peter Vanden Broecke, who founded Batavia in Java. It agrees almost in every thing with Mr. Frazer's abstract; which serves to supply the date of actions, omitted in the fragment. Herbert, who has made use of it, passes but slightly over the reign of Hemayûn: nor are his extracts, relating to Akber and Jehân Ghîr, made with due care.

(I) Perhaps Ferhad Khân.

(K) Perhaps rather Bîrar, in which the castle of Rotas is.

- a by his spies, he sent Ghâwas Khân, with 10,000 light horse; who, having but fifteen miles to ride, early in the morning, rushed upon the enemy, buried in sleep and wine, and made a great slaughter. Hemayûn, awakened with the cries and confusion which were in his camp, and seeing his soldiers already flying on every side, made haste and fled himself. When he came to the river, with only a few followers, he, by the assistance of a water-carrier, swam over to the other side. There he luckily found a horse, belonging to some soldier, who had been drowned in passing the stream, and, mounting him, escaped to Agrâ. All his elephants and horses, with a considerable treasure, fell into the hands of the Pâtans. The women likewise and daughters of him, as well as his Omrâs, became a prey to *Shîr Khân*¹.
- b THIS prince, having obtained so unexpected a victory, used it with the greatest moderation; Hemayûn neither offering any indecency to the captive females himself, nor suffering his officers to commit any. To improve the opportunity to the utmost, and give the enemy no time to breathe, he immediately advances towards Agrâ; taking many cities in his way. Mean time Hemayûn, quite destitute of troops, taking with him Jemla Begûm, one of his wives, who was big with child, retired to Azmîr or (Ajmîr), and thence to the province of Shermel; where, in the castle of Ammer, she brought him a son, named afterwards Akber. Not thinking himself yet secure, he fled to Labûr, where Mîrza Kamrân, his half-brother, commanded. This prince, vexed to see his brother's want of courage, asked him leave to go fight the Pâtans, who were already arrived at Sherbind, since he was so much afraid to face them. The king, beyond measure offended with his brother's speech, left Labûr, and went towards Kashmîr, expecting shelter from one of his Omrâs, who governed there: but, that commander being lately dead, the inhabitants had taken different measures, and not only fortified the capital, but shut up the straits of the mountains called Kotbel; so that there was no entering the country without great difficulty.
- c HEMAYUN, finding himself excluded there also, directed his course towards Kâbûl: but his brother Kamrân, having been obliged to quit Labûr (which Shîr Khân had now taken, as well as Mûltân); and, being greatly incensed against the king on that account, by great marches, got to Trinlebeg; and thus cut off his retreat to Kâbûl. In this distress he applied to Mîrza Askeri (L), who resided at Kandabâr, desiring that he might put his castle in a state of defence: but he would not so much as let him into it. Nor did he meet with more obedience from Khân Housseyn, governor of Tâtta: for the king having sent to desire leave to pass through his province, he returned for answer, that if his majesty intended for Persia, his best way was to go by Kandabâr. Accordingly he took that road, seeing himself deserted by all his people; and, leaving his wife, and son, then but one year old, with his baggage, domestics, and harâm, in the town of Shanwan (M), entered Persia, and came to Sebistgân, accompanied only by Beyrâm Khân; who a little while before had joined him with a few choice soldiers^k.
- d As soon as Askeri knew of his brother's flight, he seized on every thing which he had left behind, with his treasure, and confined his wife with her young son in the fortress. But Hemayûn received more friendly treatment from Shâh Tâhmasp (N); who, on the first news of his misfortune and flight, sent orders to the governor of Herât, to receive him with all imaginable honour, in case he should repair to that city. The governor accordingly, on the king's approach, went out, with the principal inhabitants, twelve miles to meet him; furnished him with all necessaries while he staid at Herât, and wrote to the governors on the road to court, to receive him with honour in his passage. When Hemayûn drew near Kazban, where the Shâh then resided, the Persian monarch sent his brother Mîrza Bayrâm, accompanied by all the great lords, to receive, and introduce him to his presence.
- e TAHMASP, having embraced and comforted the refugee prince, ordered his brother Bayrâm to wait on him at table. The king, observing with what assiduity the prince performed that office, said, the Shâh did rightly, so to teach his brother to be obedient; for that he, who had heaped honours and riches on his brothers, found them the worst enemies in his distress. Bayrâm, enraged at this offensive speech, put his brother in mind, that, in the reign of Shâh Ismâil, Babr, the father of Hemayûn, was no more than a gardener; and so far incensed him, that he brought him to a resolution to make his guest away. This resolution had undoubtedly been executed, if Begûm Soltâna, the Shâh's sister, had not in pity to the exiled prince, by her eloquence, diverted her brother from his purpose: putting him in mind, that he was descended from Timûr, to whom their ancestors owed numberless favours, even their empire; and that therefore he could not, without ingratitude, desert the Mogol prince.

¹ DE LAET de Imp. Mag. Mogol, p. 172, & seqq.^k Ibid. p. 174, & seqq.(L) In De Laet, Affari.(M) In the original, Tzanzaban.(N) In De Laet, Tâmas; afterwards Tamas.

returns to Kâbûl ;

TAHMASP, moved by what his sister had urged, gave orders that Hemayûn should be furnished with troops, and all things necessary for his return to Hindustân. At the same time he commanded Dein and Khân Tramma, Babadr Khân, Klân Kûl Khân, Nareajin (a kinsman of Hassan Kûl Khân), Ismaël Kûl Khân Wâttebel, and other great officers, to accompany him thither. Hemayûn immediately leaves Kazbîn, and, hustling to Kandahâr, surrounds it with his forces. On Askeri's refusing to deliver up the fortress, he ordered the walls to be battered : but when he beheld his son, then two years old (O), exposed on the walls, he gave over the attack ; after which, he, upon oath, granted his brother's life, and liberty to depart the place. Askeri went to his brother Kamrân, who then resided at Kâbûl : but the king following him, with very little trouble, took Kâbûl, and Kamrân in it. Then, having ordered his eyes to be put out, banished him to Mekka ; where soon after he died ^b.

recovers Hin-
dûstân ;

IN the year of the Hejrah 960, and of Christ 1552 (P), Shir Khân, or Tiekmeke (Q), king of the Pâtans, breathed his last in the castle of Gwaleer ; leaving behind him a son, named Fer Khân, no more than twelve years old : but while the principal ministers prepared to set him in the throne, his uncle Adel Khân (R), blinded with a lust of reigning, made him away, and usurped the kingdom. The nobles, in detestation of this atrocious action, revolted in almost every province. Adel Khân, however, hoping to divert the storm, set out from Gwaleyar with a great army ; and, with little or no difficulty, took Chilnâr (S), a large and wealthy city. The death of Shir Khân, and the troubles which ensued thereon, soon reached the ears of Hemayûn, still residing at Kâbûl ; who, judging this a proper juncture to recover his loss, immediately, with an army, enters India. There, not daring to resist him, all the towns and provinces submitted, till he came to Serhind, which was governed by Rekander Khân Affega (T), a faithful minister of the late king. This lord, with ten thousand horse, had the courage to take the field against the Mogols : but, being overpowered, after a sharp dispute, with one thousand only of his troops, fled to the mountains of Kangera.

enters Dehli

AFTER this victory, Hemayûn intrusted Beyrâm Khân Kânna with the education of his son Abdol Fetta Jelîlo'ddîn Mohammed ; and withal, giving the whole command of the army to that lord, sent him in pursuit of Rekander, who had retired to Dehli. At the same time Allan Kûl, Semaran Khân, and Babadr Khân, were dispatched to recover the province of Do-ab (U), which lies between the rivers Ganges and Jamna, or Semena. Success attended both expeditions ; for Rekander was slain, and that province reduced. Hereupon Hemayûn entered triumphantly into Dehli ; where he laid the foundation of a magnificent palace : but he had scarce been settled in his capital three months, when, by an accident, he was snatched out of the world. For, descending the palace stairs, on hearing the cryer call to afternoon prayers, he sat down, leaning on his staff ; and, having taken too large a dose of opium, fell asleep : when suddenly, the staff slipping, he pitched headlong down forty steps, and was so bruised with the fall, that he died in three days ^m. The prince departed this life on the 24th of January, 1556 (X), and was buried in a monument erected on the banks of the river Chun, or Jemni, at the age of forty-nine lunar years, four months, and ten days ; of which he reigned twenty-five years, ten months, and five days ⁿ.

His death.

S E C T. III.

The reign of Akbar, or Akber, surnamed Jalâlo'ddîn Mohammed.

3. Sultân
Akbar.

AKBAR, son of Hemayûn, was born in the fort of Amkorot, on the 12th of October, 1542 ; and, on the 12th of February, 1556, being then thirteen solar years and four months old, was proclaimed emperor, at Kalanôr, in the province of Labûr. He was reckoned a great and good prince, and was very fortunate in war ; having in his reign made several conquests, and reduced almost all India to his obedience. This in general is all which our author relates concerning this Mogol monarch ; excepting that, as he was fixed to no reli-

¹ DE LAET de Imp. Magn. Mogol, p. 175, & seqq. supr. p. 10.

^m Ibid. p. 178, & seqq.

ⁿ FRASER, ubi

(O) This supposes Hemayûn to have been in Persia no more than one year ; whereas he was there five years and half.

(P) De Laet puts 1550. De Faria, who gives the history of him, says, he was killed at Kalijar (or Gavaliyâr), which he took from the Rajaputs, by the bursting of a cannon which he fired. Pert. Asia, vol. i. ch. 9. p. 422.

(Q) Before he is called Ferriad Khân.

(R) He is in the next reign called Abdol Khân.

(S) In the original, Tzibilnar. The names are Dutch spelling, and inaccurate.

(T) Perhaps for Sekander Klân Affgân. If so, the Affghâns seem to differ from the Pâtans, or to be a particular branch of them : or, instead of Affghân, it may be Afkan ; which signifies an overthrower.

(U) Or Do-w-ab ; which, our author observes elsewhere, signifies Mesopotamia, or Interamnâ, as lying between the Ganges and the Jemni. It is called also Sanbal, or Sambel.

(X) According to the fragment of De Laet, Hemayûn died in the year of the Hijrah 962, or of Christ 1554 ; and not 1552, as that author puts it.

a gion himself, so he persecuted none; and that, in 1582, he wrote to the king of Portugal, desiring him to send him a translation of the scriptures into Arabic or Persian; and, at the same time, some learned person, to explain the Christian religion (Y)^a. It were to be wished, that, instead of Akbar's letter, Mr. Frazer had given some account of his actions from the authors to which he refers his readers (Z). For want of such a supply, we must have recourse again to Vanden Broecke's fragment, published by De Laët; which gives the best history of this and the following reign to be met with in any European author.

WHEN Abdol Khân heard, at Skilnari, where he had lain close all this while, of the sudden death of Hemayûn, he sent his chief general Kuli Khân Hemow, an Indian, of no great birth, but very valiant, with 100,000 horse, 500 elephants, and a great military chest, towards the city of Debli, to make war on the Mogols. Mean time Akbar, who, with Beyrâm Khân, Khân Kânna, and the greater part of his army, went in pursuit of his father's enemies, in the mountains of Khoshtân, as before mentioned, so soon as he received tidings of his death, marched to Kalanir; and, being there proclaimed king by his governor, made what haste he could to Debli. In the way he met Turdi Khân; who, venturing out of the city, to fight Hemow, was defeated, and fled. This commander was received by Akbar in a friendly manner; but, after treating him at a banquet, he was stabbed by a slave, set on by Beyrâm Khân. At this time Alla Kûli Khân and Bahâdr Khân were in Do-ab, or the interamnian province: but, being sent for, they were dispatched before to Panipatam, with an army, to stop the career of Hemow; who had already taken Debli, while Akbar followed with the rest of his forces^b.

THE two generals, meeting Hemow at Tilleputli, between Panipatam and Debli, immediately resolved to give him battle: but his soldiers mutinying for want of pay, forsook their leader, and dispersed. So that the Mogols took all their baggage, with the elephants; and Hemow himself, being shot in the eye with an arrow, fighting, was obliged to fly likewise. But, being overtaken by Kûli Khân Mûbrem, was brought to Akbar, now come up with the army; who, calling for a sword, smote off his head, and ordered it to be fixed on the gate of Debli. After this, Alla Kûli Khân and Bahâdr Khân are sent back into the province of Do-ab, to pursue the remains of the Pâtans: who, collecting all their forces, are met at Sambel by those generals, and vanquished, with great slaughter. The routed enemy fled to Laknow; and, making a stand there, were again defeated. After this they received a still greater overthrow at Jounpûr, on the banks of the river Tsatsa (A): so that all Hindûstân, between this river and the Ganges, was recovered in a short space of time.

MEAN while Akbar spent his time at Agrâ in hunting and other diversions: yet was inwardly grieved to see that his tutor Beyrâm Khân took the whole administration of affairs on himself, and had the army all at his devotion. This jealousy, it is likely, was in a good measure owing to the whispers of parasites, and chiefly to the insinuations of his nurse Maghem, who devised the following stratagem to free him from his governor's power. One day, not unknown to Beyrâm Khân, passing the Semmena (or Jemni), accompanied by a large retinue, under pretence of hunting, he proceeded to Kobeh; from whence his nurse, who followed him by easy journeys, conducted him to Debli; where, for a long time, the kings of Hindûstân used to be inaugurated. There, the lords of the neighbouring provinces being called together, the prince was enthroned, and acknowledged king by the whole assembly. As soon as Beyrâm Khân heard this news, he, without delay, sent all the Omrâs and Mansebdârs who were about Agrâ to the king, with a letter, importing, that, as he had never made use of the power which Hemayûn had intrusted him with, but for the good of the state, and what he thought the benefit of him the prince, so, now he found that he was able to manage affairs by himself, he wished him all happiness and success; only desiring, that, as he was quite broken with age and ministerial fatigue, his majesty would give him leave to go to Mekka, there to spend the remainder of his days^c.

His request having been readily granted, the good old man left Agrâ with all his family, and took his way through Meuwat (or Mevat) towards Guzerât; where he intended to embark: but when he came to the town of Patang, he there received a mortal stab by one of his Pâtan slaves, whose father formerly the Khân had slain. Hereupon his domestics returned

^a FRASER'S Hist. of Nadir Shâh, p. 10, & seqq. p. 181, & seqq.

^b DE LAËT India Vera, p. 180, & seqq.

^c Ibid.

(Y) Of this affair an account is given at the end of this king's reign.

(Z) As the Akbar Nâma, Tibkat Akbar Shâhi, and Montekheb Tavarikh Beda'uni, three histories mentioned before. The first was composed by his secretary and wazir, named Abûlfazl, which signifies the father of excellence; the most learned and best writer then in the east. He was murdered by order of Soltân Selim, on suspicion that he had created a misunderstanding which subsisted between him and his father. He left several works unfinished, and had carried down that of the Mogol emperors to the 38th year of the reign of Akbar; who, among others, greatly lamented his death. Frazer.

(A) So Herbert writes. De Laët, variously, Thatsan, and Tziatsom; which is Chatsom, or Jatsom.

to Agrâ, with Mirza Abdol Kakiem, son of the deceased lord, then but twelve years of age, a whom Akbar caused to be educated according to his quality.

Agra walled. THE mud wall, with which the castle of Agrâ had been long before inclosed by the Pâtan kings, being in many places fallen to ruin, Akbar ordered it to be built with stone. Kassim Khân Mierbar, an excellent architect, who had the direction of this work, took his materials from Shikeri (now called Fettipûr), and assembled masons from all parts, that it might be finished as soon as soon as possible.

Chitor fortress taken. MEAN time Zimet Pâta (B), a certain Râspût (or Râjabpût), having revolted from Râjah Râna, the most potent of all the Hindû princes, and seized the strong castle of Chitôr, of which he was governor, with many other towns, made several incursions into the Mogol provinces. Hereupon Akbar, no way discouraged by the difficulty of the enterprise, marched b with a great army, and besieged that fortress. After battering it for several months to no purpose, and receiving much damage from the defendants, he ordered the principal bulwark of the castle to be undermined; which being intirely blown up, made a wide breach for the besiegers to enter. Zimet Pâta, perceiving all to be lost, first set fire to a house wherein he had assembled his wives and children; and then, rushing desperately upon the enemy, perished himself, with all who were about him. In remembrance of this great victory, Akbar caused the statues of Zimet, and one of his chief commanders, mounted on elephants, to be placed on each side of the gate of his palace at Agrâ. This fortress formerly had been besieged by Alao'ddîn twelve years in vain.

Rebellions suppressed. HOWEVER, to allay his joy for this victory, he presently after received advice from Saffer Khân, and Râjah Bagwander, viceroy of Labûr, that his brother Mirza Mehemmet Hâkem, with 30,000 horse, from Kâbûl, had invaded that province: but Akbar came upon him, at Sherbinda, so unexpectedly with his forces, that Mohammed fled, leaving his camp and followers at the mercy of the vanquisher. The Mogol monarch hereupon put all the advantageous posts in a better posture of defence, and gave the command of them to trusty officers: but while with this view he was surveying Panjâb, he received advice from his mother, at Agrâ, that Babâdr Khân and Ali Kûli Khân Zemaen (who had been left at Laknow against the Pâtans, as before related) had rebelled, spoiled all the neighbouring provinces, and threatened even Agrâ itself: but Akbar by swift marches arrived so suddenly at the river Jemni, that the d revolters, seized with fear, took to flight. The king's troops pursued them, and, after a great slaughter of their men, between Fettipûr and Karamemekpûr, the chiefs themselves met their fate. Ali Kûli Khân was trodden to death under the horses feet, and Babâdr Khân strangled on the spot by command of Akbar†.

Akbar's pilgrimage. THIS rebellion being thus nipped in the bud, Khân Kânna and Munim Khân are sent to Jûmpûr (C), to govern that province, and watch the Pâtans, who were with Mirza Soleymân Lodi (or Lawdi), at Choutsa, not far from that city. Mean while the king returned with the rest of his forces. Some time after, he resolves to make a pilgrimage, on barefoot, to Azmîr (or Ajmîr), 150 kos, or 200 miles, distant, to visit the tomb of Haji Mondî, by that saint's intercession to obtain children. In this walk he ordered a stone to be placed at the end of every kos; and, in his return, at Shikeri, or Sikeri, eighteen miles short of Agrâ, visits e Sheykh Selim, to whom he relates the occasion of his pilgrimage. Hereupon the Sheykh foretels him, that he should have three sons, and that one of his concubines was then with child. For this reason Akbar called the first of them Selim (D), from the Sheykh: the other two were named Morâd (E), and Dbæn, or Daniel. This prediction was so pleasing to Akbar, that he inclosed the town with a wall, and called it Fettipûr (F). He likewise erected a magnificent mosk, with a palace of great beauty; and had made it his capital, if the river had been wholesome: but the badness of the water obliged him to quit that situation; which presently fell to ruin.

Guzerât subdued. DURING Akbar's abode at Fettipûr, advice arrived from Khân Azem, that a rebellion was broken out in Guzerât, by Ibrâhim Hossèyn (joined by Mirza Khân, Mirza Mohammed f Hossèyn, and Jebân Khân), who had ravaged the country as far as Barock, and was marching with his troops of thieves and Kûlis to attack Abmed abûd. Akbar, on this news, mounting dromedaries with his most trusty commanders and dependants, posts with incredible haste from Shikeri into Guzerât, riding 400 kos in seven days, and fixed his tents near that city. This unexpected arrival of Akbar so astonished the rebels, ignorant of his strength, that they immediately raised the siege and fled. Hereupon Khân Azem, and the other Mogol commanders, who had dispersed to different places for fear of the enemy, marched to meet the king; who,

† DE LAET India Vera, p. 184, & seqq.

(B) Zimet is afterwards written Zimel.

(C) Herbert writes, Joonpore, and De Lact, Ziaupor.

(D) Which signifies peaceful, safe, secure. The feminine, Selima, is a proper for women. Frazer.

(E) Morâd signifies wished for, desired. Frazer.

(F) Or Fatehpûr; that is, the place of victory, not the place of pleasure, as Herbert says.

a being by these reinforcements become pretty strong, sent Khân Goga, with 12,000 horse, to pursue the fugitives. This general coming up with them, a fierce battle ensued; till the Khân being slain, his troops began to give way. Akbar, provoked at this, rushed into the middle of the battle with such fury, that the enemy, unable to withstand the shock, took themselves to a shameful flight. Mirza Ibrâhim and Mirza Khân were slain in the fight: but Mohammed Housseyn, being taken prisoner, was beheaded. After this, the castle of Surât was reduced, without any difficulty, and the whole province of Guzerât subdued. To secure which, Akbar fortified Ahmed abâd, and then returned to Hindûstân.

THE same year the castle of Agra was finished: which magnificent edifice, built with stones of a vast size, was twelve years erecting, although sometimes 1200 hands were employed about it; and cost him 50,000 krons of taks, or two millions five hundred thousands rupees, of two shillings and three pence each. At the same time he expended in the walls and palace of Fetti-pûr one million and half of rupees. At Sekânder, or Skânder, three kos, or five miles, from Agra, in the road to Lakûr, he likewise began the sepulchres of his family (G). While these vast buildings were going forwards, Khân Kânna, and Monim Khân, who governed at Jaunpûr, prosecuted the war in Bengâl against Soleymân Kaberani; who dying suddenly, his son Skânder succeeded. But, two years after, he was slain by conspirators, and Douwet, son of Barât Khân, advanced in his room. As this was an indolent prince, and immoderately given to drinking, without minding either military or state affairs, Akbar judged this a proper season to subdue the Pâtans, and conquer Bengâl. Accordingly, marching thither (with an army of 50,000 horse and 600 elephants) he passed both the Ganges and Jotfa (H), and advanced towards Pâtan. Shâh Douwet, on the news of his arrival, sent 12,000 horse to obstruct his passage, under the command of Râjah Bekan, who met the Mogols between Jotfa and Mobeh ali pûr; but after a brave attack, of three hours continuance, was obliged to retreat, while the enemy pursued them to the city of Pâtan, where Douwet shut himself up. Akbar lay before the walls six months; nor in all that time could bring the Pâtans to a battle; but in the seventh month he takes the city by force. On this occasion a great number of Pâtans fell by the sword; many commanders likewise, with their wives and children, were made prisoners; a great deal of treasure also taken. Shâh Douwet, at this time so drunk that he knew nothing of what had happened, was carried down the river in a boat by his domestics, the distance of three days journey. There, at length, detesting him for his slothful disposition, which had brought that calamity on them, they cut off his head, and sent it to Akbar; who, having thus become master of all Bengâl, returned to Fetti-pûr.

WHILE he there oversaw his building going forward, he sent Rustan Khân and Zadok Khân at the head of an army, who in two months time took Rantipûr (I), a very strong castle (in Mâiva) from its Râjah. His next design was against the castle of Rotâs, in the province of Babâr (K); reckoned the strongest, both by nature and art, in all Asia. After he had in vain thought of the means of reducing it, Mobeh Ali Khân, an enterprising officer, obtained leave to try his skill, and, without imparting his intentions to any body, set out with some chosen troops. When he drew near the castle, he first, by making presents on all hands, cultivated a friendship with the Râjah; and then, pretending to be upon business in Bengâl, which required the greatest expedition, desired leave that his hâram, or women, might be lodged, for security, in the castle, till his return. The Râjah, not apprehending any fraud, too readily consents; and Mobeh Ali Khân fills the 200 litters, which carried his women, with men, putting two in each. These being admitted into the castle, slew the guards at the principal gate; while Ali Khân, who followed them, entering the place, killed the Râjah, and seized the castle, with an immense treasure.

AFTER this, the invincible castle of Jelûr, or Jalûr, is betrayed to Akbar by Jedney Khân, to his own brother's confusion. The news of these losses greatly alarming the Râjahs, each did his best to secure himself against an attack; and some, to prevent one, took the field. Among these was Rûp Mathi, a beautiful princess, at Sarangpûr; who, having assumed the name of Babâdr (or valiant), entered the Mogol dominions, with her Pâtans, and began to ravage them: but being met in the midst of her career by Adam Khân, he with his troops assaulted her so furiously, that, after most of her people were slain, she was taken prisoner; but, to prevent farther disgrace, took poison and died.

ABOUT the same time the king's brother, Mirza Mohammed Hakim, who commanded at Kâbûl, dying, Akbar sent Râjah Manzing, with 5000 horse, who reduced that kingdom.

* DE LAET, ubi supr. p. 187, & seqq. HERBERT'S Trav. p. 61.

† DE LAET, p. 190. HERBERT, p. 62.

(G) Herbert says, that it was augmented by Jehân Gîr; and though scarce finished in his time, yet it had already consumed fourteen millions of rupees.

(H) Or Chotfa; in De Laet, Tziotfa.

(I) So named by Herbert; by De Laet, Rban Tambor.

(K) Herbert says, the castle of Rotas, or Raughtaz, is in Birar, a province of Bengâl. It lies on the west side of the Ganges. Rotâs is called Rbâdas by Tavernier.

into a province. The wives, children, and chief ministers, being sent to court, the king^a treated them with great respect; and put his two nephews (one ten and the other seven years old) into the hands of trusty persons to be educated. To the ladies he gave pensions; and to the commanders, troops, or governments.

Rebellions
quashed.

MEAN while (L), Mozaffer Khân rebels in Guzerât, having first strangled Gotâbdas Mobammed Khân, the viceroy, and some other Omrâs. Hereupon, Abdol Rakim, son of Khân Kânna, and Beyram Khân (M), were sent with numerous forces against the enemy, accompanied by Norân Khân and Goufer Khân, sons of Gotâbdas: but, as soon as they arrived on the borders of the province, the army of Mozaffer, consisting of no more than 12,000 horse, was immediately put to flight, and himself taken: but, to prevent an ignominious death, he laid violent hands on himself. Abdol Rakim hereupon obtained the name of Khân Kânna, and the com-^bmand of 5000 horse. These advantages did not however establish peace in Akbar's empire; for Mazenow Khân, Gabiet Khân, Bama Khân, and Mohammed Masbûm Khân, some of the Kâbûl lords, began a new rebellion in Bengâl. Against them are sent Râjah Thormiel, Wazîr Khân, and Znebbar Khân, with a strong army; who are twice or thrice defeated, and the general taken prisoner: but, at length, being vanquished, they were all slain in battle, excepting Masbûm Khân, who fled; and, by the troops he carried with him, enabled that rebel to attack the Mogol provinces more vigorously than ever. Znebbar Khân (late president of Kâbûl) for this service was made viceroy of Bengâl, and Râjah Thormiel returned to Fettipûr.

Rajahs com-
pliable.

AT the same time Râjah Râmjend, lord of Bândo (a province adjoining to that of Agrâ, but abounding only with sand and stones), at the persuasion of Râjah Birmuel, went to wait^c on the king at Fettipûr; and, never having given any umbrage to Akbar, was received with honour. His example was followed by the rest of the Râjahs, or petty kings: who in this manner began to win the Mogol monarch's friendship, and send him their daughters for concubines; which laid the foundation of mutual peace and confederacy. At the same time, Akbar, making a progress towards the Ganges, and, being greatly delighted with the place, where the Ziotfa, Beak, and Jemni, meet in that river, ordered a castle to be built there with stone, by skilful architects; which was five years in erecting, and cost one million two hundred thousand rupees^d. This place, before named Praya, he called Elabâs, or Halabâs^e.

The Pâtans
overthrown.

AKBAR, having thus subdued all his opponents, and being thus quite at ease, resolves to go to Labûr, there to meet Abdo'llab Khan, son of Iskânder Khân (N), the Uzbek king of^d Mawara'lnâbr, who was come into India to pay him a visit. Mean time, Mîrza Tsfarof, having received many injuries from the Uzbeks, came from Badâkshân to Fettipûr, where the court had now continued fifteen years. With this prince, Akbar went to Labûr, intending to proceed to Kâbûl: but, calling to mind that the Ganges was still in the power of the Pâtans, he turned off towards Attek; from whence he sent Jebân Khân and Râjah Birmuel to make war on those people. But the Pâtans, who were subject to Jelâlia Afridi, and Turkoft Ji, seizing the passages of the mountains, made a great slaughter among the Mogol forces, killing Birmuel, and many other Omrâs; so that Chengam Goga, with difficulty, escaped. However, a more numerous army being sent against them, all those provinces, which belonged to Jelâlia^e and Turkoft, were entirely reduced.

Kandahâr
betrayed.

SOME time after this, news arrived that Mîrza Mozaffer Hosseyn and Mîrza Rûstân, sons of Mîrza Bayrâm, who commanded at Kandahâr, being offended with Shâh Abbâs, son of Khodabandeh, on account of injuries done them, were determined to submit to Akbar: this prince, finding so fair an opportunity offered him of adding that fortress to his empire, sent Kabîk Khân, with 5000 horse; to whom the two brothers immediately delivered up the city, and repaired themselves to Labûr; where they were kindly received. Akbar's ambition being increased by these successes, he sends Tzeddder Khân and Hakim Khân to Bokhâra, under pretence of condoling with Abdallab Khân for the loss of his father Iskânder Khân; but in reality to pry into the state of Mawara'lnâbr, which their master longed to unite to his empire. These ambassadors, or rather spies, after a whole year's stay in that country, returned laden with presents, and a full account of the strength of the cities, as well as forces, of the Uzbeks.^f invaded.

Kashmîr

AKBAR was well pleased with this information; but, before he undertook an expedition of such consequence, he judged it proper to reduce Kashmîr. To this end he sends Kassem Khan Merbar, and Mîrza Ali Chili, with all his forces towards that country; charging them at the same time with letters to Yûsof Khân, the king thereof, wherein he promised not in

^a DE LAET, p. 193. HERBERT, p. 64.

^e DE LAET, p. 71.

(L) Herbert places this in the year 968 of the Hijrah, and 1568 of Christ. Which of these years he accommodated to the other, we know not; but the year of Christ 1560 answers to 968 of the Hejrah.

(M) Herbert calls him Abdul Râjah, Bayram Khân's son. It should be rather Abdol Rakim, son of Byram Khân.

(N) In De Laet we read Abdullach Ghan, son of Thander Ghan: afterwards Abdul Ghan, and Tsfander Ghan: the Exziver copy being extremely incorrect, with regard to the proper and local names; which we cannot always rectify.

a the least to diminish his authority, provided he submitted, without obliging him to make use of hostilities. Hüf Khan, upon the receipt of this summons, immediately repairs to Labâr: but, as he left his son Takûb behind, Akbar suspected his sincerity, and looked on it as no more than a precarious submission. Nor did he judge amiss; for as soon as Hüf's back was turned, those who had the administration of affairs, disapproving of that measure, prevailed on Takûb not to bend so tamely to a foreign yoke. The young prince, following their advice, put his little kingdom in a posture of defence, and shut up all the passages into it. This vigorous resolution of the Kashmirians for some time embarrassed Akbar; who considered how difficult it would be to force the kotlen, or straits, of the mountain Bimber, ^{soon by} ~~trach.~~ by which only that country was to be entered. However, at length, he detached the above-mentioned generals, with an army of 30,000 horse, accompanied by some Omrâs of Kashmîr, to whom all the passages were known. As soon as Takûb received advice of their coming, he sent several of his Omrâs, with considerable forces, to defend those straits: but they, being corrupted by the bribes and promises of the Mogols, deserted their posts, and gave the enemy an easy admittance into the kingdom. Akbar's troops hastened to the capital, Kashmîr; which being unwall'd, they entered at the first attack, and took the young king prisoner; to whom and his father the victor allowed a yearly pension^r.

b AFTER this success, Akbar turned his arms against the kingdom of Sindi; whose prince Mirza Jehân was become odious for his tyranny. In this expedition he employed Khân Kânna, with 12,000 men; who, embarking his troops on the Râvi, sailed into the Indus, and thence to Tâtta, capital of Sindi; which he besieged. The city held out six months: but, in the seventh, the tyrant, surrendering himself, is sent to court; where he is kindly received, and his kingdom reduced to the form of a province.

c ABOUT this time, Nezâm Shâh, king of Dekân (O), dying, Akbar became desirous to conquer that kingdom also. With this intent he sends Khân Khânna from Labâr, with twenty-two Omrâs and a great army, towards Brâmpûr. Here they were joined by the forces of Râjah Ali Khân, governor of that province; but staid there six months without action: for Jând Bibi, daughter of the late king, governed the kingdom at Amdanâger with great prudence, and had an army under the conduct of Koja Shubel, an eunuch, eminent for his courage and activity. This general, with 40,000 horse, including the troops of Viziapûr and Golkonda, advanced to meet Khân Khânna; who, notwithstanding he had scarce 20,000 men with him, yet confiding in the valour of Râjah Ali Khân, Mirzâ Ked Gassem, descended from Zadet, and others, he ordered them to oppose the enemy with their troops; while he kept at a small distance with a body of 5000 men, in order to send relief from time to time. The battle continued all day and all night; during which time fortune seemed doubtful, and many were killed on both sides: among whom was Râjah Ali Khân. At length, towards morning, the Mogol troops began to give way; which Khân Khânna perceiving, he rushed with so much fury upon the fatigued enemy, that he presently obliged them to fly, after the general Koja Shubel had been slain in the fight. Although this was a signal victory, yet the province of Dekân did not suffer much by it; for the queen took care, with fresh forces, to repel the attacks of the Mogols^z.

e HITHERTO every thing succeeded to Akbar's wishes; but, from this time, many misfortunes in his family troubled his reign. In the first place, his desire of conquering Dekân still continuing, he ordered his son Shâh Morâd, who commanded 7000 horse, with Zadok Khân, and other Omrâs, to prosecute the war in that country. The prince, arriving at Brâmpûr with his forces, consumed six months in that city; where he gave himself up so entirely to drinking, that he fell desperately sick. On this news, Akbar sent Abdol Fâzl (P), president of the Divân, formerly Morâd's tutor, to reclaim him: but soon after his arrival the prince died (Q). On his death, many of the Omrâs and Mansebdârs, who accompanied him, fled, without any apparent cause. Hereupon Abdol Fâzl took on him the command of the army, and ordered several of the fugitives, who were brought back: to be trodden to death by the elephants. Then sending Morâd's corps to Debli, and distributing his treasure among the troops, he marched towards Kapûr, and encamped opposite to the enemy.

f THE same year, Akbar gave Dhaen Shâh, or Shâh Daniel, the command of 7000 men, and sent him to Elabâs, accompanied by Koutel Mohammed Khân, his chancellor, and other Kandish Omrâs, to subdue the rebels, who were in the neighbourhood of that city. Mean time, Abdol Fâzl annexed the provinces of Barâr and Khândish to the Mogol empire. After

^r DE LAET, p. 197. HERBERT, p. 66.

^z DE LAET, p. 200. HERBERT, p. 67.

(O) Herbert says, he was succeeded by his son Mâlek Amber; but, according to Van Den Broeck, the founder of Batavia, who was in Mâlek Amber's camp, in 1617, that lord was not Nezâm Shâh's son, but a foreigner, and general of the Dekân armies. By which, he intrusted Akbar to remove to Agrá; alleging, that it would facilitate the conquest ^a of Amadnagar, Viziapúr, and Golkondá. The king takes his advice; and leaving Labár, where he had resided twelve years, repairs to Agrá, and there continues a whole year.

Dekân, or Dekkân, here is to be understood the provinces of Balagât, Baglâna, and Telingâna.

(P) It ought to be Abu'l Fazl.

(Q) According to the historians made use of by Mr. Frazer, this happened in the year 1558.

War with Rájah Rána:

Hejrah 1005
A. D. 1500.

In the year of the Hejrah 1005, Akbar thought fit to send his son to Sháh Selím to make war on Rájah Rána Mardout, by far the most powerful of all the Rájahs of Hindústán; who had lately rebelled. The prince was accompanied by Shebber Khán, with 5000 horse; Sháh Kúli Khán Akbrem, with 3000; Rájah Jaganat, with the same number: besides many other Mansebdárs; which formed a potent army^a.

A. D. 1508. and in Dekán.

In 1007, the king himself departed from Agrá, in order to prosecute the Dekán war: but when he had passed the river Nerabeda, the Rájah Bahádr Sháh, not caring to trust him, put his castle of Haffer in a posture of defence, and furnished it with provisions. This fortress ^b consists of three castles: the first called Kozanin; the second, Kommerghár; and the third situated on a very high mountain, so that it may be seen at six kos distance. Akbar, judging it dangerous to leave such a place behind him, immediately laid siege to it; and, at length, after six months continual battery, Bahádr Sháh, finding himself unable to hold out much longer, not only submitted himself on promise of liberty and effects, but, with his relations, entered into the Mogol service.

Sháh Selím
rebels.

HERE Abdol Fázl met the king, and encouraged him by all means to go on with the war; alleging, that, if he could subdue Dekán, and defeat the kings of Viziapúr and Golkondá, he would sufficiently exalt his name, and enlarge his empire. But while matters stood thus, news ^c unexpectedly arrived, that Zebbar Khán Kambau, who had accompanied the prince Sháh Selím, was dead at Azmír; and that the prince, having seized his treasure, amounting to a kor, or ten millions of rupees, was marched with a numerous body of select troops to Agrá, in order to dethrone his father. Hereupon Akbar, leaving his son Sháh Daniel with Abdol Fázl, Khán Khanzied, Nisof Khán, and several other Omrás, to proceed to Amadnagar and Viziapur, he departed for his capital. Sháh Selím had been there a while before: but, finding that he could not reduce the castle, left the place; and, passing by the way of Reben and Annewár, came to Elhabís, twelve days journey distant. He had, however, gotten into his power several cities (R), in which he placed his own Omrás; turning out his father's commanders; to whom the greater part retired, leaving the rest, with all their effects, to Selím.

Success in Dekán.

As soon as Akbar arrived at Agrá, he sent letters to his son; setting before him the judgments threatened by God against disobedient children, and promising to restore him to his favour, in case he returned to his duty. But the rebellious prince, despising his father's admonition, continued to extend his power; and, having subdued all the country as far as Hassipúr and Patán, sent to Rájah Mánzing, viceroy of Bengál, to deliver up that province to him: but the Rájah rejected his motion. Mean time Daniel Sháh advanced with his army towards Amadnagar, and came to Gandezín. On this advice, Jánd Bibi shut herself up, with all her father's commanders, in the castle of Amadnagar, and prepared to undergo a siege. ^d This castle is exceeding strong; for it is built on an eminence, and surrounded with deep ditches, in which several springs discharge their waters. However, prince Daniel, surrounding the place with his troops, after battering it for above six months, at length took it. A great ^e treasure fell into the victor's hands; but the princess Jánd Bibi had before made herself away by poison. After this Soltán Daniel, having given the command of the place to Koja Bék Mirza, went and reduced the provinces of Gandes and Berar (S); which done, he returned to Brampúr; where ambassadors came to him with rich presents, and submissive letters, from the kings of Golkondá and Viziapúr. The prince did nothing remarkable from this time forward; but gave himself up intirely to drinking^b.

Amadnagar
taken.

Sháh Selím's
insolence.

AT the same time, Sháh Selím sent Koja Jebán to his father, pretending sorrow for having offended him. Hereupon Akbar writes to him, giving him hopes of pardon, in case he without delay came and asked it. Jebán, after six months stay at Agrá, returns, and so wrought on the rebel son, that he resolves to submit himself. According he sets forward, and ^f on the road writes to acquaint his father with his coming: but, as he had now on foot an army of 70,000 select troops, he required not only that his commanders might keep what had been given to them, but also that they should not be considered as rebels. Neither of these two things Akbar would grant: upon which, the prince returned to Elabás; where he not only coined money in his own name, but, to provoke his father the more, sent some of it to him. Akbar, unable to bear such an affront, wrote an account of the whole affair to Abdol Fázl; who sent back for answer, that he would be with his majesty as soon as possible, and did not doubt but to manage things so as to bring the prince bound before him.

^a DE LAET, p. 202. HERBERT, p. 67.

^b DE LAET, p. 205, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 68.

(R) As Siapúr, Babar, Kalp, Laknow, Ozede, Beraghe, Kerfama, Mekpúr, Kera, Gajlanpúr, Ghancuts, and other places.

(S) These are the same with Kbándish and Barár, already said to have been subdued by this prince.

- a ABDOL FAZL upon this, taking leave of Daniel Shâh, with two or three hundred horse sets Abdol Fazl out for Agrâ. Mean time, Shâh Selim, who was acquainted with all which passed, calling to mind, that Fazl always bore him an ill-will; and therefore fearing that he would incense his father still more against him, judged it best to intercept him. To this end he sent to Râjah Berfing Bondela, who, at that time, resided in the province of Ofsin; desiring him to way-lay Fazl between Sâr and Gwalhyâr, and send him his head; promising for that piece of service, to give him the command of 5000 horse. The Râjah consents; and, with 1000 horse, and 3000 foot, encamps three or four kos from Gwalhyâr, placing spies in the neighbouring villages, to give him early notice of Fazl's approach. When the Wazîr, ignorant of the snares laid for him, was passed Kollebâga, on the way to Sâr, Râjah Berfing rushes on him with his troops; which were placed on both sides of the road. Hereupon began a fierce engagement; in which Abdol Fazl and his followers behaved courageously: but, being oppressed with numbers, they were almost all slain. Fazl himself (T), after having received twelve wounds, was taken, by the information of a captive slave, under a neighbouring tree, and had his head cut off.
- b THE head, being sent to the prince, transported him with joy: on the contrary, the king, Shâh Daniel when he heard of the death of that minister, whom he entirely loved, was extremely afflicted; dies. and for three days did not appear in public. Nor did Akbar's sorrows end here: for not long after news arrived of the death of Shâh Daniel (U) at Brâmpûr, occasioned by excessive drinking; which affected him so much, that his life became a burthen to him. At length, recovering from his grief, he sent for Khân Khânna to court; and was so enraged at him, for not taking more care of his son, that for some time he would not admit him into his presence: but at length, by the persuasion of his Omrâs, he received him into favour; and, constituting him general in chief, sent him back to the army in Dekân.
- c AKBAR, who all this while retained his anger against his son Selim, now resolved to turn Selim submits: his arms against him. He had already passed the river Semena (or Jemni) when, advice coming from court that his mother was fallen sick, he returned to Agrâ; two days after which she died, and was buried in the sepulchre of her son Hemayûn, at Debli. As soon as these ceremonies were over, Akbar dispatched Mirafeddâr, who had been Selim's tutor, with letters to that prince; wherein, after reproaching him severely for his rebellion, he put him in mind, that, as he was now his only son and heir, he was ready to receive him into favour, provided he came and humbled himself. Selim, moved with his father's letters, and the persuasions of Mirafeddâr (X), set out with his son Soltân Perwîs from Elabâs, in the year 1013; and A. D. 1604. passing the Jemni with his army, the second day after, as it had been judged lucky by the astrologers, he arrived at the castle of Agrâ; where he was introduced to his father by Mortôja Khân. When, according to custom of the country, he fell down before the throne, received to fa- his father, taking hold of his hand, carried him into the mâhl, or inner apartment, and, vour. falling into a great rage, gave him several blows on the face (Y); at the same time upbraiding him with his wicked attempts. Then changing his strain, he reflected on him for want of courage; who, having had 70,000 troops at his command, should yet so tamely come and submit himself, in that cringing manner. After this, he ordered him to be carried to another court of the palace, and confined. His Omrâs likewise, excepting Râjah Batso, who had fled in time, were seized, and conducted to prison, loaded with irons. Selim, who used to take opium every day, stunned with this unexpected usage, forbore taking opium for twenty-four hours: but next day, the king, going to see him, gave him some with his own hand. On the third, all the ladies of the mâhl waited on Akbar, and intreated pardon for the prince; which having obtained, he was sent to his own apartments. From thence he daily came, accompanied with a great train, to salute his father: but certain courtiers having infused a suspicion into the old king's mind, that Selim intended him some mischief, he was ordered to come for the future attended only by four of his Omrâs.
- f AKBAR did not long survive this reconciliation: for, being incensed against Mirza Gaja Akbar's (Z), son of Mirza Jehân, who governed Sinda and Tâtta, on account of some insolent death: expression which dropped from him, he resolved to get rid of that lord by poison. To this end, he orders his physician to prepare two pills in the same form, and put poison in one of

^c DE LAET, p. 208, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 70, & seq.

(T) This is the famous Abu'l Fâzl, who wrote the Akbar Nama, mentioned in a note at the beginning of this reign.

(U) This happened in 1604, according to Frazer.

(X) Herbert calls him Myrad Zeda.

(Y) Herbert says, he struck him so hard and often on the mouth, that the prince, throwing himself on the ground, opened his breast, and offered at his father's command to kill himself.

(Z) Herbert calls him Mirza Gasbâ, and says the Mirza brought the pills himself; and, being ordered to take one, took the best; which Akbar, by mistaking the mark, believed to be the poison-pill, and so took the other without hesitation. Terry, sect. 28. relates the story as in the text.

them;

them; resolving to give this to Gaja, and take the other himself: but, after holding the pills a in his hand for some time, he happened to give to Aliza the sound pellet, and swallowed the infectious one himself. As soon as he discovered his error, he took remedies, although it was then too late. On occasion of this accident, Selim paying him a visit, he put his own turbán upon the prince's head, and girt him with his father Hemayún's sword: but ordered him not to act within the palace, nor visit him till he was recovered. However, Akbar died the twelfth day after he had taken the fatal pill^d, in the year 1014 (A).

A. D. 1605.

ACCORDING to the Christian account, his death happened on the twelfth of October, 1605, at the age of sixty-three solar years and one day; of which he had reigned forty-nine solar years, eight months, and one day (B). His body was interred in the burying-place of Sekandra, near Agrá (C).

his children.

AKBAR had three sons; Soltán Selím, Soltán Mocrád, and Soltán Daniel: of whom the two latter died before their father; one in 1598, the other in 1604, as hath been already remarked. He had likewise three daughters; Sháh Zâdeh Khânum, that is, the royally born lady; Shahr Nissa Begum, or the sweetest of women princesses; and Arâm Bânu Begum, or the calm and peaceful princess^e.

Account of Xavier:

BEFORE we pass to this monarch's successor, we shall take further notice of an affair, which we have already mentioned in the beginning of Akbar's reign^f. It has been there observed, that, in 1582, Akbar wrote to the king of Portugal, desiring a translation of the scriptures into Arabik or Persian; and withal, that he would send him some person of learning to explain the Christian religion. Our author, Fraser, is not sure whether that letter went farther than Goa; but supposes the sending of Geronimo Xavier, a relation of the famous St. Francis Xavier, was in consequence thereof. However, the journey of this missionary to the court of Akbar, seems rather to have been the effect of another letter from that monarch thirteen years after; viz. in 1595, to Matthias De Albuquerque, the then Portuguese viceroy in the East Indies, for some priests to be sent to him. The persons pitched on for this mission were the before-mentioned Geronimo Xavier, then rector of the Jesuits college at Goa; Emanuel Pigueira, and Benedict Goes (D), two others of the same society.

ON their arrival at Agrá, they were kindly received by the Great Mogol; who built them a church there, and granted them many privileges; which, after his death, were all confirmed by his successor.

his spurious gospel:

AT Akbar's command, Xavier wrote two books in the Persian language. The first, intituled the history of Jesus, collected for the most parts out of the Romish legends, which he intended to substitute among the Mohammedans, instead of the gospel. The second was called, A Looking-glass shewing the Truth, and contains a defence of the doctrines of that gospel against the Mohammedans. Xavier, having learned the Persian, in order to obey the king's command, first wrote his History of Jesus; which he presented in 1602: the Looking-glass was not published till a year or two after. When it first came abroad, it unluckily fell into the hands of a learned Persian nobleman, of Ispáhán in Persia, named Abmed ebn Zeyn Alabo'ddin; who immediately wrote an answer to it, which he calls The Brusher, or burnisher, of the Looking-glass; wherein he makes terrible work with the Jesuit, through the advantages e which he gave him, by teaching the idolatry, superstitions, and errors, of the church of Rome, for the doctrines of Christ.

shows Christianity.

WHEN this book (which is reckoned the most acute of any that has been written by the Mohammedans against the Christian religion) first appeared, it so alarmed the college de propaganda fide, at Rome, that they immediately ordered it to be answered by Bonaventura Malvasia, a Franciscan friar of Bononia; who published his Dilucidatio Speculi Verum Monstrantis, in 1628. But, this not being judged by the college to be a sufficient reply, they appointed Philip Guadagnol, another Franciscan friar, to write a second answer, which he composed under the title of Apologia pro Christiana Religione. This was published in Latin at Rome, in 1631; and, being better approved of than the former, by the college, the author was ordered f to translate it into Arabik. This being performed in 1637, they sent it into the east, to be dispersed among the Mohammedans: but his performance, saith our author Doctor Prideaux, doth by no means answer the design, as abundance of his arguments are drawn from the authorities of popes and councils; which will never convince an infidel of the truth of the Christian religion^g.

^d DE LAET, p. 211, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 71. before, p. 57.

^e FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Sháh, p. 18. ^f See

^g See PRIDEAUX'S Life of Mohammed, p. 155, & seqq.

(A) Herbert makes it 984; we presume, by subtracting 620 from 1604, the year of Christ; mistaking the Mohammedan for solar years.

(B) De Laet says, he reigned 60 years: Herbert, only 25; and that he lived 73.

(C) De Laet, and after him Herbert, writes Tzek-ander; which is three kos from Agrá. The sepulchre was not then finished.

(D) He went from Agrá, in 1603, to China; and was the first missionary who went thither by land.

C H A P. VI.

The Reign of Jehân Ghîr, surnamed Nuroddin Mohammed.

^a AS soon as Akbar was dead, the principal Omrâs, who were about him, shut all the gates ^{4. Soltân Je-} of the castle of Agra, and gave the keeping of them to their most trusty officers. ^{hân Ghîr.} This done, Mortâza Khân, Seyset Khân, Kûli Mohammed Khân, Râjah Ramdas, and Râjah Mansing, met together at the house of Khân Azim, to consult what was best to be done at this critical juncture. Khân Azem and Râjah Mansing were for placing Soltân Khosraw, son of Soltân Selim, on the throne: but Râjah Ramdas, who had four or five thousand Râspûts within call, opposed their motion; and, seizing the treasury, would suffer nobody to meddle with the cash. Mean time, Soltân Selim, being informed of his father's death, assembled his Omrâs at his palace, and acquainted them with the designs of his adversaries: but, in the interim Mortâza Khân, to whom the chief gate of the castle was intrusted, went out to the prince, and saluted him king. His example was followed by the Nabâb Sayel Khân, his son Kûli Mohammed Khân, and soon after by Khân Azem himself: but Râjah Mansing, passing out by the gate which faces the river, carried Soltân Khosraw with him in a boat to his own house.

SELIM, having now gained all the principal Omrâs to his interest, went with them on foot, ^{proclaimed em-} attending the corps of his father, and buried him in great pomp. Then, returning to the ^{peror.} castle, they crowned him, and gave him the name of Mohammed Jehân Ghîr (A). Three days after, Soltân Khosraw was taken out of the hands of Râjah Mansing and Khân Azem, and brought to court; where his father seemed to be reconciled to him. Moreover, the coronation of Jehân Ghîr being soon made known in foreign countries, ambassadors arrived from Persia, Tartary, Golkondâ, Viziapûr, Dekân, and the neighbouring Râjahs, with magnificent gifts, ^c to felicitate his accession to the throne.

AT this time the following provinces were subject to him; Kandâhâr, Kâbûl, Kasbmîr, Ghassanî, and Benazâd, Guzerât, Sindî, or Tâtta, Gândhees (B), Brampûr, Barar, Bengâl, Orixâ (or Orissâ), Odé, Malow (or Malwa), Agra, and Dehlî; out of which the annual tax, according to the register of Akbar, amounted to six ares and ninety-eight krors of dams (C).

IN 1015, which was the first of Jehân Ghîr, this king, jealous of his son Khosraw, asked ^{Provinces sub-} Mirza Omra (D), his chief minister, what was the proper course to be taken with him? ^{ject to him.} The Mirza answered, to deprive him of sight. But, while the king delayed coming to a resolution, Soltân Khosraw flies: ^{A. D. 1606.} the prince, who had discovered what was in agitation against him, writes to his friend Hassan Bek (E), to hasten towards Agra with his choicest troops, and carry him off to Labûr. Hassan Bek, whom Akbar before his death had sent to Kâbûl to collect the revenue of that province, upon receipt of Khosraw's letter, immediately set forward with two or three thousand horse; and, being arrived at Akbarpûr, within twenty kos of Agra, the prince, with 500 young men, departed in the evening from the castle, the Kotwal Kôja Mâlek Ali not daring to hinder him. In their way, they put out their lights every-where, and plundered some shops; then getting into the fields, early in the morning arrived at Akbarpûr; from whence they hastened to Labûr.

AS soon as the king was informed of his son's flight, he sent the Kotwal Kôja in pursuit of ^{besieges Lahûr} him, with 300 horse: he was followed the same night by Mortâza Khân, with 1500 more; ^{castle:} and the king himself, by the persuasion of Mirza Omra, set out in the morning after the rest, with the swiftest elephants, and several Omrâs. These four parties were not above ten kos one before the other. The prince plundered all the country people along the road, took the king's horses out of the stables, and whatever merchants he met with, carried them with him: so that on the ninth day, when he arrived at Labûr, he had gathered a tolerable army. But Ibrâhîm Khân, the Pâtan, whom the king had a little while before made governor of Labûr, getting into the castle before the prince could come up, shut the gates against him.

THIS was an unluckily accident; but he met with another presently after, still more mortifying: for, hearing that Sayd Khan was encamped with his people, only three kos from ^a DE LAET'S Ind. Vera, p. 214. HERBERT, p. 72.

(A) Or, more fully, Nûro'ddin Mohammed Jehân Ghîr, that is, the light of the religion, Mohammed the conqueror of the world; which titles, as Frapier observes, Selim assumed to himself on his ascending the throne, on the 21st of October, 1605; at which time he was aged about 36 solar years, having been born at Fattalpûr, on the 19th of August, 1509.

(B) Perhaps Khandîsh.

(C) A dam is the fortieth part of a rupee, which is two shillings and six pence English: 100,000 rupees make one lak; 100 laks, one krôr; and 100 krors, one arrib. Fraî. Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 25, & seq.

(D) Mirza Omra is doubtless a mistake for Mirza'l Omra, or Mir al Omra, that is, the prince of princes, the first and most honourable post at the Mogol's court. It is the same with Amir al Omra of the Arabs.

(E) Herbert calls him governor of Kabul.

the city, in his way to Bangbe, he sent to desire him to join his forces. Sayd Khân seemed a to consent; but, when he came with the soldiers of the prince to the river Râvi, he deceived them, and brought the boat to the castle (F).

he retreats:

MEAN time, Jalâlo'ddîn Hassan came from the king, to offer the prince Kâbul and Banâsid, provided he could quit Labûr. But Khosraw demanded, that all the country of Serbînd should be yielded to him: and as he found this treaty was set on foot only to delay time, till the Imperial forces came up, so soon as he heard that the king had passed the river at Soltân-pûr, and that Mortâza Khân was ready to cross the Nakhod, he breaks up from before Labûr castle, after a fortnight's siege; and with 20,000 men turns back, determined to give his father battle. When he had proceeded about 30 kos, he came to a place, where Mortâza Khân, apprised of his march, had already posted himself, having with him scarce 300 men. b and is defeated:

Although it happened to be a very rainy and tempestuous day, yet the prince ordered his troops to attack the Khân's; which they did, at first, by light skirmishes. In a little time they were quite surrounded, and Shân Kbelial, the commander, slain; when Koja Mûlek arrived seasonably with the royal standard, and gave out aloud, that the king himself was at hand. This news so much animated the Imperial troops, and dispirited the prince's, that Abdol Râjab, his standard-bearer, threw it on the ground, and fled. The rest of his forces were so confounded at this action, that, concluding Khosraw was slain, they took to flight also, and dispersed. Thus were they for the most part slain, or taken, with all their baggage, either by the country-people, or the troops of the king: who, when he had joined Mortâza Khân, in memory of this great victory, called the place Fettipûr (G). c taken prisoner.

THE prince, accompanied by Hassan Beg, Khân Pâdishâh, and Abdol Râjab, hastened back to Labûr; where leaving the Râjab, he, with Pâdishâh, crossed the Râvi, in order to get to the strong castle of Rantas. But, coming to pass the Cbenâb, the watermen, by the direction of the sons of Kâssef Kân Nimek, who commanded the garrison there, when the boat was in the middle of the stream, jumped out; and, swimming to the other side, left the prince and Hassan Beg in the power of their enemies. Being brought to the king, who by this time had passed the river Latir (H), he returned with them to Labûr; where Abdol Râjab was drawn out of his concealment. To punish the rebels now in his power, he orders the peasants to fix without delay a long series of sharp stakes on each side of the road; on which some were impaled, and others hung upon trees. This done, the king carries the d captive prince with him towards the city; and, the more to mortify him, had him set on an elephant with Zemâna Bek (afterwards called Mobabet Khân) behind him, in order to shew him the criminals as they passed along, and tell him their names (I). When they arrived at Labûr, he was given in custody to the same lord; and Hassan Bek Pâdishâh, being sewed up in a raw hide, was left to die in horrible torment. Afterwards his head was cut off, and sent to Agra, to be fixed on the castle gate.

A new conspiracy.

THIS rebellion being thus quashed, Jebân Ghîr for some time took the pleasure of hunting; and, when he had staid four months at Labûr, set out to visit Kâbul. Soltân Khosraw still remained confined, the Omrâs and Mansebdârs, by turns, guarding him. One day, as Mirza Fetulla, son of Hâken Mirza Sharîf, son of the Etimâdo'ddawlet Mirza Murroddin, nephew e of the great Ajfos Khân, Mirza Jâffer Bek, and several other Omrâs, were upon that duty, they conspired among themselves to slay the king in passing the Kâbul mountains, and set Khosraw upon the throne: but a proper opportunity not offering, Jebân Ghîr got laie to that city.

Shîr Afghân slain.

A. D. 1609.

MEAN time, the Etimâdo'ddawlet, who was great treasurer, is accused by Ottem chend, one of his Indian slaves, of having converted fifty millions of rupees to his own use, and is committed to the custody of Dianet Khân. Moreover, in the year 1018, the king received advice, that Shîr Afkân Khân (K), son-in-law of the imprisoned treasurer, had slain Kolbo'ddin Mohammed Khân Goga, viceroy of Bengâl, at Râjab Mâhl. Sheykh Ghiatbo'ddîn, the brother, and Kizwer Khân, the son of the viceroy, revenged his death, and sent Shîr Afkân's head to f Agra (L). They likewise imprisoned his brother Gommer, with his son and mother: also his ^b DE LAET, ubi supr. p. 217, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 73.

(F) Herbert says, the prince was taken, but by a bribe escaped to Hassan Beg.

(G) Or Fattehpûr, that is, the place of victory. Herbert mistakes this for the city of Fettipûr, which is but twelve kos from Agra; whereas this place is but thirty kos south of Labûr.

(H) Herbert says, it is seven days journey from Rantas.

(I) According to Terry, scilicet 28, there were 800 thus impaled; and the king himself shewed them to the prince, who told his father, that he ought to have spared them, and served him so; adding, that he had no pleasure in life after beholding the execution of so many brave men.

(K) Shîr Afkân signifies the lion-overthrower. It is written in the copy of De Laet, Affen; elsewhere, Affegan. He is afterwards said to have been a Turk. Frazer says, of a Turkman family, which came from Persia. He was esteemed the bravest man in the army.

(L) Frazer says, p. 21, that, for sake of his exquisitely beautiful wife, Jebân Ghîr sent Shîr Afkân, with some troops, to command a place in Bengâl, and afterwards sent another with a greater force to cut him off.

wife

a wife Mehîr Mejâ, daughter of the Etimâdo'ddawlet; whom they treated in a very ignominious manner.

THIS murder greatly aggravated Jehân Ghîr's resentment against this last-mentioned lord : The plot discovered. but what soon after happened completed his ruin. For just as the king was ready to return to Labûr, Koja Veîz comes, and, both by word of mouth and in writing, accuses the above-mentioned lords, and several others, of a plot against his majesty's life. Jehân Ghîr, highly enraged at this treason, ordered all the conspirators, with the Etimâdo'ddawlet, to be brought before him bound. This being done, he commanded their heads to be cut off, and their bodies fixed upon the battlements; only the Etimâdo'ddawlet, at the request of his keeper, was pardoned, on promise of paying eleven lak (M) of rupees for his life; but led back to prison in the most disgraceful manner. After this, the king left Kâbul, and returned to Labûr; where, by the counsel of Mirza Omra, and other lords, he ordered Soltân Khosraw to be deprived of sight, with the juice of æk leaves; which yet did not so effectually blind him (N), but that he could see a little with one eye.

AT the same time, Jehân Ghîr vented his anger against Khân Azem, father-in-law of the prince, on account of this latter. After confiscating all his effects, he ordered him to be brought before him, cloathed in a disgraceful manner, and all the Omrâs to spit on his beard. Then he sent him loaded with chains to the castle of Gwâliyâr, where he was imprisoned: but at the end of two years he was, by the intercession of some ladies of the Harâm, restored to favour and his places at court. The same year (O) Mirza Omra was rendered incapable of business, by losing the use of one side, after the fit of an apoplexy; and Salâm Khân, who acted the part of Fausdar (P) at Agra, or rather that of captain of the robbers in the neighbouring country, was made governor of Bengâl, in the room of Kothbo'ddîn Khân, slain as above-mentioned^c.

THE king, having gotten his fill of hunting, and intending to return to Agra, gave permission to the Etimâdo'ddawlet, and his keeper Dianet Khân, with all his family, to repair to that city, in order to collect his fine of rupees, and soon after came thither himself. From thence he wrote to Salâm Khân, to send him with all speed the family of Shîr Affegân; namely, his widow Meher Mejâ, and his brother. Salâm obeys the order, and the parties set forward. When they had entered the province of Babâr, a Darwîsh, reported to have foretold many things, accosts Meher Mejâ on the road; and, looking her in the face, predicts her favour with the king, and future splendor. As soon as they arrived at Agra, the brother and son of Shîr Affegân were given in charge to the Omrâs: but Meher Mejâ and her young daughter were introduced to Rokkiâ Soltân Begum, the king's mother; who, embracing her with the greatest affection, could scarce ever after bear her to be out of her sight.

Soon after, the queen mother happening to carry Meher Mejâ into the mâhl, or women's apartment, the king came in; and putting aside her veil, looks in her face. A few days after this, on the feast of the new year (called by the Mohammedans Nova Rosa) (Q), the king being very merry among his ladies, Meher Mejâ brought her daughter, but six years old, before the king; who, deeply enamoured with the mother, said with a smile, Henceforward, I will be father to this child. The lady answered, that she was an unhappy widow, unworthy to be numbered among his majesty's wives; and only desired he would have pity on her daughter, and do something for her. After this, Jehân Ghîr became so doatingly fond of Meher Mejâ, that every evening he went by water to the Etimâdo'ddawlet's house, and did not return to his palace till early in the morning. He had loved her when a virgin, in his father Akbar's life-time; but, as she had been espoused to Shîr Asfân, his father would not give her to him for a wife: for all this, he still retained an affection for her.

^c DE LAET, p. 220, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 74, & seq.

(M) That is 132,550 pounds sterling; reckoning the lak at 12,500 pounds. Herbert says, he paid 200,000.

(N) Terry, sect. 28, says, his eyes were sealed up, by something put before them, which was not to be taken off for three years; at the end of which, the seal was removed, that he might freely enjoy the light tho' not his liberty. He doubtless seemed to have his sight perfectly, to this author; who often saw him following the king in his progresses; particularly once, when he stopped to talk to Sir Thomas Roe. Terry says, he had a very lovely presence, and fine carriage. Sir Thomas himself only says, that his person was comely, his countenance chearful, and his beard grown down to his girdle. He was attended with no great guard; and his questions shewed ignorance of all that was done at court. Roe's Journal, Church's Collect. Trav. vol. i. p. 718.

(O) That is, in 1609. Herbert says, that this year the Jesuits, with Jehân Ghîr's consent, baptised three of his brother's sons, by the names of Philippo, Carlo, and Henrico; with another grandson of Akbar, whom they called Don Edoard. He said, that the king was prevailed on to suffer this, by the persuasion of his son Soltân Khorm and his friend, in order to make his way the easier to the throne.

(P) It ought, no doubt, to have been Fojhdâr, an officer who has command of a body of horse, and is entrusted with the care of the suburbs and out parts. Fraser.

(Q) This does not mean the new rose, although the English comes nearer the true word than the Latin; but Nawerûz, or Nawrûz, which, in the Persian, signifies the new day, or, if you will, new year's day. The names throughout the original are so corrupted, or disfigured, by the Dutch spelling, we cannot warrant many of them to be right, as we have reduced them to the English idiom.

AFTER

Marries Jehân Ghîr.

AFTER he had thus for forty nights made his court to her, he orders Koja Abdol Hassan a to go and demand her of the Etimâdo'ddawlet; for that he was determined to marry her, and give her the precedence of all his other wives. Abdol Hassan, going about to remonstrate how dishonourable it would be to his majesty, to marry the daughter of an infamous person, Jebân Ghîr bade him angrily begone, and obey his commands. The Etimâdo'ddawlet received the royal message, and, having declared himself unworthy of the honour designed him, gives his consent; after which, a fortunate day being fixed, the king married her, and changed her name to that of Nûr Jebân Begum (R). In short, he loved her to such excess, that he not only preferred her to all his other wives, and gave her father the command of 5000 horse, but also conferred honours and places at court on all her relations.

Preferments at court. A. D. 1611.

IN the year 1020 of the Hejrab, and sixth of his reign, he sent the Nabab Mortâza Khân, b with his youngest son Soltân Shebriâr (S), with absolute command, into Guzerât; Khân Jebân, with several Omrâs, to Brampûr; the province of Kbor was given to Khân Khânnâ; and Mobabet Khân was sent with an army to make war upon Râjah Râna. The same year arrived Zeynel Bek, ambassador from Shâh Abbâs, king of Persia, with a magnificent equipage, and very rich presents. He was received with great honour, and sent back with presents suitable to the occasion. In Bengâl, the territory of Râjah Kots is reduced into a province by Salau Khân (T); and Mursa Khân, son of Hissa Khân, with many other lords, brought into subjection to Jebân Ghîr. As for Mobabet Khân, sent against Râjah Râna (U), after taking some towns from Râjah Mardout, he was recalled to court; and Abdol Khân, with other Omrâs, sent to command the army in his room.

War against Rana:

WHEN Abdol Khân arrived at Sissimîr, he was met by an army of Râspûts; whom Râna had sent to oppose him: but he fell on them with such vigour, that, being quickly routed, they fled to Oudepûr. That province being thus subdued, the wives and children of the Indian inhabitants were carried into slavery. From thence he marched with his army to Siavend, where the ancestors of Râna formerly had their palace: for it was a place so strongly fenced, being surrounded with impenetrable woods and deserts, that the kings of Debli never durst attempt it. But Abdol Khân, commanding his pioneers to cut down the trees, and open passages through the rocks, by degrees cleared the way to Siavend. When Râna saw this, he left two or three thousand Râspûts, with a great deal of provision, in the castle; then, taking with him his domestics and women, withdrew into the woods and mountains.

His country reduced.

MEAN time Abdol Khân sits down before the castle, and, making a wall with the trees which had been cut down, attacked the place with such vigour, that at length he took it, after all the garrison had been slain. As soon as he had taken possession, he ordered all the pagods, or Hindû temples, to be destroyed, which had stood for above one thousand years; and, in their room, a stately Masjed to be erected. At the same time, he pursued Râna so closely, that, after obliging him several times to shift his quarter, he at length forced him to leave his provinces at the mercy of his enemies. Jebân Ghîr, highly pleased with Abdol Khân's proceedings, sends him next into Guzerât, to command there; with particular orders to pursue the Bielsgrats and Kowlis, who infested the ways, and robbed the karawâns, and either reduced them to obedience, or quite extirpated them. In his march, many Râjahs and their subjects e met him, with presents, and voluntarily submitted; excepting Râjah Eder and Lael Kowli, who, trusting in the ruggedness of their country, refused to come in^d.

Successes in Guzerât.

ABDOL KHAN, resolving to humble them, as soon as he had gotten to Abmed abâd, marched at the head of 500 select men, with so much speed, that he arrived at the castle of Eder, seventy kos distant, before the garrison knew any thing of his coming. However the Râjah ventured out to meet him with his followers: but, by a smart conflict of some hours continuance, was so roughly handled, that he was compelled to fly, accompanied by only four or five of his soldiers; leaving his castles and treasures to be possessed by the victor. Not long after, Abdol Khân, being informed, that Lael Kowli had robbed a karawân of all its merchandises, moved towards him with an army: the Kowli, far from retreating, met him with f two or three thousand horse, and ten or twelve thousand foot. But, after a bloody engagement, the victory fell to Abdol Khân; and Lael himself having been slain in the battle, his head was cut off, and set over the gate of Abmed abâd.

Mâlek Amber attacked.

MEAN time, Khân Jebân, who was sent against Mâlek Amber, king of Dekân, finding he made no progress, chiefly through the discord among the commanders, sent to desire Jebân Ghîr to command the army. The king hereupon sent Soltân Parweis, accompanied by Râjah Ramdas; who, being arrived at Brampûr with his forces, wrote to Adel Khân, and Kotbb Mâlek (X), to know why the accustomed tribute was not paid: and, being answered, that it

^d DE LAET, p. 224, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 75, & seqq.

(R) In De Laet, Nourziam Begem. It signifies the lady, who is the light of the world.

(S) Shebriyar, or Shebr riyar, that is, the friend of the city. In De Laet it is written Tzerriar.

(T) Before called Tzalam, or Salam Khân.

(U) Herbert calls him Rana, or Rahanna of Mandaw.

(X) Rather Adel Shâh and Kotbb Shâh; the first, king of Viziapûr, the other of Golkendâ: for Shâh was the title used by the kings themselves; that of Khân being given them by the Mogols, by way of contempt.

- a had been ready a considerable while, he sent a person to receive it. As soon as he had secured the money, he dispatches Khân Jebân, Râjah Mansing, and Râjah Ramdas, with a strong army, into Ballagât, against Mâlek Amber; who, with his forces, daily encountered them. After this, Jebân Ghîr sent Khân Azem, with three or four thousand soldiers more, to Brâmpûr, and removed himself to Azmîr. Mean time advice arrived, that Râjah Râna had appeared in the field again, and recovered Oudenpûr, Pormândel, and other neighbouring places. Here-Râna submits. upon, the king sent against him his son Soltân Kourm, with a potent army. The prince, advancing to Oudenpûr, sent out troops on all sides; whereby Râna was hemmed in so straitly, that he intreated Kourm to mediate his pardon with the king; and, at the Soltân's demand, sent his son Karen, as a pledge of his fidelity, with rich presents, valued at 100,000 rupees.
- b With these he repaired to Azmîr, and made peace for Râna with his father, who kept Karen about him, and gave him the above-mentioned places.

KHAN Azem, being arrived at Brâmpûr with his forces, sent to Khân Khânna, who resided Dekân invad- in the kingdom of Khûr, to join him. After which, it was resolved in a council of war, that ed. the Râjahs Abdol Hassan, Mansing, and Ramdas, with several Omrâs, should march before towards Ballagât, while Khân Khânna and Khân Jebân followed with the rest of the troops. Mâlek Amber, on the news of their march, set out to meet them, with 50,000 forces; 20,000 of his own, 20,000 brought by Adel Khân, and 10,000 by Kolbb Mâlek. Here- upon Jebân Ghîr ordered Abdol Khân, who then commanded in Guzerât, to set out in haste with all his troops for Dekân. By this time the Mogol army was advanced as far as Kerki, c the regal seat of Dekân, but not inclosed with walls, yet within five or six kos of Dawlet abâd, a very strong fortrefs. Mâlek Amber, being determined to fight them, sent Fassen to defeat Abdol Khân before he could join the other forces: but when he drew near, and found those forces to amount to no fewer than 100,000 horse, he became astonished, and fled with only a few followers; leaving in the camp Molbena Mohammed Lâri, and the Wakil of Adel Khân, who, with 20,000 men, were come to assist him.

- WHEN therefore the king of Dekân saw, that he was no match for the Mogols, he had recourse to stratagem. He ordered counterfeit letters to be written, giving an account, that Notable stra- Jebân Ghîr was dead; and contrived, by unknown messengers, to convey them to the hands tagem. of Râjah Mansing, Râjah Ramdas, and Khân Khânna. The Omrâs, giving credit to these letters, immediately break up their camp, and in great haste return to Brâmpûr. Abdol d Khân, deceived by the same artifice, distributes his forces into garrisons, and marches back to Guzerât. Mâlek Amber, being thus delivered from his enemies, quickly recovered the places which they had taken from him, and fortified them with new works. When Jebân Ghîr heard how his generals had been duped, he was greatly incensed at their easy credulity; which he severely chastised in his letters to them. When he got to Mândow, he sent Mohabêl Khân to command in Brâmpûr, and the province of Barar; who was so fortunate, as, in a short while, to reduce the whole country a second time as far as Kerki. After Jebân Ghîr had resided for one year and five months at Mândow, he proceeded to Guzerât; from whence, being come to Ahmed abâd, he sent Abdol Khân to govern the provinces of Kalpi and Khûr.
- e Then, having diverted himself another year with hunting, returns to Agra.

At this time, Shâh Bek, governor of Kandabâr, being superannuated, the king recalls him, and places Babâdr Khân, the Uzbek, in his room. He likewise dispatched Sejad Khân to Bengâl: Commissions in Salâm Khân, viceroy of Bengal, that he might place him in the government of Odia: but Bengâl: Ozmân Khân, the Pâtan, who for many years had been master of the country lying between that city and Daak (or Duka), came in the mean time, with a great army, and besieged the latter. Upon this advice, Salâm Khân moved towards him with his forces, sending before Sejad Khân, Mirza Effagber, and other Omrâs; while he followed about fifteen kos behind with the rest of his troops to support them. The two armies meeting, Effagber and Mirîk f Jelâyir gave the enemy so furious an onset, that they obliged them to fall back: but Ozmân sending a fierce elephant among them, they, in their turn, were obliged to give way, and Effagber was slain. Sejad Khân also himself, to avoid that furious animal, threw himself off the elephant which he rode on, and broke his leg in such a manner, that his people had much ado to carry him out of the battle. Hereupon the Mogols began to fly on every side: and had been utterly overthrown, had not an unexpected accident restored the fight. For a soldier, who lay wounded on the ground, happening to hit Ozmân in the eye with a knobbed stick, as he rode by on his elephant, that Pâtan soon after died of the wound; which so terrified his soldiers, that they immediately fled. Salâm Khân, being informed by a courier of the victory, arrived two days after on the field of battle; and, finding Sejad Khân dead of his wound, set himself in pursuit of the enemy. By forced marches, he at length overtook the brother, g widow and children of Ozmân Khân, whom he seized, with the elephants, and all the treasure of the deceased; which, at his return to Daak, the capital of Bengâl, he sent to Jebân Ghîr.

* DE LAET, p. 229, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 76, & seq.

Province subdued.

IN the year . . . that monarch removed from Agra to Labûr. Mean time, Abdol Khân, a who had been sent to govern the provinces of Khûr and Kalpi, intirely subdued them: for he brought in subject on, or destroyed, all the Râjahs and others, who had rebelled, and never would obey the former governors. He likewise made captives their wives and children; amounting, it is said, to so great a number, that, being sent to Irân (or Persia at large), the sale of them amounted to eleven lak (Y). Lastly, to humble the natives effectually, he razed all their fortified places to the ground.

Embassy to Persia:

JEHAN GHIR about this time, resolved to send an ambassador to Shâh Abbâs, pitched on Khân Azem, a man of prudence and high birth, to execute that commission. That he might appear at the Persian court with greater lustre, he was intrusted with magnificent presents for the king. These consisted of agate vessels, all sorts of cotton and woollen cloths, made in Hindûstân, intermixed with gold and silver; daggers and swords, adorned with gold and precious stones, with other curiosities of great value; amounting in the whole to fifty thousand rupees. He likewise ordered sixty thousand more to be paid out of his own treasury for defraying the expences of the Khân's journey, and the train of noblemen, who accompanied him. In his letters to the Shâh, he bestowed great commendations on the ambassador; styling him not only his friend, but brother.

honourably received.

WHEN he arrived with his retinue at Serâd, Hassan Bek, governor of that city, met him; and, with great honour, conducted him thither. Likewise, on his approach to Spîbân (or Isfâbân), the Shâh sent Konstalik Khân, with several other lords, to compliment, and usher him into his capital. When he was introduced to the king, his majesty rose up, and walking a few steps to meet him, took him by the hand, and placed him by him on the throne. Thenceforward banquets were made, and shews exhibited daily for his entertainment. At length, after two years stay, Khân Azem was dismissed with magnificent presents, both for his master and himself. Among those for Jebân Ghîr, besides great quantities of silk, and cloth of gold and silver, were 500 Persian horses, twenty he and fifty she mules, with 150 dromedaries of both sexes, all very beautiful in their kind. Shâh Abbâs, at the same time, desired the ambassador to speak to his king, to restore Kandabûr, which had been betrayed to his father Akbar; or else, to take an equivalent elsewhere in lieu of that province.

Affairs of Bengâl.

KHAN AZEM returned to Labûr, at such time as Jebân Ghîr went for the first time to Kashmîr; and Soltân Khosraw, who till then had been in custody of Affos Khân, was delivered into the hands of Khân Jebân. Mohabet Khân likewise was made viceroy of Kâbul and Banghes (Z). Salam Khân having deceased in Bengâl, the king made his brother Sheykh Kâssef lieutenant of that province. Kherram Khân, son of the late governor, hearing of his uncle's coming, who ever hated him, leaves Daik, with all his father's effects, in order to repair to Agra: but Kâssef, meeting him at Râjah Mîbl, took from him some elephants and other goods. Of this Kherram Khân complained to the king, who was so incensed at Kâssef for the same, that, at the year's end, he recalled him; and, in his room, appointed Ibrâhîm Khân, a relation of Nûr Jebân, with the command besides of 5000 horse. As soon as Kâssef had received notice of his disgrace, he in haste, with his family and all his effects, departed from Daik: but Ibrâhîm, meeting him at Râjâb Kom, demand restitution of what he had taken from his nephew. Kherram, instead of the goods, returned ill-language; which, at length, produced blows: but, finding himself the weaker party, he killed several of his women, that he might fly the faster; and, leaving all his effects behind, escaped with a few domestics; while Ibrâhîm was, with great submission, received as governor by all the inferior Omrâs^h.

74. Mughals
exp. Lab.

AFTER this, Jebân Ghîr sends an army against the Mûkbans, who had committed hostilities; and Ibrâhîm joining them with his forces, fell upon the rebels; of whom he made a great slaughter, and took many captives, with considerable spoils. These actions rendered Ibrâhîm so much in favour with the king, that, besides sending him horses, a sword, and a dagger, he conferred on him the name of Firûz Jebân Khân. The same year he sent Mortûza Khân to besiege Kangra, a castle so strongly fortified by nature and art, that the kings of Dehli never could take it from the Hindûs: for it is surrounded by steep mountains and deep ditches; nor is there any getting to it, but through a wood fifty kos in breadth, and a very narrow path between the rocks. The Khân, nothing dismayed with these difficulties, commanded the trees to be cut down before him: and, although he advanced scarce half a kos each day, yet he persisted in the work, till at length, after eight months labour, he arrived before the castle. He immediately ordered a wall to be built round it, and battered the place so furiously, that in a short time it seemed in a fair way of being taken; when his death put an end to the expedition.

75. Khot-
tan, 1618.
A. D. 1618.

IN 1628, Jebân Ghîr made a second progress to Kashmîr; but quickly returned to Labûr; when, by the persuasion of Nûr Jebân, and her brother Affos Khân, Soltân Khosraw was g ^h DE LAET, p. 231, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 77, & seqq.

Y. That is lak of rupees; which, at 12,000 pounds to a lak, amount to 137,500 pounds sterling.

(Z) Rather Banghîr, or Pengîr, a city about thirty miles north of Kashmîr.

a taken out of the custody of Khân Jēbān, and delivered into the hands of his brother Soltān Khūrm. This prince was now greatly in favour with his father; who gave him the command of 40,000 horse, and sent him to the war in Dekān, accompanied by Koja Abdol Hassan, and other experienced generals. The ground of this expedition was, that the kings of Viziapūr and Golkonda had for several years forborne to pay the tribute; and Milek Amber had surpris'd the provinces of Kbāndīsh and Barār: so that Khân Khānna was in a manner besieged by an army of Rāspūts. Mean time Abdol Azīz Khān was appointed governor of Kandahār, in the room of Babādr Khān Uzbek, who was sent against Kangra, before mentioned; and the command of Multān given to Khân Jēbān: that of Kalpi to Abdol Khān, and the government of Bondela to Rājān Lala Bertsing. Lastly, Soltān Parweis was nominated to that of Pātan.

b IN 1029, Rājāh Rāra dying, Jebān Ghīr sent Karen from court, to succeed his father in his territories: and at the same time ordered his brother Rājān Ribem, to assist Soltān Khūrm with 2 or 3000 Rāspūts. This prince, who now assumed the name of Shāh Jēbān, at length arrived at Brāmpūr, with his whole army; from whence he detached before Abdol Khān, Lala Bertsing, and Koja Abdol Hassan, with several other Omrās, to make war on Mālek Amber, Ziādū Rājāb; and Mirza Makkey was sent to invade Golkonda. At the same time Mohammed Takki was dispatched to Viziapūr, with letters for Adel Khān; in which he gave them notice, that, unless the tribute was forthwith paid, he would enter their dominions, and drive them out. In the interim Abdol Khān, with his forces, pass'd through Ballagāt, followed by the prince, at the distance of ten or twelve kos, with the rest of the army.

c AT length they are oppos'd by the troops of Mālek Amber; with whom they had several battles, in which they had always the victory; and then advancing to Kerki, took it a second time: where, to be revenged on Mālek Amber, they demolish'd his palace, and carried away a vast booty. Thus the province of Kbāndīsh and Barār, with all the places about Amdanigar, again fell into the hands of the Mogols.

d IN 1030, the king, returning to Agra, spent his time much in hunting, and the gardens of Soltān Parweis, beyond the river. The same year died the Itemādo'ddawlet, prime wazīr to Jebān Ghīr; who bestow'd all his effects on his daughter Nūr Jēbān, and his post on Koja Abdol Hassan.

e SHAH Jēbān, who resid'd at Brāmpūr, began to contrive how to make away with his brother Khoṣraw (whom he had in custody) without suspicion: and, having imparted his mind to Khān Khānna, and other Omrās he confid'd in, rode out a hunting. Reza (A), his slave, whom he had engag'd to commit this murder, going in the night with his assistants to the prince's apartment, knock'd at the door, pretending he brought him vests and letters from his father, with orders to his brother Shāh Jēbān to set him at liberty. As Khoṣraw, who suspected his errand, refus'd to admit him, the ruffian forc'd the door off the hinges; and throwing the prince on the ground, with the help of the rest, strangled him. Then, laying his dead body on the bed, went out, and shut the door again¹.

f NEXT morning his wife, who was daughter of Khān Azem, going into the chamber, and finding her husband dead, fill'd the house with lamentations. Every one was griev'd for the prince's unexpected death; but nobody suspected that he was murdered. As soon as Shāh Jēbān return'd to the city, he wrote his father an account of his brother's death; and, the better to conceal his crime, got all the Omrās and Mansebdārs to sign the letter: after which he had the corpse interred in a garden without the city. But the Nabāb Nūro'ddin Kowli, happening to be there at that time, sent a detail of the whole matter to Jebān Ghīr. The king mightily bewail'd his son's death, and wrote very sharply to the Omrās; demanding, Why they fail'd to let him know, whether his son died a natural or violent death? He likewise command'd the body to be taken up again, and sent to him, that it might be buried at Elabās, in his mother's tomb. Then sending for Khān Azem, the deceased prince's father-in-law, he comforted him, and committed to his care the education of his nephew Soltān Bolaki (B); on whom he confer'd the command of ten thousand horse.

S E C T. II.

From the rebellion of Soltān Khurm to the recalling Mohabet Khān to court.

g MEAN time Abdol Khān, departing from Shāh Jēbān without leave, retires to his government of Kalpi; but the king resent'd this liberty, and order'd him to return to the army. While affairs were in this confusion, a courier arrives from Azof Khan,

¹ DE LAET, p. 239, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 78, & seqq.

(A) Herbert calls him Rājāh Bander.

(B) Herbert writes Bolaki, or Bolaki. Frazer says, he was also called Dawr Buksh; that is, God's gift.

governor of Khandabâr, with advice that Shâh Abbâs, king of Persia, was advancing to a besiege that fortress, and to desire immediate succours. Khân Jehân, who commanded at Multân, was accordingly ordered to set out, with what forces he had, upon that service; but while he delayed to obey his orders, the Persians came and besieged the place; which they attacked continually both day and night. Jehân Ghîr, anxious to relieve Khandabâr, by advice of his council, sent for Abdol Khân; who now, with the prince's leave, was gone back to his government. The Khân no sooner received the king's orders than he set forward, with 5000 chosen horse and 100 elephants. Jehân Ghîr was so well pleased with this instance of that lord's zeal for his service, that, on his arrival at Labûr, he gave his grand-daughter (C) in marriage to his son Mirza Khân.

taken by Shâh
Abbâs. THE siege of Kandabâr had now continued six months, when Shâh Abbâs came in person, b with a great army, against that fortress: of which the news arriving at court, Jehân Ghîr, on reflection that he could not send relief in time, wrote the Shâh word, that he would deliver up the city to him of his own accord; and sent Azof Khân orders for that purpose: but this lord, suspecting the letters to be counterfeit, held out the place, till the principal bulwark being blown up, he was obliged to surrender. Shâh Abbâs, having appointed Ali Kuli Khân for his governor, marched back to Ispahân; while Azof Khân and Abdol Khân returned to Labûr.

Solrân Khurm
advances BEFORE this, Jehân Ghîr had sent Azof, or Affof Khân, brother to Nîr Jehân Begum, to Agra, to bring the treasures from the castle of that city to Labûr. But Ethabar Khân, governor of Agra, and Ethamat Khân, keeper of the treasure, both eunuchs, first refused c to deliver it; and when they had consented, still raised many objections against it. Mean time Affof Khân sent letters privately to Shâh Jehân, in which he gave him an account of his journey to fetch away the treasure; advising him to come and seize it between Agra and Dehli. The prince had long since coveted his father's throne; and for this end had married the daughter of Affof Khân; who with his brothers and other Khorassân lords, governed almost every thing at court. He had likewise, with the same view, so attached his Omrâs to his interest, by gifts and pensions, that they did not scruple to swear obedience to him, in opposition to their rightful sovereign.

to seize the treasury: BESIDES these supports, Shâh Jehân had received, from the indulgence of his father, several large and wealthy provinces; as all the country between Mandow and Brâmpûr, Gandersi, d Oudepûr, Barâr, Amdanâgar, all Guzerât, extending from Brâmpûr to Surât, and from thence to Ahmed abâd, its metropolis. In all which provinces, and the cities belonging to them, he, by his own authority, appointed governors, to serve his ambitious design, as before mentioned: and, lastly, to remove his chief obstacle, he made away with his elder brother, by the advice of Râjah Bikkermansid (†); who was thought to have the gift of foretelling what was to come. So that nothing farther seemed wanting to compass his ends, than to join his father's treasures to those which had been gathering, for five or six years, out of the provinces subject to him.

besieges Agra;
A. D. 1621. HAVING therefore received the above-mentioned message from his father-in-law, he, with- e out delay, assembled all his Omrâs, with Râjah Bikkermansid, who governed Guzerât, and other commanders; and, in 1031, set out from Brampûr, with an army of 70,000 horse under pretence of going towards Mandow to hunt. He made such great expedition, marching twenty or thirty kos a day, that he arrived at Azmîr with all his forces, before Ethabar Khân knew any thing of his coming; and on the fifteenth day got to Fettipûr. As soon as Ethabar Khân heard this news, he carried back the treasures, which he had gotten ready to deliver to Affof Khân, into the castle of Agra; and, by couriers, immediately gave the king notice of the prince's coming, and design. Hereupon Jehân Ghîr, without delay, set out from Labûr to that other capital. Mean time the prince detached Râjah Bikkermansid, his chief general, Beyrâm Bîk, Rostom Khân, Tsoffalia Deria Khân, Wazîr Khân, and Mohammed Takki, with an army, to take the castle of Agra. But Ethabar Khân, faithful to his king, f had already fortified it, prepared his warlike engines, and walled up all the gates^k.

but is repulsed. BEYRAM BIK, who first entered the city, posted himself in the house of Mirza Abdollatr, son of Khân Azem, from whence he went to attack the castle-gate: but he was bravely repulsed by the garrison, under the conduct of Râjah Baderois. Next came Râjah Bikkermansid, who, taking up his quarters in the house of Affof Khân, sent to search those of Nûro'ddîn Kûli, Laskar Khân, and other lords, who defended the castle. In the house of the first they found ten lak; in that of the second lord, sixteen; and several more in Affof Khân's. Having thus in three days time gathered fifty or sixty lak out of the houses of ^k DE LAET, p. 243, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 80, & seqq.

(C) The daughter of his son Dahen, or rather Dhan Shâh; that is, Daniel Shâh.

(†) Called also Bikker mansa.

a several Omrâs, they returned to the prince at Fettipûr, without doing any other damage to the citizens.

WHEN Shâh Jebân found himself baulked in his design of seizing his father's treasures, The king taken, and having no hopes of taking the castle in a short space of time, he resolved to meet his father, and give him battle. For this end he distributed money among his soldiers; and, having reviewed his forces, departed from Fettipûr the twenty-fifth day after his arrival there. The king began his march with only a few troops: however he had sent for Mohabet Khân from Kâbul, and Khân Jebân from Multân. Soltân Parweis also was on the road from Pâtan with succours, designing directly for Agra. Shâh Jebân, with his army, comes on the third day to Fern abâd, within ten kos of Debli; three kos from which the king was encamped: b so that the two armies were no more than seven kos asunder. Next day the prince sent Râjah Bikkermanfid, with other commanders, to attack his father's army; who sent against them Abdol Khân, Mohabet Khân, Affof Khân, Râjah Bertzing, and other Omrâs, with forces divided into three bodies: but some of these lords, having given their faith to the prince, deserted Jebân Ghîr; whom they had even determined, if practicable, to deliver into his son's power.

THE forces of the king were commanded by Shebriar, his youngest son, and Mohabet yet gains the Khân; those of the prince by Bikkermanfid. When the two armies were drawn out ready victory. for battle, Jebân Ghîr sends Zaberdaft Khân, with a sword, bow, and arrows, to Abdol Khân, conjuring him to do his best to defeat his rebellious son: but that lord, advancing with c fifty horse nearer the enemy's front than he imagined, was attacked and cut off. Mean time, the battle growing hot, and many other Omrâs being slain, Bikkermanfid broke his way through the king's troops to his very tent, and takes him prisoner: but before he could secure his prize, he was killed by one of the guards, with the stroke of a mace on the poll; which accident so astonished the rest of the Omrâs, that they immediately drew-off, with their forces, to three kos distance, and left the victory to the king's troops.

AFTER this Khân Khinna persuaded the prince to give over the war; and, retiring to the mountains of Mevat, endeavour by all methods to regain his father's favour. Which advice Khurm submits. the prince follows. On the other side, Soltân Parweis meeting Jebân Ghîr at Balzol, the whole harâm was sent to Agra, and Ethabar Khân ordered to open the gates of the castle d again. The king hereupon wrote to acquaint Shâh Jebân, that provided he came to him to Azmîr, and would swear not to attempt any thing against his person for the future, he would not only pardon, and take him into favour, but would also confer on him great honours and riches. The prince, on receipt of these letters, immediately set forward with Khân Khinna, Abdol Khân, Beyrâm Bik, and other Omrâs, who all arrived at Azmîr, and were well received.

AFTER the death of Râjah Bikkermanfid, Shâh Jebân conferred the government of Guzerât Guzerât taken on Abdol Khân; who, continuing with the prince, sent his eunuch Baffadar Khân to command by in his absence. When he arrived at Abmed abâd, he thrust out the Nabâb Shaffi Khân, the king's chancellor; who, enraged at this affront, went to Kanksi. From thence he wrote to Nâzar Khân, governor of Pâtan, and Babon Khân, who resided at Kapperbeniz, giving e them an account of what had passed. As he knew that Soltân Bolaki, and his grandfather Azem Khân, were on the road with an army to recover Guzerât, and command over it for the king, they blamed him for suffering himself to be so easily thrust out; and ordering him to meet them at Kapperbeniz, it was resolved to march to Abmed abâd: therefore, setting forward in the evening, they early next morning arrived before the walls of that city; and, having divided their forces (D) into three bodies, each attacked a gate, which with their elephants they broke open; and, thus entering the place, seized Baffadar Khân, and other lords, who had deserted to the prince.

As Shâh Jebân, then at Mandow, was greatly concerned at this news, Abdol Khân made the royal army. light of it; saying, that they who had taken Abmed abâd were only three merchants, and f would easily be obliged to quit their conquest. But it happened otherwise; for when he, accompanied with several other Khâns, and 70,000 horse, was come to Wasset (E), he found Shaffi Khân prepared to receive him, though not expected. This lord, finding the king's army, under Soltân Bolaki and Khân Azem, was at a great distance, and, being short of money, stripped the throne, which Shâh Jebân had caused to be made at Abmed abâd, of its gold and jewels; and therewith, in nine day time, procured out of the neighbouring places 19,000 horse, 500 musketeers, 28 elephants, and 22 Omrâs¹.

WITH these forces he encamped without the city, at Kanki, from whence he removed to Khurm, ge- Assempûr; where, being informed of Abdol Khân's coming, he posted himself with his army ncral

¹ DE LAET, p. 248, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 82, & seqq.

(D) Herbert says, they had 1000 horse and 5 elephants.

(E) Beyond (or to the south of) Brodra, which is five days march from Mandow. He had 1,400,000 rupis to pay the soldiers: but Herbert says, it was to increase his army with 12,000 foot.

MOD. HIST. VOL. III.

at Bowben talaw, six kos from Abmed abîd. Abdol Khân, on this advice, leaving Ana-mogherri, advances to Neriâd, and thence to Momod abîd (F), but six kos from the enemy, whom he despised, too much confiding in his own strength. Here discovering by an intercepted letter, that Matza-bayb Khân intended in the battle to go over to the king's troops, he had him arrested, with his son Koja Soltân, and confiscated their effects. Next morning he moved towards Kanisa: but, when he understood how strong the royal army was, and knowing that some of his commanders were not to be trusted, he turned off towards Baroch, with design to attack Shaffi Khân in the rear. However, his design being discovered by the watchful enemy, he resolves to give them battle without delay. To this end, next morning, he divides his forces into three bodies, and gives the right wing to Hamed Khân and Zali Beg; the left to Zardi Khân, Mashûd Beg, and Mohammed Kûli, reserving to himself the main body.

attempts to recover it;

In this order the whole camp advanced by Jetelpûr to Fettabâgh; where Shaffi Khân being already arrived with his forces, Nakar Khân, with his five sons, and two sons-in-law, Karâ Mohammed Khân and Shâb Mohammed Khân, with 3000 horse, began the fight, and made a great slaughter of Abdol Khân's troops. Shaffi Khân, having at the same time chosen a more commodious ground, so galled the enemy with his cannon, that one of the chief elephants, being wounded, turned about, and made great disorder among their ranks. Abdol Khân was not wanting all this while to encourage his soldiers; and, having in some measure restored the battle, challenges Nabar Khân to a single combat. The brave old man did not fail to meet him; but, having been wounded by his adversary in the head with a lance, his men came in to his assistance. Hereupon began a fierce conflict, in which one of his sons-in-law was killed, and three of his sons wounded. Nabar Khân finding the enemy too strong for him, began to fly: but Delawer Khân called him back, and renewed the fight.

but is defeated.

SAID KHAN and Sîd Yakûb in the mean time attacked Sali Beg, who had advanced before with 1000 horse, with so much bravery, that all his soldiers dispersed; yet, with only four more, he still fought gallantly, till being at length thrown from his elephant, Said Khân ran him through. Abmed Khân also, who ventured to assail Râjah Hallen and Abdol Rhamân, had his head cut off; which with that of Sali Beg was sent to Shaffi Khân. The death of these great officers so astonished the whole army of the enemy, that they immediately fled on all sides, excepting Zaitfi Khân, governor of Brodra, who, with 400 horse and three elephants, still stood his ground in the rear; but, on Shaffi Khân's advancing towards him, he surrendered. His son Mohammedan Kûli Khân, much offended at his father's cowardice, with forty horse and one elephant, fled to Abdol Khân: who, being informed of those misfortunes, thought it best to fly likewise towards Brodra; whither he arrived with only a few followers, great numbers of his troops having been cut-off in their way by the people (G) of the country. From thence he went to Surât, where having staid eight days, he returned with a few troops to Brâmpûr.

Khurm other-thrown;

MEAN time Jebân Gbîr, who remained at Fettipûr, detached his son Soltân Parweis, with Mohabet Khân, Râjah Lala Bertzing, and the whole army of Râspûts, to pursue his rebellious son, and, if possible, take him alive. At the same time Mirza Khân, son of Abdol Khân, is sent laden with chains to the castle of Agra; while Abdol Ajef Khân, who had by the contrivance of Abdol Khân been put into the power of Shâh Jebân, makes his escape, and returns to the king. As soon as this prince knew that the royal army was advancing, he removed from Azmîr to Mandow, and assembled all his forces, in order to try his fortune in battle. When the two armies were now within five or six kos of each other, the vanguards began the fight, and soon after ensued a general engagement: but Rostan Khân and Berkendash Khân deserting to the king's forces, Shâh Jebân was overthrown. Hereupon he fled, fighting by the way; and, passing the Nerebeda, or Nardaba, arrived at Brâmpûr.

flies to Malek Amber.

MEAN while Beyrâm Bek and Darab Khân being left at the river, to hinder the passage of the king's forces, Khân Khânna persuades Shâh Jebân to send him to his brother Soltân Parweis, in order that he might intercede for them with his father; nor could Abdol Khân divert the prince from entering into this measure, or induce him to suspect Khân Khânna's fidelity. The Khân having crossed the river, and arrived at the Soltân's camp, advises him to pass the Nardaba, with what rafts or boats he could procure, in haste; assuring him, that his brother had but few forces, and that Beyrâm Bek, already gained, would not hinder him. Soltân Parweis, without delay, crosses the river, as he had been counselled, and sends Beyrâm Khân to inform Shâh Jebân, that Khân Khânna had made his peace with his brother: but Abdol Khân counselled the prince to beware of Khân Khânna's treachery; assuring him, that his design was to seize him unawares, and deliver him into his brother's hands, since 20,000 horse had already passed the Nardaba. He therefore advised, that, instead of minding what

(F) Perhaps Mahmûd Alâd.

(G) These are the Kowlis, according to H. bert.

- a Beyrám Bek said, both he and Darab Khán should be put in irons, and the prince himself retire as fast as he could to Reben Kera^m.

SHAH Jebán, approving this counsel, had those two lords bound on an elephant, and fled ^{The Uzbeks} towards Kerki, to Malek Amber; who appoints him a residence in Nafsír Trom; from whence ^{repulsed.} he sent his fatigued elephants to the castle of Dolt abád, in order to recruit. Mean time, Soltán Parweis being arrived at Brámpúr, without any opposition, sent an account of his success to Jebán Ghír, who received the news with the utmost joy: but his joy was soon allayed with the news, that Ibens Tous, the Uzbek, with 30,000 horse, was on his march towards Kabúl, in order to conquer that province. As soon as Khána Zaed Khán, son of Mohabet Khán, governor of the province of Banghiz (H), heard of this Tatar invasion, he in all haste repaired to Kabúl, and fortified it. Then, being informed by his scouts that Iben Tous was advanced within fifteen kos of that city, he marched out to meet him with 20,000 horse; and giving the Uzbek battle, obliged him to fly, after he had made a great slaughter among his troops. Zaed Khán, making use of his victory, pursued the enemy, for forty kos, to the borders of Uzbek. Then attacking the city of Gassani (+), he took it, and returned to Kabúl with a rich booty, many elephants, and several thousand captives: for which victory he was rewarded by the king with the command of 5000 horse and other gifts.

AFTER this, Jebán Ghír made another progress to Kashmír, for the sake of hunting: ^{Khurm enters} which opportunity of his long absence Sháh Jebán thinking proper to lay hold of, with ^{Bengál,} 4000 horse and 300 elephants, marched by the way of Colkonda and Orisba, through the deserts, into Bengál. At this unexpected coming, Kamet Bek Khán, the governor, married to Ibráhim's sister, was so terrified, that he fled; leaving the prince in possession of his treasure, and every thing else which belonged to him. Hereupon several Mansebdárs revolted to Sháh Jebán; who thence marched into Pátan; which Moklidis Khán, the governor, shamefully deserting, fled to Rostam Kandabári, governor of Elhabás; who, for his cowardice, imprisoned him, and seized all his effects.

MEAN time Sháh Jebán, having crossed the Ganges, entered Bengal, and came to Kerin: ^{and subdued} but Ibráhim Khán, governor of Daak (or Daka), meeting him at Rájah Mábl with 5 or 6000 ^{part.} horse, attacked him so furiously, that he was on the point of flying; and had been utterly defeated, if Abdol Khán, who lay in ambuscade, had not seasonably advanced to his assistance. For the king's forces were so dismayed at this unexpected reinforcement, and being at the same time greatly dissatisfied at the avarice of their commander, who withheld their pay, that they turned their backs, leaving the covetous Ibráhim Khán, with 500 men, to shift for themselves. After a brave resistance, he and his soldiers were all slain. Then the prince, seizing his treasure, sent Darab Khán to Daak, to bring away the rest of Ibráhim's riches, with his wives and children. He had orders also to reduce all Bengál, while Sháh Jebán marched to Paián, where Rájah Jebán Usím joined him with 5000 horse and 20,000 foot.

As soon as Soltán Parweis was informed of these proceedings, leaving Rájah Rostan Khán ^{S. tán Par.} to command in his absence at Brámpúr; he set out, accompanied by Mohabet Khán, Khán Wéis Alem, and other Omrás, who with the rest of the Ráspút forces (I) marched with all expedition towards Elabás; and, when he was entered into the province of Lala Bertzing, this prince met him with a present of two or three lak of rupees, and joined them with all his troops. Mean time the king, having received advice in the city of Káshmir of Ibráhim Khán's death, forthwith sent orders to Khán Jebán, who resided at Múltán, to march with his forces to assist Soltán Parweis: but he, coming to Fettipúr, loitered there six months, without carrying any succours to that prince. On the other side, Rustam Kandabári fortified Elabás, while Sháh Jebán sent troops against the castle of Rantas, which Sid Monbark surrendered to him; as did the castle of Sinnar, commanded by Hastis Baki, after enduring several assaults. About the same time Wázir Khán marching to Benáres, extorted tribute from the inhabitants; and Abdol Khán coming to Jaurpúr, did the like there, after obliging Jebán Ghír Kúli Khán, the governor, to retire to Elabás.

SHAH Jebán, being informed that his brother Soltán Parweis and Mohabet Khán were ^{marched} advancing against him, and had already passed the river Kalpi, sent Rájah Rbím, Beyrám Bik, ^{against} and Adol Khán, to besiege Elabás; the suburbs of which they destroyed. Rustan Khán, incensed at this provocation, sallied out with his troops; but many of them being cut off, he was forced to retreat back to the castle, which he afterwards defended bravely against the rebels. In the interim, discord arose between Abdol Khán and Rájah Rbím; who soon after, repassing the Ganges, retired to Banáres, on the approach of Soltán Parweis and his forces; which first arrived at Bakkeri, and then at Munikpúr. While they were on the road between Kalpi and the province of Rájah Bertzing, Mia Febím attempted by force to

^m DE LAET, p. 254, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 86, & seqq.

(H) A city to the north of Kabul.

(I) Herbert says, he had with him 50,000 horse.

† Perhaps Ganza, or Glázna.

rescue his lord Khân Khânna, who, on suspicion, had been confined by Mohabet Khân; but was by the keepers, after some slaughter of them, slain, with several of his associates. Hereupon all the effects of Khân Khânna were confiscated, his wives and children sent in custody to Agra; and himself, laden with chains, more closely imprisoned. At length, the prince arriving at Elabâs, was joyfully received by *Rustan Khân*ⁿ.

and defeats

MOHABET Khân, eager for battle, with the Râjahs Ziffing, Jand, and Bertzing, passed the Ganges with the greater part of the troops, in order to meet Shâh Jêhân: who having raised considerable forces in Pâtan, was come to Fonek, about ten kos from Banâres; where the two armies, parted only by the river, cannonaded each other. Mean time Beyrâm Bîk, advancing towards Elabâs with near 4000 horse, was met by Mohammed Shâma (K), at the head of the vanguard of Soltân Parweis, on the bank of the river Shawezi (L); and, being slain in fight, had his head cut off. All this while the prince's army suffered much from Shâh Jêhân's cannon, and could not pass the river: but, at length, being conducted over at a convenient ford, they encamped opposite to the rebels; who did not long delay coming to a battle. For Râjah Rhim, a most gallant soldier, advancing forward with his troops, gave the charge; and with his war elephants so disordered the king's forces, that they were obliged to give way. And, had this brave commander been supported by Abdol Khân and Derra Khân, they must have been overthrown: but those two generals, out of malice, would not stir to his assistance; which giving the Soltân's troops an opportunity to rally, they returned to the charge with such fury, that they wounded most of the Râjah's elephants, and restored the battle. On this occasion Soltân Parweis exposed himself to danger (M) at the head of his troops, fighting on his elephant. The prince's example gave such courage to his men that they fought like lions; so that at length Râjah Rhim being slain, Derra Khân was put to flight. Shâh Jêhân endeavoured to restore the battle; but in vain: upon which he was by Abdol Khân prevailed on, though much against his will, to quit the field, with 3 or 4000 horse. The troops of Râjah Bertzing, having taken possession of his camp, the soldiers plundered it of all the gold and silver; of which they found a great quantity: but the elephants, horses, and other spoils, were reserved for the king's use.

his brother;

reboquits Bengâl,

SHAH Jêhân, after this defeat, fled with such haste, that in thirty-six days he reached the castle of Rantas; where he had placed Râjah Gholam, one of the murderers of his brother Soltân Khosrow. Here leaving all his harâm, excepting Affof Khân's daughter, he, on the third day, fled towards Pâtan; most of his followers dispersing themselves. Mean time Soltân Parweis and Mohabet Khân followed him close, at the distance of forty or fifty kos. Being arrived at Pâtna, he wrote to Dârâb Khân, whom he had made governor of Bengâl, to meet him at Râjah Mâbl. On the other hand, the Soltân Mohabet Khân, and his father Khân Khanna, invited that lord to join the king's forces. Shâh Jêhân, after a short stay at that place, thinking Dârâb Khân had deserted his party, posted on to Medenpûr, and thence to Ouja (N). When the king's forces arrived at Medenpûr, and found Shâh Jêhân had fled, Bakker Khân and other Omrâs were sent to pursue him (with 8000 horse), while Soltân Parweis passed on to Râjah Mâbl; from whence he wrote into all the provinces, to seize Dârâb Khân, and bring him to the camp. These letters hastened the death not only of that Khân's children, who were with Shâh Jêhân, but of their father also: for Mohabet Khân sending to him his son, and kinsman, son of Shâh Nabar Khân, gave secret orders to Mir Khân, who was their conductor, to put them all to death; which he did when they least expected it, and brought their heads to the prince. Mohabet Khân, the more to afflict Khân Khânna, had them shewn to him, and then sent them to the king.

and flies to Dekân.

A. D. 1623.

In the year 1623, Jêhân Gbir sent for Khân Zaw Khân, son of Mohabet Khân, governor of Kâbul, and conferred on him the command of 5000 horse, with the government of Bengâl. At the same time Mîlek Amber (king of Dekân), marching with an army of 50,000 men, to drive the Mogols out of his borders, was met by Lasker Khân, Mirza Manucher, and Ibrâhim Hosselyn, with 15,000 horse: but he defeated them with great slaughter; and, having taken them prisoners, with all their camp and treasure, confined them in the castle of Dolt abâd. Mean time Shâh Jêhân, being hotly pursued by Bakker Khân, left Ouja, and, with 3000 horse and 300 elephants, fled to the borders of Golkondâ, where Mîlek Amber ⁿ DE LAET, p. 260. HERBERT, p. 88, & seqq.

(K) In De Laet, Ziama. Herbert calls him Shawma.

(L) In De Laet, he is called Ziauzia. In Herbert Shawezi.

(M) Herbert says, the battle lasted very hot for five hours: that Khurm (or Shah Jêhân) was hurt in the arm, and Parweis wounded in the side by Derra Khân; and that, but for the goodness of his armour, he had been killed. He also ascribes the success to the resolution and activity of Mohabet Khân.

(N) Called in De Laet, p. 73, Odee; and, by Herbert Oudee, Oujea, and O.jea; an antient city, once the seat of the Pâtau kings, but now almost ruined. Not far from it are seen the ruins of the castle and palace of Rânikand, whom the Indians, says Herbert, hold to be the supreme God.

- a furnished him with money and all other necessaries ; after which he granted him refuge within his kingdom.

WHEN he had continued here for three months, he set out with Abdol Khân, Derriah Khân, Befegis Bram-Mohammed Takkik, and Tüküt Khân, whom Milek Amber had joined with 10,000 horse, pūr; and marched towards Brâmpūr. This city had been newly walled and fortified by Rajah Rostang, made governor by Soltân Parweis; who, on the enemy's approach, sallied out with his forces; but, after a sharp conflict, was obliged to return. Hereupon Abdol Khân and Derriah Khân assaulted the walls, which were defended bravely almost the whole night by the citizens. However, in the interim, Takkik, forcing his way in through a breach, takes the castle: but the other two generals, vexed to see that the son of a merchant should accomplish what they had in vain attempted, refrained giving him assistance: so that the fortress was not only recovered by Kojan Khân and Asiet Khân, but the brave Takkik, after receiving a wound in the eye, was taken prisoner, and all his soldiers slain.

- b The king, or Nûr Jehân Begum, at the same time sent Mîr. a Arch Destoa Khân to bring retires again Khân Khânna up to Labûr. Being thus taken out of the hands of Mohabet, much against the will of the latter, as soon as he arrived at court, he complained heavily against his late keeper, for having not only destroyed his children, but also disgracefully imprisoned himself, who had in so critical a juncture deserted the prince, and confiscated most of his effects. Mean while, Soltân Parweis, having left Pâtan, with Mohabet Khân, Khân Alem, Rajah Bertzing, and the whole army of Râspûts, made what haste he could to Brâmpūr; which c Shâh Jehân hearing of, he raised the siege; and, thinking it was in vain to attempt any thing farther, sent his brother the keys of the castles Haffer (O) and Rantas, and retired again to Mâlek Amber°.

- AFTER this, a misunderstanding arising between Soltân Parweis and Mohabet Khân, on account of Khân Khânna's accusations, the prince, lwayed by bad counsel, wrote to desire the king to call that Khân to court. On the other side, the king, persuaded by the advice of his wife Nûr Jehân, and her brother Ajfof Khân, as well as of Khân Khânna, and other enemies of Mohabet Khân, commanded him to repair to him without delay: and, on his making excuses, sent Mîr. a Arch Destoa Khân to fetch him to Labûr. Hereupon Mohabet Khân, obeying the king's command, although much against his will, departed from Brâmpūr, and came to his castle of Ratampūr (P) seventy kos distant from Agra. At the same time the king made Khân Jehân governor of Abmed abad in his room: and, soon after, that lord joined prince Parweis. While these things were doing, Shâh Jehân, to soothe his father, sent him 100 of his best elephants, with his two sons, under the conduct of Koja Jehân; who arrived safely at Agra; where they stayed for some time. At this juncture Kâssan Khân, being turned out of his government of Agra, which he had long enjoyed, the king conferred it on Mozaffer Khân, who was then at Labûr: which disgrace his wife Mowissa Begum, sister of Nûr Jehân Begum, so highly resented, that, to restore him, she contrived a means which will be related presently.

- At the same time that Soltân Khoisraw was delivered to the custody of his younger brother, Soltân Khurm, or Shâh Jehân, the two sons of his brother Dhân Shâb (who died of drinking at Brâmpūr), named Shâh Etimor and Shâh Housseyn (Q), were also put into his hands. These, when young, he delivered to the Jesuits, to be baptized, and bred up in the Christian faith. Not that he favoured the christian religion (R), but that he might render them odious to the Mohammedans while boys; and, with the same levity, draw them back from Christianity (S) at pleasure. After these young princes had been a long time in Shâh Jehân power, they made their escape. Shâh Etimor, when his uncle was defeated at Elabâs, fled to Soltân Parweis; and when he was obliged to retreat from before Brâmpūr, Shâh Housseyn took the opportunity to get away to Râja Rostan. From thence they repaired to their grandfather; who received them with great honour and affection, giving in marriage to the eldest his daughter Ehar Banû Begum. f ° DE LAET, p. 265, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 91, & seqq.

(O) Five kos from Brâmpūr, in the way to Agra. It is the strongest and in all respects best fortified castle in the province of Khândish.

(P) Herbert writes, Rautampūr.

(Q) Their names were Teyomars and Hoshang.

(R) Other authors relate, that when the young princes were grown up, after being under Corfi the Jesuit's tuition, who kept a school, for some years, they desired him to provide them with Portuguese wives; in which he not gratifying them, they delivered up their crosses, and other tokens of conversion, to the Jesuits; saying, on being asked, that the king had commanded them. Whence the Jesuits concluded, that the whole affair was only an artifice to get a woman for the king's use. Roe's journal, Church. collect. Trav. vol. i. p. 731. Terry's voya. to India, sect. 30.— This happened before the year 1616, as appears from Sir Thomas Roe's letters on the occasion.

(S) Herbert says, that, not daring to provoke the people farther, by shedding their blood, he took this method to render them incapable of possessing the throne.

S E C T. III.

From Jehân Ghîr's Imprisonment by Mohabet Khân to his Death.

Abdol Khân deserts Khurm.

MEAN while Mohabet Khân, who remained with his Râspûts (T) at Rantipûr, was by the king's mandate ordered to deliver up his castle and province to Nûr Jehân Begum and his governor Bakker Khân, and remove into Bengâl, to command there as his viceroy. As this order was death to a man impatient of injuries, he wrote back to the king, that if he was falsely accused of great crimes by the betrayers of the kingdom, his reputation required, that above all things he should acquit himself before his majesty. About the same time an account was brought, that Abdol Khân, in a belief that, on Shâh Jehân's raising the siege of Brâmpûr, his affairs were become desperate, had deserted him; and, induced by the hopes of pardon given him by Khân Jehân, had returned to the king's party, and was honourably received by Soltân Parweïs.

Mohabet
Khân attacked:
A. D. 1625.

IN 1035, Mohabet Khân set out from Rantipûr, with 5000 Râspûts, towards Labûr; hoping to meet the king at Kâbûl, whither he was making a progress. But Nûr Jehân Begum and Affof Khân, being informed of his design, persuaded Jehân Ghîr, who had now passed the Chunâb (U), to command him to leave his men behind, and, sending his elephants before, to repair to court only with his domestics. Mohabet Khân, who knew that this was a snare laid for his destruction, sent his son-in-law before with the elephants, and wrote back to Jehân Ghîr, that he was sensibly grieved his majesty should distrust his old slave: that he was ready to deliver his wives and children as pledges of his fidelity; but could not suffer himself, on any account, to be brought into the king's presence. As soon as his son-in-law arrived at court, he was first clothed in an ignominious habit, and then bastonaded on the soles of his feet; after which he was mounted bare-headed on an elephant, and carried through the camp by way of derision. The wekkîl, or vakîl, also of the Khân was lashed with whips.

his signal victory:

MEAN time Mohabet Khân arrived with his little army at the river Behad (or Behat), where he received a new order from the king, that he should repair to him, accompanied by no more than 100 of his retinue; that he should make all the haste he could, and leave his troops to follow him: but the hatred of the queen and Affof Khân, of Eradet Khân, Fedi Khân, Koja Abdol Hassan, and other great lords of the Khorasân faction, so far had influenced the mind of Jehân Ghîr, that Mohabet could obtain no justice at his sovereign's hands. In the interim, to hasten his destruction, which they were bent upon, they took the opportunity, while the king was asleep in his tent, to cross the river with a great army, in which were 50,000 horse, and fall on the forces of Mohabet Khân, consisting of no more than 5000 Râspûts (X). But, such was the valour of the leader, and fidelity of his soldiers, that, without any difficulty, they put to flight the king's troops; whereof above 2000 were slain, and many drowned in the river: among whom were some men of great note, as Koja Shawâr Khân, Abdol Sâmek, and Abdol Gâllek.

seizes Jehân
Ghir,

MOHABET KHAN, making use of his victory, crossed the river with so much speed, that he seized the king yet sleeping in his tent; and, having killed such of the guards as resisted, put him on an elephant, and carried him to his own tent. Guards were set on the tent of the queen. Soltân Balokhi, Soltân Shebrîar, and the sons of Dhân Khân, were also taken prisoners. Affof Khân and Fedi Khân escaped by flight. Eradet Khân, and Mohandas, the Diwân of Affof Khân, were taken. All the king's treasure and wealth of the Omrâs was plundered by the Râspûts, while the camp was filled with nothing but confusion and noise. Zâdok Khân, who had fallen-out with his brother Affof before the battle, took part with Mohabet Khân, and had the government of Labûr committed to his trust. In short, the face of affairs was of a sudden wonderfully changed: for the queen Nûr Jehân Begum, who but a little before was worshipped like a goddess, became now neglected, and deprived of her attendants. Affof Khân, with his son Abontaleb, viceroy of Labûr, and the son of Mîr Mira, who had fled toward Attek, were brought back by the son (Y) of Mohabet Khân, and Rûro'dâîn Kûli Khân, with 2000 Hâddis and Râspûts, to the Khân; who was already, with the captive king, at that city. There they were loaded with irons, and from hence were all carried to and all his court.

(T) Mohabet Khân must have been a Râjah, or Hindû prince; otherwise he could not have commanded Rajah-pûts.

(U) That is, the river Chun; written Tziunab in De Lach. The Chun is the same with the river Jemna, or Jemni, as before remarked.

(X) Herbert says, Mohabet Khân had 20,000 Râspûts; and that he marched in quest of the army of Nûr Mâll (called also Nûr Jehân), consisting of 50,000 horse. The same author relates several particulars of this affair, which we presume he learned in India.

(Y) Herbert calls him Mîrza Bircawer; and says, he was the Khân's third son.

a Kābūl: where Eradet Khān and Mūlīna Mohammed were so severely as well as ignominiously treated, that the latter expired under his troubles ^p.

It has been observed above, that Monniza Begūm, wife of Kāssēm Khān, who was highly offended at her husband's being removed from the government of Agra, repaired forthwith to Labūr, to the queen her sister, and from thence to Kābūl. But, when she saw that her sister had lost her power (Y), and Mobabet Khān swayed every thing, she applied herself to him; and, as she was an old acquaintance of his, easily got her husband restored. Mozaffer Khān, who had enjoyed it no more than three days, being thus turned out again, he was ordered to bring the two sons of Shāh Jēbān, with Koja Jēbān (their governor) to the king. This he readily performed; whereupon those young princes, with Soltān Bolakbi, were, by b Mobabet Khān, committed to the custody of a certain Rāspūt.

WHILE these things were transacting on one side, Shāh Jēbān, who had hitherto kept Khurm de- close in Dekān, now appears again, and, with fresh forces, accompanied by the son of Rājah ^{fiated in} Rbīm, marches through the province of Rājah Rāna, towards Azmīr. This news gave some ^{Bengāl.} uneasiness to the king's troops, especially, because many Rājahs of the Rāspūts deserted to him: and it was reported, that the prince himself was hastening to Agra. But the son of Rājah Rbīm, whom he chiefly confided in, dying suddenly at Azmīr, and the Rāspūts by degrees leaving him, he quitted the design of going to Agra, and turned towards Tāta; which, at the earnest persuasion of Derri Khān, he besieged. But Sbarīf Mālek, who governed there for the king, sallying out with his forces, obliged them to withdraw. However, they soon returned to attack the city a second time: but the Sbarīf, making another sally, fell on the enemy with so much fury, that Derri Khān was slain, and Shāh Jēbān forced to fly to Bākker.

AT the same time Mālek Amber, king of Dekān, sends the captive Omrās, Leskar Khān, ^{Forces raised} Mirza Manucher, and Ibrāhīm Hosseyn, to Soltān Parweīs, at Brampūr; and twenty-six lak ^{secretly} of rupees safely arrived at Agra, from Zeyd Khān, son of Mobabet Khān, governor of Bengāl. The king, who now returned from Kābūl to Labūr, by the persuasions of the queen, gave permission to his guards to fall upon the Rāspūts belonging to Mobabet Khān, and sell those whom they took prisoners, to the people of Kābūl. After this the king's party consulted among themselves in what manner to destroy Mobabet Khān, before his friends

d Khān Alem and Rājah Rāstang should come to his assistance. At this consultation it was agreed, that Ouriar Khān, governor of Bassower and Dessowa, should, with all expedition, raise 5000 horse, and attack Mobabet Khān at Attek. Koja Sbera was to furnish 5000 more: while the queen, squandering the treasure, to make friends and procure soldiers, at length assembled a considerable army: but still her brother Affof Khān, and the sons of Shāh Jēbān, remained in Mobabet Khān's custody. As for Fedi Khān, who fled from the battle into Rukestān, or the desarts of Tombel, after he had continued there a while with Rājah Gomanow (Z), he repaired to Rājah Bertzing, and then requested letters of safe conduct from Soltān Parweīs; who readily granted them.

AFTER the king had crossed the river Attek, at the place where the late bloody battle was ^{by the queen} fought, he desired Mobabet Khān to set Affof Khān at liberty; promising, on that condition, to build a mosk in the same place: but the Khān did not think fit to grant his request; however, he consented, that Affof Khān should be treated with less rigour than he had been. When they came to the river Rbeed (A), the queen's forces began to appear on every side; and Soltān Shebrīyār, who had married the queen's daughter, in 1029 (B), was sent before A. D. 1619, to Labūr, to secure the principal lords there. In his way he forced out of the hands of the Rāspūts Soltān Bolakbi, with the two sons of Dhān Khān; and being arrived at that city, fortified the castle, after turning out all the Rāspūts. Mean time the king proceeded on his way, hunting, to the river Rbeed (or Behed); where Ousber Khān joined the queen with 5000 men: so that her army was now 20,000 strong.

f ALTHOUGH Mobabet Khān was advised by his friends to be on his guard: yet, trusting in Jehān Ghīr his troops, he despised the danger. However, during his absence, the king sent for Mirza ^{escapes.} Rostam Khān, and told him, he judged that to be a proper time for him to make his escape. The queen, having been of the same opinion, Jehān Ghīr went a hunting, as usual, the next day: on which signal his Omrās hastened towards him from all parts, with their forces; which now amounted to 30,000 horse. Although Mobabet Khān was not in a condition to fight the king's forces, yet he durst venture to go to him into the court of justice (C): but, when he saw the king look cold upon him, he went again with his people, and removed his camp half a kos from Jehān Ghīr's. The same evening Balant Khān brought a threatening

P DE LAET, p. 270, & seqq. HERBERT, p. 94, & seqq.

(Y) Herbert says, she was condemned to lose her head by Mobabet Khān and his council; but that, at the king's request, she was pardoned.

(Z) Perhaps the Rājah Gammon of others.

(A) Rather Behed, as Herbert: or Babat, as others.

(B) That is, we presume, by her first husband Afkān Khān.

(C) Herbert says, into the hāt, or camp message

message from the king, commanding him to set at liberty Affof Khân, and the other Omrâs : a but Mohabet Khân, still confiding in his soldiers, refused to obey. However, upon second thoughts, he afterwards sent to desire of the king, that he might first cross the river Bebed ; promising then to send those lords to his camp. The queen was against granting the condition required ; earnestly pressing to have them taken out of his hands by force : but Jebân Ghîr thought the other the most prudent course.

Mohabet
Khân retires.

MOHABET KHAN, finding the face of things intirely changed, and being in fear not only of losing his life, but of an ignominious punishment, sends for Affof Khân, and told him, that although it was now in his power to take away his life, yet he willingly spared him. He added, that he did not believe he would ever forget so great a benefit, or make any attempt against the life of a person who had preserved his. Then having taken an oath to b that purpose from Affof Khân, he took off his chains with his own hands, put on him a royal vest, and, presenting him with several excellent horses, sent him to the king. He promised moreover, that as soon as he had passed the river Aziknaw, he would dismiss his son and Mîr Mira, with the brother-in-law of Koja Abdol Hassan : which he accordingly performed. The king was exceedingly pleased at Affof Khân's return : on the contrary, the queen, his sister, asked him in a rage, how he came to be so very hasty, and not to wait, till she, with an armed force, came and rescued him out of the hands of his adversary? Affof Khân pleaded the fear of his life, which at length pacified her. He likewise acknowledged to the king, that he thought himself under a perpetual obligation to Mohabet Khân for the favour he had received ; and that he had promised never to do him any hurt ^a.

The queen's hatred.

JEHAN GHIR being returned to Labûr, the queen, who still burnt with revenge, left nothing unattempted to destroy Mohabet Khân. With this intent she dispatched Abmed Khân (cousin-german to Ibrahim Khân) with Zaffer Khân, Nûro'ddîn Kûli, and other Omrâs, with 10,000 horse ; who intercepted the treasure of twenty-six laks of rupees, sent by Saïd Khân from Bengâl to his father Mohabet Khân, and brought it to her. It was convoyed from Agra by 500 Râspûts ; who, being arrived at Cheban Chabad, a walled town, for some time held out against the king's forces ; of whom they slew no small number : but at length the besiegers, making a furious assault, took the place, and killed many of the defenders ; the rest fled, and left the money in the hands of their adversaries. The queen, not content with this advantage, by large gifts, and larger promises, prevailed on Khân Khânna, though much d against his will, being now broken with age, to command an army against Mohabet Khân ; whose troubles were increased by the desertion of his younger son Mîrza Beyrewer. This lord being sent with 3000 horse to Nornon, in order to make war upon Râjah Setterfing, turned off to Banger, with design to seize his father's treasures, which were lodged in the castle of Rantipûr : but was prevented by the care of Mozaib Khân, who commanded there in his father's behalf.

Soltân Par-weïs dies.

MEAN time news arrived at Labûr from Brâmpûr of the death of Soltân Parweïs ; which greatly surprised the king : for this son, who never disobeyed his commands, was solely beloved by him, and brought up in expectation of the crown. Being thus deprived of his only hope, he saw himself reduced to great straits. For Shâh Jebân, then in open rebellion e against him, had brought many calamities on his kingdom ; and Soltân Shabriyar was judged unfit to reign for want of conduct. Nor was the death of this prince less afflicting to Mohabet Khân, on account of the friendship which had subsisted between them. The Khân therefore, who was now deserted by his followers, looking upon his affairs to be in a very bad condition, bent his course towards Jalor, and retired to the castle of Firmol, possessed by the Râjah of that name. As to his son Mîrza Beyrewer, he was taken in his way to Rantapur by Râjah Rottang, who resided at Bondi, and imprisoned by him.

Dekân invaded.

SHAH Jebân, who hitherto had hovered about Tâtta with 1000 horse and 40 elephants, passing through Tesal, Kbobagheren, and Aklisseren, at length arrived at Nasser Tormet, in the kingdom of Dekân ; where he was kindly received by the son of Mâlek Amber (C), lately deceased, f and furnished with new forces. Mean time, Khân Khânna had raised troops to go in pursuit of Mohabet Khân ; but, when all things were ready for his march, he was seized by death in the city of Debli, and was there buried. At the same juncture, Takont Khân, chief of the Omrâs at Dekân, for fear of the new king, with whom, when a prince, he had been always at variance, fled to Khân Jebân, governor of Brâmpûr. The Khân, encouraged by the desertion of this lord, as well as provoked by the Dekân king, who molested the frontiers of the Mogols ; leaves the widow and son of Soltân Parweïs under the care of Laskar Khân, and with 40,000 horse, and 40 elephants, marching towards Dekân, arrives at Ballagât. There, by intercepted letters of Koja Hisari to Abdol Khân, he discovered, that the latter a intended to desert to the king of Dekân: hereupon he confiscated his effects, and sent him in chains to Brâmpûr.

^a DE LAET, p. 276. HERBERT, p. 98.

(C) Herbert calls him Mîrza Alao'ddîn.

AFTER this Khân Jehân pursued his march; and, being animated by the retreat of the Dekânees, penetrates into the heart of the kingdom; where he destroyed many towns, which ^{The Moguls} had never before felt the rage of war. But, at length, the enemy, recovering their spirits, ^{defeat.d.} hemmed in his army in such a manner, that great numbers of them perished; partly by famine, and partly by the sword: so that he was compelled to make peace on very dishonourable conditions, and deliver up to the king of Dekân several towns of Hindûstân, in order to obtain liberty of returning safe to the place of his residence.

b THE same year, Jehân Ghîr, by flattering letters, recalled from Bengâl, Khânna Saïd Khân ^{Uzbek am-} (son of Mohabet Khân), and in his room appointed Mogreb Khân, to whom he gave the ^{bassadar.} command of 5000 horse: but this lord being drowned, by the overturning of a boat, in less than six months, Fayda Khân, another commander of 5000 horse, was appointed to succeed him. At this juncture there arrived at Labûr, Sîd Borka, ambassador from the king of Manauwer (D), having in his retinue Kadi Abdolrahîm, brother of Kadi Kalawn; who were both held in such great honour on account of their sanctity, that the people of Manauwer (Matwara'lnâbr) and Bokhâra, Samarkand, and Balk, revered them almost to adoration, and they were far more rich than the king himself. There were sent to meet him Koja Abdol Hassan, and all the other Omrâs of the court, excepting Affof Khân, who with great magnificence brought them to the king. Rich presents were mutually made on this occasion.

c The queen first sent Abdol Rabîm a gold basin, and drinking-cup, studded with jewels, valued at a lak of rupees. On the other hand the Kadi presented the king and queen with 500 beautiful dromedaries, 1000 fine horses, carpets, porcelain, and other things of great worth. Sîd Borkba likewise brought, as a present from his king, to Jehân Ghîr, 2000 horses, 1000 dromedaries, and other gifts, of greater price than had ever been offered at court during this reign.

THE queen, still resolved to be revenged, if possible, on Mohabet Khân, detached Amîr ^{Mohabet} Nûro'ddîn Kûlî, Abmed Bik Khân, and other Omrâs, with 15,000 horse, in pursuit of them. ^{Khân pursued:} But Affof Khân, either on account of the benefit received from him, or believing that the destruction of so great a commander would prove of bad consequence to the kingdom, persuaded Amîr to make slow marches: by which means Mohabet Khân, getting time to escape, fled first to Jessmîr, and from thence to Râjah Râna. However, his son Khânna Seïd Khân was kindly received at court by the king, and carried with him to Kashmîr: for all this, when Jehân Ghîr was informed, that the Khân had taken shelter with Râna, he wrote to the Râjah, commanding him to send his adversary out of his territories. Râjah Râna at first paid no ^{joins Soltân} regard to the king's order: but when he found that Jehân Ghîr renewed his command, ^{Khurm.} accompanied with threats, he writes to Shâh Jehân, who then resided at Ghinîr (a castle between Dekân and Oudegherad, on the borders of Nizâm Shâh's dominions), watching for an opportunity to take the field again, and in his letter recommends to him Mohabet Khân, suggesting, "of how great importance that lord would be to him in his then situation; he e "therefore advised him to forget those hostilities, which, by his father's command, he had committed against him; and send for a man who had received so many injuries from the queen. As to his fidelity, he assured the prince, it needed not be doubted, and that he himself would be his security." Shâh Jehân hesitated for some time, till at length Mohabet Khân himself wrote to him, and offered his service. The prince hereupon invites him to come; after which, having taken an oath to be true to him, he, with 500 Râspûts, repaired to Ghinîr, accompanied by Wazîr Khân, who carried with him 1000 new-railed horse; for Deyria Khân and other Omrâs had deserted Shâh Jehân's party.

MEAN time, the king, falling sick at Kashmîr, departed, in order to return to Labûr by ^{Jehân Ghîr} easy journeys; but, his illness increasing, he died at Bimber (E), in the year 1627. This is ^{dies:} the account of De Laet and Herbert: but according to the eastern authors, made use of by ^{Hej. 1037.} Mr. Frazer, the name of the place, where he departed this life, was Chirgarbisti. This happened on the 27th of October, when he was aged 58 solar years, one month, and twenty-nine days; whereof he had reigned twenty-two years and six days: the last eight of which he had been afflicted with an asthma.

JEHAN GHIR was a weak prince, and too much over-ruled by the beautiful Nûr Jehân, or ^{his character:} Nûr Mâbl, which made the last ten years of his reign very uneasy to him, and unfortunate to the empire. She had been wife to Sbîr Afkan, Khân of a Turkmân family; who came from Persia to Hindûstân in very indifferent circumstances. As she was exquisitely beautiful, of great wit, and an elegant poetess, Jehan Ghir was doatingly fond of her. The Omrâs, a who knew her mean original, were resolved to oppose all her schemes: but she persuaded the emperor to break through all rules, in order to advance her father, brother, and other relations, to the highest employments^a.

^f DE LAET, p. 281. & seqq. HERBERT, p. 101, & seqq.

(D) A mistake, doubtless, for Matwara'lnâbr, called at present Great Bukhâria.

(E) A town at the foot of the mountains of Kashmîr, towards Hindûstân. Bernier.

acts of cruelty: JEHAN GHIR was reckoned of a gentle disposition (F); yet, whether owing to ill advice, wine, or some share of fault in his nature, he often gave very cruel orders. Happening to catch an eunuch kissing one of his women, whom he had given over to converse with, he sentenced the lady to be put into the earth, with only her head left above ground, exposed to the burning rays of the sun; and the eunuch to be cut in pieces before her face. She lived in this dreadful torment twenty-four hours, and till near noon the next day, lamenting her head so long as she could speak. Although he would often debauch with wine (G) himself, yet b he would punish others severely, who were guilty of that vice. Sometimes he would command persons to be whipped most unmercifully for trifles; as he did one of his eunuchs for breaking a china cup, which he was ordered to take care of, and then sent him to China to buy another. At other times, in his capricious humours, he would condemn men to slavery, to have their limbs cut off, or to be put to death, without any just cause.

his charity. ON the other hand, he daily relieved many poor people, and behaved with great marks of duty to his mother; whose palanki he would often help to carry on his shoulders. He often visited the cells of religious men, whom he esteemed sacred, and would speak with great reverence of Christ (H): but his parentage, poverty, and crucifixion, did so confound his thoughts, that he knew not what to think of them. Our author, who was at the court of c this prince in 1618, tells us, that, a few years before, a juggler of Bengal, a country famous, he says, for wizards and witches, brought an ape to shew the king, who was fond of novelties; and, being told this animal could do several very strange things, sent for a company of boys, and gave a ring privately to one of them, to see if the ape could find it; which he did, by going to the boy who had it.

Story of a divining ape. AFTER Jehan Ghir had made some other trials, in which the ape performed his part with equal success, it came into his head to order the names of twelve prophets, or lawgivers (I), to be written on scrolls of paper, and put all together in a bag, to see if the creature could draw out the name of the true prophet. This done, the ape put in his paw, and pulled out the name of Christ. The experiment being made a second time, with new papers; and d the ape drawing out the name of Christ, as before, Mohabet Khân said it was some imposture of the Christians, although none were then present, and desired, that he might make a third trial: his request being granted, he put in no more than eleven of those names, and reserved that of Christ in his hand. The ape hereupon was ordered to put in his paw again; which he did, and drew it forth empty two or three times successively. The king demanding a reason for this, was answered, that hap'y the thing which he looked for was not there. The animal was then bid to search for it; when drawing out the eleven scrolls, one after the other, he, in a seeming indignation, tore them; after which, running up to Mohabet Khân, he caught that lord by the hand, in which the name of Christ was concealed: and the scroll being thereupon delivered to him, he opened and held it up before the king, without renting it, as he e had done the others. Upon this, Jehan Ghir kept the animal, calling it the divining ape, and gave the owner a pension on the occasion. This relation our author had from persons, who, though strangers to one another, as well as of different religions, yet all agreed in the several circumstances of it.

Jesuit's impostor: A LITTLE before the year 1616, the Jesuits house at Agri having been burned, among others, it was pretended by one of them, named Francisco Corsi, who resided there, that his wooden cross, set on a pole near the side of his house, was not consumed. Upon this, he carried the cross to court, and reported the wonder to the king. Prince Khûrm, who was present, and no favourer of the Christians, deriding the Jesuit, said it was one of his fabulous miracles; and proposed to put it to the trial, by throwing the cross into the fire, with this f condition, that if it did not burn, he, the king, and all the persons present, would turn Christians: but, in case it did, that the Jesuit should be burned with it. Corsi, not caring to put the matter to such a precarious issue, alleged, “that such an experiment would be to

^a FRASER'S Hist. of Nadir Shâh, p. 20. & seq.

(F) Roe says, he had a chearful countenance, and was proud by custom, not by nature; for that at night he was very affable, and full of easy conversation. Church. Collect. vol. i. p. 730

(G) One time Sir Thomas Roe had audience when he was in liquor: he spoke very kindly; but, being very drunk, fell at last to weeping, and into divers passions; yet kept him till midnight. Roe's Journ. Church's Coll. Trav. vol. i. p. 719.

(H) Roe says, he was bred up without any religion, was never circumcised, and in short an atheist; that he made a religion of his own out of all others; and went farther than his father Aklar, in assuming to be a greater prophet than Mohammed.

(I) As Mohammed and Ali for the Musulmans; Brahma, Bramma, Ram, and Permisar, for the Hindus, or Indians; Zerdâst for the Persians; Mohs for the Jews; and Christ for the Christians; with three others, whose names did not come to our author's knowledge.

- a "tempt God : that possibly the Deity never designed the persons present the infinite favour "to make them Christians ; or, if he did, the time of manifesting it might not be come : that,
 "as in this case, God might not shew a farther miracle (or grant that which was required),
 "his religion might suffer prejudice (K) thereby for ever after."

OUR author observes, that, although the Jesuits had liberty in those days to make converts and pretended in the Mogol's empire, and sent advice into Europe of mighty doings that way ; yet that, in conversions, reality, they had baptised but a very few, and those only such as became proselytes to relieve their necessities.

- JEHAN GHIR had three sons and two daughters (L) ; 1. Soltána Nissa Begum, or the lady-queen of women, born in 1586 ; 2. Soltân Kbofro (or Kbofraw), born in 1587 ; he died in 1622, and was father to Soltân Daur Bukhsb, or Bolaki. These two children were by the daughter of Râjah Ravandas, who poisoned herself in 1601 ; because the emperor did not take as much notice of her son, as he did of Soltân Khûrm. 3. Soltân Parvez (Parvêis, or Parweys), that is, the victorious ; he was born in 1589 ; his mother was the daughter of Kbojab Hassan. 4. Babâr Banû Begum, or the lady blooming princess, by the daughter of Râjah Kessoudas Rattor, in 1590. 5. Soltân Khûrm, or the joyful prince, by the daughter of Râjah Oudesung, in 1692 ; who afterwards succeeded his father, and took the name of Shâh Jehân. Jehân Ghîr's children.

- JEHAN GHIR had also Soltân Jebân Dâr, or the possessor of the world ; and Soltân Shebriyâr, that is, the friend of the city ; twins by a concubine, born in 1605. As this last was married to the daughter of Nûr Jebân, by her first husband Shîr Afkân Khân, she endeavoured to secure the empire to him ; but without success, as we shall see presently.

* TERRY'S Voy. to India, sect. 25, & 30. ROE ap. Churchill's Collect. Trav. vol. i. p. 731, & seqq.
 " FRASER, ubi supr. p. 21.

(K) A very good reason, but not to the advantage of his religion ; which, if from God, it must be presumed God would secure from harm.

(L) Terry, sect. 28. says he had five sons and one daughter, whose names and their significations he mistakes : 1. Soltân Kûbsurrû, the prince with the good face, to express his beauty : 2. Soltân Peram, or prince of the Pleiades, for Parweis : 3. Soltân Karûm, or prince of bounty : 4. Soltân Shabar, or the prince of fame : 5. Soltân Tâkt, or the prince of the throne, as born on his father's ascending the throne. This must be Soltân Jebân Dâr.

C H A P. VII.

The reign of Shâh Jehân.

S E C T. I.

From his ascending the throne, to the civil war among his sons.

- a AS soon as the breath was out of Jebân Ghîr's body, Nûr Jebân, the widow-queen, sent Soltân Bo- her son-in-law Shebriar before towards Labûr, in order to ascend the throne, and did laki crowned. her utmost endeavours to gain the army to her party : but Afsof Khân, joined by Koja Abdol Hassan, Eradet Khân, and other Omrâs, opposed his sister's design, and confined her. At the same time, to prevent tumults arising on account of the interregnum, they, to blind the people, placed the crown on the head of the young Soltân Bolakbi (A) ; who, suffered this ceremony to be performed much against his will. In the interim, letters were dispatched in haste to Shâh Jebân, in which they assigned reasons for what they had done, and intreated him to come with all expedition, and assume the throne. After which, they took measures for bringing to order Soltân Shabriyâr ; who, without the queen's assistance, could do nothing himself.

b THE prince, though 600 Indian miles distant, received these letters in six days time ; upon Shahriar the reception of which, being encouraged by Mohabet Khân, he set out with 7000 horse ; usurps the and, by the way of Surât and Kambaya, arrived at Ahmed abâd ; where Saffi Khân, the prince's throne. enemy, was governor : but, as he then lay sick in bed, Naarha Khân, and the other Omrâs, immediately deserted to Shâh Jebân. Mean while, Afsof Khân, with king Bolakbi, proceeded to Labûr ; and Shabriyâr, who had usurped the kingdom, being deprived of the queen's help,

(A) Herbert says, this was done at Dehli ; that prince being then thirteen years of age. According to Fra- ser, Shâh Jebân being then at a great distance, and the three young princes, his sons, Dara Shikowb, Soltân Sujab, and Aureng Zib, in the hands of Nûr Jebân ; Afsof Khân and Eradet Khân, to disconcert her scheme, and protract the time till Shâh Jebân arrived, proclaimed Soltân Daur Bukhsb, or Bolakbi.

in

in a few days, distributed the treasures, both of the king and the Omrâs, amounting to ninety a lak of rupees, among the soldiers, in order to secure them to his interest. But all this did not avail : for, on the approach of Affof Khân, with an army, Shîr Kôja and Amîr Bîk, his principal generals, whom he had sent before with 20,000 horse, basely deserted him. Upon this he fled to Labûr, and fortified that city : but Affof Khân coming up with a greater force, the castle was taken, and Shahbriyâr, falling into the hands of the king's troops, was deprived of sight by means of poison.

Khurm
destroys both.

MEAN time, Shâh Jêhân proceeded on his journey ; and, being joined by all the Râjahs, b governors of provinces, and generals, his forces increased at length to 30,000. In the kingdom of Nagor, the most potent Râjah Kessing came to him of his own accord ; as did Khân Azem, near Azmîr : and not far from Agrâ he was met by the Râjah Jessing, Mansing, and Zitterzing, with several great lords. These happy omens seemed to secure the crown to him without dispute : but still despairing to possess the kingdom in peace long, as Shahbriyâr, Bolakhi, and his uncle's sons (B) were alive, he sent Râjah Babâdr (C) to Labûr, with a cruel order to put those princes secretly to death. In eight days he got to that city by post ; and the unhappy victims being delivered up to him by Affof Khân, he strangled them all by night, and buried them in a garden near the deceased king (D). Shâh Jêhân being arrived at Agrâ, he repaired to a palace which he had built in a delightful place on the side of the Jemna ; where he remained till the lucky day was come, on which he was to enter the castle, and sit in the royal throne ; at which time he was saluted by the grandees by the name of Soltân Shahâbo'ddîn Mohammed (E), and crowned with great magnificence. c

New troubles
arise.

FIFTY days after the coronation, came Affof Khân, with the dowager queen and her daughters ; likewise all the rest of the late king's women, together with Sadok Khân, Eradet Khân, and Mîr Gomley, and delivers the royal treasures to Shâh Jêhân ; who, on the other hand, confers on Affof Khân the whole authority under himself, and loaded him with honours.
But, while the king imagined he had surmounted all difficulties, and had firmly established his throne by the death of the innocent princes, new troubles arose in several parts of the realm ; which made him very uneasy. For the Uzbeks broke into the province of Kâbul, with numerous forces. Sheuf Almûk endeavoured to keep the kingdom of Tâtta for himself :
Râjah Youk, taking up arms, had the boldness to infest all Hindûstân, and the road leading to Brâmpûr, with his robberies : lastly, two counterfeit Bolakhis gave him no small vexation. d
So that the new king was obliged to assemble all his forces, augment them considerably, and send bodies of troops into various parts of his dominions. In this state things continued till the end of the year 1628^b.

Peace restored.

ALTHOUGH the empire of Hindûstân was in the most flourishing condition that ever it had been, when Shâh Jêhân ascended the throne ; yet, by the distractions which ensued, it might have become a prey to its neighbours, in case it had been attacked. But Persia, on the west, was at that time governed by a weak, indolent prince. The Uzbek Tatars, to the north, were too much divided among themselves, to give the Mogols any disturbance : nor had they any thing to fear from the Indian princes, on the east ; who, besides being separated by vast mountains and deserts, had neither power enough, nor genius, for war. It was this situation e of the bordering kingdoms, which secured Shâh Jêhân against invasions from without, and gave him an opportunity to suppress the troubles, which threatened his dominions from within.

The Portu-gueses attacked.

As soon as the affairs of his empire were returned to a settled state, he resolved to make war against the Portugueses, who, before his reign, had been very formidable in the Indies ; but of late were become contemptible, by the losses they had received from the growing powers of the English and Dutch. His chief motive to this war was the Portugueses refusing to assist him (F) in the time of his rebellion against his father : which gave him such a hatred to Christianity, whereto he was no friend before, that he made a vow to root it out. This prince, after the loss of a battle, being retired to a fortified place, some leagues from Dâka, Michael Rodriguez, who commanded the Portuguese troops at Ougli (or Hugli), made a visit f to the Soltân, and endeavoured to comfort him under his affliction. Hereupon Shâh Jêhân requested his assistance, with soldiers and artillery ; promising, that if ever he ascended the throne, he would reward the services received from his nation. Rodriguez, instead of granting him the aid demanded, had the boldness to tell him, “ that he should be ashamed to serve a rebel :

^b DE LAET's India Vera, p. 288, & seq. HERBERT's Voy. p. 106, & seq.

(B) These were the three sons of Soltân Daniel, (brother to Jêhân Ghîr) named Gurshâp, Teyomars (perhaps rather Keyomars) and Hoyshang or Hûshang). Frazer.

(C) Herbert calls him Bandor.

(D) Herbert says, he was interred at Sekander, three kos from Agrâ. Tavernier relates these matters differrently.

(E) Shahâbo'ddîn signifies the bright star of religion, as Shâh Jêhân imports king of the world. He was born on Wednesday, the fifth of January, 1592, and sat on the throne in Agrâ, the first of February, 1628, being then 36 solar years and 28 days old. Frazer's Hist. of Nadir Shâh, p. 24.

(F) Bernier says, the reason was their conniving at the Portuguese pirates of Rakan, and buying his subjects from them from slaves. Toum. ii. p. 125.

a “rebel : and that to take up arms against his father, was taking up arms against God himself.”⁹⁹ The Portuguese commander did what was still more provoking ; for he joined the party of Soltân Parweis ; and the victories, which this prince obtained over his brother, were in no small degree owing to the Portuguese infantry, who fought under his orders.

It is said, that the Soltâna Tâje Mâhl (G), wife of Shâh Jehân, helped much to incense ^{Hugli taken from them.} him against the Christians in general, and the Portugueses in particular. She not only inherited her aversion to Christianity from her aunt Nûr Jehân, but was greatly exasperated against the Portugueses, for having given a retreat to two of her daughters, who had been converted by the missionaries to the Romish faith. The emperor, pushed on by the hatred of his queen, and his former oath, ordered Kassim Khân to lay siege to Ougli. That general, being arrived before the place, threatened to raze it to the ground, unless Rodriguez would pay him the sum which he demanded. The Portuguese commander, being in no condition to hold out against all the forces of the empire, which were sent against him, submitted at last to the Mogol general's demand, though much against his will ; and, could he have foreseen what was to happen, would doubtless never have complied with the proposal : for Kassim Khân had no sooner received the money, than, instead of drawing off, he laid close siege to the town (H), and battered it furiously with his artillery ; which is the principal force used in taking places in Hindûstân. The Portugueses made but an indifferent defence, and when they saw a breach opened in their walls, the fear of an assault obliged them to surrender at discretion. Above five or six hundred of them were sent to Agrâ ; among whom were some Jesuits and Augustine friers.

c OUR author takes it for granted, that this disaster was a judgment of heaven on the colony ^{Their profligate behaviour.} of Ougli for the sins of the Portugueses. Unluckily for them, the Ganges, which is scarce ever dry, had at that juncture so little water, that the barks which they had on the river, and might have secured their retreat, could not get out of port. Being arrived at Agrâ, several of them turned Mohammedans to preserve their lives ; while others suffered death rather than renounce their faith (I). Not one of them had been left alive, if Tâje Mâhl had not deceased before their arrival at that capital : for she had made a vow, that they should all be cut to pieces. No-body lamented her loss but Shâh Jehân himself ; who owed the throne to her artifices and credit. In return for that benefit, he built her a sepulchre ; which nothing in the Indies can equal for magnificence. The missionaries, after many fruitless attempts to make them renounce their religion (K), were released and sent to Goa, through the intercession of an Armenian and a Venetian ; who were in great favour with Shâh Jehân.

AKBAR had removed the court from Debli to Agrâ, and Jehân Ghîr from Agrâ to Labûr : ^{Jehân abad built.} but Shâh Jehân brought it back from Labûr to Debli (L), and restored this antient capital to its first lustre ; building at a vast expence a new city, which he called Shâh Jehân abad, or the city of Shâh Jehân, and to which the old one serves as a suburbs. His principal care was employed about making two gardens in his palace ; in which incredible sums were expended (M) : and in this delicious place it was, that he forgot the warlike inclinations which possessed him in his youth, to give himself up intirely to pleasure ; which had its continual round in music and dancing, plays and entertainments. No person had a greater share in his graces, e than a poet, who invented new feasts and diversions ; for the emperor and his harâm delighted most in buffoon farces. Sometimes he pleased his eyes with the cruel sight of gladiators, who fought before him ; and certain days of the week were set apart for the chace.

BUT Shâh Jehân's principal pleasure was that of women ; which he carried to a much ^{Shâh Jehân's debauchery :} greater height than any of his predecessors. Not content with a multitude of queens, concubines, and slaves ; which are the three different classes of women in the harâm, he took away the wives of the principal officers of his court. Those of Jaffer Khân and Khalil Khân gave great ⁹⁹ MENOUCI's Hist. Gen. Emp. Mog. par Catrou, p. 214, & seqq. BERNIER's Mem. Emp. Mog. part ii. p. 125.

(G) Manouchi, or his editor, writes Taige Mahal. He likewise calls this monarch, corruptly, Shâh Jaham ; writes Cham, or Kham, for Khân, and the like.

(H) Bernier owns, that the Mogol got from them all the money he could ; but that the reason why Ougli was besieged, was the Portugueses being indiscretely obstinate, in refusing what was demanded of them : but he does not mention what that demand was. Tom. ii. p. 125.

(I) Bernier mentions nothing of these martyrdoms. He says, the handsome women were shut up in the harâm ; and that the old women and others were distributed among the Omrâs : that the young lads were circumcised, and made pages ; while most of the men renounced their faith, through the terror of threats to be thrown to elephants, or the allurements of promises. Tom. ii. p. 125, & seq.

(K) Bernier reckons the friers among those who renounced their faith ; saying, indeed, that some of them persisted in it : and that the missionaries of Agrâ, who still remained in their houses, found means to get them conveyed away. Tom. ii. p. 126.

(L) This was on the 29th of March, 1647, being the 20th of his reign. Frazer's Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 24. So little do we find in European authors relating to this prince, either before or after this remove, for ten years more ; that is, till the time of the rebellion of his sons, scandal to the whole empire. They went every day to the palace, contrary to the custom of the ladies in that country, one of them in the morning, the other in the afternoon; which gave occasion to the Fakirs, who always croud the entrance of the palace, to make the severest reflections. Shâh Jebân's love for women made him lavish in his expences upon them, and magnificent in his apartments. It is reported, that he presented Khalil Khân's lady with a pair of slippers, whose value was scarce to be estimated. From thence afterwards he took occasion to pass a jest upon her husband in a public assembly; but it is said that jest cost him dear, and caused Khalil to desert afterwards to Aureng Zib.

(M) The castle and palace which he built at Debli, or Shâh Jehân abad, with the gardens and other conveniences on the banks of the river Chun (or Jemna), cost above 50 laks of rupees, or 625,000 pounds. Frazer, ubi supr. p. 25.

and excellent government.

THE famous gallery, which has been talked of so much in Europe for its immense riches, had its rise from the same vein of gallantry. This magnificent apartment was said to have been designed for a female dancer, sprung from the dregs of the people, and of no extraordinary accomplishments. But, however addicted to pleasure, Shâh Jebân never neglected to administer justice, with an exactness and care surpassing all his predecessors. He was, as it were, the Solomon of the Mogols; and they relate decisions of his, pronounced with so much wisdom, that the memory of them will never be lost in the Indies. He never pardoned corrupt judges, and took great care to clear his dominions of robbers. Before his reign, the roads were so infested with them, that trade was greatly interrupted. The method which he took to deliver the empire from that plague, was to make the officers of justice responsible for all the robberies which were committed in their respective districts. Thus the warehouse of the Dutch, at Surât, having been broken open in the night, he obliged the governor to pay them the full value of the goods, which they had lost.

A gallant
Omrâ.

THE justice which Shâh Jebân rendered to his people, somewhat lessened the contempt in which voluptuous indolent princes are usually held. However, they sometimes lost their respect for him. An Omrâ of his army having presumed to sit in his presence, contrary to the custom of the empire, the king deprived him of his employments. Next day the disgraced officer appeared in the hall of audience with the same confidence as he had done the day before. Then sitting down in Shâh Jebân's presence, "Now, my lord," says he, "since I am no longer in your pay, I may use that freedom which belongs to every man who is independent." The emperor, far from being offended at the liberty which the Omrâ took, praised his resolution; and, restoring him to his posts, augmented his appointments. As this facility in the emperor to pardon often occasioned the courtiers to speak to him with too much freedom, so his faults at length drew on him the contempt of the people, and caused his own sons to rebel against him.

Presumptuous Râjah.

THERE is a remarkable instance of want of respect to him, in one of the Râjah, or Indian princes, who, with their troops, mount the guard before the palace, every week in their turn. This Râjah, named Amarfin, having neglected to be upon duty on the day he was to serve, at length, by the persuasion of his friends, repaired to his post. Hereupon one of the secretaries of state reproached him, in the emperor's presence, for making slight of the service: which the Râjah taking as a great affront, he drew his poniard, and stabbed the minister to the heart, so near to Shâh Jebân, that his cloaths were stained with the blood. As so great a piece of insolence could not go unpunished, Amarfin was pierced with a thousand wounds: but his Râjapûts, with impunity, revenged their master's death, by putting to the sword all the people, whom they met with about the palace and in the city.

Villainy of
astrologers,

THE weakness of the government gave occasion to other Râjahs to act at pleasure. Champet, one of the most daring and powerful among them, refused to pay the tribute. As an example of this kind would prove, if followed, of the most dangerous consequence, it was advised by the astrologers, without whose opinion nothing is done at court, that Shâh Jebân himself should take the field against the rebel; and, the more strongly to oblige him to pursue their counsel, declared, that, during such a month, the residence at Debli would prove fatal to the person who there held the first rank. The credulous emperor, to avoid this prediction, departed from the city with an army, and left the Kutwâl governor in his absence. Sadul Khân, who commanded the Mogol troops under his majesty, marched towards the territories of Champet; who advanced to meet the enemy. The general, whom the emperor's presence had rendered somewhat fearful, perceiving the Râjah advantageously posted, judged it better to dislodge him by fraud, than attempt it by force. Pursuant to this resolution, he, by a messenger, not only promised him pardon for his offence, but also to augment his governments, provided he would retire out of the territories of his sovereign. Champet, confiding in the general's word, retired accordingly: but had no sooner quitted his post, than he found the Mogols at his heels; and he must inevitably have been cut to pieces, with all his forces, if the impenetrable forests and craggy mountains had not protected him from the perfidy of the emperor. Shâh Jebân returned to Debli, covered with shame, for having violated his faith, without gaining his point against the Râjah; who, as soon as the enemy had turned their backs, took the field anew, and pillaged the lands of the empire without opposition.

no verify predictions.

^d MENOUCI, ubi sup. p. 218, & seqq.

a However, he was pleased to think, that the expedition had preserved his life: for he found the Kutwâl dead, whom he had left in his stead; the astrologers, to verify their prediction, having procured his physician to poison him; and by this piece of villainy established themselves more than ever in the favour of Shâh Jêbân.

WHEN this prince grew old, his passions changed with his age, and avarice succeeded to Shâh Jêbân's prodigality, which surpassed all his other vices: for as soon as his officers, both civil and ^{avarice:} military, were grown rich by oppressing the people, he stripped them of their ill-gotten wealth, and enriched himself by the spoil. The better to secure the immense treasures, which he had hoarded up, he caused two large subterraneous vaults, supported by marble pillars, to be made under his palace; in one of which he kept his gold, and in the other his silver.

b Likewise, to prevent those precious metals from being carried away, he had them formed into huge wedges, of a bulk unfit to serve in commerce. Shâh Jêbân spent great part of the day in these caverns, to feed his eyes with the sight of that prodigious heap of riches, under pretence of the coolness which the place afforded. His covetousness became so great, that, to save the expence of maintaining his sons at court, suitable to their dignity, he gave them (N) governments to live on, without any appointments, but what they could draw from the people: and thus ran into the same error in politics, which had given so much inquietude to Jêbân Ghîr: who, by bestowing distant provinces on his children, during his life-time, put it in their own power to rebel against him: and although Shâh Jêbân's own conduct had verified this truth, yet avarice hindered him from taking warning by his father's indiscretion.

c SHAH Jêbân never had more than twelve children (O) by all his wives: for the Mogols ^{his children.} make no scruple to prevent prolificness in their women. Of these only four sons and two daughters grew to the estate of men and women. In regard all the intrigues of the court, and civil wars, which troubled the reign of this monarch, concern those princes and princesses, as the true sources from whence they sprung, it will be proper to give our readers some account of each.

THE eldest son was named Dara Shêkowh, that is, in pomp like Darius. This prince was ^{Dara Shêkowh.} gallant in conversation, witty in repartees, exceeding civil and liberal; but had so good an opinion of himself, that he thought nobody capable to give him counsel, and those, who offered to advise him, were sure to be treated with injurious language. He was besides easily d fired, and in his passion would threaten and affront the greatest Omrâs. It is true, all passed over like a flash of lightning: but those insults generally leave stings behind, which are never to be drawn out. He pretended in private to favour every kind of religion, in order to gain the professors to his interest; particularly that of the Indians, to several of whose Brâmmans he gave considerable pensions; which proved fatal to him in the end.

SOLTAN Sujâb, the second son, was much of his brother Dara's humour; but more ^{Soltân Sujâb.} reserved in his conduct, and dexterous in managing his affairs. He made friends under-hand by means of presents; which he heaped on the principal Omrâs and Râjahs: but too much indulged his pleasures with women, among whom he spent whole days and nights in feasting; which cooled the affection of many towards him. As the Persians, or their children, had the e greatest power at the Mogol's court, and held the most important places, he, to gain them to his party, declared himself of the Shiyâb sect.

AURENG ZIB had not the gallantry and surprising presence of Dara; for he appeared serious ^{Aureng Zib.} and melancholy: but was more judicious, and understood the world much better. To take off any suspicion of his aiming at the throne, he for a long time made profession to be a Fakîr, a kind of religious mendicant; yet all this while he was making a party at court, but with such art and secrecy, that it could hardly be perceived. He had the address also to gain the affections and esteem of Shâh Jêbân, who could not conceal it, and judged him capable of reigning. This gave no small jealousy to Dara, who could not forbear saying sometimes; Of all my brothers, I fear none but this Namazi, that is, this bigot, this great praying f man.

MORAD BUKHSH, or Bokhsh, that is, the giver of desires or wishes, was the youngest and ^{Morad Bukhsh.} least judicious of the four brothers. He cared for nothing but mirth and pastime; to drink, hunt, and shoot: yet he had some good qualities. He was very civil and liberal. He despised cabals; glorying in it, that he kept nothing secret; and boasting openly, that he trusted in nothing but his arm and his sword. In short he was very brave; and, had this bravery been accompanied with some share of conduct, he would have ascended the throne.

^e MENOUCI, ubi supr. p. 227, & seqq. ubi supr. part i. p. 10, & seqq.

^f FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 28, & seqq. BERNIER,

(N) So Manouchi; but Bernier says, he did this against his judgment; fearing, as they were all grown up, married, and making parties to secure the crown, that if he kept them still at court, they would cut one another's throats before his eyes.

(O) Menouchi says but seven; other authors speak of no more, because only seven were living when the wars began.

Jehân Ara
Begüm :

THE name of Shâh Jehân's two daughters were Jehân Ara Begüm, and Royshn Rây Pegüm.^a Jehân Ara Begüm, or the princess ornament of the world, is the same who is called by Bernier, and other European authors, Begüm Sabeë. She was very beautiful, as well as a great wit; and so passionately beloved by her father, that it was rumoured he was intimate with her; and pleaded in excuse a decision of the Mohammedan doctors, that a man might eat of the fruit which he had planted. But if this had been so, it is not likely that he would suffer a musician of the palace to be her favourite, wink at their meetings, and load him with benefits. However that be, her father placed great confidence in her, gave her charge to watch over his safety, and was swayed by her in the most weighty affairs. As she had great pensions, and received large presents from all quarters, so she was of a generous disposition. This princess always espoused the interest of her brother Dara; which inclination to serve him was kept up by a promise which he had made, to marry her as soon as ever he came to the crown.

her gallantry.

BUT neither this promise, nor her gallant within the palace, could restrain her inclinations from rambling abroad. It is said, that she found means to introduce a handsome young man, of no great quality, into her apartment; but, as it was very difficult to conceal this from so many watchful and jealous eyes, the matter came to the ears of Shâh Jehân; who resolved to surprise her, under pretence of a visit. The princess, seeing her father come so unexpectedly, had no more time than to hide the unfortunate gallant in one of the great caldrons made to bathe in. The emperor, who suspected it, after entertaining her for a pretty while, as he used to do, at length began to find fault with her dishabille, and told her she ought to bathe oftener. At the same time, he, with a countenance somewhat stern, ordered a fire to be made under the caldron; nor would leave the place till the eunuch had brought him word that the unhappy lover was dispatched.

Another instance.

SOME time after she took other measures, and chose for her steward Nâzer Khân, a young Persian lord, one of the handsomest and most accomplished Omrâs in the whole court, of which he was the darling; insomuch, that Shâh Hest Khân, Aureng Zib's uncle, proposed marrying him to the princess: but Shâh Jehân took that proposal very ill; and soon after, being informed of the intrigues carried on between that nobleman and his daughter, resolved to get rid of Nazîr Khân. This resolution he put in execution a few days after, by means of betel (P), which he gave him, by way of doing him honour. The young lord, little imagining that he had taken poison, left the assembly very jocund: but the drug was so strong, that he died in his paleki, before he reached his own house.

Royshan rây
Begüm.

ROYSHAN RAY, or Rushn rây Begüm; that is, the princess of an enlightened mind; called by our writers, Reveherrera, and Roshenara Begüm (Q); though she was not so beautiful and witty as Begüm Sabeë; yet she was handsome enough, as well as lively, and hated pleasure no more than her sister. As she was strongly attached to the interest of Aureng Zib, she was of course an enemy to Dara, and Begüm Sabeë. This was the reason that she had no great riches, nor any considerable share in the affairs of state. However, as she was in the harâm, and wanted no spies, she could not but discover many important matters; of which she gave intelligence to her favourite brother^e.

Princes provided for.

SHAH Jehân, having determined, as before observed, to remove his sons at a distance from court, and one another, sent Soltân Sujâb viceroy into Bengal; Aureng Zib into Dekân; and Morâd Bukhs to Guzerât; giving to Dara the kingdoms of Kâbul and Multân. This last, being the eldest, and designed for the throne, stirred not from court; where he was permitted by his father to issue out orders, and sit on a sort of throne, a little lower than his; so that it seemed as if there were two kings in the realm. For all this great indulgence shewed to Dara, and the extraordinary submission paid by that prince, yet Shâh Jehân still harboured some diffidence; fearing, above all things, the Morsel: and as he thought Aureng Zib more fit for reigning, it was said that he always held a secret correspondence with him^b.

Amîr Jemla

AN account will elsewhere be givenⁱ of the attempt made by Aureng Zib to surprise the king of Golkonda, by means of his general Amîr Jemla, who, to avoid the king's displeasure, had revolted from him; and of the peace, which was at last concluded between the two states; supposed to have been brought about by the intrigues of Dara, and Begüm Sabeë; from the apprehension, that, if Aureng Zib should conquer Golkonda, he would become too powerful. Pursuant to this peace, Amîr Jemla withdrew, with all his family, his effects, ⁱ See hereafter, book x. ch. 4. sect. 2.

^a BERNIER, ubi supr. part 1. p. 20, & seqq. MENOUCI, p. 230.

^b BERNIER, p. 29, & seqq.

(P) A regale given at visits to chew.

(Q) Bernier writes Raveherrera, if there be not some mistake in printing; and Menouchi, Roxanara; the x being used for the English sh. She was indeed the fifth of Shâh Jehân's children, but not younger than Aureng Zib, as Menouchi makes her. This author speaks also of a third, and youngest daughter, at the time of the rebellion, called Mernisa Begüm. This seems to be the same with Hûro'l Nissa Begüm, or the princess most angelic of women: but she was the eldest of all Shâh Jehân's children, and died some years before.

troops,

^a troops and artillery, marching with the prince towards Dekân. In the way they took Bider (or Beder) one of the strongest fortresses in all Viziapûr; and, on their arrival at Dawlet abad, contracted so intimate a friendship, that they could not live a day without seeing one another twice. This union began to give a new face to affairs in all those parts of India; and laid the first foundations of the sovereignty of Aureng Zib.

^b AMIR JEMLA, who had the art to get himself called often to court, always went with rich presents; and still urged Shâh Jehân to make war against the kings of Golkonda, Viziapûr, and the Portugueses. To allure him the more effectually to take his advice, he presented him with that great diamond found in the Golkonda mines; which is esteemed matchless. The emperor, whether dazzled with the precious stones, or to have an army in the field, to be a check, as some thought, on Dara, listened to this counsel: for he found this prince active to make himself potent, and to have ill-treated several of the prime Omrâs, because they did not approve of his measures; particularly the Wazîr Sado'llah Khân, whom he caused to be poisoned, to the great affliction of Shâh Jehân, who passionately loved him, and considered as the greatest statesman the Indies had ever produced. The Wazîr being very powerful, Dara saw that he was in a condition to be arbitrator of the empire in case his father should de cease. Besides, being an Indian, some, envious of his greatness, insinuated to the prince, that he entertained numerous troops of Pâtans, in divers places, with a design to make himself, or his son, king; at least to expel the Moguls, and restore the Pâtans.

^c DARA did all he could to hinder the sending an army to Dekân, as he saw it was to give strength to Aureng Zib: but when he found he could not prevail, he at length consented, on condition that his brother should remain at Dawlet Abâd; and Amîr Jemla, prosecuting the war by himself, should leave his family at court, as a pledge of his fidelity; which condition, at length, that general agreed to, on the emperor's promising, in a little time, to send to him his wife and children. Accordingly he set forward from Agra, with a very gallant army; and entering Viziapûr, without stopping, besieged a strong place, called Kaliân^k.

S E C T. II.

Account of the civil wars, till Shâh Jehân's deposition.

^d THE affairs of Hindûstân were in this situation, when Shâh Jehân fell dangerously ill (A). This prince, who, though past seventy years of age, was much addicted to venereal pleasures, took so strong a potion to invigorate nature, that it brought on a suppression of urine, which had like to have killed him. All the empire was soon alarmed at this news; and all the princes were quickly in motion, raising troops in their several governments, and writing letters to make friends. Some of these falling into the hands of Dara, he shewed them to the king, in order to incense him against his brothers: but Shâh Jehân, more afraid of the accuser than the accused, only took care to guard against them; and, 'tis said, even wrote to Aureng Zib; which Dara hearing of, resented with menaces.

^e MEAN time Shâh Jehân lingering under his distemper, it was reported that he was dead; which threw the court into great disorder, and caused the shops in Agra to be shut up for several days. On this advice, his sons no longer concealed their designs, but made open preparations for war, each in his own defence: well knowing that they had nothing for it, but the throne or death; and that whoever should be conqueror, would rid himself of all the rest, as their father had before done of his brothers.

^f SOLTAN Sujâb, who had amassed great treasures in Bengâl, by ruining some Râjahs, and drawing great sums from others, first took the field, with a puissant army; and, in confidence that all the Persian Omrâs were in his interest, boldly marched towards Agra; giving out by the way, that Dara had poisoned his father, and he was resolved to revenge his death. Shâh Jehân, by Dara's advice, wrote to inform the prince that he was better, and forbid him to advance: but Sujâb, assured by his friends at court that the king's sickness was mortal, ceased not to continue his march; pretending he knew his father was dead, and that, if alive, he was desirous to kiss his feet.

AURENG ZIB, at the same time, takes the field (B) in Dekân; and altho' forbidden like- wife to proceed, returns the same answer as Sujâb had done. But his forces being small,

^k BERNIER, p. 42, & seqq.

(A) According to the Indian authors, as reported by Frazer, p. 29. Soltân Dara Shikowb, endeavouring to possess himself of the empire, confined his father, Shâh Jehân, towards the end of the year 1656; which probably was in the time of his sickness: but then he could not be above 64 or 65 at most.

(B) As soon as Aureng Zib had notice that Dara had confined his father, he began to make preparations for war, in favour, as he gave out, of Morâd Bukhsh; to whom he wrote from Aureng abad, in Dekân, to join him at Eugene (or Eujin), the capital of Mâlwa. Frazer. Hist. Nadir Shah, p. 29.

and his treasury low, he made use of two artifices to put himself in a condition to march. a First, he writes to his brother, Morâd Bukhsh, in Guzerât, a dissembling letter, importing, that as Dara was a Kâfir, or idolater, Sujâb a Refezi, or heretic, and himself a Fakîr, there was none who could pretend to the succession, but he, Morâd: that therefore, if he would promise only to let him live quietly in some corner of his dominions, when he should come to the empire, there to spend his days in devotion, he would forthwith join him with his troops, and help him to gain the throne: that, in the mean time, he had sent him 100,000 rupees (C); and advised him to come, with all speed, to seize on the castle of Surât, where the treasure of the country was lodged. Morâd Bukhsh, who was neither very rich, nor powerful, was overjoyed at this proposal: and having, by the credit of his brother's letter, soon raised money and men, sent 3000, under the command of Shâh Abbâs, a valiant eunuch, b to besiege Surât.

gains Amîr
Jemla;

AURENG ZIB's second contrivance was to draw in Amîr Jemla, who was still before Kaliân, to join in his measures. With this view, he sends his eldest son Soltân Mahmûd, who had married the king of Golkonda's daughter, to persuade the Amîr to repair to Dawlet abad: but Jemla, suspecting his errand, told him that he was assured Shâh Jebân was alive; and that, besides, all his family being in the power of Dara, he could by no means assist Aureng Zib. This prince, not discouraged by the first repulse, sent his second son, Soltân Mauzum, who backed his father's letter with so much dexterity, that the Amîr, no longer able to resist, pushed the siege of Kaliân vigorously; and, forcing the garrison to surrender, with the choicest of his troops set out for Dawlet abad. As soon as he arrived, Aureng Zib complimenting c him with the title of Bâba, and Bâba ji, Father, and Lord Father, intreated him not to fail him, at this critical juncture, with his forces and money. To remove the objection about the danger of his family, he promised putting him under a sham arrest, and confining him in the castle, that Dara might think the Amîr had no hand in the plot^a.

sets forward;

AMIR JEMLA having consented to this stratagem, he was formally arrested, and confined in a chamber. His army, alarmed at the detention of their general, ran to his rescue; but, as the whole was counterfeited, they were soon appeased; and, by distributing money, back'd with great promises, in case of success, the troops both of the Amîr, and of Shâh Jebân, were induced to lift under the banner of Aureng Zib. This done, the prince marched (D) d towards Surât, where Morâd Bukhsh had met with greater resistance than he expected: but hearing in his march, that the governor had surrendered the place, he sent to congratulate his brother on the occasion; acquainted him with the affair of Amîr Jemla; and desired him to haste to join his army, which was advancing to Agra, by way of Brâmpûr.

joined by Mo-
râd;

AFTER all, Morâd Bukhsh neither found so much treasure as he expected at Surât, nor had much reason to boast of taking the place: which, tho' defended with no regular fortifications, opposed his forces for above a month; and would never have been reduced by him, but for the Dutch, who cast the besieged into such a consternation, by blowing up part of the wall with a mine, that they immediately surrendered (E). However, this success, being wholly ascribed to the valour of Morâd Bukhsh, by the people of those countries, greatly promoted his affairs (F). Yet the eunuch Shâh Abbâs, a man of good sense as well as courage, advised e him not to confide too much in the specious promises of Aureng Zib, nor be too hasty to join him; but rather to fortify Surât which was a very good post, and see what turn things were likely to take, before he proceeded any further. But that prince, blinded with an excessive ambition to reign, and having neither much forces nor treasure, was prevailed on, by his brother's continual letters, and protestations of sincerity, to haste to the place of rendezvous, where he was received with all outward demonstrations of joy and affection.

march towards
Agra.

THE two armies, being thus joined, set forward together; and, during the whole march, Aureng Zib treated his brother with the utmost respect; never addressing him, either in public or private, but with the title of Hazerat, that is, King, and Majesty. This behaviour took-off all suspicion from Morâd Bukhsh, who never reflected on the late expedition against Golkonda; f and that he, who discovered so much eagerness to conquer a powerful kingdom, was not of a temper to live and die a Fakîr. The news of this conjunction of the two brothers alarmed not only Dara, but Shâh Jebân himself, who knew the subtil genius of the one, and the courage of the other. It was to no purpose to write to them to turn back, and that he was in a way

^a BERNIER, p. 49, & seqq.

(C) Or 12,500 l. a rupee being about half an English crown.

(D) Aureng Zib set out from Aureng abad the 4th of Feb. 1658, with 25,000 horse, having sent his son Soltân Mohammed (Bernier's Mahmûd) before him on the 24th of January.

(E) On the 29th of December, 1659, the mine threw down part of the wall; yet the city held out still for above 40 days. Tavernier. Trav. Ind. l. ii. c. 2. p. 109.

(F) When Morâd, who was then at Abmed abad, squeezing money out of the people, heard that Surât was taken, he got a throne, and was proclaimed king there of all Hindûstân, coined money, and appointed governors of cities. Tavern. Trav. Ind. l. ii. c. 2. p. 109.

a of recovery. They answered, as Soltân Sujâb had done before, on the same occasion; and said the letters were counterfeited by their brother Dara^b.

WHILE Shâh Jebân is in the greatest anxiety, to see his children going to destroy one another, Sujâb ^{defeated} without having it in his power to prevent it, preparations are made by Dara, to oppose the two armies, which were in full march, on different sides, to Agra. As that of Soltân Sujâb was most advanced, the first care was to detach troops to oppose him. The command of these was given to Soleymân Shikowh, eldest son of Dara, a prince about twenty-five years of age, handsome, and of good parts, generous, and beloved of all, especially his grandfather, who considered him as his successor, rather than Dara. Yet as Shâh Jebân was desirous that matters should be accommodated, rather than come to extremity, he gave the young prince, for his companion, an antient Râjah, named Jesseyn, with secret orders not to fight, if it was ^{by Soleymân} possible to avoid it; and to advise Sujâb to retire: but this prince, fearing lest Aureng Zib ^{Shikowh} should get possession of the capital before him, and his nephew being urged by a desire of signalizing himself, there was no possibility of restraining the two armies, which, as soon as they came in sight, towards Elabâs, began to cannonade each other. The first onset was very sharp and obstinate on both sides: but at length Soleymân Shikowh pressed Sujâb with such vigour, that he put his troops into disorder; and at length obliged him to fly. So that if Jesseyn, and the Pâtan Delil Khân, who followed the Râjah's measures, had seconded the prince, 'twas thought the whole army would have been overthrown, and Sujâb himself in danger of being taken: but Jesseyn conforming himself to the emperor's orders, the Soltân had time to retreat, leaving behind some of his artillery. As this defeat gave great reputation to Soleymân Shikowh, it lessened that of Soltân Sujâb, and exceedingly cooled the inclinations of the Persians towards him.

PRINCE Soleymân, who had received advice, that his uncles Aureng Zib, and Morâd Bukhsh, ^{Soleymân} were advancing towards Agra; well knowing that his father Dara had no great stock of pru- ^{tuons Luck} dence, but many secret enemies, after he had pursued Soltân Sujâb for a few days, turned back, with a resolution to make what haste he could to the capital. This certainly was the wisest course which could be taken; and could he have gotten thither time enough, in all probability Aureng Zib would never have ventured a battle against such very unequal forces as he must then have had to deal with. But Dara's bad fortune would not permit things to happen conformably to the wishes of the prince, his son.

MEAN time, Aureng Zib having, to the great surprize of the court, crossed the river of Aureng Zib Brâmpûr, and all the difficult passages between the mountains, some troops were sent in haste ^{advances;} to the river Eujenes (G), under the command of Kâssef Khân, a renowned general, but not much inclined to Dara; and Jessom seyn (H), a potent Râjah, not inferior to Jesseyn, and married to the daughter of that Râjah Râna, who was so puissant in the time of Akber. Before their departure, Shâh Jebân gave them the same orders as he had done to Jesseyn, when he sent him with Soleymân Shikowh against Soltân Sujâb; nor did they fail in their march to send several times to Aureng Zib, and Morâd Bukhsh, to persuade them to turn back, altho' to no purpose: for the princes detaining the messengers, advanced the faster; and appeared with their forces, on a rising ground, not far from the river, much sooner than was expected.

As the Eujenes was then fordable, it being the time of the great heats, and the army of the confederate princes much fatigued with the march, Aureng Zib played upon the enemy ^{comes to} with his cannon, to prevent their passing the river; which if they had done, they might easily have routed the tired troops: but they were content, according to their orders, to remain by the river-side, and hinder the other from crossing it. This, however, they could not do; for Aureng Zib, after he had let his army rest for two or three days, commanded them to pass the river, under cover of all his artillery, which began to play. Kâssef Khân, and the Râjah, did not fail to answer them with theirs. The combat was obstinately maintained at first by the extraordinary valour of Jessom seyn; for Kâssef Khân, though a famous warrior, gave no great proof of his courage on this occasion. Nay, some accused him of treachery, in having ordered the powder and ball to be buried by night in the sand; for after two or three discharges, there was no more to be found^c.

For all this, the confederate army was much embarrassed by rocks in the middle of the river, ^{defeats the} and the high banks on the other side; but at length Morâd Bukhsh cast himself into the stream, ^{enemy.} with so much resolution and force, that there was no resisting him. He passed over, and with him a good part of the army, which made Kâssef Khân to give back; and put Jessom seyn in

^b BERNIER, ibid. p. 62, & seqq.

^c BERNIER, p. 73, & seqq.

(G) Rather Eujin, on which stands the city of that name, the capital of the province of Mâlwa. It may be pronounced Vîn, Oujin, Eujin.

(H) Frazer says the two brothers at Eugene defeated Kâssef Khân, and the Mâha Râjah Jessvint Jung. Mâha Râjah signifies the great prince, in the Sanskrit, or Brâhman language; a title given by the Mogols to the Râjahs of Marwar, of the Ratter family. The capital of their country is Jahîjâr, 176 kofs (or 264 miles) distant from Dehli. The Rajapûts of Marwar are reckoned the best soldiers in India. Frazer. Hist. Nadir Shah, p. 30

Magnanimous
women.

great danger of his person: for presently he found the whole body of the enemy upon him; and but for the extraordinary bravery of his Râjapûts, who were almost all killed about him, he must have been a dead man. Out of 8000, or more, not above five or six hundred remained; insomuch, that he durst not return to Agra, after so great a loss. On the other hand, his wife refused to admit him, after his defeat and flight. When she heard he was near the castle, notwithstanding the brave resistance he had made, instead of sending an officer to console him, she ordered the gates to be shut, and not to suffer this infamous man to enter; adding, "that he was not her husband; and that she would never see him: that the son-in-law of the great Râna could not have had so low a soul; but would have imitated the virtue of the illustrious house into which he was ingrafted: in a word, would either have vanquished or died." A moment after, she commanded a pile of wood to be laid, that she might burn herself; saying, "that they had abused her; and that Jessom seyn must needs be dead." Then returning to her first temper of mind, she fell into a passion, and broke out into a thousand reproaches against him. She continued in these transports for eight or nine days, without being able to resolve to see her husband: till, at last, her mother brought her, in some degree, to herself; assuring her, that as soon as the Râjah had a little refreshed himself, he would raise another army, to fight Aureng Zib, and repair his honour at any rate.

Dara enraged.

WHEN Dara was informed of what had happened at Eugenes, he fell into such a rage against Kâssef Khân, that had he been present, it is thought he would have cut off his head. He was likewise so transported against Amîr Jemla, whom he considered as the principal cause of the misfortune; that had not Shâh Jebân pacified him, by representing the improbability of the case, it is thought he would have killed his son Mohammed Amîr Khân, or sent his wife and daughter to the market-place of prostituted women. Mean time, the victory swelled the hopes of the two confederate princes to no small degree; and Aureng Zib, still more to animate his soldiers, bragged openly, that he had 30,000 Mogols at his devotion, in Dara's army; and the sequel shewed, that there was some foundation for what he said. The army rested for a few days on the banks of that sweet river: during which time Aureng Zib wrote to all his friends, and tried to get intelligence from the court. After this he marched on towards Agra, but slowly, that he might have time to take proper measures at this juncture^d.

His great
army.

SHAH Jebân, perceiving the resolution of the two princes, would fain have prevented the last decisive battle, for which he saw Dara was preparing; but knew not how to compass it. As he was in this son's power, he was obliged to commit to him all the forces of the empire, and command all officers to obey him. His army consisted of little less than 100,000 horse, and 20,000 foot, with 4000 pieces of cannon (I); besides an incredible number of servants, victuallers, and other followers of camps, who are often put by historians among the number of combatants. Although this army was very brave, and strong enough to cut in pieces two or three of such as Aureng Zib had with him, consisting at most of 35,000 or 40,000 men, tired with long marches; yet scarce any body presaged well for Dara, as they knew the chief Omrâs had no affection for him; and that the troops, which he could most confide in, were with his son Soleymân Shekowb.

Slights advice.

FOR this reason, his friends, and Shâh Jebân himself, advised him not to hazard a battle, at least till his son arrived with his troops. What was still more prudent, the emperor offered, infirm as he was, to be carried into the field, to interpose his authority for accommodating matters. This, doubtless, was a very good expedient: for the two princes would never have dared to fight against their father; and if they had, they must have smarted for it: since all the Omrâs, as well as soldiers, however averse to Dara, had a great affection for the emperor, and would have fought resolutely in his defence. But Dara was deaf to all proposals of that nature: as he had the king, the treasure, and, in short, all the power then in his own hands, he was resolved not to give it up, or share it with his brothers (one already defeated, and the other two, in his opinion, not far from ruin) as he must have done in case of an accommodation.

The armies
meet.

RESOLVING likewise to have all the glory of this preconceived victory to himself, he ordered the army immediately to take the field, without waiting for his son. When he went to take leave of his father, the emperor embraced and blessed him; but bid him, if he lost the battle, take heed of ever coming into his presence. This made no impression on Dara, who, taking horse, seized the passage of the river *Tebembel, about twenty miles from Agra; where he fortified himself, and expected his enemy: but the subtil Fakîr, who knew by his spies that the passage there was very difficult; instead of attempting it, prevails on Champet, a rebellious Râjah, mentioned before, to let him pass thro' his territories, to a place where the river was very shallow. Then breaking up his camp in the dark, only leaving some tents to ^d BERNIER, p. 85, & seqq.

(I) 'Tis in the original fourscore thousand: perhaps it ought to be but 400.

* Rather perhaps Tchem'el; in English characters, Chembel.

- a amuse Dara, he marched, night and day, thro' the woods and hills, conducted by the Râjah himself, with such expedition, that he was on the other side of the Tehembel before Dara knew any thing of the matter. This obliged Dara to quit all his fortifications, to follow his enemies: who advanced, with great diligence, to gain the river Jemna, there to post themselves securely, and expected their brother: in effect, they encamped at Samongher, now called Fateh abad, or the place of victory, five miles short of Agra. Shortly after, Dara arrived, and pitched his tents on the bank of the same river, between the capital and the army of his competitors. During the three or four days which were spent without action, Shâh Jehân wrote several times to acquaint Dara, that Soleymân Shikowh was near at hand; and advised him to wait his coming: but that prince answered, that, before three days were
- b past, he would bring Aureng Zib, and Morâd Bukhsb, bound hand and foot, to the foot of the throne^c.

- IMMEDIATELY after this, he began to draw up his forces in order of battle. He caused Order of all his cannon to be placed in the front, and chained together, to shut the passage to the battle. cavalry. Behind the artillery he ranged light camels, carrying each a small piece, the size of a double musket, with a man behind to manage it; and behind the camels stood the greater part of the musketeers. The rest of the army (consisting of several nations, armed with bows and arrows, swords and half-pikes) were divided into three bodies. The right wing was committed to Khalilullah Khân, with 30,000 Mogols, under the great Bakshis (K), or master of the horse, with 30,000 Mogols under his command: the left wing was given to
- c Rustam Khân Dakni, a very renowned commander, in conjunction with the Râjahs Skatresal and Ramsfeyn Rowtla. On the other side, Aureng Zib, and Morâd Bukhsb, ranged their forces in much the same order; only in the midst of the troops of some Omras certain field-pieces were concealed, according to the method of Amir Jemla, and with no bad effect. There were likewise in both armies men placed here and there with Bans, a kind of grenado, fastened to a stick, which may be cast a great way thro' the cavalry; whose explosion terrifies the horses, and even kills sometimes. All this cavalry wheel about very easily, and draw their arrows surprisingly quick (L); one archer being able to shoot six, before a musketeer can discharge his piece twice. They likewise keep very close in troops, under their respective officers, especially when going to fight hand to hand. However, our author does not think
- d that this way of drawing up an army is to be compared with the European manner, when well executed.

- THE signal being given, the artillery began to play, and the arrows to fly thro' the air, The fight when a sudden storm of rain interrupted the combat. As soon as the tempest was over, the begins. cannon began to roar afresh; and then it was that Dara appeared: who, mounted on a proud elephant of Seylan, commanded the engagement to be general; and advanced himself, in the center of the cavalry, directly towards the enemy's artillery. The confederate forces gave him a very warm reception, killed a great number of men about his person, and put into disorder not only the main body, which he commanded, but also the other bodies of horse which followed him. But as he still kept his ground, without giving back, and made signs
- e with his hands for his troops to advance, the disorder soon ceased, and they began to move forward again: yet they could not reach the enemy, without receiving another volley; which caused a greater disorder than the first. However, the prince still persisting in his resolution, and encouraging his soldiers to stand the brunt, they rallied again; and pressing vigorously forward, without loss of time, forced the enemy's artillery, broke the chains, and, entering their camp, routed their camels and infantry.

- IN short, Dara overthrew every thing which he met with on that side, and opened a Aureng Zib's passage for the horse, which followed him: then it was that the enemy's cavalry facing him, dispress. a fierce combat began on both sides, first with arrows, and then with swords. But at length
- f Dara pushed his way with so much vigour, that the enemy, no longer able to withstand him, turned their backs, and fled. Aureng Zib, who was not far from them, seeing this great disorder in his troops, without being able to remedy it, caused the main body of his best cavalry to advance, to try if he could make head against his victorious brother: but it was not long before this body also was forced to retreat, in great confusion, in spite of all which Aureng Zib could say or do to hinder it. On this occasion the resolution of the prince was seen: for although he saw that almost his whole army was in a flying posture, and Dara, notwithstanding the roughness of the ground, seemed ready to rush in upon him, when he had scarce 1000 (M) men standing; yet, for all this, he lost no courage, but called to his

^c BERNIER, p. 95, & seqq.

(K) This post was given him in place of Daneshmend Khân; who not being well affected by Dara, because of a launch to Shâh Jehân, resigned. He was afterwards our author Bernier's Aga.

little execution; more of them being lost in the air, or broken on the ground, than hit. p. 113.

(M) Our author was told by some, that there was not half the number.

(L) However, our author says those arrows do but captains, saying, Courage, my old friends, God is ! What hope is there in flying ? God is ! And, a to shew he was determined not to stir from the place where he was, ordered chains to be fastened to the feet of his elephant ; which would certainly have been done, but that they all declared their resolution to live and die with him ^f.

Dara successful.

MEAN time Dara, tho' still at a good distance, endeavoured to advance upon Aureng Zib, in order to encounter him ; as the only means to assure him of the victory. But while he was retarded in his march, as well by the difficulty of the way, which was full of holes, as the resistance he met with from those disordered squadrons of the enemy's horse, which covered all the high and low grounds through which he was to pass, he perceived that his left wing was in great disorder. At the same time he was informed, that Rustam Khân, and Shatresale Râjab, were killed ; that indeed Ramseyn Rowtlé had forced his way thro' the enemy, but, b having advanced too far, was now hemmed in by them, and in great danger. Dara, on these bad tidings, changed his design of making towards his brother, that he might go succour his left wing ; and this it was which saved Aureng Zib from inevitable ruin.

Morâd Bukhsh's bravery.

WHEN Dara got up with his recoiling troops, he renewed the battle, and, at last, routed those of the enemy ; yet not so totally, but that there still remained something which resisted and stopped him. Mean time, Ramseyn Rowtlé pushed on so vigorously, that he wounded Morâd Bukhsh ; and came so near, that he began to cut the girdles of his elephant, in order to make him fall down. But the undaunted prince, all wounded as he was (N), and pressed by the Râjapûts, who were round about him, knew so well to take his time ; that although, besides defending himself, he was to cover with his shield a son scarce eight years old, sitting c by his side, yet he sent an arrow shot so luckily at Ramseyn Rowtlé, that it made him fall dead to the ground.

Khalil's treachery.

DARA soon heard the sad news of this accident : but as, at the same time, he understood also that Morâd Bukhsh was in imminent danger from the Râjapûts, who fought with fury to revenge their master's death ; he resolved to rush thro' the opposing squadrons, and put an end to the battle on that side, by overpowering with numbers the half-spent prince. But here again his bad fortune interposed, and hindered him to make sure of his victory : for Khalilo'llab Khân, who commanded the right wing (which was able to have defeated the whole army of Aureng Zib), to revenge an affront given him by Dara (O), not only stood idle all the while of the battle, under pretence that he had orders not to fight, excepting in the last d extremity ; but at the time when he saw Dara turning to fall on Morâd Bukhsh, with a few men, rode hastily up towards the former ; and cried out, " God save your majesty, you have " obtained a victory — Come down from your elephant, and take horse ; what remains more " to be done, than to pursue these runaways ? "

Dara overthrown.

DARA, blinded by these flattering words, as if the advice had been true and sincere, descended from his elephant, and took horse. But I know not, saith our author, whether there passed one quarter of an hour before he perceived the Khân's treachery. As soon as the army, who always had their eyes on the prince, beheld him no more on his elephant, they imagined he had been slain by some secret enemy about his person ; which surmise seized them with such a panic, that, to escape the hands of Aureng Zib, they all disband and fly. A e sudden and strange revolution ! Aureng Zib, by holding out firm for one quarter of an hour, upon his elephant, beholds the crown of Hindûstân upon his head ; and Dara, for having come down a little too soon, sees himself hurled from the throne. Thus fortune takes pleasure, adds Bernier, to make the gain or loss of a battle, and the decision of a great empire, depend upon nothing ^g.

by an over-sight.

AURENG ZIB, encouraged by this wonderful success, did not fail to improve it by all the art and courage which he was master of. Khalilo'llab Khân is presently with him, offering his service and troops. The crafty Fakîr receives him with joy : but, to keep up appearances, carries him to Morâd Bukhsh, whom, at the same time, he extols for his valour, ascribing to him all the honour of the victory ; and, styling him king, pays him the submission of a subject. f Mean while, he labours night and day for himself, writing letters continually, to gain the Omrâs ; by which means, and the interest of Shâh Hesh Khân, his uncle, the subtlest pen in Hindûstân, and an old enemy to Dara, for an affront received, his affairs were much advanced.

Runs to Agra.

In the interim Dara hastes to Agrâ ; and tho' Shâh Jehân was dissatisfied with his conduct, yet he sent an eunuch to tell him, " that he was troubled for his misfortune ; that his affairs " were not yet desperate, since there was a good army with his son Soleymân ; that he should go " to Dehli, where he should find money, horses, and elephants ; and that he knew how to " chastise Aureng Zib." Dara was then so dismayed and sunk with his misfortune, that he had not power to speak to the eunuch, or courage to depute any one to his father : but after

^f BERNIER, p. 107, & seqq.

^g Ibid. p. 117, & seqq.

(N) Bernier says he was shot in his body with five arrows.

(O) It is said by others, to have been given by Shâh Jehân himself. See before, p. 86.

a sending several times to his sister, Begum Sabeel, went away at midnight, taking with him his wife, daughters, and grandson, Sepe-shekowb, attended by no more than three or four hundred persons.

While Dara was on his way to Debli, Aureng Zib left nothing undone to improve the Soleymán advantages he had already gained. As he knew that his brother could yet place some hopes Shekowb in the victorious army of Soleymán Shekowb, he wrote letters upon letters to Rajah Jesseyn, and Delil Khán, the chief generals of that young prince, to assure them that Dara was quite undone; that his whole army had submitted to him; that he had sent orders every-where to seize him; that Sháh Jehán could never recover; in short, that if they understood their own interest, they would become his friends, and, seizing on Soleymán Shekowb, bring him to the camp. Jesseyn was much perplexed how to act on this occasion. He feared to lay hands on a royal person, which was always attended with mischief; besides, he knew that prince Soleymán would rather die, than suffer himself to be taken in that manner. Therefore, after consulting with Delil Khán, he went to the prince's tent, who had sent for him, on the news of his father's defeat; and shewing him Aureng Zib's letters, told him that he ought not to trust in Delil Khán, Dawd Khán, or the rest of the army; and therefore had best retire to the mountains of Serenágher, there to remain with the Rajah of that country, till he saw how things went. fies also.

The young prince, perceiving by this discourse of Jesseyn, that he had no more reason to trust in him than the rest, immediately departed, with a good number of Mansebdárs, and others, who were his friends, leaving the army in a great surprize. The Rajah, not content with distressing him in this manner, was so mean as to send some troops, under hand, to fall on his baggage: who besides took an elephant laden with rupís of gold (P), which caused many of his followers to abandon him; and this desertion induced the people of the country to attack his men, for sake of plunder. However, at length he arrived with his wife and children at Serenágher, whose Rajah (Q) received him with great honour; and promised to assist him with the utmost of his power. Let us now return to see what is doing at Agra^b.

THREE or four days after the battle of Semongher, the victorious princes advanced to a little garden near the gate of the capital, a small league from the fortress; whither Aureng Zib's Zib sent an eunuch to salute the Sháh Jehán, with protestations of affection and submission. He likewise expressed sorrow for what had passed; but laid all the blame on the ambition, and evil designs, of Dara. Sháh Jehán, no less a dissembler than his son, whose secret passion for reigning was known to him, yet declared to the eunuch, "that he was well satisfied with Aureng Zib's proceedings, and pleased at his success." But, instead of causing himself to be carried thro' the town, and assembling all his Omrás, which might still have been done, he goes about to outwit Aureng Zib, who was his master in craft; and attempting to draw him into a snare, is taken himself. With this view he sent an eunuch also to this son, to let him know "that he was sensible of the ill conduct, and incapacity, of Dara; that he passionately wished to embrace him, Aureng Zib, for whom he had always a particular affection; and therefore desired he would come and see him, to advise what was proper to be done at the present juncture."

AURENG ZIB knew very well that his father was not to be trusted on this occasion; especially as Begum Sabeel, his enemy, as well as sister, was continually about him: and it was reported, that several of those lusty Tartarian women, who serve in the harám, were armed, to set upon him as soon as he should enter. But altho' he was resolved not to hazard a visit to Sháh Jehán, yet he spread a rumour that he intended to go see him the next day. Instead of performing his promise, which he put off from time to time, he made it his business to sound the chief Omrás; which he did to so good purpose, that at length, having concerted the proper measures, he sent Soltán Mahmúd, his eldest son, to the fortress, under pretence of waiting on Sháh Jehán, in his name: but that daring prince was no sooner entered, than he fell upon the guards at the gate; whilst a great number of men, who were ready at hand, rushed in with fury, and made themselves masters of the wall.

SHAH Jehán, astonished to find himself fallen into the trap, which he had prepared for his son, sent to Soltán Mahmúd, promising, on the Korán, to make him king, in case he would serve him on that occasion. And certainly, if Mahmúd had laid hold of the offer, and Sháh Jehán taken the field, nobody doubted that all his great Omrás would have followed him; and that Aureng Zib, if he had dared to fight against his father, would have been abandoned

^b BERNIER, ibid. p. 139, & seqq.

(P) According to Tavernier, Soleymán went with the Rajah Rozeep into the territories of this latter, to levy me, carrying with him five millions of rupís (or 625,000 l.), which the Rajah seized; and then the prince fled to the kingdom of Serenágher. Rajah Rozeep seems to be Jesseyn.

(Q) Tavernier calls him Nakti Ráwa.

by all the world; nay, possibly, by Morâd Bukhsh himself (R). However that be, Shâh Mahmûd, whether fearing to be detained, or to play tricks with his father, would never hearken to any thing, nor enter into the apartment of Shâh Jehân; answering, “that he had “no orders to wait on him: but was commanded to bring his father the keys of all the “gates of the fortrefs; that so he might with safety come and kiss his majesty’s feet.”

in the palace;

SHAH Jehân was near two days before he could resolve to deliver up the keys: but finding that all his people, who were upon guard at the little gate, disbanded by degrees, and that all his power was gone, he surrendered them (S); with an order to tell Aureng Zib, “that “he should come forthwith, if he was wise, for that he had most important matters to say “to him.” But Aureng Zib was too cunning to commit so gross a mistake: instead of that, he made his eunuch, Eibar Khân, governor of the fortrefs; who presently shut up Shâh Jehân, together with Begum Sübeeb, and all his women; causing divers gates to be walled up, so that the emperor might not be able either to write, or speak, to any-body, without permission.

under pretence

MEAN time, Aureng Zib wrote to his father a short letter, which he shewed to every-body before he sealed it. Wherein he told him, “that, for all the great protestations of “affection, which he had made to him, and contempt expressed for Dara, yet he knew,
“from good hands, that he had sent him two elephants, laden with rupees of gold, to renew
“the war; that therefore, in reality, it was not he, but Dara, who had imprisoned him, “and was the cause of all his misfortunes; that if it had not been for Dara, he would have “waited on him the first day of his arrival, and paid him all the dutiful respect which he “could have looked for from a son; that for the rest, he begged pardon for what had happened, “and desired his majesty would have a little patience; promising that as soon as he had “disabled Dara from executing his evil designs, he would come himself, and open the “gates to him.”

of assisting Dara.

CONCERNING the supply of money mentioned in the letter, our author had been told by some, that Shâh Jehân sent it to Dara, the same night on which he left Agra; that it was discovered to Aureng Zib by his sister, Rawshnara (or Râshn ray) Begum, who had also imparted him the plot for setting on him with the Tartarian women; and that this prince had intercepted some letters of Shâh Jehân to Dara. On the contrary, others affirmed there was no such thing; and that the letter was contrived only, in some measure, to justify his proceedings against his father. However that was, as soon as Shâh Jehân was shut up, almost all the Omrâs were in a manner necessitated to go and make their court to the two confederate princes. ’Tis certain, not one of them had the courage or gratitude to make the least attempt in behalf of their king, who had raised them from the dust, and even slavery itself, to advance them to riches and honour: excepting some few, as Danishmend Khân, and others, who joined with neither side, all the rest declared for Aureng Zib. Necessity, as we have said, drove them to this: for they having no lands to subsist on themselves, but only pensions, which the Great Mogol can take away at pleasure; so that they may be ruined in an instant, without having credit to borrow one farthing.

The Omras
join him.

Resolves to seize

AURENG ZIB having thus made himself sure of Shâh Jehân, and all the Omrâs, took what sums of money he thought fit out of the treasury: then leaving his uncle, Shâh Heft Khân, to govern the city in his absence, he went away, with Morâd Bukhsh, to pursue Dara. The day on which the army was to march out of Agra, the friends of this last prince, especially his eunuch, Shâib Abbâs, who knew that excessive cringing is usually a sign of imposture, counselled him, that since he was acknowledged as king by every body, and even Aureng Zib himself, he should let his brother go in pursuit of Dara, and stay with his troops about Agra and Dehli. If he had followed this advice, ’tis certain he must have greatly embarrassed Aureng Zib (if not intirely frustrated his designs); but confiding entirely in his fair promises, backed by oaths on the Korân, he never would suffer the least suspicion to enter his breast.

Morâd
Bukhsh

WHEN they arrived at Matûra, three or four days journey from Agra, Morâd’s friends endeavoured again to persuade him to be on his guard; assuring him, that some mischief was upon the anvil; that they had notice of it from several quarters; and desired that he would forbear going to visit his brother, only for that one day. But the prince was deaf to all precautions (T)! and, as if urged, rather than dissuaded, by the advice of his friends,

¹ BERNIER, p. 140, & seqq.

(R) Perhaps this is carrying the supposition a good deal too far; since Shâh Jehân, for many years, waged war against his father; and even fought to meet him with his forces.

(S) Tavernier says, being at first enraged, he attempted to escape, and killed some of the guards, who opposed him; but not one of his servants offered to help him.

(T) According to Tavernier, Morâd Bukhsh, perceiving his error in trusting his brother too much, sent to him for half of the treasure which he had seized, that he might retire to Guzerât: but was still deluded by fair promises; and went, at his invitation, to the entertainment, although he believed it would be the last day of his life.

a went that very night to see Aureng Zib, and even stayed to sup with him. As soon as he was come, his brother, who expected him, and had already laid the plot with Mir Khân, and three or four more of his most intimate commanders, was profuse of his compliments and submissive behaviour, so far as gently to wipe the sweat and dust off his face with a handkerchief.

MEAN time the table is served: they sup, and then, as usual, fall into conversation. At length there is brought a huge bottle of Shirâz wine (U), with some of Kâbul, for a debauch. At the sight of which, Aureng Zib, who affected to appear very regular and exact in observing the law of Mohammed, riseth from table; and having respectfully intreated his brother to be merry with the officers present, withdrew, as if to repose himself a little. Morâd Bukhsh, who loved a glass of wine very well, plied it so heartily, that at length he grew drunk, and fell asleep. As this was the thing which they all looked for, some of his servants, who were in waiting, were ordered to withdraw, under pretence of letting their master take his rest without noise. When they were gone, his sabre and poniard were taken from him; after which, it was not long before Aureng Zib came himself, and awaked him, by hitting him roughly with his foot^k.

WHEN the prince began to open his eyes a little, his treacherous brother throws off the mask, with this surprising reprimand: "What means all this," saith he; "what a shameful and odious thing it is, that a king, as you are, should have so little share of discretion, as thus to make himself drunk! what will the world say both of you and me? Take this infamous man, this drunkard," continued the hypocrite, "tie him hand and foot, and throw him into that room, there to sleep out his wine." This order was no sooner given, than it was executed: for five or six persons immediately seized him, and without regarding his complaints and outcries, fettered his hands and feet. However, this affair could not be managed so secretly, but that some of his people, who were about the palace, came to have tidings of it; and, making a tumult, would have entered forcibly, had not Allab Kûli, one of his chief officers, and master of his artillery, who had been gained before-hand, threatened, and made them draw back.

WITHOUT delay, emissaries were sent through the whole army, to calm this first commotion; which otherwise might have proved dangerous. These men made the soldiery believe, that what had happened was nothing like what had been reported: that the whole matter was, Morâd Bukhsh had gotten very drunk; and having in that condition railed at every body, and even Aureng Zib himself, it was thought necessary, for fear he should do any mischief, to keep him apart: but that the next day they should see him abroad, after he had slept off the fumes of the wine." Mean time the presents walked about all night among the chief officers of the army: their pay was immediately augmented; and they had great promises made them. In short, as there was scarce any one who had not for a long time before expected some such event, it was no great wonder to find almost every thing quiet the next morning: so that the night following, this poor unhappy prince was shut-up in a little close house, such as used to be placed on the back of elephants to carry women in; and, without any stir or noise, conducted to Selimajor, a little old fortress at Debli, situated in the middle of the river.

AFTER all had been thus pacified, excepting the eunuch Shâh Abbâs, who gave a good deal of trouble, Aureng Zib received the whole army of his brother into his service, and went after Dara; who marched apace towards Labûr, with an intent to fortify himself in that city, and draw thither all his friends. But Aureng Zib followed him so briskly, that he was forced to retreat from thence to Multân; which he also abandoned for the same reason. His indefatigable enemy pursued him, though in the great heats, with so much eagerness, that he often advanced almost alone two or three leagues before his army, drank bad water, and slept under a tree, with his head resting on his shield, like a common soldier. It is thought, that if Dara, at his departure from Labûr, had cast himself into the kingdom of Kâbul, as he was advised, he would there have found above 10,000 warriors, designed for a guard against the Aughâns (or Afghâns), the Persians, and the Uzbeks; and that the governor Mohabet Khân, one of the most potent Omrâs, as well as the most antient, in all Hindûstân, who never had been a friend to Aureng Zib, would probably have embraced his party with all that militia. Besides, being then, as it were, at the gate of Persia, and the country of the Uzbeks, he might have drawn assistance from both those regions, as Hamayûn had formerly done. But Dara, instead of following that good advice, went towards Sindi, and entered the fortress of Tâtta Bâker, that strong and famous place seated in the midst of the Indus.

^k BERNIER, p. 153, & seqq.

(U) Shirâz, capital or Pârs, or proper Persia, famous for excellent wine, of great strength.

returns to Agra:

AURENG ZIB, glad to find that his brother had taken this route, rather than that of Kibul,^a was content to send after him 7 or 8000 men under Mir Bâba, his foster-brother, and turn back himself for Agra: as well for fear lest, in his absence, some of the Râjahs should attempt to free Shâh Jebân from his confinement, as that Soleymân Shekowb, or Soltân Sujâb, should approach too near that capital.

great escape,

and resolution.

IN his way to Labûr he had a great escape: for being, according to custom, advanced some miles before his army, of a sudden, he beheld the Râjah Jessyn coming against him, accompanied with 4 or 5000 of his Râjapûts; and, knowing him to be zealous for Shâh Jebân's interest, was sufficiently surprised, as he now had it in his power to strike a master stroke, and, by seizing the rebel son, draw the father out of prison. Nor is it known whether this Râjah had not some such design; for he had marched with such extraordinary speed, that Aureng Zib thought him still at Debli. But what may not resolution and presence of mind effect? The prince, without any alteration in his countenance, marches directly towards the Râjah; and, as far off as he could see him, makes signs with his hands for him to approach; and calls to him aloud, flattering him with the title of Râjah-ji and Bâba-ji, Lord Râjah and Lord Father. When Jessyn was come to him; "I expected you," said he, "with great impatience: the work is done: Dara is lost: he is all alone. I have sent Mir Bâba after him, from whom he cannot escape." Then, taking off his necklace of pearls, he put it about the neck of the Râjah; and, the sooner to get rid of him handsomely (for he wished him far enough); "Go," said he, "with all the expedition you can to Labûr, and wait till I come: for my army is somewhat tired; and I fear that otherwise something sinister may happen there. I make you governor of the place, and put all things into your hands. For the rest, I am extremely obliged to you for what you have done with Soleymân Shekowb.—Where have you left Delil Khân? I shall find my revenge of him—Make all possible dispatch—Salâmed Bâshed. Farewell¹."

Dara in Guzerât.

DARA, being arrived at Tûtta Bâkar, strengthened the place with a good garrison of Pûtans and Sayeds. He had for cannoners several Franghis, as Portugueses, English, French, and Germans, who had followed him on the great promises he had given them, in case his affairs prospered. He staid there only two or three days: then, leaving a dexterous eunuch governor, with the greater part of his treasure, which he had still plenty of, he marched away with 2 or 3000 men only, descending the Indus towards Sindi: from whence, crossing the territories of the Râjah of Kâche (X), he arrived at Abmed abâd, capital of Guzerât. The governor Shâh Navâz Khân, father-in-law to Aureng Zib, whether surprised, or for want of courage, though he had a strong garrison, instead of opposing Dara, thought best to surrender, and received him honourably. In short, he managed him afterwards with so much dexterity, that this indiscrete prince trusted himself to his power, and communicated to him his designs. He even shewed Shâh Navâz the letters which he received from Jessom Seyn, and other friends, who were preparing to come to him: although every body told him, and his correspondents warned him by letters, that his competitor's father-in-law would betray him.

Aureng Zib
marches

to Kajowh,

HOWEVER, Aureng Zib was greatly surprised when he heard that Dara was in Abmed abâd,^e where he knew the discontented party, which was very numerous, would resort to him, as well as his friends. On the other hand, he saw it was not safe for him to follow his brother into the countries of Jessyn, Jessom Seyn, and other Râjahs; lest, by removing too far from Agra and Shâh Jebân, Soltân Sujâb, who had already passed the Ganges at Elabâs, with a strong army, should advance on that side; or, at least, Soleymân Shekowb should descend from the hills with the Râjah of Serenâgher. In this perplexity he at length concluded it best to leave Dara for a time, and march against his brother Sujâb. This Soltân was come to encamp at a village called Kajowh (Y), on the side of a great talab, or reservoir of water; and Aureng Zib posted himself by a small torrent, a mile and a half short of him. Being impatient to end this war, he, at break of day, went and attacked Sujâb with an effort scarce to be imagined. Amîr Femla likewise, who arrived on the day of battle from Dekân, fearing Dara no longer, because his family was more in safety, did on this occasion also employ all his vigour, courage and dexterity. But, as Soltân Sujâb was very well fortified in his post, and had a fine train of artillery, advantageously placed, it was not possible for Aureng Zib to force his camp, and drive him from those waters: on the contrary, he was repulsed himself several times, which threw him into great perplexity.

against Soltân
Sujâb:

SOLTÂN Sujâb, in defending himself only in his post, without coming out into the plain, acted very prudently: for he knew that Aureng Zib could not stay long where he then was; and that the hot season would oblige him to turn back to the torrent, for the conveniency of

¹ BERNIER, p. 160, & seqq.

(X) Tavernier calls him the Râjah of Kack-nagara. Kuchnaggen, as Hamilton names it, is a province and town in Guzerât, towards the Indus.

(Y) According to Frazer, the battle of Kajong, near Agra, was against Dara; who, after his defeat, fled towards Labûr.

a water; in which case he resolved to fall upon his rear. Aureng Zib also foresaw the same thing; and that was what made him so pressing in the affair. But behold a more troublesome accident happened: for, at this very juncture, he received advice that Rajah Jessom Seyn, who in appearance was in his interest, had fallen upon his rear, and plundered his baggage, with the treasure which was left behind at the torrent. This news astonished him much; and the more when he saw that it had thrown his army into disorder. Yet he loses not his judgment for all this: and being aware, that to turn back was to hazard all, he resolves, as in the battle with Dara, to bear up the best he could, and at all events stand his ground^m.

MEAN time the disorder increased among his troops; which Sujáb observing, presseth him vigorously. He who led Aureng Zib's elephant being killed with an arrow, he guides the animal himself, as well as he can, till another could be found to supply the leader's place. Arrows rain upon him; and he returns many himself; but at length his elephant begins to be frightened, and to go back. Behold him now in great extremity, and brought to such a desperate pass, that one foot is out of the seat, as if he went to cast himself to the ground. And no man knows, what in that distress he might not have done, if Amir Jemla, who was not far off, and, like a great man as he was, doing actions beyond imagination, had not called to him, with his hand raised up, Dekán kow? Dekán kow? Where is Dekán? Where is Dekán (Z)? This seems to have been the greatest extremity to which Aureng Zib could well be reduced. It now seemed as if fortune had quite abandoned him, and that there was no possibility for him to escape. But his good luck is still superior to all difficulties: Soltán Sujáb must be routed; and Aureng Zib be king of Hindistán.

For one of Soltán Sujáb's chief captains, named Allah Verbi Khán, seeing the whole army of Aureng Zib in confusion, runs towards the Soltán, and begs that he would stay no longer in so great danger upon his elephant; saying, in the words of Khallilo'llah Khán to Dara, on the same occasion. "Come down, in the name of God; mount on horseback: God has made you sovereign of the Indies: let us pursue those runaways: let not Aureng Zib escape us!" Some said this officer had been gained: others, that it was not through treachery, but mere flattery, that he acted. However that be, Soltán Sujáb, not more considerate than Dara, commits the same fault; and, like him, suffers by it. For he was no sooner come down from his elephant, than his army, not seeing him, was struck with terror, believing some treason had been acted, and that he was either taken or slain. Hereupon they disbanded, without more ado; and the defeat was so great, that the Soltán had difficulty enough to save himself.

JESSOM SEYN, on this unexpected turn of fortune, perceiving it not safe for him to tarry there, marched off with all diligence, with the spoil he had gotten, to Agra, thence to pass on to his own country. Mean time news had reached the capital, that Aureng Zib had not only lost the battle, but that Soltán Sujáb was bringing both him and Amir Jemla prisoners to the city. So that Sháh Hesh Khán, the governor, and uncle to Aureng Zib, seeing Jessom Seyn, whose treachery he had heard of, at the gates, and despairing of his life, laid hold of a cup of poison, and had actually drank it, if his women had not hindered him. In short, the certainty of this defeat was so firmly believed for two whole days, that if Jessom Seyn had laid hold of the opportunity, and acted vigorously, he might have delivered Sháh Jehán out of prison. Instead of that, he thought of nothing but to get off himself, with all the speed he could: yet Aureng Zib was so much afraid he would attempt something in his father's behalf, that, after a short pursuit of the vanquished army, he turned back with all his forces for Agra; where he staid a good while to settle his affairs.

In the interim he received intelligence, that Soltán Sujáb, who had lost but few men in the late route, for want of further pursuit, had raised great forces in the lands of the Rajahs, on both sides of the Ganges, on the credit of his being rich, as well as very liberal; and had fortified himself in Elabás, that important passage of the river, which with its fortrefs is the first entrance into Bengál. On this occasion he meditated with himself what he had to do. He considered that he had about him two persons, Soltán Mahmúd, his eldest son, and Amir Jemla; both very capable indeed to serve him, but therefore liable to grow too assuming, as he found the first already began to be, for having seized on the fortrefs of Agra: and he had no reason to expect otherwise of the Amir; who, besides the merit of his great services, courage, and riches, passed for the first mover of affairs, and the ablest man in all the Indies, as well in civil as military matters. These things would certainly have perplexed an ordinary genius, but Aureng Zib found a way to get rid of them in so handsome a manner, that neither of them found any cause to complainⁿ.

^m BERNIER Mem. Emp. Mog. part i. p. 170, & seqq.

ⁿ BERNIER, ibid. 178, & seqq.

(Z) This seems to have been a word among the forces, who had been with Aureng Zib in Dekan, on occasion of some exploit or exploits done in that country.

Amîr Jemla

THE course he took was to send them both against Soltân Sujâb, with a puissant army; letting the Amîr know, that, as an earnest of his acknowledgements, he conferred the government of Bengâl on him, and his son, for their lives: and that, as soon as he should defeat his brother Sujâb, he would make him Mîro'l Omrâ, or prince of the Omrâs; which is the most honourable place in all Hindûstân. To Soltân Mahmûd, his son, he only said these few words: "Remember that thou art the eldest of my children; that it is for thyself thou goest forth to fight: and that thou hast done much, but yet nothing, if thou overcomest not Sujâb, who is our greatest and most powerful enemy." In this manner he dismissed them both, with rich vests, horses, and elephants, gallantly harnessed, after he had obliged them to leave, as pledges of their fidelity, Mohammed Amîr Khân, only son of Amîr Jemla, under pretence of education; and Soltân Mahmûd's wife, daughter to the king of Golkondâ, on a suggestion that her following the camp would be very inconvenient.

advances
against him

SOLTÂN Sujâb, who always feared that the Râjahs of the Lower Bengâl, whom he had ill treated, would be raised against him, and dreaded nothing more than to have to do with Amîr Jemla, no sooner heard of his march, than, apprehending that the passage to Bengâl would be obstructed, he raised his camp at Elabâs, and went down the Ganges to Benâres and Patna. From thence he proceeded to Mojer, a small town, seated on that river, and commonly called the key of Bengâl; being a kind of streight between the mountains and the woods. There he fortified himself, causing a trench (A) from the river to the mountains, there to attend Amîr Jemla, and dispute the passage with him. But he was strangely surprised when he was informed, that the troops which slowly descended along the Ganges, were only to amuse him: for that the Amîr himself and Soltân Mahmûd were advancing apace through the mountains, whose Râjahs they had gained, with all the flower of the army, towards Râjab Mâbl, in order to intercept him.

to Râjah Mahl.

ON this advice Sujâb quitted his fortifications at Mojer, and made such haste, that, altho' he was obliged to follow the windings which the river makes to the left, he arrived at Râjab Mâbl, and had time to fortify himself there also, before the Amîr arrived: because the latter, having heard this news, quitted his former route, and bent his course towards the left hand and the Ganges, there to wait for his troops, which were marching, with the body of the artillery and the baggage, along the river. As soon as they were come, he proceeded to attack Soltân Sujâb; who defended himself very well for five or six days: but observing that the Amîr's cannon, which played incessantly, ruined all his works, made only of sandy earth and faggots; finding likewise, that without them he could make no great resistance in that place, and that the rainy season was begun; he retired by favour of the night, leaving behind two large pieces of cannon. As Amîr Jemla put off the pursuit till next morning, for fear of some ambush in the dark, very luckily for Sujâb, at day-break, there began to fall rain, which continued for more than three days: so that Jemla found himself not only hindered from pursuing the enemy, but obliged to continue at Râjab Mâbl all winter; the excessive rains in that country rendering the roads so troublesome in July, August, September, and October, that the armies cannot possibly march °.

Soltân Mahmûd revolts.

BY this means Soltân Sujâb gained time not only to retire to whatever place he thought fit, and fortify himself, but likewise to procure out of the Lower Bengâl a good many pieces of artillery, as well as some companies of Portugueses, who had retired thither (B) on account of the plenty of provisions: for he courted the missionaries who were in that province, promising to build churches for, and enrich them, all. Mean time Soltân Mahmûd, for the reasons above-mentioned, grew very imperious; and not only pretended to an absolute command of the army, requiring Amîr Jemla to follow his orders, but, from time to time, also let fall insolent expressions with reference to his father, as if he was obliged to him for the crown. He likewise threw out words of contempt and even threats against the Amîr, which caused a great coldness between them: till at length Mahmûd, understanding that his father was much dissatisfied with his conduct, and fearing Amîr Jemla had orders to seize his person, he went away, accompanied with a very small number of followers, to Soltân Sujâb; to whom he made great promises, and swore fidelity.

Soltân Gwa-liâr.

FOR all this, his uncle Sujâb, who feared the snares of Aureng Zîb and Amîr Jemla, could not trust him; but always had an eye upon his actions, and never gave him any considerable command: which so disgusted the prince, that, some months after, he left Soltân Sujâb, and returned to the Amîr; who received him well enough, assuring him, that he would write in his behalf to Aureng Zîb, and do his utmost to heal the breach. Our author had it from many hands, that the escape of Soltân Mahmûd was an artifice of Aureng Zîb, who did not matter hazarding his son, to try to destroy his brother Sujâb; and besides, was pleased to think, that whatever

° BERNIER, ibid. p. 187, & seqq.(A) Fernier saw this trench in his passage that way some years after.(B) There were then 8 or 9000 families of them, either native Portugueses or Mestizes.

a whatever was the event, he should have a specious pretence to imprison him. However that be, he afterwards shewed himself much dissatisfied with Mahmūd; and wrote him a severe letter, in which he enjoined him to return to Dehli, but at the same time took care that he should not come so far: for he had no sooner crossed the Ganges, than he met with troops, which stopped him; and, putting him into a small chair (as Morād Bukhsh had been served) carried him to Gualiyār; where at length he died in his confinement.

AURENG ZIB having by this means freed himself from no small perplexity, at the same time let his second son Soltān Mauzm know, that “the affair of reigning was so delicate a ^{Soltān Mauzm warned.} thing, that kings ought to be jealous even of their own shadows:” adding, “that if he did not behave discretely, the like disaster might happen to him, as had befallen his elder brother: in short, that he ought to think Aureng Zib was not a man who would suffer the same injury to be done to him which Shāh Jēbān did to his father Jēbān Gbīr; and which he had lately seen done also to Shāh Jēbān.” This warning Aureng Zib thought proper to give, though there seemed to have been no occasion for it; since, as our author observes, no slave could be more tractable than Soltān Mauzm: neither did Aureng Zib himself ever appear more careless of greatness, or more given to devotion, than he. However, he adds, that many thought he only dissembled his ambition, as his father had done before him ^{F.}

HERE we think proper to close the reign of Shāh Jēbān; during whose time the empire ^{State of the empire.} flourished exceedingly, comprehending no fewer than twenty-three provinces; five of which, Bālkh, Kandabār, Bidlukhshān, Tellengana, and Baghina, were added by him. The revenues arising from them all amounted to 27,500,000 pounds; and the number of his forces, as paid out of those revenues, was, in 1647, full 911,400, horse and foot ¹.

THE kings of India, by an antient and barbarous custom, are heirs of the effects belonging to those who die in their service. On this occasion two things happened in Shāh Jēbān's ^{Remarkable passage.} reign worth relating. The first is of Neyknām Khān, one of the most antient Omrās of the court, who had, in the space of forty or fifty years service in considerable offices, amassed great store of wealth. When this lord found himself near death, reflecting on that unreasonable custom, which often reduces both the widow and her children to beggary, he secretly distributed all his treasures among indigent knights and poor widows. After this he filled his trunks with old shoes, rags, bones, and other rubbish; then locked and sealed them, telling every body that they were goods belonging to the king. Upon his death, the trunks were brought before Shāh Jēbān, when he was in the assembly; and, by his command, opened before all the Omrās: but when he saw what was in them, he was so provoked, that he rose in great fury and went away.

THE second passage is this. The son of a rich Baniyān, or Hindū merchant, who died in the king's service, being very extravagant, and his mother refusing to supply him with money, he, by the persuasion of others, complained to Shāh Jēbān; and was so silly as to discover the value of his father's effects, amounting to 200,000 rupīs (or 25000 pounds). The king, who coveted this treasure, sent for the widow, and commanded her in the open assembly to send him 100,000 rupīs, and let her son have 50,000; giving orders at the same time to put her away. The old woman, though no less surprised at this command, than vexed to be so hastily thrust out without liberty of speaking, yet lost not her judgment; but with a loud voice, declared, that she had something of moment to impart to the king. Hereupon, being brought in again, she said; “God save your majesty! I am sensible that my son has some right to demand of me the goods of his father, as being of the same flesh and blood with us, and therefore our heir; but I would gladly know, in what manner your majesty stands related to my deceased husband, so as to intitle you to his effects.” Shāh Jēbān, who could not forbear laughing at this home piece of raillery, ordered her to be dismissed, without demanding any thing from her ².

SHAH Jēbān had by two of his wives seven sons and five daughters: all of whom, excepting ^{Shāh Jēbān's children.} one of the females, were by the empress Mehd Alia, daughter of Asof Khān; whose first name was Ardumond Bānu Begum, or the noble princess.

HUR al nissa Begum, or the most angelic of women; born in 1612. She died before her father was deposed.

JEHAN Ara Begum, or the princess ornament of the world; born in 1614.

SOLTAN Dara Shikowh (C), or the Soltān in pomp like Darius; born in 1615.

SOLTAN Sujab (D), or the valiant Soltān; born 1617.

ROYSHN Ray Begum, the princess of an enlightened mind; born 1617.

¹ BERNIER, ibid. p. 193—199. ² FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Shāh, p. 26; ³ BERNIER, ubi supr. part ii. p. 93.

(C) He had two sons, Soleymān Shikowh, august, or in pomp like, and Soleymān Sepch Shikowh, of military pomp, like Soleymān.

(D) This prince had two sons; Zeyno'ddin Moham-med, the ornament of religion; and Bullind Akhter, of high stars, or great fortune.

SOLTAN Aureng Zib (E), or the ornament of the throne; born 1618. a SOLTAN Amyâd Bukhsb, or the giver of hopes; born 1620; died before the revolution.

SURIA Bânu Begum, the shining princess; born 1622; died before the revolution.

SOLTAN Morâd Bukhsb (F), the giver desires, or wishes; born 1624.

SOLTAN Lowtf-allah, the favour of God; born 1627; died before his father's deposition.

SOLTAN Dowlet Afza, increase of fortune; born 1628; died before the revolution.

By a daughter of Mazuffer Hossayn Mirza, grandson to Shâh Ismael, king of Persia, Shâh Jebân had a daughter, named Parbiz Bânu Begum, or the abstinent princess; born in 1611. She died young².

² FRASER, ubi supr. p. 26, & seqq.

(E) Aureng Zib's sons will be mentioned at the end of his reign.

(F) Morâd Bukhsb had one son, Jezd, or Yezd Bukhsb; that is, God's gift.

C H A P. VIII.

The reign of Mohio'ddîn Aureng Zib, sixth emperor.

S E C T. I.

From his advancement to the end of the civil wars.

6. Khân
Aureng Zib
acts as king.
A. D. 1658.

Dara deserted at Ajmir; defeated, and fles.

WHILE matters were transacted in Bengâl, as before related, Aureng Zib kept moving a to and fro about Agra. At length, having sent Morâd Bukhsb also to Gwaliyâr, he went to Dehli, and there assumed the regal power (A), giving orders in all affairs relating to the state. But his thoughts were chiefly employed on contriving how to lay hold of Dara, and get him out of Guzerât; which at length his good fortune effected. Jessom seyn having, as hath been said, retired to his own country, and made the best of what he had taken in the battle of Kajowb, raised a strong army, wrote to Dara to haste to Agra as soon as he could, and promised to join him with his forces. Dara, who had also by this time set on foot a considerable number of troops, though for the most part new-raised ones, leaves Abmed abâd, and marches with great speed to Azmîr, seven or eight days journey from Agra; in hopes many of his old friends would not fail to come in to him, when they saw him approaching the b capital, in conjunction with that Râjah. But Jessom seyn having in the interim been dissuaded from his purpose by Jessayn, who, in his letters, after laying before him the inconveniencies and dangers which were likely to attend his enterprize, told him; that if he would leave Dara to himself, Aureng Zib would bestow on him the government of Guzerât; which, being near his own lands, made him perfectly secure against any surprize. In short, this Râjah acted his part so well, that Jessom seyn returned home, whilst Aureng Zib approached with his whole army to Azmîr, and encamped in sight of Dara's troops.

THIS unhappy prince, thus abandoned and frustrated of his hopes, considers, that it was impossible to return back safe to Abmed abâd, which was a march of five-and-thirty days, through the lands of Râjahs, friends of the two before-mentioned, and in the height of summer, c when water would fail him, he resolved to give battle at all risks; though the match was very unequal, and Shâb Navaz Khân, who was along with him, betrayed all his secrets to his competitor. The fight began between nine and ten in the morning, in which Dara's artillery were loud enough, but, it was said, carried nothing but powder. It is needless to recite the particulars of this battle, which was rather a rout than an engagement: for the attack was scarcely begun, when Jessayn appeared near Dara, and sent him word to fly instantly, unless he had a mind to be taken: so that the prince, quite surprized, was forced to run away with such precipitation, that he had not time to put up his baggage, or get off with more than his wife and family. Nor could he possibly have escaped, if that Râjah had endeavoured to prevent him: but he always preserved a respect to the royal family; or rather he was too d politic to venture laying hands on a prince of the blood², withstanding he had sworn by the Korân to be true to him. After this he sent his father from Dehli, to be confined at Agra, 44 kos distant. However, his reign does not commence till a year after, as will be observed in its place.

² BERNIER's Mem. emp. Mogol, part i. p. 200, & seqq.

(A) According to Frazer, p. 30, presently after the battle of Kajowb, Aureng Zib entered the castle of Agra; and, on the 20th of July 1658, sat on the throne, and was proclaimed emperor, in the town of Eazabâd (or Azabâd), two measured kos and half from Dehli; having first confined his brother Morâd Bukhsb, no:-

- a WE must not omit, that Shâh Navaz Khân was punished for his perfidy, being killed Shâh Navaz in the fight: some say by Dara himself; others, more probably, by some of Aureng Zib's ^{Khân's} army, for fear he should discover the letters which they had written to that prince. However that be, the unhappy Dara was forced, in the hottest time of summer, accompanied only by 2000 men, and without tents, to cross those countries of the Râjahs, extending almost from Azmîr to Abmed abâd. In his march he was harassed by the Kowlis, who are the country people, and the greatest robbers. These followed him night and day, rifling and killing his soldiers: so that if any man staid but 200 paces behind the rest, he was stripped naked, and murdered on the least resistance. For all this Dara made shift to get near Abmed abâd: but when he expected to enter, the governor, whom he had left in the castle, having b been wrought on by letters from Aureng Zib, denied him entrance.

- THREE days before this, our author Bernier met the unhappy prince; who, having no physician with him, obliged him to follow in his train, and one night did him the favour to make him come into the Karavân Serrak, where he was, for fear the Kowlis should murder him. When the ladies heard the answer of the governor of Abmed abâd, they broke out into lamentations enough to pierce the hardest heart. All was in the utmost confusion. Soon after Dara came forth, half dead; now speaking to one, then to another, even of the meanest soldiers; whom he found all astonished, and ready to abandon him. He was obliged to march away that instant, departing with tears in his eyes, accompanied by 500 horse at most, and two elephants, said to be laden with money. As he had not authority enough to c procure the author any beast of carriage, he was obliged to leave his physician behind.

- AFTER innumerable hardships, in passing the deserts, and the loss of most of those who followed him, besides several of his women, he reached the Râjah of Kacheb; who at first received very kindly, and promised to assist him with all his forces, provided he would give his daughter in marriage to his son: but Jesselyn having soon brought off this Râjah also, Dara, apprehending his person in danger, sets out from thence for Tâtta Bakar. Mean time the war continued in Bengâl: which being under the conduct of an experienced general, and at a great distance, did not disquiet Aureng Zib so much as the neighbourhood of Soleymân Shekowb; who continually alarmed him with rumours, as if he was coming down with the Râjah from the mountains, which are no more than eight days journey from Agra. To d draw this thorn out of his foot, Aureng Zib employs the Râjah Jesselyn to ply him of Serenâgher with letters; promising great things if he would deliver up the young prince, and threatening war in case he refused. The Râjah answers, that he would rather lose his estate than be guilty of so unworthy an action. Hereupon Aureng Zib marches to the foot of the mountains (B), and attempts to widen the passage, by cutting the rocks: while the Râjah laughs at his vain efforts to ascend inaccessible hills, where stones would be sufficient to repel the forces of four Hindûstâns; so that he was constrained to return as he came^b.

- WHEN Dara arrived within two or three days journey of Tâtta Bakar, he received news that Mîr Bâba had, after a long leaguer, reduced the place to the last extremity; a pound of rice and meat being sold for more than a crown. Yet the brave governor still held out, and e extremely incommoded the enemy by frequent sallies; deriding the attempts of the general, as well as the threats and promises of Aureng Zib. On the news of Dara's approach he redoubled his endeavours, and by sending spies into the enemy's camp, to spread reports of the prince's being at hand with considerable forces, so terrified them; that, had he advanced even with that handful of men, the army would have disbanded, and part gone over to him: but, believing it impossible to raise the siege with so few soldiers as accompanied him, he was for passing the Indus, and getting into Persia. This would have been a very difficult task, not only on account of the deserts and little water in those parts, but also because on the frontiers there are many Râjahs and Pâtans of no great generosity, who acknowledge neither the Persian nor the Mogol. However, when these strong reasons could not divert him from f that design, a weak one, urged by his wife (C), did; namely, that if he took this last course, he must expect to see her and his daughter slaves to the king of Persia.

In this perplexity Dara remembered that there was thereabout a certain Pâtan, of some power, named Jon Khân, whose life he had saved twice, when Shâh Jêhân had ordered him

^b BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 206, & seqq.

(B) Frazer says, that on the Sunday, the 2d of January 1659, Aureng Zib set out for Bengâl; where, at a place called Kuura, he defeated his brother Sujâb, and obliged him to fly. But Bernier mentions no expedition of Aureng Zib to Bengâl, or any-where else, excepting this, during the remainder of the war; which in that province was carried on by Amîr Jemla. The same author adds, that, on the 15th of May the same year, being then forty solar years, six months, and twenty-three days old, he was proclaimed a second time; and ordered, that the beginning of his reign should be dated from the 1st of Ramadân, Hejrah 1069, which answers to the 12th of May 1659.

(C) According to Tavernier, before he got to Jon Khân's habitation, he received the news of the death of his most beloved wife, who died on the road, of thirst; which almost distracted him. On this occasion he put on a dress of coarse linen, much the same with that which he appeared in afterwards at Dehli.

to be cast under the feet of an elephant, for having often rebelled. To this man therefore he a resolves to go, and obtain succours to raise the siege of Tatta Bakar; after which, taking thence his treasure, he proposed to bend his court for Kandahâr, and so cast himself into the kingdom of Kâbûl, in hopes of being assisted by Mobabet Khân, who had obtained the government by his favour. But his grandson, Sepe Shekowb, yet but very young, threw himself at his feet, and intreated him, for God's sake, not to enter the country of that Pâtan. His wife and daughter did the same; remonstrating, that Jon Khân, being a rebel and revolted governor, would infallibly betray him: that he ought not to be so anxious on raising the siege, but rather endeavour to gain Kâbûl; which was not impracticable, since it was not likely that Mîr Bâba would quit Tatta Bakar to follow him. But Dara, hurried by his evil destiny, always maintained that Jon Khân would never be so base as to betray him, after all the good b he had done him; and accordingly set forward to prove, at the price of his life, that no trust is to be placed in a wicked man.

who betrays
him:

THIS robber, who imagined that the prince had numerous troops following him, at first gave both him and his soldiers the most hospitable reception that could be: but, when he found that the two or three hundred men, whom Dara brought with him, were his whole forces, he quickly shewed what he was. Whether instigated by letters from Aureng Zib, or tempted by some mules, said to be laden with gold; one morning, when every-body thought himself perfectly secure, this traitor, who in the night had gotten together many armed men, fell upon Dara and Sepe Shekowb (D), killing some of their followers, who stood up to defend themselves; and, having overpowered them, he first took care to seize on the burdens with c which the mules were loaded, and all the jewels of the ladies. Then he caused Dara to be bound fast upon an elephant, with an executioner behind him, who had orders to cut off his head, in case he should offer to resist, or any attempt to rescue him; and in this strange manner he was carried to Tatta Bakar, and delivered into the hands of Mîr Bâba; who caused him to be conducted, accompanied by the traitor, to Labûr, and thence to Dehli.

carried through Dehli:

WHEN this unhappy prince was at the gates of Dehli, it was debated whether he should be made to pass through the city or not. Many were against it; alleging, that it would be a great dishonour to the royal family, and that some might attempt to save him: others maintained, that it was absolutely necessary, that he should pass through the town, to shew the power of Aureng Zib; and take away all hopes from those who still favoured his interest, by d convincing every body that he was actually in his brother's hands. This opinion, therefore, being followed, he was put on an old dirty elephant, with a pitiful seat, and his grandson Sepe Shekowb at his side; both dressed in dirty vests, and turbâns of coarse linen. In this wretched condition, our author saw him pass through the principal streets of Dehli; all the shops being crowded with spectators, who wept bitterly: while the lower sort of people, by whom he was much beloved, exclaimed against the tyranny of Aureng Zib, who had already imprisoned his father, son, and brother. They also, with some Pakirs, reviled and threw stones at the infamous Jon Khân, who rode by his side: but not one man had the boldness to draw a sword in his behalf, although he was but very slightly guarded.

debates about him:

AFTER the prince had been led in this ignominious manner through the city, he was put e into a garden called Hayder abâd (E): while Aureng Zib, being informed how the people had lamented Dara, and cursed the Pâtan, called another council, to deliberate whether it was better to send him to Gwalyâr, as had been concluded before, or put him to death without more ceremony. Some were of opinion, it was sufficient that he should be carried under a strong guard to that fortress; and on this Daneshmend Khân (F), although Dara's old enemy, insisted much: but Rushn Ray Begum, in hatred to this brother of hers, urged Aureng Zib to dispatch him out of the way; and not run the hazard of keeping him in prison. Of the same mind were all his old enemies, Khalîl'ullah Khân, Shâb Hest Khân, and especially a certain medical parasite, who, having fled from Persia, was first called Hakîm Dawd (or Doctor David); but afterwards, being become one of the great Omras, was named Takarrub f Khân.

sentenced to death:

THIS upstart lord boldly rose up in a full assembly, and cried out, that it was expedient for the safety of the state to put him to death immediately; and the rather, because he was a kâfir, or idolater, without religion: adding, that he would take the sin of it on his own

^c BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 217, & seqq.

(D) According to Tavernier, Dara, awaked by a noise of their seizing his son, could not refrain venting his passion on Jon Khân, in these terms; Finish, infamous and ungrateful villain, as thou art, finish the work thou hast begun; we are become victims to bad fortune, and Aureng Zib's unjust ambition: but remember, that I only deserve death for having saved thy life: for never prince of the royal blood had his hands tied behind him before. Jon Khân, in some measure moved by these words, caused the young prince to be unbound, and only set guards over him and his father.

(E) According to Frazer, he was sent to Khesrabâd (fifty-two measured kos from Dehli), where he was murdered by Aureng Zib's order, the 28th of August 1659, in the night.

(F) Afterwards Bernier's Aga.

a head. Of which imprecation he soon after felt the smart : for, falling into disgrace, he was treated like an infamous fellow, and died miserably. However, Aureng Zib, Iwayed by the reasons which were given, commanded that Dara should forthwith be put to death, and Sepe Shekowb sent to Gwaliyâr. The charge of this execution was given to a slave, called Nâzar ; who, having been bred up by Shâh Jêhân, had formerly received some ill treatment from Dara. This slave, accompanied by three or four more to assist him, went presently to the garden ; where Dara was himself then dressing some lentils, with Sepe Shekowb. The prince is murdered as no sooner saw Nâzar, than he cried out, My dear son, behold those who come to kill us ! laying hold at the same time of a knife ; which was all the arms that were left him. One of these butchers immediately seized on Sepe Shekowb : the others fell on the arms and legs of Dara, b throwing him on the ground, and holding him down, till Nâzar (G) cut his throat. His head was forthwith carried to the fortress to Aureng Zib, who commanding it to be put in a dish, and water to be brought, had the face washed clean from the blood, that he might see if it was Dara's, which being done, he fell a weeping, and said, Ab ! unfortunate man ! Take it away, and bury it in the sepulchre of Humayûn.

At night the daughter of Dara was brought into the harâm ; but afterwards sent to Shâh Jon Khân Jêhân and Begum Sabeb, at their request. As for that prince's wife, she had poisoned herself^h before this at Labûr, to avoid the misery which she saw falling on her family. Sepe Shekowb was sent to Gwaliyâr. A few days after, Jon Khân, by Aureng Zib's order, appeared in the assembly ; where having received some presents, he was dismissed : but, when he was c near his own lands, he met with a more proper reward for his villainy ; being killed in a wood^d.

MEAN time, Tâlta Bakar was surrendered, in obedience to an order which had been Bakar surren- obtained from Dara ; and all the conditions which the governor demanded were agreed to :^{dered.} but with an intention not to be kept. For as soon as the valiant and faithful eunuch arrived at Labûr, he was cut in pieces, with the few men who accompanied him, by Khalilo'llah Khân, the governor. The reason for non-observance of the capitulation was the intelligence which arrived, importing, that he had secretly conveyed abundance of gold into the hands of the Franghis, or Europeans, and all the rest who came with him out of the fortress, under pretence of accompanying him as far as Debli, to Aureng Zib (who often expressed a desire d to see the man, who had so gallantly defended himself) ; but in reality with design to go directly to Soleymân Shekowb.

THIS prince was now the only one who remained of the family of Dara Shekowb : nor Soleymân would it have been easy to draw him from Serenâgher, if the Râjah had been steady to his Shekowb first declarations : but the death of Dara, and persuasions of Râjah Jessèyn, joined to the threats of Aureng Zib, who had actually excited the neighbouring Râjahs to make war upon him, at length prevailed on him to consent to their demands. Soleymân, being informed of this agreement, fled through the midst of those horrid mountains and frightful deserts, towards Great Tibet : but the Râjah's son, soon pursuing and overtaking him (H), caused him to be assaulted with stones. The poor prince was hurt, and, being seized, was carried to Debli ;
e where he was imprisoned in Serenâgher, that little fortress where at first Morâd Bukhsb had been confined. Aureng Zib, careful, as in the case of Dara, to convince the people that it was no sham, commanded Soleymân to be brought before him, in presence of all the grandees of the court. At the gate, the chains were taken off his feet ; but those which he had about his f hands, and seemed gilt, were left on.^{taken and imprisoned.}

WHEN this proper young man, so handsome and so gallant, was seen to enter, many of the Omrâs could not hold their tears ; and all the great ladies of the court, who had leave to see him come in, fell a weeping. Aureng Zib, who appeared himself to be touched with his misfortunes, began to speak very kindly ; telling him, “ that he had nothing to fear : that no “ hurt should be done him : that, on the contrary, he should be well treated ; and therefore f “ ought to cheer up his spirits : that he had put his father to death for no other reason, than “ that he was a kâfr, and a man without religion.” Hereupon the young prince returned his uncle the salern, and blessed him ; letting fall his hands to the earth, and then lifting them, as well as he could, up to his head, after the usage of the country : but told him, with resolution enough, “ that if he was to drink the powst (I), his desire was to die off-hand ; being

^d BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 226, & seqq.

(G) Bernier observes, that it was not known what became of the Nâzar ; suggesting that he had been made away with, as Jon Khân had been.

(H) Lavernier says, that Nakti Raja, to save his oath, would not seize Soleymân : but a party of Jessèyn's men, on notice given, surprised him as he went a hunting ; and took him, after all his attendance had been slain, and he had slain nine of the party himself.

(I) This powst is nothing but poppy expressed, and infused one night in water. This is the potion which is given to those princes, whose lives are spared. It is the first thing which is brought them in the morning ; and they would rather let them starve for hunger, than give them any thing to eat till they have drank a large cup-full. It emaciates them exceedingly, and kills them insensibly : for by degrees they lose their strength and understanding ; growing quite torpid and senseless.

“very willing to submit to his fate.” In answer to this, Aureng Zib promised him publicly, a “that he should drink none of it; bidding him rest satisfied as to that matter, and not enter“tain any melancholy thoughts about it.” Having spoken these words, his nephew once more repeated the salem; and after answering to several questions, which had been put to him in the name of Aureng Zib, touching the elephant loaded with rupees of gold, which was taken from him when he went to Serenâgher, he was sent to Gwalijâr (K) to the rest.

Morâd
Bukhsb
 NOTWITHSTANDING these fine words and fair promises of Aureng Zib, it is said, that not only Soleymân Shikowb, but his son Sepe Shikowb, and the grand-child of Morâd Bukhsb, were dispatched by the powst. As to Morâd Bukhsb himself, he was made away by a more violent death. For his brother, perceiving that the generality of people had an inclination to him, and that verses were dispersed about in praise of his valour and courage; apprehended, b that, if he took him off privately by the powst, his death would be doubted of, which might give occasion one time or other to some commotion: he therefore thought it safer to get rid of him in a more open manner; and this he contrived to do under a shew of justice. For Morâd Bukhsb, when he was at Abmed abad making preparations for war, having, among other violences, to procure money (L), put to death a very rich Sayed, one of Mohammed's kindred, in order to get his estate; the children of the Sayed were set on to make their complaints in a public assembly, and demanded the head of that prince, in satisfaction for the blood of their father. Hereupon their petition was granted without any other form or process: nor did one of the Omrâs interpose in the affair, not so much on account of the great veneration in which the Sayeds are held, as because every-body understood that Aureng Zib himself was at c the bottom of it. In short, an order being issued out for the purpose, they went to Gwalijâr, and took off the unfortunate Morâd's head.

Soltân Sujâh
 THERE now remained no other thorn in the foot of Aureng Zib, excepting his brother Soltân Sujâh, who all this while held out in Bengâl: but Amîr Jemla was reinforced, from time to time, with so many troops of all sorts, that, being at length hemmed in on all sides, he was obliged to fly to Dakka, which is the last city of that province towards the sea; and now comes the conclusion of this whole tragedy. The prince, being destitute of ships, and not knowing whither to fly, sent his eldest son Soltân Banka to the heathen king of Rakan (M), or May, to know if he would give him leave to make that country his place of refuge only for some time, and do him the favour, when the monsoons, or season winds, should come, to d furnish him with a vessel to carry him to Mekka; intending from thence to pass into some part of Turky, or Persia. The king of Rakan sent answer, that he should be very welcome, and have all possible assistance from him.

flies to Rakan.
 WITH this answer, and some galleasses, manned with Franghis, that is, fugitive Portugueses, and other straggling Europeans, who had put themselves in the service of this king, and did nothing but ravage the lower (or maritime) Bengâl, Soltân Banka returned to Dakka; where the prince, his father, embarking with his wife, his three sons, and his daughters, set sail for the kingdom of Rakan. When they landed, they were well enough received; and furnished with whatever that country afforded, at the expence of the king. At the end of some months, the monsoons began to blow; but no news of the ship which was promised him, although he demanded e it at his own charges; for as yet he wanted neither rupis of gold and silver, and precious stones.
 His misfortune was, that he had too great plenty of them; for his riches were, in all appearance, the cause of his ruin, or at least contributed not a little to it. These barbarous kings, says our author, have no true generosity, nor much regard for the faith they give. To get out of their hands likewise, one must either be stronger, or else have nothing to tempt their avarice.

The king's treachery.
 MEAN time, the king of Rakan, instead of furnishing Soltân Sujâh with the vessel, began to shew much coldness, and complain, that he did not come to see him. The prince, either thinking it beneath him to pay the king a visit, or rather fearing to be seized on, if he went to the palace, and delivered up to Amîr Jemla, who had already offered great sums of money f for that purpose, never would go thither himself, but only sent his son Soltân Banka; who, as he drew near the palace, threw rupis both of gold and silver among the people. Being introduced to the king, he presented him with store of embroideries, and curious pieces of gold-smith's work, set with precious stones of great value. He apologized for his father, as being indisposed; and besought him, in the Soltân's name, to remember his promise of the vessel.
 But for all this Soltân Sujâh could not obtain his request. On the contrary, five or six days e BERNIER, ubi sup. p. 236, & seqq.

(K) According to Frazer, Aureng Zib sent his son Soltân Mohammed and Mohammed and Soleymân Shikowb to Gwalijâr, on the fourteenth of January, 1661.

(L) He borrowed, or took by force from those who scrupled to lend him, great sums of money, from all the rich merchants.

(M) Called also Arakan, or Arrakan, and Arrakam.

after,

- a after, the king of Rakan sent to demand his daughter in marriage (N) ; which being a thing he could never resolve to comply with, the king became highly offended.

As the prince now saw it was high time to take care of himself, and the season was near spent without any hopes of his getting to Mekka, he undertook an action, which may serve as an instance of what despair is capable of attempting. Although the king of Rakan is a heathen, yet there are in his dominions great numbers of Mohammedans; who either retired thither to settle, or had been made slaves of, and carried thither, by the Europeans before-mentioned. These Mohammedans Soltân Sujâb gained under-hand, and with them, joined to two or three hundred men, remaining of those who had followed him from Bengâl, resolved on a certain day to attack the palace; and, killing all the royal family, cause himself to be proclaimed king of Rakan. This seems to have been a romantic project; and yet our author had been informed by Mohammedans, as well as Portugueses and Dutchmen, who were then present, that the thing was practicable enough. But the day before the stroke was to be given, the design was discovered; which broke all the prince's measures, and quite ruined his affairs^f.

FOR, finding it no longer safe for him to stay in Rakan, he resolved to attempt escaping into Pegu; which was a thing quite impracticable, on account of the vast mountains and forests, which were to be crossed, ^{fies from Rakan:} However, the unfortunate prince set-out with his family and some of his people: but he was immediately pursued, and with so much diligence, that he was overtaken the same day on which he fled. Soltân Sujâb defended himself with great courage, and killed an incredible number of the Rakan soldiers: but was so overpowered by the multitude, that he was obliged to quit the combat. Soltân Banka, who was not so far advanced as his father, defended himself also like a lion: but at length he was taken, and all over bloody with the wounds he had received from the stones which were poured upon him, and carried back with his two little brothers, his sisters, and mother.

WHAT became of Soltân Sujâb himself could never, with any certainty, be known: the common report was, that he got to the top of the mountain, with one woman, an eunuch, and two other persons: that he was hit by a stone on the head, which struck him down; but that, rising again, the eunuch wrapped his turbân about the wound, and that afterwards they escaped through the midst of the woods. However, our author observes, that he had heard the relation told three or four different ways, even by persons who were on the spot. Some affirmed, that he was among the dead; but not with certainty known: and Bernier saw a letter from the chief of the Dutch factory (at Rakan), confirming the same. This was what gave rise to so many alarms at Dehli. One time he was landed to join the kings of Golkondâ and Viziapûr: another time he was seen with two ships, carrying red colours (O), off Surât. Next he was at Sbîrâz, in Persia, and soon after at Kandahâr, ready to enter the kingdom of Kâbul. But the same author gave more credit to the report of his being slain: not only as it was confirmed by the letter of the Dutch, but because both an eunuch of his, with whom he travelled (P), and the great master of the artillery, assured him, that he was no longer in being; although they made a difficulty to say any more concerning him.

AFTER this last action, Soltân Sujâb's whole family was put in prison at Rakan; where they were treated roughly enough. However, some time after they were set at more liberty, and received a milder entertainment; which was increased by the alliance made by the king, who married the Soltân's eldest daughter. Mean time, some of Soltân Banka's domestics, in conjunction with several of the Mohammedans, formed a second plot like the first: but, on the day appointed for putting it in execution, one of the conspirators, who was half drunk, beginning to act before the time, blasted the whole design. Yet our author takes notice, that it was very difficult to know the truth of this affair also, since he had heard forty different accounts of it. What is certain, is, that the king was at length so exasperated against the unfortunate family of Sujâb, that he commanded it should be quite extirpated. Soltân Banka and his brothers had their heads cut off with blunt axes, and the women were mured up between stone walls; where they were starved to death. In short, not one escaped the slaughter; excepting that daughter whom the king had made his wife. ^{his family destroyed.}

THUS ended this civil war, which the lust of reigning had kindled among those four brothers, sons of Shâh Jehân, after it had lasted five or six years; that is, from about 1655 to 1660, or 1661, which left Aureng Zib in peaceable possession of this powerful empire^g. On this occasion, our author observes, that, although most of his readers will judge the ways taken by this prince to obtain the empire, to be very violent and horrid; yet, if they consider the custom of the state, which leaving the succession undecided, for want of being settled by

^f BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 244, & seqq.

^g Ibidē ubi sup. p. 251, 258.

(N) Tavernier says, the prince demanded and obtained the king's daughter in marriage.

(O) The livery of the kings of Pegu and Siam.

(P) From Bengâl to Malipatan.

law on the eldest son, exposeth it to the conquest of the strongest; and at the same time lays a every prince of the blood under a sort of necessity, either to reign by destroying all the rest to secure himself, or else to perish for the security of others. These things considered, he is apt to believe, that Aureng Zib's conduct will not appear in so bad a light: however, he is persuaded, that those who attend to his history, will not take him for a Barbarian, but for a great and rare genius; for a statesman, and a great king ^b.

^b FERNIER, partii. p. 174, & seqq.

S E C T. II.

Occurrences from the end of the civil wars, to the death of Shâh Jehân.

Ambassadors arrive

^b THE wars being ended, the Uzbek Tatars sent ambassadors to Aureng Zib, whom they had seen fight in their country, when yet a young prince; Shâh Jehân having sent him to command the succours, which the Khân of Samarkant had desired of him against the Khân of Bâlk. They considered likewise, that he could not but remember the affront which they put upon him, when on the point of taking the city of Bâlk, the enemy's capital: for the two Khâns agreed together, and obliged him to retreat; alleging, that he might make himself master of their whole dominions, as Akber had formerly done by the kingdom of Kashmîr. Whatever their motives were, the two Khâns sent their ambassadors to offer their service, and congratulate him upon the happy commencement of his reign. Aureng Zib was too judicious not to see, that, the war being at an end, this offer was out of season; and that it was ^c nothing but fear, or the hope of obtaining some considerable present, which had brought these ambassadors. For all this, he received them honourably at their first audience, at which our author was present; commanding a serapah, or habit from head to foot, to be given to each: but they were obliged, at entering, to make the slavish obeisance of the country; and to deliver their letters into the hands of an Omrâ, though they were so near the throne, that Aureng Zib might have taken them himself.

from Great Bukhâria.

THEIR presents consisted of lapis lazuli, camels, horses, some loads of fresh fruits; as apples, pears, grapes, and melons; several more of dried fruits, as prunes of Bokhâra, apricots, raisins without stones, and two other sorts, both black and white, very large and very good. Aureng Zib expressed much satisfaction at the presents; and, in dismissing them, ^d intimated, that he should be glad to see them often. They were extremely covetous and nasty, laid up the money allowed for their maintenance, and lived a miserable life, very unworthy of ambassadors: yet they were dismissed with great honour and rich presents, after above four months stay ^a.

Aureng Zib falls sick:

^e BEFORE their departure, Aureng Zib fell desperately ill of a violent and continued fever, which sometimes deprived him of his understanding. His tongue was seized with such a palsy, that he almost lost his speech, and the physicians despaired of his recovery: so that for some time it was believed he was dead, and that his sister Raushn ray Begum concealed his death out of design. It was already hinted, that the Râjah Jessom Seyn, governor of Guzerât, was on the way to deliver Shâh Jehân: that Mobabet Khân, who had at length obeyed the orders of Aureng Zib, was advanced from Kabûl to Labûr with three or four thousand horse, for the same end; and that the eunuch Atbar Khân, who kept the deposed monarch, would have the honour of his deliverance. At the same time interest was making for the succession. On one side, Soltân Mauzm, by bribes and promises, laboured to gain the Omrâs; so far as that one night he went disguised to Râjah Jessyn, intreating him, in the most respectful manner, to engage in his behalf. On the other hand, Raushn ray Begum, with Teday Khân, and many Omrâs, declared for the young prince Soltân Akber, though but seven or eight years old. Both parties pretended their design was only to release Shâh Jehân (which the people every moment expected), although none of them had any such thing in their thoughts: nor indeed had any of them reason to wish for his restoration, excepting Jessom Seyn, Mobabet Khân, ^f and some others, who had hitherto done no great matters to his disadvantage.

his great resolution:

BUT although Aureng Zib was very sick, yet he gave orders in all affairs; and although he advised Soltân Mauzm to open the gates to Shâh Jehân, in case he should die, yet he took care that Atbar Khân should be incessantly written to, in order to keep a strict watch over his father. The fifth day, in the height of his sickness, he was carried into the assembly of the Omrâs to shew himself. The like was done on the seventh, ninth, and tenth day of his illness. What is almost incredible, on the thirteenth, after a swooning fit, which occasioned a rumour through the whole city that he was dead, he sent for two or three of the chief Omrâs, and the Râjah Jessyn, to let them see that he was alive; and, being raised up in his bed, called for ink and paper to write to Atbar Khân: he likewise sent for the great seal from his sister,

^a BERNIER, ubi sup. p. 1, & seqq.

a filter, fearing she had already made use of it to serve her designs ^b. The cause of this sickness was probably owing to his rigid diet: for at the time that Aureng Zib ascended the throne, he would not eat any wheat or bread, nor meat, nor flesh: but fed on barley bread, herbs, and sweet-meats (A), by way of penance for his crimes. This made him very thin and meagre ^c.

As soon as he had recovered his health, he sought to get out of the hands of Shâh Jehân, ^{son-in-law for} Begum Sabeel, the daughter of Dara; in order to marry her to Soltân Akber, his third son, ^{Soltân Akber} on purpose to give him the greater right to the empire. This he designed him for, as he had many powerful relations at court, and was born of the daughter of Shâh Navaz Khân, and consequently of the blood of the antient sovereigns of Masbat; whereas Mahmûd and Maûzm ^b were sons only of Rajipowtuis, or daughters of Rôjabs. But it is scarcely to be believed, with what fierceness this proposition was rejected by the three parties; the young princess threatening to kill herself, rather than marry the son of him who had murdered her father. He had no better success with Shâh Jehân, in his application for certain jewels, to finish an addition which he had made to the famous throne (B) then in being; for the deposed emperor threatened to beat them to dust, rather than let him have them. However, at length, he obtained both his requests, by the kind treatment and great respect which he paid his father.

For although Aureng Zib caused Shâh Jehân to be secured with the greatest strictness, yet ^{respect for his} he left him in his old apartment with Begum Sabeel, and his other women. He allowed him ^{father} also his singers, dancers, cooks, and the like, with certain moillahs to read the korân to him; ^c for he was become very devout. He had likewise, as formerly, the diversion of seeing beasts fight, and other fights. But what softened him most was the obliging letters, full of respect and submission, which Aureng Zib often wrote to him; consulting him as an oracle, and expressing a thousand regards for him. He was likewise incessantly sending him some engaging present: all which so gained on his father, that he answered his letters, and sent him some of the jewels, which he had before refused. He even consented that the daughter of Dara should be delivered to him; in short, he granted him at length that pardon and paternal blessing, which he had so often refused.

THE Dutch, to gain credit themselves in the country, and intimidate the governors of the Dutch ^{sea-ports}, resolved to send an ambassador to Aureng Zib. They pitched on Mr. Adrican, ^{chief} chief of their factory at Surât, a person of integrity and good sense. Although Aureng Zib seemed to despise the Franghis, or Christians, yet he received him with honour; bestowing embroidered serapahs, or full suits, on him, and some of his train. He gave him another at his last audience, and a very rich one for the general of Batavia; with a poniard adorned with jewels. The presents of the Dutch consisted of scarlet-cloth, looking-glasses, with Chinese and Japan curiosities: among which was a paleki, and a takt-ravan, or field-throne, of admirable workmanship. About the same time, what seems almost incredible, Didar ^{Amorous} Khân, one of the chief eunuchs of the harâm, though cut close, fell in love with the beautiful ^{eunuch} sister of an Hindû scrivener, who lived near a house where the eunuch often retired to divert himself. The neighbours at length beginning to rally the scrivener on the occasion, he ^e threatened both his sister and her lover to kill them, if they continued their correspondence. Soon after, finding them in the night lying together, he dispatched the eunuch outright, and left his sister for dead. The whole harâm, women and eunuchs, did their utmost to get the scrivener put to death: but Aureng Zib was content that he should turn Mohammedan ^d.

MEAN while this prince was informed, that his sister Rausbn ray Begum had given access, at ^{The king's} different times, to two young gallants into the harâm; yet shewed no resentment to either her ^{clemency} or the young men. They were both found wandering in the garden, deserted by those intrusted to conduct them out: and being brought before Aureng Zib, the first said he got in over the wall; the other confessed he entered by the gate. They were ordered to go out the same way they came in: but the eunuchs, exceeding their commission, threw the first headlong ^f from the wall, and killed him.

PRESENTLY after the Dutch embassy, there arrived several others, almost at the same time; ^{Other em-} viz. from the Sharif of Mekka, the king of Yamman, or Happy Arabia, and the prince of ^{bassee} Barab; whose presents were in horses: lastly, two others from the king of Habash (or Ethiopia). To the three first no great regard was paid; their appearance and equipage was

^b BERNIER, ubi sup. p. 14, & seqq. part ii. p. 21, & seq. 99, & seq.

^c TAVERNIER'S Trav. part ii. l. 2. c. 7.

^d BERNIER,

(A) The same author observes further, that, in 1665, all the time of the comet's appearance, he drank nothing but water, and ate millet bread; which so impaired his health, that it had like to have cost him his life. Besides, he always lay on the ground, with only a tiger's skin under him; from which time he never was perfectly well. Tavernier's Trav. Ind. l. ii. c. ix. p. 124.

(B) According to Tavernier, this request was made a few days before he ascended the throne, that he might appear with more lustre: and that Shâh Jehân's refusal to send him any jewels was the reason that Aureng Zib, when he ascended the throne, had no more than one jewel on his bonnet; for it cannot be called a crown.

One from Habash.

so miserable, seeming to come only to get presents, and sell their merchandize, under pretence a of being ambassadors. The Ethiopians fared better, though they deserved it as little. They were ordinary merchants, with a wretched retinue, and mean presents; consisting of twenty-five-slaves, nine or ten of them very young, for making eunuchs of (a design very becoming a Christian prince!); twelve horses, a mule beautifully streaked and speckled, two huge elephant's teeth, and a very large ox horn full of civet. As Seva ji sacked Surat just after their landing, they lost the little which they brought for their subsistence, and were obliged to beg provision of the governor, who also sent them up to Debli; where their half-naked train passed for beggars. Yet, by our author's speaking in behalf of their king to his lord, they were admitted to audience by Aureng Zib; who honoured them with serapahs, gave them money for themselves, and a rich present for their sovereign. They engaged to employ b their interest with the king for rebuilding a mosk; and requested a Korân, and some other religious books, in their master's name; which seemed as odd from a Christian ambassador, as one of them was, as from a Christian king^d.

A Persian ambassador.

WHILE these Ethiopians were at Debli, Aureng Zib assembled his privy council, to consult about the education of Soltân Akbar, which he had much at heart. After this there arrived a Persian ambassador, who was received with great respect. He made his salute after the Persian mode, and delivered his letters into Aureng Zib's own hands. The presents were very rich, and acceptable to the Great Mogol; who gave the ambassador considerable donatives, and assigned him a place among his chief Omrâs. Notwithstanding all these tokens of honour, the Persian Omrâs, at the Great Mogol's court, gave out, that their king had reproached him c in his letters with the death of Dara, and the imprisonment of Shâb Jehân, as actions unworthy of a brother, a son, and a mussulman: they reported also, that Shâb Abbas II. had twitted him with the word Alem Ghîr; or conqueror of the world; which Aureng Zib had caused to be engraven on his coin. Our author, indeed, cannot think that the king of Persia would have ventured, in such a manner, to provoke so victorious a prince as Aureng Zib; and yet afterwards believes, either that there must have been some offensive expression in those letters, or else that the ambassador must have some-how displeased Aureng Zib. Because two or three days after he had dismissed him, that prince caused a report to be spread, that the ambassador had ordered the hamstrings of the presented horses to be cut; and being yet on the frontiers, made him return all the Indian slaves, whom he carried along with him, d amounting to a prodigious number.

Astrologers
disgraced.

ABOUT this time, the death of the king's chief astrologer, who happened to be drowned, brought those of the faculty into disgrace; for people could not imagine how the man, who foresaw the fate of others, should be ignorant of his own. And yet this sort of impostors, practising on the credulity of the people, have found means to make themselves as necessary a sett of men in the Indies, as the clergy or the lawyers^e.

Amîr Jemla
rewarded.

AFTER Amîr Jemla had driven Soltân Sujâb out of Bengâl, he sent to intreat leave of Aureng Zib to remove his family into this province, that he might end his days in the company of his wife and children: but Aureng Zib feared if he had his son with him, that he might aspire to the crown, or at least make himself independent in Bengâl, where he had then e a strong army at his devotion. At the same time considering that it might be dangerous to disoblige him, he sends to him his wife, and all the children of his son; creates the Amîr himself a Mîro'l Omra, which is the greatest degree of honour that a favourite can be raised to; and makes Mohammed Amîr Khân the great Bakshis: a dignity like our great master of the horse, the second or third post in the state, but such as obliges the possessor to be always at court. The Amîr perceiving Aureng Zib's dexterity, thought it best to rest content with the honours he had received; and, at the same time, be always on his guard, that since he could attempt nothing against Aureng Zib, Aureng Zib should not be able to attempt any thing against him.

Invades Achem.

THUS matters stood between them for near a year: when Aureng Zib, well knowing that f a great captain cannot be long at rest; and that if he be not employed in a foreign war, he will at length raise a domestic one, promised to Amîr Jemla to make war on the rich and potent Râjah of Asbam (C), whose territories are situated to the north of Dikka, upon the gulf of Bengâl^f.

WE are told by a certain author, that before the expedition of Amîr Jemla, the kingdom of Asem (or Asbam) was not known. It had been at peace above 500 years before; and 'tis thought guns and powder were first invented here: which discovery passed from Asem into Pegu, and thence to China. 'Tis certain, that the Amîr brought from this country several pieces of iron cannon, and store of excellent powder, round and small, both made in Asem.

^d TAVERNIER, p. 32—49.

^e Ibid. p. 58—89.

^f BERNIER, p. 107, & seqq.

(C) Tavernier calls it Ajem, others Azem; and says the capital was formerly a city the same name. Trav. Ind. c. 17.

- a When the king dies, all his beloved wives poison themselves, to attend him in the other world.

ASEM is one of the best countries in all Asia; for, besides all sorts of provisions, it contains mines of gold, silver, steel, lead, and iron. Silk is plenty there, but coarse: there is also a silk, made by little round creatures, formed at the foot of trees, which is very glossy, but frets presently. Gum-lak of both kinds is here in great store, especially that of a red colour, which grows under trees, and with which they paint their calicoes. When the red juice is drawn out for that purpose, the remaining substance serves to varnish cabinets, and make wax. Although all necessities of life are so plenty in Asem, yet dogs flesh is in most esteem, and the greatest delicacy at feasts. It is sold in the towns every month, on market-days. Although

- b there are abundance of vines, the inhabitants never think of wine, but dry the grapes to make their aqua vite. They have no salt, but what they get out of the ashes of the leaves of trees, especially that called Adam's fig-tree; whereof also they make a lie for washing their silk, which thereby becomes as white as snow.

- The king requires no subsidies of his subjects; his revenues arising out of the mines, which are his property, and wrought by slaves. The people live at their ease, have each four wives, and commonly an elephant to carry them. They are well complexioned; only the more southerly they live, the more swarthy, and not so subject to wens in their throats: but the women are flat-nosed. In the south parts they go naked, excepting a cloth to cover their privities, and a blue cap hung about with swines teeth. They wear gold in their ears, and bracelets of coral, amber, and shells, which, at the burial of friends, they fling into their graves.

BUT to return to the war: Amir Jemla, who, in all appearance, had before designed the same expedition, readily undertook it. He embarked at Dikka, with a powerful army, upon a river which comes from those parts (D): and having proceeded about 100 leagues north-east, arrived at Azo, a castle (E) which the Rajah had many years before wrested from the kingdom of Bengal. This place he retook in fifteen days; and then in twenty-six more marched still northward, over land, towards Shamdara, which gives entrance into Assam. There a battle was fought, in which the Rajah, being worsted, retreated to Gherghon (F), his capital city, four miles from Shamdara.

- d THE Amir pursued him so closely, that he gave him no time to fortify himself, arriving there in five days time. This constrained the Rajah to fly towards the mountains of the kingdom of Lassa, and abandon Gherghon, which was pillaged as well as Shamdara. They found vast riches in that city, which was very large and fair, well traded, and the women exceeding beautiful. Mean time, the rainy season arriving sooner than usual, which laid the country under water, and the Rajah's people having carried away all the provisions of the fields; the Amir's army was greatly distressed, without being able either to advance or retreat, for the mountains on one side, and the deep roads on the other: besides, the Rajah had caused the way to be dug as far as Shamdara. This obliged the general to abandon his design, and, when the rains were over, to return; which he did, after suffering extremely from the roads, want of victuals, and the pursuit of the Rajahs. He designed, however, to renew his attempt the next year: but at Azo, where the flux began to rage in his army, he fell sick, and died; which put an end to the just apprehensions of the Great Mogol. For on this occasion, those who knew the state of affairs, said, 'Tis this day that Aureng Zib is king of Bengal; and he could not forbear to express something like it himself: for he said publicly to Mohammed Amir Khan, You have lost your father, and I the greatest and most dangerous friend I had. However, he caressed this son, and promised to be a father to him: in which he kept his word; for he confirmed him in his post of Great Bakshis, augmented his pension to 1000 rupis a month, and left him heir of all the Amir's estate, which, by the custom of the country, fell to himself.

- f THE government of Bengal, and command of the army in that country, with the title of Miro'l Omra, which Amir Jemla possessed, the king gave to his own uncle, Shah Hest Khan (G), who had so much contributed to his advancement by his eloquence and address. This lord was first made governor of Agra, when he left that city to meet Soltan Sujab at Kajowh, and afterwards governor of Dekan, and general of the army there. As soon as Shah Hest Khan was settled in Bengal, he resolved to deliver the country from the Portuguese § BERNIER, Trav. Ind. c. 17.

(D) Tavernier says it comes from Chiamay: but neither the situation, nor name of that lake, is with any certainty known, or mentioned by later travellers.

(E) According to Tavernier, the tombs of the kings and royal family of Asem are at this town: for they do not burn their dead, as in other parts. Great wealth was found here, in the vaults of the chapels of the great Poged, where the tombs are. Trav. Ind. c. 17.

(F) Tavernier says, the name of the city where the king keeps his court is Kennetsof, 25 or 30 days journey from that which was formerly the capital, and bore the same name.

(G) He was son of the famous Ajef Khan, father-in-law of Shah Jahan.

pirates,

pirates, who had for a long time been a plague to that country; and then to attack the king a of Rakan (or Arrakan) according to the order of Aureng Zib; who had a mind to be revenged on that prince (not so much for harbouring those execrable vermin, as) for his cruelty toward Soltân Sujâb, and all his family ^a.

the Portuguese
pirates;

IN order to set this matter in a proper light, our reader is to know, that, for many years before, the kingdom of Rakan had been the refuge of all the runaway Portugueses from Goa, Kochin, Malakka, and other places which they had in the Indies, as well as of their slaves, and other Europeans. They consisted of such as had abandoned their monasteries, had been twice or thrice married, murderers, and the like, who led in that country a most horrible life, b butchering one another, and assassinating their own priests, who sometimes were not better than themselves. The king of Rakan kept them as a guard of his frontiers against the Mogol, in the port called Chategon (H) (which he had taken from Bengâl), giving them lands, and liberty to live as they pleased. Their usual trade was robbery and piracy; they not only scoured the sea-coasts, but entered the rivers, especially the chanel of the Ganges; and often penetrating forty or fifty leagues up the country, surprised and carried away whole towns and villages of people, with great cruelty, and burning all which they could not carry away. Hence it is, faith our author, that there are seen in the mouth of that river so many fine islands quite deserted, which were formerly very populous.

their villanies;

AFTER they had done all this mischief, they had the impudence to go and sell the old people, whom they could make no use of, in the very country from whence they had taken them; so that those who had escaped by flight, brought to-day their fathers and mothers, who c had been made slaves of yesterday. The rest of their captives they made rowers of, and such Christians as they were themselves; or else sold them to the Portugueses belonging to other part of the Indies; and even to those of Ogowli (or Hugli), who settled there by favour of Jehân Gbir, on promise to keep the bay of Bengâl free from pirates. This trade was carried on towards the isle of Galles, near cape Palmas, where these corsairs waited for the Portugueses, who filled their ships with slaves at an easy rate: this infamous rabble bragging that they made more Christians in one year, than all the missionaries through the Indies did in ten. They were these pirates who made Shâb Jehân at last to vent his passion not only against the jesuit missionaries at Agra, most of whose church (I) he caused to be pulled down; but also against the Franghis of Owgli, for conniving at the pirates, and filling their houses with slaves, d who were his natural subjects (K).

seize Sundiva.

THESE miscreants, some time before the desolation of Owgli, offered the viceroy of Goa to put the whole kingdom of Rakan into his hands for the king of Portugal: but he refused to send the succours demanded by one Bastian Gonsalvo, who was their captain, and had married one of the king's daughters. This the viceroy did, as they say, not thro' detestation of the treason, but out of arrogance and jealousy, that Bastian should have the honour of doing such an exploit. About the same time these pirates seized on the island of Sundiva, commanding, in some measure, the mouth of the Ganges; in which isle a certain Augustin frier, a very famous man, acted the king for many years. Having taken a course, God knows how, says our author, to rid himself of the commander of that place, these same robbers, who carried e Soltân Sujâb from Dâka to Rakan, as before related, found means, by the way, to open his coffers, and to rob him of good store of jewels; which they sold privately at Rakan, for a small matter, for want of knowing the value of them. In short, their depredations were so great in Bengâl, that they for many years obliged the Great Mogol to garrison the passes everywhere, and keep a great militia on foot at land, as well as a fleet of galleasses at sea, to oppose their courses: but they only laughed at the Mogol soldiery, and were become so daring at sea, that four or five of their galleasses would set upon fourteen or fifteen of the others, which they actually worsted and took, or run aground ⁱ.

A frier king.

Pirates revolt

to

THIS was the condition of the pirates, when Shâb Hest Khân entered upon the government of Bengâl; and this lord knowing that it was impracticable to pass any forces, either horse or f foot, from Bengâl to Rakan, on account of the many chanel and rivers upon the frontiers; considering also, that those pirates would hinder him to transport his army by sea, he resolved to engage the Dutch in his design; and for that purpose sent an officer to Batavia, to persuade the general to join with him in subduing the kingdom of Rakan. The general of Batavia, judging this a proper means to destroy the Portuguese power in the Indies, and enlarge their own, dispatched two men of war for Bengâl, to favour the transportation of the Mogol troops:

^a BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 11, & seqq. 131.

ⁱ BERNIER, p. 118, & seqq.

(H) Chatigon, as Bernier writes it, and Natigam, as the Portugueses. Its true name, according to Hamilton, is Chittagong. It stands at the mouth of the eastern branch of the Ganges; is a poor place, in the hands of the Mogols; altho' the descendants of the Portugueses are the domineering lords of it. New Account of East Ind. vol. ii. p. 22. and 25

(I) It was fair and large, built as well as that of Lahûr, by Jehân Gbir, with a great steeple over it, and a bell, whose sound might be heard all over the city.

(K) See more of these affairs hereafter.

but

a but before those men of war arrived, Shâb Hest Khân, having equipped a great number of galleasses, and many large vessels, for the same service, sent to acquaint the pirates with his design upon Rakan; promising, in case they abandoned the service of the king, and took part with Aureng Zib, that he would distribute among them as much land in Bengâl as they desired, and give them double the pay which they then had. On the other hand, he threatened, in case they refused his offers, utterly to spoil and ruin them.

The pirates, whether for fear of the Mogol general, or the king of Rakan, one of whose officers they had about that time assassinated, were one day struck with such a panic, that they shipped themselves, all at once, in forty or fifty of their galleasses, with the utmost precipitation, and wafted over to Bengâl. Shâb Hest Khân received them with open arms, and gave them considerable pay: then, without letting them cool, carried them with him to attack the island of Sundîva, which was fallen into the hands of the king of Rakan, and afterwards Chattigon, both which he took. About the same time the two Dutch ships arrived: but Shâb Hest Khân, imagining that he should now be able to compass his design without their assistance, put off, with thanks and compliments, the captains of those vessels, who were not well pleased at being so duped. As to the pirates, when he had served his purposes with them, he never minded to perform the large promises he made. Knowing that they were in his power, and unable to help themselves, he let them go whole months without pay, considering them as traitors and infamous men, who were to be used at discretion; and in this manner did Shâb Hest Khân put an end to that rabble.

c AURENG ZIB was very jealous and strict over his children. He sent his eldest son Soltân Mahmûd, as hath been said, to Gwaliyar; but according to report, did not make him drink the powst, or stupefying potion. Nor was he well satisfied, for a time, with his second son, Soltân Mauzm, who afterwards came to the throne; although he always was a pattern of reservedness and moderation. Whether it was to try his courage, or that he thought him too forward in making a party in his late sickness; he one day, in a full assembly, ordered him to go kill a lion, which, descending from the mountains, had made great havock in the plains: and when the master of the hunt called for those large and strong nets used in this dangerous game, the king told him, that when he was prince, he did not look for such formalities. It was Mauzm's good fortune to succeed in this enterprise, without losing more than two or three men, and having a few horses wounded; although he was in some small danger himself, the wounded lion having leapt up to the head of his elephant. After that, Aureng Zib expressed much affection to him, and gave him the government of Dekan; but with so little power and income, that he had not much to apprehend from him^k.

It has been already observed, that Mohabet Khân had been received into favour by Aureng Zib. This prince, unwilling, as he said, to lose so brave a commander, and one who had stuck so close to his benefactor Shân Jeshân, not only pardoned him, but removed him from the government of Kâbul to that of Guzerât, in place of Jessom seyn, whom he sent to make war in Dekan. However, this favour of Aureng Zib was probably owing to some considerable presents which the Khân made to Rushn ray Begum, in conjunction with others presented to the Great Mogol himself, consisting of many excellent Persian horses and camels, besides 15,000 or 16,000 rupis of gold. As Aureng Zib did not ruin all those who were against him, or not of his party, in the late wars, so he did not fail to reward such as had faithfully served him: for besides his uncle Shâb Hest Khân, on whom he conferred the government of Bengâl, he gave to Mîr Khân that of Kâbul; to Khalil'ollah Khân, that of Labûr; to Mîr Bâba, that of Elabâs; to Lasker Khân, that of Pâtna. He appointed the son of Ala Verdi Khân (L) governor of Sendi; Fazel Khân he made Khâneh Samman, that is, great steward of the house royal; Daneshmend Khân, governor of Dehli (M); and Dianet Khân, governor of Kashmîr^l.

'Tis true, that Nejabâd Khân, who had behaved well in the battles of Semongher and Kajoweh, was dismissed; but that was, because he had the presumption to upbraid the king with the services done him. As to what concerns the Râjahs Jeseyn and Jessom seyn, this latter was suspected of holding intelligence with Seva ji, who had plundered Surât (N): for which reason Aureng Zib called him away from Dekan; but, instead of going to Dehli, he went to his own territory. In his place the king sent Jeseyn, accompanied by his son Soltân Mauzm, who yet was vested with no power. This Râjah presently besieged the principal fortrefs of Seva ji; and, no less by his dexterity in treating, than by force, prevailed on that

^k BERNIER, p. 131, & seqq.

^l Ibid. p. 146, & seqq.

(L) Who was of Soltân Sujâb's party.

(M) This was the lord by whom Bernier was retained as physician. As he was always employed in studies and foreign affairs, he was dispensed with from attending twice every day in the assembly of Omrâs, without having his salary retrenched.

(N) This was in 1664; in which year, we are told by Frazer, that Aureng Zib went against the Râjapûts; and that his son Soltân Mohammed Akber revolted from him, and joined them; that the king pursued him into Dekan; but that the prince found means to get by sea to Persia. Yet Gemelli says, this revolt happened in 1680; as will be observed afterwards.

lord to surrender, before it came to extremities. This done, he drew Seva over to the Mogol a interest, against Viziapûr; on which, Aureng Zib declared him a Râjah, and gave the pension of a considerable Omrâ to his son. Some time after, at the instigation of that monarch, he went to Debli, on the faith of Jesseyn.

Escapes from court.

BUT Aureng Zib being prevailed on, by the persuasion of his uncle Shâb Hest Khân's wife, to arrest him, he found his pavilions, one evening, beset by three or four Omrâs: however, he made shift to get away in the night. This escape made a great noise at court: and as every-body accused the eldest son of Jesseyn to have assisted in it, the Râjah left Dekan, to secure his estate, by advice of his friends; keeping night and day on his guard, for fear the Great Mogol should lay hold of the pretence to seize his lands: but when he was at Brâm- pûr he died. For all this, Aureng Zib, far from expressing any resentment to his son, con- b doled with him for his father's death, and continued his pension: which confirms, says our author, what many said, that Seva ji's escape was with the consent of the king himself, that he might avoid the resentment of the ladies of the court.

Sieges of Kandahâr.

AURENG ZIB, being now engaged in no foreign broils, began to think of recovering Kan- dahâr, which has of late ages been the subject of grievous wars. Akber took it from the Persians; and Shâb Abbas I. recovered it from his son, Jehân Ghîr: afterwards it returned to Shâb Jehân, by means of the governor Ali Merdân Khân, who, to avoid the malice of his enemies, surrendered it to him, and went to live at his court. The city was besieged, and retaken afterwards, by the son of Shâb Abbâs (O), from the same prince, who twice attempted c to regain it, but without success. The first time it escaped, through the misunderstanding among the Persian Omrâs, at the court of the Great Mogol; for they behaved very slackly, and would not follow Râjab Rowp, who had already planted his standard on the wall towards the mountain. The second time it was saved by the jealousy of Aureng Zib himself, who commanded at the siege: for after a large breach had been made in the wall by the cannon, which was served by English, Portugueses, Germans, and French, he would not enter it; that it might not be said to have been taken in the time of his brother Dara, who first proposed the siege, and was then at Kâbul, with his father Shâb Jehân.

Aureng Zib's attempt.

THIS prince, a little before the war among his sons, would have besieged it the third time, had he not been diverted by Amîr Femla, who persuaded him to turn his arms towards Dekân.
In this he was seconded by Ali Merdân Khân himself; who, on that occasion, told him, d that he could never expect to take it, unless he had another traitor there, such as he was. However, Aureng Zib prepared to make a new trial, as above-mentioned; urged thereto either by the offensive letters of the king of Persia, relating to his proceedings against his father and brothers, or by the ill-treatment given by that monarch to his ambassador, Tarbiet Khân.
But hearing of the king of Persia's death, he turned back; saying, as was reported, that he would not meddle with a child; a new king. This reason, however, our author does not think probable; because Shâh Soleymân, who succeeded his father, was, in his opinion, about twenty-five years of age^m.

BERNIER does not inform us what that treatment was which Shâb Abbâs II. gave to the Mogol's ambassador: but we have an account of it from another traveller, of the same time, e who relates it in the following manner.

Mogol ambaf-sador,

SOME months before the death of Shâb Jehân, Aureng Zib sent an ambassador into Persia, who was magnificently received and caressed for a month; but on the day when he delivered the presents, the king divided them among the officers of his house, only keeping one diamond, which weighed sixty carats. A few days after, Shâb Abbâs sent for the ambassador, who having dropped some expressions against Ali, his majesty asked him what his name was?
He answered, that Shâb Jehân had given him that of Baubek Khân; that is, Lord of a free heart; and honoured him with one of the chief employments at court. Then thou art a villain, replied the king, with an angry countenance, to desert thy sovereign in his necessity, after thou hadst received so many favours from him, to serve a tyrant, who keeps his father f in prison, and has murdered all his brothers. How dares he, continued the Persian, to take upon him the title of Alem Ghîr, or, Conqueror of all the world, who never conquered any thing; but possesses all he has by treachery and parricide? Hast thou been one of those who counselled him to shed so much blood, to be the executioner of his brothers, and to keep his father in prison? Thou art not worthy to wear a beard: and with that, immediately ordered it to be shaved off; which is the greatest indignity that can be offered in that country. Soon after, he commanded the ambassador to return home: sending with him, for a present to Aureng Zib, 150 beautiful horses, with a great quantity of gold and silver carpets, and other stuff, to an immense value. But when Baubek Khân had given his master an account of the king of Persia's behaviour, Aureng Zib sent the horses into several parts of the city, and ordered it to be g insulted in Perna.

^m BERNIER, p. 148—157.

(1) Shâh Sefi.

proclaimed,

a proclaimed, that the followers of Ali could not ride those horses, without being unclean, as coming from a king who did not obey the true law. After which, he ordered them to be killed, and the rest of the presents to be burnt; uttering, at the same time, many reproachful words against the king of Persiaⁿ.

b AFTER Aureng Zib had sat on the throne near seven years, his father, Shâh Jêhân, died, on Shâh Jêhân Sunday the 21st of January, 1666, in the castle of Agra, aged seventy-four solar years and sixteen days. His body was interred in the same city, in the magnificent monument which he caused to be erected for his empress Mehd Aliya, called also Tâje Mâhl, and which had cost him sixty laks, of 750,000*l*. Aureng Zib was exceedingly affected at this news; on which he that instant set out from Debli for Agra, where every thing was with pomp prepared for his reception by Begum Sâbeb (or Jêhân Ara Begum); who at his entrance into the harâm presented him with a great golden bason, wherein were all her jewels, as well as those of Shâh Jêhân. In short, she received him in so magnificent a manner, and entertained him with so much dexterity, that she not only obtained his pardon, but also gained his favour, and even his confidence^o. He took her along with him, in his return to Jêhân abâd, or Debli: but not long after she died; and every-body suspected that she had been taken off by poison^p.

ⁿ TAVERNIER, Trav. part 2. l. 2. c. 7.

^o FRASER, Hist. Nadir Shah, p. 25. BERNIER, p. 174.

^p TAVERNIER, Trav. Ind. l. 2. c. 3. p. 114.

S E C T. III.

Conquests, and other transactions, to the death of Aureng Zib.

c ALTHOUGH Aureng Zib reigned so long in Hindûstân, yet we meet with very little, in either travellers, or other authors, relating to his reign, after the death of Shâh Jêhân, in 1666; where Bernier leaves off his history, which has furnished materials to succeeding writers. We are even assured, that there is no history extant, but of the first thirteen years of that monarch's reign, from 1658 to 1671; he having forbidden, under severe penalties, any account of his actions from that time to be written, during his life (A). All therefore we can do, in this case, is to collect the few scattered passages to be found chiefly in travellers, to supply, in some measure, this deficiency.

d ABOUT the year 1678 Râjah Jesson seyn, who had been instrumental in raising Aureng Zib Râjapûts at- to the throne, dying, that monarch demanded of his widow the treasure and territory belong- tacked ing to her late husband: but she returned for answer, that she had no money, but store of swords. This attack upon the Rânnâ, or princes, brought all the Hindûs into a confederacy with her: besides, Mohammed Amîr Khân, governor of Guzerât, who was son of Amîr Jemla, and her relation, was making parties for advancing to the throne one of the sons of Aureng Zib, who was thus engaged on all sides in wars. This gave occasion to Seva ji to move towards Surât, while a neighbouring Râjah marched against Brâmpûr, whose governor the Great Mogol had sent for to join him with his troops. In 1679 Aureng Zib made great preparations to attack the Râjapûts, who had revolted, as before-mentioned; but was for some time prevented by the rains, which were so heavy, that the tops of trees, near Surât, were under water (B). However, as soon as they were over, that monarch left Jêhân abâd (or Debli) with 10,000 e men, to go against them. Mean time his eldest son, Soltân Mahmûd, advanced to Brâmpûr, with a formidable army; for all which, Seva ji plundered the country in 1680. Aureng Zib A. D. 1680: continues a double poll-tax on the Hindûs, and breaks down all their images where-ever he finds them; so that, being forbidden to worship them in public, they retired to woods and caves to perform their devotions.

In the midst of these combustions, the famous Seva ji died, on the 1st of June, the same year.

f In the interim Aureng Zib, jealous of his eldest son, sent him to the Jowalar, or post (T). by Aureng He likewise recalled his second and third sons; Soltân Azem from his government of Bengâl, Zib. and Soltân Mauzm (U) from Aureng abâd: but, fearing to trust themselves in his power, they refused to resign them, and to repair to court. This disobedience to his commands their father was then obliged to take no farther notice of, as he had been out twice this year with a

^q FRYER's Trav. p. 412, & seqq.

(A) For this information we are beholden to Mr. Fra- ser, author of the history of Nadir Shâh.

(B) Our author, Fryer, tells us, p. 414. that this same year there fell a shower of blood, for 12 hours, within the land; and that on the coast (of Golkonda) Machla- patan (or Masulîpâtan) was overwhelmed by an inundation, whereby 16,000 of the inhabitants perished.— It was almost depopulated by a plague, in 1687.

(T) Perhaps it should be to Gwalîyâr, to drink the powst, or stupefying draught.

(U) Fryer calls one Assum, the other Massum.

numerous army against the Râspûts; who, retiring into the mountains, so fatigued the Mogols, and distressed them with want of provisions, that the king was forced to return without being able to engage them^a.

His sons revolt.

THE disaffection of his three eldest sons made Aureng Zib more fond of his youngest, Soltân Akber, whom he intended for his successor; but forbore to nominate him, till he had executed his designs against the Râspûts; whom he intended to extirpate. To weaken the conspirators, he ordered Mohammed Amîr Khân, the governor of Guzerât, to join him. This lord, who was originally a Hindû, inclined to favour the Rânnâ, or widow of *Jessen Sing; and finding that the Mogol generals drew from her great sums of money, under pretence of sending it to court to make her peace with the emperor, yet at the same time took Cheyttûr, the capital city, by surprise; he acquainted Aureng Zib with their fraudulent practices. He b likewise informed him, that Kâbul Khân, who was of his privy-council, held correspondence with Soltân Mauzm in Dukkân (or Dekân): but at the same time advised him to remit his severities against the Hindûs; alleging, that otherwise a general defection of them was to be apprehended.

The pagods destroyed.

THIS advice Aureng Zib did not relish: but, having soon after seized letters from Kâbul Khân to Soltân Mauzm, urging him to begin a rebellion while his father was in Azmîr, at war with the Rânnâ, he found it was best for the present to take it; and ordered the treacherous Khân to be thrown headlong from a steep rock, as a reward for his perfidy. Mean time, although the emperor was withheld from his design of reformation among his Hindû subjects, yet he gave orders to demolish all the temples and images in Azmîr and the country c of Jessen Sing, which his army had subdued. In this devastation Cheyttûr suffered most; its magnificent marble structures being levelled with the ground. This city, which is impregnable by its situation, could never have been taken by force: but the Rânnâ, relying on the promises of the Mogols generals, neglected to provide the place with either men or ammunition; so that they who were in it on the enemies approach, finding themselves unable to oppose them, retreated into the mountains, and left this fortress open to their arms. After this, whatever the cause was, the Mogol forces were withdrawn in the midst of their career against the infidels; and commissioners left behind with very friendly offers towards an accommodation; which gave room to conjecture, that Aureng Zib was smitten with the Râjah's widow, who was a very beautiful lady^f.

Soltân Akber
rebels;
A. D. 1684.

THE next thing of note which we meet with in this reign, is the rebellion of his favourite d son Soltân Akber; who, we are told, was more ambitious than all the rest. This prince was sent (X) with an army of 30,000 men to make war on the Râjah Lisone, who borders on the kingdom of Azmîr (Y): but instead of subduing, he was prevailed on to join him: after which they both marched with their forces, consisting of 70,000 horse and a competent number of foot, most of them Râspûts, and entered Azmîr, where his father then was; who could hardly believe the thing real. Here, whilst the prince rested his army, much fatigued with the long march, the crafty old man, not having force sufficient to oppose him, had recourse to stratagem. He therefore wrote letters, directed to his son, in which he commended his conduct in drawing the idolaters to that place to be cut-off, as had been agreed; and promised to advance the next day, and put that design in execution. This letter he sent e by a trusty eunuch into the enemy's camp, with orders to behave so, that he might be seized as a spy, and a letter intercepted. The thing was managed accordingly, and had the desired effect: for, although Akber swore on the Korân that it was a contrivance of his father's to divide them, the Hindû chiefs would never believe him. These jealousies kept them so long employed, that Aureng Zib had time to call Shâib Alem, with a powerful army: who defeated both the Râjah and Akber.

fies to Persia.

AKBER after this put himself, with 4000 horse, under the protection of Râjah Samba (Z): but Aureng Zib attacked him so vigorously, that at length he took him prisoner, and caused his head to be cut-off, for having uttered some indecent expressions in his presence. This

^a FRYER'S Trav. p. 412, & seqq.

^f Ibid. p. 416, & seqq.

* Or Jessom seyn.

(X) There is much disagreement among authors about the date of this event. According to Frazer, he revolted to the Râspûts in 1664; but, had that been so, Bernier, Tavernier, and Thevenot, would have mentioned it. Gemelli places this revolt in 1680: but in that year Fryer says he was in great favour. Captain Hamilton, vol. i. p. 245, puts it about 1685. In this case Frazer must have mistaken 64 for 84. In effect, it must have been rather after than before 1684; since Gemelli says Aureng Zib had in 1695 been four years at Gulgala, after the defeat of Akber; whom he saw at Ispahan in 1694.

(Y) Hamilton says, that Aureng Zib was then in De-kan against Seva ji; but could not reduce him; because Akber had a friendship for that Râjah, and still betrayed his father's designs. Also that the king having drawn Seva ji to his camp, with design to cut him off, Akber gave him notice, and he fled by night. The king, suspecting his son, sent him a rich vest, but poisoned; whereupon Akber fled to Dandi Râjapûr, and thence to Masât in Arabia. New account of East-India, vol. i. p. 245, & seq.

(Z) Samba Râjah, according to Fryer, was brother to Seva ji. See his Travels, p. 169, 171. But, p. 79, we find a son of that name, who succeeded his father in 1680. p. 415.

^a Râjah's ruin was owing to his drunkenness: for, though the centinels twice gave him notice, while he was drinking in his tent with his women dancers, that the Mogol army was advancing, instead of going to arms, he ordered their heads to be cut-off; saying, "the enemy" would not dare to come where he was." His son, who was not so far gone in liquor, escaped with one thousand horse, leaving his father behind; who soon smarted for his folly and intemperance.

As for Akber, he got away to Goa, and from thence was conveyed to Ormiz (A). Notice of his arrival being sent to Shâh Soleymân, this prince had him conducted to Ispâhân, and allowed him a pension suitable to his quality. Aureng Zib tried several arts to draw him out of Persia; but Akber was too wise to trust him. He likewise made war on Seva ji (B), for assisting that prince; and, after taking several towns, besieged him in his capital, called Jinji (C). This place is seated amidst seven mountains, with each a fort at top, which may be relieved in spite of the Mogols, who lay before them with 60,000 horse and foot, to little purpose. When Gemelli left India, the siege had lasted seven years^s.

IN 1688, Sir John Child, governor of Bombay, pretending grievances, gave in articles to the governor of Surât; and, not meeting with the redress which he expected, resolved to indemnify himself by taking the India merchant ships. In January 1689 he left Surât, and in his way to Bombay seized a fleet of vessels, carrying corn to an army of the Great Mogol's, which lay at Dunder Râjapûr, fourteen leagues to the southward. Hereupon Sedi Yakûp, the general, sent twice to the governor, in a very civil manner, to desire that he would discharge his fleet: but Sir John returning an insolent answer both times, Sedi Yakûp, on February 14th, landed 20,000 men, and soon took the whole island, excepting the fort; which he began to press upon. So that, in December, the governor sent two deputies to Jehân abâd, to beg pardon of Aureng Zib, and desired a new Firmân: which, in June 1690, the 31st of his reign, was granted, on condition that the governor should leave India in nine months (but he died in January), and satisfaction be made to his subjects, for debts due, and damages received. This was an argument of that monarch's pacific and forgiving disposition; as his granting a Firmân to Mr. Boucher, an English merchant, to secure him against the implacable malice and wicked persecution of the governor, was of his justice and humanity. Not long after, he received a new insult from Captain Every (or Avery), an English pirate, who took and plundered a great ship of his called the Gunsway; on which occasion our author Captain Hamilton, and Mr. Vauz (judge of Bombay), were made prisoners at Surât, in 1696^t.

WE should have been glad to conclude the reign of Aureng Zib with an account of his conquest over the two kingdoms of Viziapûr and Golkonda; which he had long resolved upon, and often attempted without success. But of these great events authors barely make mention, without so much as noting the year wherein they happened (D). It should seem from one writer, that in the year 1695, Golkonda was in the hands of its own prince; for that, the next year, advice arrived at Batavia, that the inhabitants were under much uneasiness, for fear of the Great Mogol; who, having conquered Viziapûr (E), was marching to attack that kingdom^e. But the truth is, that the capital of Golkonda was taken in 1687^{*}.

AURENG ZIB died at Abmednâgar, in the province of Dowlet abâd, the 31st of February 1707, after he had lived ninety lunar years, fourteen days, and reigned about fifty. He left a short will, in which he recommends the division which he had formerly made of his dominions to his sons, as the way to prevent much bloodshed. He told them, that whoever settled in Agra might have the province thereof, with Dekhan, Mâlva, and Guzerât; and that he who resided at Debli might have Kâbul, and the other provinces: but assigned neither part of any of them; only he ordered all his servants to be faithful to Mohammed Azem Shâh, his third son, who was then with him, Mauzum being at Kâbul; and recommended to such of his fortunate children as should chance to rule the empire, not to molest Mohammed Kam

^s GEMELLI Trav. ap. Churchill's Collect. vol. iv. p. 232.
vol. i. p. 200, 218, & seqq.

^t HAMILTON's New Account East-Indies, p. 155.
^{*} See the Hist. of Golkonda, book xiv. ch. 4. sect. 2.

(A) According to Captain Hamilton, he went to Maskât; where Messieurs Bendal and Stephens, two English gentlemen, provided him a vessel to carry him to Persia; and soon after his arrival, he was married to the king's sister. Ibid. p. 246.

(B) If this was so, Akber's revolt could be neither in 1684 nor 1680; for Seva ji died in June this last year, and Akber was in favour at Jehân abâd. There must be some mistake either in the Râjahs, or their names.

(C) We know of no place in Seva ji's country of this name. Jenab, on the borders, comes nearest it. Rari was his residence in 1678, when Fryer was in India.

(D) This is the case both of Gemelli and Frazer; who only say, that he added those kingdoms to his empire. Only Gemelli says Viziapûr was subdued in 1685, Golkonda is now reduced into a province, under the name of Heyder abâd; which is the Persian name for Bagh-nagar, the capital city.

(E) Viziapûr must then have been conquered in or about 1695. But Gemelli, who saw Aureng Zib encamped in that kingdom with a vast army, the same year, speaks of the conquest as made nine years before. Which must have been the case.

Bukhsb, his youngest son, in case he rested content with the two new Sababs, or governments, a meaning those of Vijapur, and Hayder abad, or Golkonda, which were lately conquered. He likewise ordered, that he should be buried in the place of Shâb Zeyno'ddîn, a Darwîsh, reputed holy, near the city where he died, without any pomp: and that only a tomb should be made for his corps, after the manner of the Darwîshes, which is plain, and without any ornament (F). As this prince was very zealous for Mohammedism, those of the religion make a great merit of visiting his tomb, especially on the 28th of the month Zilkaadb, which was the day he died on ^x.

His person, A CERTAIN traveller, who, in 1695, made a journey from Goa to the camp of Aureng Zib, then at Galgala in Viziapûr, and had an audience of him, gives the following account of his person. He was of a low stature, with a large nose, slender, and stooping with age. He walked leaning on a staff forked at the top, yet endorsed petitions without spectacles; and, by his chearful smiling countenance, seemed pleased with doing business in the public audience. His beard was white, and his complexion olive-coloured ^y.

and character. AURENG ZIB laboured to gain the reputation of being a strict observer of the Korân, and a lover of justice. He had so disposed of his time, that he could scarce ever be said to be idle. Some days in the week he bathed, before sun-rise: then, having prayed, he broke his fast. After that he spent two hours with his secretaries, and then gave public audience before noon. From thence he went to prayers again. This done he dined; and soon after gave audience a second time. Then followed the third and fourth time of prayer. He was next employed in the affairs of his family till two hours after it was dark: then he supped, and slept only two hours: after which he took the Korân, and read till break of day. This account was given our author by several eunuchs of the court; who, knowing their prince was skilled in necromancy (says Gemelli, no less superstitious than the eunuchs), believed he was assisted by the devil in that painful course of life; or could not have undergone so much fatigue in his old-age. Yet his diet was nothing but herbs and pulse.

His mildness: AFTER Aureng Zib had prescribed to himself this sort of life, he ceased to be bloody; and grew so mild, that the governors and Omrâs, depending on his clemency, neglected to pay him the obedience which they owed him. Hence the poor became oppressed by the great: for the king, when advised to be less merciful to those who transgressed his commands, answered, that heaven would punish them. The generality imputed this to his sanctity; but our author judged, that he connived at the faults of his ministers to attach them to him, and make them averse to a change.

daily employment. HOWEVER, he did not, when young, give himself up to sensual pleasures, as his predecessors had done; keeping a numerous harâm of women for ostentation rather than use. Nor was his table maintained out of the revenue of the crown. He said, the food was not good which cost the sweat of the subjects: but that every man ought to work for his living. For this reason he made caps, which he sent in presents to his governors; who, in return for the honour, remitted by the messengers several thousand rupis. When our author was in Hindûstân, his decrepid age having rendered him unable to work, he had reserved the revenue of four cities for his table. His expences were but small; for a vest of his did not cost above eight rupis (or twenty shillings); his sash, and chira, or cap, still less^z. He left in his private treasury 57,382 rupis (of 7172*l.* 15*s.*) as appears by his will.

His titles. AURENG ZIB, when he became emperor, assumed the titles of Mobio'ddîn, that is, the reviver of religion; and Alem Ghîr, the conqueror of the world^a. Gemelli says, he took the name of Alem Ghîr, in a belief that he possessed three parts in four of it. For this reason he carried a golden globe as his ensign, and had it in his seal. He likewise always tore off one corner of the paper he wrote on, to signify that the fourth part of the world was not his ^b.

His revenue. THE revenues of the empire were greatly increased in this prince's time: for, excluding Bâlkh, Kandabâr, and Bidukhsân, which Shâb Jebân possessed, and were afterwards lost, the remaining twenty-one provinces, reckoning the two new conquests, yielded a revenue of 12,071,876,840 dams which (at 320 dams to a pound sterling) make 37,724,615*l.* 10*s.* 0*d.* (G).

Soltân Mohammed. AURENG ZIB had five sons; first, Soltân Mohammed, or Mahmûd, as most authors call him. He was several times confined by his father's order: and once or twice imprisoned in Gwaliyâr; where it is reported by some that he died by drinking the powst^c: but we are told

^x FRASER, ubi supr. p. 33, & seqq.

^y GEMELLI, ubi sup. p. 222.

^z Ibid. p. 230, l. ii. c. 4.

^a FRASER, ubi supr. p. 29.

^b GEMELLI, ubi supr.

^c FRASER, p. 33, 38.

(F) He left by his will 1000 rupis (or 125 pounds), to be distributed among the poor, at his funeral.

(G) Gemelli makes the revenue eighty kror of rupis, every kror containing ten millions: by which account it will amount to one hundred millions. See his Voyage round the world, l. ii. ch. 6. ap. Church. Collect. vol. iv. p. 234.

a by a certain author, that, aiming at the crown, he proceeded so openly towards taking away his father's life, that, to prevent him, he caused him to be poisoned one day, when he went a hunting: and, mistrusting that he was not really dead, when he was brought to the palace, he, to be sure, commanded a red-hot iron to be run into his leg from the sole of his foot to his knee.

b MOHAMMED Mauzm, or, as Gemelli calls him, Shâb Alem (H), the second son, by the Mohammed death of Mahmûd had the right of eldest, and entertained the same thoughts of destroying his Mauzm, father. With this design he once caused a great trench to be dug near Aureng Zib's tent, that he might fall into it, as he passed along: but, the plot being discovered by an eunuch, Shâb Alem was shut-up in a dark prison; where, though sixty years of age, he remained six years; till a few days before our author arrived at the Mogol's camp in Viziapûr, which was in March 1695. Yet on account of his title by birth to the crown, many thousands of the soldiers were of his party, and even when he was in prison, continued firm; nor would receive any other pay, although he relieved them but meanly. He was at that time tall and corpulent, with a thick long beard, which began to be grey, being then sixty-five years of age. He succeeded Aureng Zib.

MOHAMMED Azem, or Azem Shâb, third son of Aureng Zib, played his game also in plot-Mohammed ting against his father, with the king of Viziapûr, his kinsman, before he was taken, and Azem, lost his dominions. Azem Shâb was fifty-five years old in 1695. Aureng Zib appointed him his successor; but his brother Shâb Alem deprived him of his crown and life.

c MOHAMMED Akber, or Soltân Akber, the fourth son, was the prince whom Aureng Zib was Mohammed most fond of, and designed for the throne: but his father's indulgence could not restrain him, Akber, more than the rest, from seeking the empire before his death, by rebellion; as hath been already related, with his flight to Persia, from whence he never returned to Hindûstân. In 1695 he was forty-five years of age.

AURENG ZIB's youngest son was Mohammed Kambukhs (I). Gemelli, who calls him Mohammed Sekânder, says he was about thirty in 1695, and infected with ambition, like the rest of his Kambukhs, brothers: for this reason, though after the conquest of Viziapûr the emperor had no enemy left more considerable than Seva ji, yet, fearing the designs of his sons, he had kept the field for fifteen years together^d.

^d GEMELLI, ubi supr. p. 220, & seqq. 231, & seqq.

(H) This shews, that Soltân Mauzm took the name throne, as Shâh Jehân had done before.

(I) That is, the giver of desires, or wishes. Frazer.

C H A P. IX.

Containing the reigns of the Emperors Kothbo'ddîn, Bahâdr Shâh, Jehândâr Shâh, Mohammed Furrukshîr, and Rafîya al Derjâl.

S E C T. I.

Reign of Kothbo'ddîn Bahâdr Shâh.

a U P O N Aureng Zib's death, Mohammed Azem Shâb (A) set out from Dekhan, with his Wins the father's troops, towards the capital, to take possession of the empire, according to his crown father's destination: but Mohammed Mauzm, as the eldest brother, resolved to dispute the title with him; and therefore, about the same time, departed from Kâbul with another army, in order to decide the controversy by a battle. The two princes met with their forces on the banks of the river Chun (or Jemni), near Agra. They were the most numerous which for several ages had come together in India; Mohammed Mauzm having had with him 150,000 horse and 178,000 foot, exclusive of the auxiliaries furnished by the Râjahs, and his brother nigh as many. In short, after an obstinate battle, Azem Shâb's forces were defeated, and himself slain. Hereupon Mohammed Mauzm was proclaimed emperor, and assumed the title b of Kothbo'ddîn Bahâdr Shâb, and Shâb Alem (B).

(A) Azem Shâb signifies the great or glorious king. This prince was then, according to Gemelli, reckoned sixty-seven years old.

(B) Or, as it may be now pronounced in the Indies, Shâb Allâm, which signifies king of the world. According to Gemelli, he went by this name or title many years before; it being customary for the princes to change their names on certain occasions. Bahâdr Shâb signifies the valiant king, and Kothbo'ddîn, the axis of religion. He was, according to Gemelli's account, seventy-seven years old.

THIS

from his brothers.

THIS prince at his accession made Mohammed Khân his Wazîr; Zulfekâr Khân, his Mîr Bukhshî, or paymaster-general; Dawd Khân, Soubahdâr, or lord-lieutenant, of the provinces of Dekhan; and Affad Khân absolute agent. Then, leaving this latter to take care of the capital, he marched against his brother Kam Bukhsh, who had left Vijapûr (or Viziapûr), and settled at Hayder abâd (C). There, after some small resistance, he was taken prisoner, and died the same night of the wounds which he had received in the fight.

Their sons.

BAHADR Shâh, having thus removed all obstructions out of his way, returned to his metropolis; and from thence went to Labûr, to suppress some religious riots: shortly after which he died, when he had reigned about six years. This emperor had four sons: Mauzo'ddîn, called also Jehândâr Shâh (D); Mohammed Azîm, or Azîm al Shân (E); Raffiya al Kadr, or Raffiya al Shân (F); Khojesta Akhter, or Jehân Shâh (G).

SOLTAN Mohammed Azem had two sons; Mohammed Bidûr Bukht (H), and Mohammed Wallâ Jâh (I).

SOLTAN Mohammed Kam Bukhsh had one son; Jesdân Bukhsh, called also Rahmân Bukhsh (K); whose daughter was married to Nasr Allab Mirzâ (L), son of Nadir Shâh, or Tabmasp Kûli Khân^a.

^a FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Shah, p. 39, & seqq.

(C) Formerly called Bâgnâgar, the capital city of Golkondâ.

(D) Mauzo'ddîn signifies the honour or glory of religion; Jehândâr Shâh, the king who possesses the world. Frazer.

(E) Mohammed Azîm, Mohammed the Great; Azîm al Shân, of great figure, or rank. Frazer.

(F) Raffiya al Kadr, of exalted power; Raffiya al Shân, of exalted rank.

(G) Khojesta Akhter, of happy stars; Jehân Shâh, king of the world.

(H) Bidûr Bukht, whose fortune is awake. Frazer.

(I) Wallâ Jâh, of august rank.

(K) Jesdân Bukhsh, God's gift; Rahman Bukhsh, the gift of the merciful. Frazer.

(L) Nasr Alla, assisted by God. Frazer.

S E C T. II.

Reign of Jehândâr Shâh.

His success:

ON the death of Babâdr Shâh, Azîm al Shân gathered a powerful army: to oppose which, and prevent his possessing the empire, his three brothers, Jehândâr Shâh, Raffiya al Shân, and Jehân Shâh, joined their forces to oppose him. The two armies at length coming to an engagement, Azîm al Shân was defeated and slain. The confederate brothers after this could not agree about the partition of the empire: and, during the contest, the treasure of the deceased prince fell into the hands of Zulfekar Khân, who was in Jehândâr Shâh's interest. As this accession of wealth greatly augmented his power, he marched against his two remaining brothers; and, having overcome their forces, took and put them both to death. The destruction of his brothers secured the empire to Jehândâr Shâh, and Zulfekar Khân became his Wazîr.

Awake prince;

HE was a weak prince, and so foolishly fond of one of his wives, named Lal Koar, who was of an obscure parentage, and a singer by profession, that he endeavoured to fill the places of greatest trust and honour in the empire with her mean relations. This misconduct so disgusted Seyd Abdallab Khân and Seyd Hassan Khân, two brothers, who were of great authority, and had a choice body of troops at their command, that they resolved to place Mohammed Furruksîr (M), son of Azîm al Shân, on the throne. This prince, who was then in Bengâl, notwithstanding he had but little treasure, got numbers of people to join his party, with whom he marched to dethrone the emperor. At first he met and defeated (N) Eazo'ddîn, son of Jehândâr Shâh. After which he proceeded against Jehândâr Shâh himself: who, through the treachery and cowardice of his troops, was defeated near Agra, and obliged to fly, although he had near 100,000 horse and foot.

is dethroned.

JEHANDAR SHAH had one son, Eazo'ddîn.

AZIM AL SHAN had one son, Mohammed Furruksîr.

RAFIYA AL SHAN had three sons; Raffiya al Derjât (O), Raffiya al Dowlat (P), and Soltân Ibrâhim.

JEHAN had one son, Mohammed Shâh, who was the late emperor of Hindûstân^b.

^b FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 41, & seqq.

(M) Furruksîr (or Furruksîr) signifies of happy disposition. Frazer.

(N) Eazo'ddîn (or Azzo'ddîn) signifies the glory of religion. Frazer.

(O) Raffiya al Derjât, of exalted degree.

(P) Raffiya al Dowlat, of exalted fortune. Frazer.

S E C T. III.

Reign of Mohammed Furrukhsîr.

^a MOHAMMED FURRUKHSÎR, son of Azim al Shan, being settled on the throne, Seyd Abdollah Khân was made Wazîr, with the title of Kothb al Mulluk, and Jâr bâ shers wafâ (Q). Hassan Ali Khân was appointed Mîr Bukhshî, or paymaster-general, with the title of Amîr al Omrâ (R). As these two brothers usurped the absolute management of all affairs, the emperor found himself in effect only so in name, while these ministers had the whole power in their own hands. Furrukhsîr, ill brooking the condition of a nominal sovereign, at length, by the advice of Khândorân and Mîr Jumla, began to contrive means how to get rid of such assuming subjects. The two brothers, on the other hand, were intent on nothing so much as enriching themselves. They turned out Nizâm al Mulluk (S), son of Gâzi'ddîn Khân (T), from his government of Dekkân, and Hassan Ali Khân went thither himself. At last, the two brothers, finding that the emperor grew jealous of their power, resolved to dethrone him, and place a more passive prince in his room.

To accomplish their design the more effectually, they endeavoured to draw into their measures Ajît Sang, the Mâha Râjah; who, although his daughter was married to Furrukhsîr, joined in the conspiracy. Having seized the emperor's person, they first confined, and shortly after blinded him, by drawing a red-hot wire over his eyes. At length, on the 16th of February, 1719, after offering him a thousand indignities, they put him to death, when he had reigned seven years. It was in this emperor's time that the English East-India company obtained a Firmân (U), exempting them from paying any duties within his dominions^c.

^c FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 43, & seqq.

(Q) Kothb al Mulluk, the axis of the empire; Jâr bâ wafâ, the grateful friend. Fraser.

(R) The prince of princes, or commander of commanders. Fraser.

(S) A title, signifying he who arranges and puts in order the empire. His first name was Chîn Kulij Khân, which, in the Tatar language, signifies the sword-drawing lord. Some corruptly pronounce Chuklas Kaun. He has a son named Gâzi'ddîn, who has lately gotten the title of Nâsr Jing, victorious in war.

(T) The champion of religion.

(U) It signifies, literally, an order; but is used for a patent or grant from the emperor. Mr. Fraser has inserted a translation of this Firmân, with an explanation of the terms.

S E C T. IV.

Reign of Rafîya al Derjât.

^c THE Seyds, after they had made away with Furrukhsîr, took Rafîya al Derjât, son of Rafîya al Shân I. out of the castle of Selîngur, where the royal family are confined, and placed him on the throne. But he had not reigned above three months before they murdered him also: and, sending for his brother, advanced him to the empire.

S E C T. V.

Reign of Rafîya al Dowlet.

^d THIS prince, after the murder of his brother, was by the assassins proclaimed with the usual solemnity; but in a few days after he died a natural death, and was succeeded by Rafîya al Dowlet.

^d FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 54.

C H A P. X.

The reign of Nasro'ddîn Mohammed Shâh, 12th emperor.

S E C T. I.

Affairs at court till the invasion of Nâdir Shâh.

12. Khân Mohammed Shâh.

One brother slain,

the other taken;

but is spared,

and well treated.

MOHAMMED SHAH, who was the son of Jebân Shâh, on his advancement to the throne, assumed the title of Nasro'ddîn; that is, the supporter or assister of religion. But the Seyds, who had raised him to that dignity, allowed him no more of the imperial power than they had done to his cousin Furruksbîr; which made him eagerly wish for an opportunity of making himself independent, and revenge the death of that prince. Nor was he long without accomplishing his desires. For, in October 1720, Mohammed Shâh, accompanied by Hassan Ali Khân and several other Omrâs, set out from Agra, with a numerous army, under pretence to reduce Nesâm al Muluk, who had grown very powerful in Dekkan. At the end of the first day's march, being nine measured kos from the capital, the emperor (as it had been concerted) called a Diwân, or council; and, after a short stay, withdrew. As soon as he was gone, Mohammed Amîn Khân (A), Heydr Kûli Khân (B), master of the ordnance, Khândoran; and several other Omrâs, who were most attached to the royal family, drawing their swords, fell on Hassan Ali Khân, and killed him, with two or three of his friends.

UPON this event, Mohammed Shâh laid aside the expedition to Dekkan, and returned towards Dehli, in order to cut-off Seyd Abdollah Khân, the other brother, who was in that capital, with a great force. This minister, as soon as he heard of Hassan Ali Khân's murder, took out of prison Soltân Ibrâbîm, son of Raffiya al Shân, and proclaimed him emperor. Then, having gathered what treasure he could, and broken to pieces the famous throne, which cost Shâh Jebân eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, in order to pay his soldiers, he soon completed an army of 50,000 horse, and advanced to meet the emperor, who had encamped at Serkad, which is twelve kos from Mhetra. On the second of November 1720, both armies came to an engagement; and after a bloody battle fought, Abdollah's forces were not only defeated, but the young Soltân and himself taken prisoners. The latter was desperately wounded, and the former had no other punishment inflicted on him than being sent back to his old quarters, the castle of Selîmgûr^a.

UPON this victory the emperor made great rejoicings: and, appointing Mohammed Amîn Khân Wazîr, returned to Dehli. There, Abdollah Khân being brought before him, he said, "Traitor, see what thou hast done." To which the other answered; "I took you out of prison, and gave you an empire. As I was at the head of an army when my brother was murdered by your order, self-preservation directed me to make use of it. Providence decreed you the victory: use it as you think proper, by treating this clay as your resentment or interest may prompt you." Then the emperor asking him, "What harm had Furruksbîr done to him?" his reply was, "that he grew jealous of his and his brother's power; and that, as it was inconsistent with their interest to resign it into his hands, they thought it dangerous to lose any time in removing him." He added, "that if providence had permitted them to continue acting with the same prudence, they should not have come to such a tragical end." The emperor then ordered him to be confined, and four servants allowed to attend him.

His clemency to this usurper extended still farther; for Furruksbîr's mother having desired that the murderer of her son might be delivered to her; he sent her word, that it was unlawful to put two persons to death for the murder of one, and that Hassan ali Khân had been killed in retaliation. He then ordered, that Abdo'llah Khân should lodge in the palace of Asof al Dowlet, have a pension of 3000 rupîs monthly, thirty household servants, and seventy menial ones, with provisions of all kinds from the royal kitchen; five women to attend him, and proper guards over him. But the Khân did not live long to enjoy this generous allowance; for he died a few months after of his wounds. Forty-five women, most of them his wives and concubines, and some his near relations, burned (C) themselves in one room, the night after his decease.

AFTER

^a FRASER, ubi supr. p. 54, & seqq.

(A) The faithful Khân.

(B) Heydr Kûli signifies the slave of the lion; meaning Ali Mortîsâ, son-in-law of Mohammed; who had, among others, the appellation of Heydr.

(C) In antient times, none but the wives of the Bramins had the privilege of burning themselves: but, since the government passed from them to the Râjpûts, it is customary, when any of their princes dies, for one or

^a AFTER the fall of the two brothers, Heydr Kûli Khân was in great favour, and afterwards made Sowbahdâr, or lord-lieutenant, of Abmed abâd. Nousrit Ear Khân was made Sowbahdâr of Ajmîr (or Azmîr); Sîr Bullind Khân was sent for from Kûbul to be made one of the Wazîrs; and Khândorân was made Mîr Bukhshî, or paymaster-general and treasurer, with the title of Amîr al Omra.

IN the year 1721-2, the emperor wrote to Nezâm al Muluk, then in Dekkan; desiring him to repair to court, and take on him the office of Wazîr. But this lord, after mentioning the designs of the late Seyds against him, declined that post, under pretence that he was not equal to it: upon which it was conferred on Mohammed Amîn Khân, and after his death on Kamro'ddîn Khân, his son; who still enjoyed it in 1741. Nezâm continued in Dekkan, as Subahdâr of Vijapûr, Heydr abâd, Aureng abâd, and other provinces, yet made no remittances to court; but appropriated the revenues to maintain an army, which he said was to keep in awe the Mâharâttas, or Ganims, the Sahow Râjah's subjects (D), in Dekkan; whom, notwithstanding, he permitted to ravage several of the king's provinces. They imposed a tribute of one fourth of the revenues (which they call chot) in many places, and some parts they have taken intirely to themselves. He well knew, that, with the assistance of the Mâharâttas, he could defy any attempts which might be made against him by the court ^b.

THUS things went on for some time: but as the affairs of the empire grew daily worse, through the indolence of the Wazîr, Mohammed Shâh resolved to send again for Nezâm al Muluk, who had been one of Aureng Zîb's old Amîrs, and was a person of great experience. Accordingly, orders being issued out for his appearance at Debli, he left his son Gâzio'ddîn Khân to command in Dekkan, and come to court. There he met with a gracious reception from the emperor; who made him absolute agent, which is greater than Wazîr, and honoured him with the title of Asof Jah (E). But as Mohammed Shâh was intirely governed by Khândorân, the paymaster-general, and Nezâm was for settling affairs on the same footing they were in Aureng Zîb's time, whatever he required on that score was opposed and laughed at by the Omrâs. As by this he perceived the weakness of the emperor, and the dissoluteness of the courtiers, who spent their time in the company of loose women and buffoons, he told his majesty the affairs of his province required his presence, and left the court.

ON his arrival in Dekkan, resolving to rouse the emperor and those about him out of their indolence, he encouraged Râjah Sahow to send his general, Bajiraw, to ravage the empire. The Mâharâttas soon over-ran the province of Mâlwa, killed the governor Guerdir Bahâdr; and, seizing all his riches, returned to Dekkan. As the court took no notice of these inroads, next year they entered Guzerât, and plundered the inhabitants, although they agreed to pay a quarter part of the revenue. From thence they went and harraided the country round Gwal-yâr; which being near the capital, the court was alarmed, and Khândorân, Kamro'ddîn Khân, and other Omrâs, sent with a powerful army to chastise them: but these great officers, judging peace the safest measure, agreed to pay the chot, or quarter part, and returned home. Notwithstanding this, when the money was paid, the Mâharâttas not only plundered the redeemed places, but resolved to proceed as far as Agra; there to receive the chot for Debli. This obliged the above-mentioned officers to march back to Agra; but, a little before they arrived, the enemy had crossed the river Jemna, with an intent to enter Awdîh ^c.

SAADIT KHAN, governor of that province, having notice of their design, marched against them with a strong body of troops; and, after an obstinate engagement, defeated them, took two of their principal officers, and killed 5000 of their men. With the remains of their army, they advanced to Ferid abâd, ten kos from Debli: upon which, Khândorân and the Wazîr, being joined by Saadit Khân, went in pursuit of them. But the Mâharâttas had left that place three hours before the Omrâs arrived, and proceeded to Kâlka, near that capital; where they stripped the inhabitants of all their effects; and, knowing that Debli had but few forces therein, they intended to plunder it. On this advice, the emperor sent Amîr Khân and Hassan Khân to oppose them: but, after an engagement of some hours, Hassan Khân was killed, and the army being almost routed, the Mâharâttas were on the point of entering the city; when the Wazîr, who had out-marched the other two Omrâs, came to his or more of his wives to be burned with him; but there is no compulsion in the case. Lately the Seyd and Pâtan families, in several parts of India, have, through excessive pride, gotten into this custom: and as it is strictly forbidden by their religion, which is the Mohammedan, they do it privately, by setting an apartment on fire about their ears. Frazer.

^b FRASER, ubi supr. p. 57, & seqq.

^c Ibid. ubi supr. p. 62, & seqq.

(D) The Sahow Râjah, who keeps his court at Set-tara in Dekkan, is a descendant of Seva Râjah, otherwise Seva ji. He has lately taken the island of Salset, the castle and town of Baqaim, with other places, from the Portugueses. He has above 200,000 horse in his dominions. Frazer's hist. of Nadir Shâh, p. 33. This seems to be the same prince, who, in Downing's history of the Indian wars, is called the Grand Seyd (or Seyd), from whom Angria took several territories along the sea-coast; and at length made an alliance with him, by marrying his daughter. The same author calls the subjects of that prince Sedeys, or Ganims, p. 232, and elsewhere.

(E) That is, in place and rank as Asof; who they say was Solomon's Wazîr. Frazer.

assistance, and put the enemy to flight. Not content with that, he pursued them for seven a kos from Dehli, and came up with them; yet, having no inclination to fight, secretly made up matters: upon which they marched back to Dekkan.

Nizâm's conspiracy.

THE emperor fearing always to be troubled with these incursions of the Ganims, while Nezâm al Muluk continued in Dekkan, in 1638, got Mebr Parvir, his grandmother, who had great interest with that lord, to write him a letter; promising him the intire management of affairs, provided he would come forthwith to court. Nezâm complied with her request: but met with worse treatment than before from the Omrâs, who took all opportunities of affronting him; especially Kbândorân, and his creatures, who used to ridicule him when he came to court; saying, Observe how the Dekkan monkey dances. This usage having wrought him up to the highest pitch of resentment, he resolved to be revenged of Kbândorân and his b party, though by distressing the empire. Not being able to draw the Wazîr Kamro'ddîn Kbân, though allied by marriage (F), into his plot, he prevailed with Saadit Kbân, Sowbahdâr of Awdib, who ever since the scandalous peace made with the Mâbarâttas, stood disaffected to the court; and the method they resolved on, was to call in Nâdir Shâb, ruler of Persia, who was then repairing and fortifying Kandahâr; which, during the confusion at the Great Mogol's court, he had subdued ^d.

^d FRASER, ubi supr. p. 66, & seqq.

(F) Nizâm's son was married to the Wazîr's daughter, and the Wazîr's son to Nizâm's daughter.

S E C T. II.

The conquest of Hindûstân by Nâdir Shah, and confinement of the emperor.

Nâdir Shâh's invited:

THE conspirators having removed the difficulties which Nâdir Shâb urged in his answer c to their letters, and promised to make every thing easy to him; that hero set-out with an army of 125,000 horse, of several nations, all inured to hardships. Mean time, Nezâm al Muluk and Saadit Kbân used all their endeavours secretly to promote their design; and as Sherzîb Kbân, governor of the castle (G) of Kâbul, Nazîr Kbân, Sowbahdâr of that province, a creature of Kbândorân's, and Zakariya Kbân, ruler of the province of Labûr, were the chief obstructions in Nâdir Shâb's way, they wrote to inform them, "that, as the emperor and his " favourite courtiers employed their time in nothing but wine and women, they could have no " assistance from court; and therefore the best that they could do, was on this occasion to act " discreetly, and save themselves." These letters had the desired effect with the two latter. So that Nazîr Kbân, finding that Nâdir Shâb, after he had taken Ghorbund and Ghoznavi (H), d was marching to Kâbul, retired from thence to Peyshur: but Sherzîb Kbân defended both city and castle for six weeks. He sent repeatedly to Nazîr Kbân, and the court, for assistance; but none coming, both were at length, in June, taken by storm, and he, with his son, put to death. The victor here found treasures of great value; which had been laid up in vaults ever since the time of Soltân Bâbr.

enters the empire,

THIS great success startling the court, the emperor ordered every thing to be gotten ready for taking the field: but as Râjab Jessing had informed Kbândorân, that Nâdir Shâb's invasion was a concerted thing, that Omrâ advised Mohammed Shâb not to leave the capital. However, it was at last agreed, that his majesty should accompany the army to Labûr; and that from thence it should proceed towards Kâbul, under the command of Nizâm al Muluk, and e the other two Omrâs. But, when all things were ready for setting out, Kbândorân, to every body's surprize, returned to the palace, and delayed the march; while Nizâm seemed earnest to hasten it. The emperor's servants also contrived all the impediments which they could think of, so that Nâdir Shâb was far advanced in his march to Peyshur (I). There the Afghâns and mountaineers kept him in play for seven weeks; when, seeing there was no forcing the passes without much bloodshed, he sent them offers of accommodation. These they came into the more readily, as the Sowbahdârs had sent no assistance; and they had been four or five years without receiving any of their usual pay, or allowance, from court ^e.

with small opposition:

THEREFORE, on Nâdir Shâb's giving them a certain sum of money, they not only let his forces pass unmolested, but listed under him. Hereupon, leaving the main body behind, f ^e FRASER, ubi supr. p. 129, & seqq.

(G) There are always two governors; one, called Hakem, to command the city; the other Kullehdâr, who commands the castle, and is generally for life; but must never stir out of it. Fraser.

(H) or Gazna, a famous city between Kandahâr and Hindûstân, once the capital of a dynasty, or monarchs, who took from it the name of Gâzni, and Gâznavi.

(I) A city 202 measured kos (or 253 miles) from Dehli, 97 from Labûr, and 35 from Astok.

he

a he set out in November with 10,000 chosen Kuzzibāsh (K) horse, and in seven days got to Peyshār. By this means surprising Nazir Khān, who was encamped near the city with 7000 horse, he defeated such as stood the shock, and took him prisoner (L); after which he entered Peyshār. When the news of this defeat came to court, Nizām al Muluk, Khāndorān, the Wazir Kamro'ddin Khān, and the other Omrās, set out on the second of January, 1738-9, with a numerous army, and train of 700 artillery, to oppose the conqueror. Nizām, after using delays, and prepossessing the soldiers with a terror of the enemy's power, marched on, and encamped in the plains of Karnal, fifty-five kos from Dehli; where the emperor (M) joined his troops on the fourth of February.

MEAN time Nādir Shāh, having crossed the Atok (N), marched to Labār; where Zekā-comes to Labār Khān had intrenched himself without the city: but, as soon as the enemy's troops appeared in sight, he retreated with his forces into the castle; from whence, having cannonaded the Persians for three days, he capitulated, and 1000 Kuzzibāsh took possession. Nādir Shāh staid there one week, and then, by continued marches, arrived (O) at the village of Tillawuri; which is near *Karnal*¹. The emperor's camp, about seven kos in circuit (P), was surrounded by murchas, or barricades, on which were mounted 5000 carriage-guns. In the center stood the imperial quarters; fronting which were the murchas of Nezām al Muluk and Saado'ddin Khān, mounted likewise with ordnance. On the right was Khāndorān; on the left Kamro'ddin Khān; behind the emperor was posted Sirbullind Khān; and Mohammed Khān Bungush in the rear of all; each accompanied with several Omrās at the head of their troops; the whole army amounting to 200,000 horse and foot.

NADIR Shāh had with him 40,000 horse, each with two or three attendants, grooms, ^{meets and} and camel-drivers, robust young men. All were completely armed, with lances, bows, or ^{or} muskets, even to the sutlers, and mounted on camels, mules, or horses: amounting in the whole to near 160,000 men. Nay, 7000 women, who had been taken captives, were, tho' veiled, booted and armed like the men; having a furtout over their own cloaths, and a sort of turbān on their heads. The same day that he arrived at Tillawuri, which was the thirteenth of February, 1738-9, several messengers were sent to Nezām al Muluk, with offers of an accommodation: but he rejected all, and would hear of nothing but war. Next morning Saadit Khān arrived in the camp; and being informed, while he waited on the emperor, d that his baggage was attacked by the Persian vanguard, halted to assist his people. As this affair happened near Khāndorān's quarters, that Omrā and above twenty more, with their troops, joined Saadit.

At the same time, Nādir Shāh, who had removed his camp on that side, being apprised ^{the Mogol} of their design, advanced towards them; and, having planted 3000 horse in ambush in three ^{army} different places, sent 500 musketeers towards Saadit Khān, and 500 more towards Khāndorān, in order to draw them into the snare. This stratagem having taken effect, the horsemen, who lay in ambush, broke-out on and engaged them furiously. Mean time, Nādir Shāh, attended by 1000 Afsbar horse, rode to and from all quarters to encourage those men. The rest of the army stood drawn up at a distance, ready at a signal to come to his assistance: e but, as it happened, there was no occasion for them: for those four or five thousand having fought obstinately till the evening, when the emperor's forces gave ground, Saadit Khān, Shirjing, and Khāndorān's youngest son, were taken prisoners. Khāndorān himself received several mortal wounds, and was carried back to his quarters. Muzaffer Khān, with several other officers, were killed, besides what were wounded; and great numbers lay dead in the field of battle (Q)².

WHEN those who fled returned to the camp, a great tumult arose; and the tents of Khān-An accommo-dorān, Muzaffer Khān, Saadit Khān, and others, who were in the action, were plundered by ^{dation pro-} ^{posed.}

¹ FRASER, ubi supr. p. 136, & seq.

² FRASER, ubi supr. p. 152, & seqq.

(K) Or Kezibāsh, an order of soldiers, much like the janizaries, established by Sheykh Heydr, father of Shāh Ismael.

(L) Five hundred thousand pounds were remitted to this Navob; who, on his defeat, fled; but was taken and imprisoned: yet in a few days was made one of Nādir Shāh's Wazir's. Fraser, p. 144.

(M) The emperor, confounded on hearing Nādir Shāh had crossed the Atok, was for going by water to Patna, or to Kaffi Benares, a city in the province of Alehabad, famous for Indian worship and colleges.

(N) When Nādir Shāh was about Atok, he wrote a letter to the emperor; in which he said the reason of his stay there was to do him and religion service, by driving to hell the infidels of Dekkan (meaning the Maharattas, or Ganims), in case they should any more invade his dominions; swearing by Ali Morija, that he had no other view. About the end of the same month (of August) by another letter he demanded five millions sterling.

(O) There were killed in the road and villages 8000 people, from Lakār to Karnal.

(P) What follows is taken from a journal of Nādir Shāh's transactions in India, written by Mirza Zuman, secretary to Sirbullind Khān, and communicated to Mr. Fraser.

(Q) According to a letter wrote the next day from the Mogol camp, Nādir Shāh fought with 50,000 men. Khāndorān received a bullet in his arm and in his side. Muzaffer Khān was killed jumping from his elephant. Mirza Khodabenda, grandson to the Great Mohabet Khān, was killed. On Nādir Shāh's side, seven principal officers and 2500 men were slain, about 5000 wounded. —17,000 of the Hindostān army were slain.

their own people. In this confusion, the emperor, in conjunction with Nizâm al Muluk, the a Wazîr, and the other Omrâs, drew up their men without their barricades in a line of battle, with design to hinder the enemy from advancing any farther: but had not night come on, those precautions would have stood in little stead; and that day would have put an end to the whole affair. As many of those, who escaped out of the fight, as well as of such who attended the baggage, fled towards Debli; the camp was in some places so thin of men, that when at midnight the emperor sent for Nizâm al Muluk, to come to his tent, the space of his mûrcha, or barricade, about three quarters of a kos, was entirely empty. This made them next day to contract their camp within that space which was sufficient to contain all the troops which remained; who stood under arms all that day, the 16th, every minute expecting the enemy's approach. On the 17th, Nizâm al Muluk and Azîm alla Khân went to Shâh Nâdia's camp, b to accommodate matters; and, after a stay of six hours, returned. Nâdir Shâh embraced Nizâm sitting, and made him stand honourably, close by himself; he gave him a cup of sherbet, and appointed him to eat at the house of Kassum Beg Khân, his Eytêmâdo'ddowlet, or Wazîr: after which it was agreed, that Mohammed Shâh should go and see Nâdir Shâh. The same evening Khândorân died of his wounds.

The emperor goes to

THE 18th, at night, Nizâm received a rich kalaet, or vest, on being appointed Mîr Bukhshî, or paymaster-general, and Amîr al Omrâ (R), or head of the Omrâs, in the room of the deceased; whose corps was buried the next day with marks of distinction, in the village of Kârnal. Mean time, the emperor sitting in a royal litter (S), with a canopy and umbrella, one led horse, and a drum, attended by Ghâzioddin Khân Azîm allah Khân, the Wazîr's son, c and several eunuchs, marched out of the camp, with 200 horse; who, when he had gone a little way, returned. With the rest, he went on to Nâdir Shâh's camp. When he was about half-way, Tabmâsp Khân Vakîl came to do him the usual honours. Afterwards he was met by Nâsr allah Mîrza, the son of Nâdir Shâh; who, alighting from his royal litter, paid the emperor his respects after the Persian form. Then Mohammed Shâh, ordering his own litter to be set down, embraced the young prince: after which they both marched on till they came to the train of ordnance. Here all the attendants were obliged to stay behind; the emperor only, with the Omrâs above-mentioned, and two or three eunuchs, being allowed to pass^h.

Nâdir Shâh's
camp:

WHEN they came to the door of the royal tent, Nâdir Shâh came forth to receive his guest; d and, having embraced, seated him close by himself on the same musnid (T). After the usual forms of salvation, and enquiry about each other's health, were over, Nâdir Shâh addressed him thus: "It is strange you should be so regardless of your own affairs, that although I " wrote you several letters, sent an ambassador, and testified a friendship for you, your minis" ters should not think proper to send me a satisfactory answer. Likewise, by reason of your " want of command over your own people, one of my ambassadors (U), contrary to all laws, " has been killed in your dominions. Even when I entered your empire, you seemed under " no concern for your affairs; nor so much as sent to ask who I was, or what was my design.
" Although I advanced as far as Labûr, yet none of your people came with a message, " or salutation: nay, not with an answer to my compliments to you. Afterwards, when e " your Omrâs were awaked out of their lethargy, they prevented all means of a reconcilia" tion; and coming tumultuously with an intent to stop my farther progress, brought them" selves into one general snare."

is severely lectured,

THEN, having shewn how ill the war had been conducted against him, he proceeded:
" Even when you had thus entangled yourself, I sent you offers of an accommodation; but " you were so puffed up with your own childish conceits, and foolish resolutions, that you " would not give ear to any honourable overtures, or consult your own interest, until, by the " help of God, and strength of arms, you have seen what has come to pass. Moreover, your " predecessors were wont to take the jeziyah (or poll-tax) from the infidels: but you, in " your reign, have paid it them; having, for these twenty years, suffered the empire to be f
" over-run by them. However, as hitherto the race of Timûr have not injured, nor misbe" haved towards the Seffi family, and the people of Persia, I shall not take the empire from " you: only as your indolence and pride have obliged me to march so far, and I have been " put to an extraordinary expence; on account also that my men are much fatigued by long " marches, and want necessaries, I must go to Dibli, and there continue some days, until

^h FRASER, ubi sup. p. 159, & seqq.

(R) A title given to the favourite minister.

(S) In the original, takt us ar, or a moving throne.

Fraser.

(T) A place in the divan, commonly higher than any other, large enough for two or three to sit on.

Fraser.

(U) On the Peyshûr side of the Attok, by some rebellious Rajpûts.

- a " the army is refreshed, and the peyshkush, which Nezâm al Muluk had agreed to (X), is made good ; after that I shall leave you to look after your own affairs."

MOHAMMED SHAH made no answer to this home speech, or lecture, in which he was and returned treated contemptibly enough ; but was fixed in a silence, which testified a good deal of confusion and shame. There were none present, excepting Javead Khân, Bebrozz Khân, and Ghazizâddîn Khân. Towards evening the emperor returned to his camp ; when it being represented to him, that the Baniyâns made the grain very dear, he ordered their shops to be plundered ; which, instead of mending the matter, very much increased the dearth of provisions.

- b On the 20th of February, Nezâm al Muluk, the Wazîr, Azîm allah Khân, and Ghazizâddîn Khân, waited on Nâdir Shâh ; and, at taking leave, received each a coat and vest : but Nezam had a horse also. The same day, orders being given to bury the dead belonging to the Hindûstân army, their number was found to be 17,000, and the bodies spread over the space of seven kos. But not one of the Nâdir Shâh's people was seen on the field of battle ; though it was said 400 of them were killed, and 700 wounded : for they buried them the same night. Many of the wounded Hindûstâns, who could not stir out of the place, died, because none had compassion enough to bring them off to be cured. Three elephants were also killed. The number of those killed, during three days after the battle, on the roads, and in the neighbouring country, by Nâdir Shâh's troops, when they went out a marauding, amounted to fourteen or fifteen thousand ¹.

- c On the 22d, the emperor's camp was removed to the side of Karnal, opposite to Shâh his camp removed. In their march, the Kuzzlbâsh horsemen carried off 27 elephants and 25 camels. Next day, Nezâm al Muluk, being sent for to Shâh Nâdir's camp, was there detained, with five or six of his attendants : and several of the Kuzzlbâsh being sent against Tavisâr, they slew the inhabitants ; and, having plundered the place, returned with great spoil. About eight at night, the Wazîr received a firmân, or order, from Nâdir Shâh, importing, that next day the emperor, Sirbullind Khân, Mohammed Khân Bungush, and Azîm allah Khân, should appear before him. Hereupon Mohammed Shâh sent for Sirbullind Khân, and all the other Omrâs ; with whom having consulted till midnight, he at length declared, that, as affairs were now gone beyond his power, he was under a necessity the next day to do one of three things : to try his fortune by one desperate push ; put an end to all troubles by a dose of poison ; or else to submit tamely to whatever terms should be imposed : which last measure the emperor was inclined to, although he did not then discover it.

- d On the 24th, Sirbullind Khân and the other Omrâs were ready, with their men, to act as the emperor should determine. But nothing was that day resolved on ; and at night a note and himself guarded arrived from Nâdir Shâh to that lord, bidding him be of good cheer, and repair to him before Mohammed Shâh set out. Accordingly next morning he went thither, and about nine o'clock the emperor followed in a royal litter. On his arrival, he alighted at a tent, pitched for him in the front of the camp ; where he was allowed all his necessary domestics, and 1000 Kuzzlbâsh were set as guards round him. About eight in the evening, he went to visit Nâdir Shâh, and after three hours stay returned ; but orders were given, that none of the Omrâs should be allowed to see him. On the 26th, orders were issued to seize all the ordnance, and other arms belonging to the emperor and his Omrâs, with all his treasures and jewels. There was an order also to send to Mohammed Shâh his son Soltân Ahmed, and the empress Mauka al Zumani (Y). A third order was also issued, that all the emperor's old servants and soldiers should be continued in their places ; but that the babîrs, or baggage-carriers, and new enlisted men, should be suffered to depart.

- e On the 27th, Mohammed Shâh, with the Omrâs, his old servants, and baggage, went to the camp of Nâdir Shâh ; into whose possession their effects were put : and he, having marches to Dehli picked out 200 cannon from the emperor's ordnance, sent them, with some treasure and other effects then seized, to Kandahâr, by way of Kâbul. The same day, Nâdir Shâh gave three months pay to every man in his army, attendants and all. On the 28th, early, Tabmâshp Khân Vakil was dispatched to Shâh Jehân abad, or Dehli, with 4000 horse and musketeers, to take possession of the castle ; and Saadit Khân to secure the city and effects of the Omrâs. On the 2d of March, Nâdir Shâh set out himself for the same place, attended by 20,000 horse, and preceded by the mâhl, or women, with a guard of 4000, at the distance of one kos. At the same distance behind him followed Mohammed Shâh, and forty or fifty of his principal people, with 12,000 horse to escort him. On the sides were Sirbullind Khân, Nizâm al Muluk, Kamro'ddîn Khân, and Mohammed Khân Bungush, each with his men and baggage, separated by the distance of half a kos, with horsemen between, to keep them from joining. In this order they marched every day, taking up five kos in length, and three in breadth ².

¹ FRASER, ubi supr. p. 163, & seqq.

² Ibid. ubi supr. p. 169, & seqq.

(X) Of twenty lacs of rupîs, or twenty-five millions sterling.

(Y) That is, queen of the times with Nâdir Shâh :

who orders affairs.

IN the road, the Kuzzlbâsh not only plundered several villages, amongst which were Paniput ^a and Sanput (Y); but likewise killed to the number of 7000 inhabitants. The 7th, Nâdir Shâh arrived at the gardens of Sballimûr. Next day, by his order, Mohammed Shâh, in a royal litter, attended by 4000 guards, entered the city at night, and was lodged in the castle. But Nâdir Shâh, being informed that the inhabitants were of a seditious, turbulent temper, deferred his entrance till the 9th, in the morning; when he marched in with all the caution imaginable, attended by 20,000 horse, leaving the rest of his army encamped without the city. After he had alighted at the castle, Mohammed Shâh came to congratulate him, and they breakfasted together. They were in conversation till the evening; during which time, Nâdir Shâh behaved with the greatest complaisance and seeming affection to him. He likewise gave orders to punish, in the severest manner, all persons molesting the Indians: who, ^b on their side, were so frightened at the terrible aspect of those men, and the barbarous figure (Z) they made, that most of them avoided coming near them. At night, Nâdir Shâh, having called Saadit Khân before him, spoke with a great deal of passion; and even used some hard words, in regard to collecting the peyshkush, or present of twenty-five millions sterling. That lord, who had for some time been indisposed, died at four next morning: some say, with vexation at his treatment; others, that he took poison.

(Y) Two stages from Dehli.

(Z) The Persians, however polite and luxurious in regard to the more western nations, are but rude and hardy in their apparel, diet, and living, compared with the delicate Indian Mogols and Persians.

S E C T. III.

The massacre of Dehli; and what passed there till Nâdir Shâh's return.

The mob rise.

ON Saturday, the 10th of March, being the eyd zoha, or feast of sacrifice, in the morn- ^c ing, Sirbullind Khân, Mostafa Khân, Arizbeghi, Nezâm al Muluk, and Kamro'dîn Khân, met at the castle, to deliberate on means for collecting the peyshkush-money, along with Tabmâsh Khân Vakil; who, at noon, sent nine horsemen to order the granaries to be opened, and settle the price of corn. But, as the price which was fixed did not turn to the account of the proprietors, towards evening they assembled a mob; who killed the nine horsemen, and several Kuzzlbâsh, who repaired thither to buy corn. After sun-set, they spread a report, that Nâdir Shâh was taken prisoner, and some said he was poisoned: on which, the idle and disaffected people, joining from all quarters, poured like a torrent towards the castle; and killed several of the out-guards, who retired within, and to other places of security. Next morning, about eight o'clock, when the tumult was in its height, Nâdir ^d Shâh, being greatly provoked, walked out of the castle; and, mounting his horse, went towards the bazâr of Chandîn Chok, to quell the mob, who were committing great disorders in that quarter. In the way, perceiving many bodies of his people, who had been killed in the night, he sent a strong party to suppress the rioters: with orders, that in case neither threats nor persuasions would do, to cut them off: but on no account to injure others who were not concerned.

a horrible
slaughter:

THE soldiers at first proceeded gently; which, instead of appeasing, emboldened the mob, who began to discharge fire-arms and arrows at them. Mean time, Nâdir Shâh having entered the masjid, or temple, of Royshn al Dowlet, the neighbouring inhabitants got upon their terraces, and began to throw stones. At length a musket was designedly shot at Nadir ^e Shâh; which, missing him, killed one of his officers who stood next him. This made him give way to his passion, and order a general slaughter to be commenced from that very place. At this command, the soldiers, in an instant getting up the walls and terraces, began to plunder and kill. This bloody scene extended from the Serâfa ardui (A), which is before the castle, to the Eydgab (B), which is three kos distant. The bazârs, streets, and alleys, within this space, were all plundered; and whomsoever they found either abroad, or in the streets and shops, great and small, men and women, were put to the sword; nor did the beasts escape their fury ^f.

the number
 slain.

NADIR SHAH, after he had given those sanguine orders, returned to the castle: where, about two o'clock, Mohammed Shâh and Nezâm al Muluk waited on him; and, having made great intercession for the city, at three o'clock it was proclaimed by beat of drum, that none of the inhabitants should be any longer molested. During the seven hours, which the slaughter

^a FRASER, ubi supr. p. 177, & seqq.

(A) Where all the bankers and money-changers belonging to the king and his army have their shops. Fraser.

(B) The place where people assemble to prayers, on the two great annual eyds, or festivals. Fraser.

- a continued, 400 Kuzzlbâsh were slain, and of the citizens 120,000 (C); some computed 150,000. Of the plunder, Nâdir Shâh had some, and much was destroyed by the fire. Although the Hindûs burned numbers of their dead, yet there still remained so many in the streets, that for a considerable time there was no such thing as passing through them. When the slaughter began, the persons, who had raised the commotion, disappeared in an instant, and left the innocent shopkeepers and their families to be butchered. Several, jealous of their honour, first killed their women, and then themselves. One of these unfortunate creatures, seeing the soldiers near his house, burned about twenty women of his family, and expected they would come every minute and kill him. By chance they missed his house: at which, finding himself disappointed, he went out and brought some of them back; telling them
- b there was a great deal of money and effects therein. They plundered his house; but, to his still greater disappointment, went away without killing him; which so enraged him, that he dispatched himself.

There were great numbers of people, especially women and children, burned in their houses. Please enlarged again. About 10,000 women threw themselves into wells (D); some of whom were taken out alive, after being there two or three days. On the 12th, the prisoners of both sexes, to the number of 50,000, were, by the Shâh's order, all conducted back to their respective houses; but in affliction not to be expressed. On the 13th, all people were ordered to betake themselves to their employments, and be under no farther apprehension. The effects of Saadit Khân, Kbândorân, and Muzaffer Khân, were seized. Those of Kbândorân (exclusive of what he had in the camp) were computed at no more than one kror of rupîs: but Muzaffer's amounted to very near four krors. This day guards were planted round the city, to prevent any person's going out without licence; and next morning a number of Fakirs, or poor people, wanting to go out of the city, with design to travel and beg abroad, the out-guards cut-off their noses and ears, and made them return again. The 15th was employed in clearing the streets of the dead bodies^a.

THE 16th, a firmân was drawn up, exempting the dominions of Persia from taxes for three The peyshkush years. At the same time, arrears of 6,100,000 pounds, due to the soldiers, were discharged: raised, likewise one year's pay before-hand, and six months pay, as a gratuity, was given to all, even those who followed the camp. After this, all diligence was used to raise the peyshkush, or present of twenty krors of rupîs, that is, twenty-five millions sterling; which the Shâh had demanded, over and above the jewels, gold-plate set with precious stones, and other fine goods, of the king and Omrâs, which had been seized. The severity used on this occasion, brought on a new calamity. In the king's treasury, the gold and silver coins did not exceed 3,750,000 pounds: but in the inward vaults, which had been shut-up and sealed for many years, there was found in gold and silver to a much larger amount. Nizâm al Muluk contributed 1,875,000 pounds, in jewels, money, and goods; Kamro'ddin Khân did the like. Sirbullind Khân, on account of his poverty, was excused. The Omrâs, Mansabdârs, officers, and rich inhabitants, were taxed on this occasion according to their circumstances; of which they were obliged to give in an account.

e THE care of collecting this peyshkush was committed to Sirbullind Khân, and other Omrâs, with great severity: who met daily for that purpose at his house. They were from the eighteenth of March to the 8th of April, settling the list of people, and the sum each was to pay. Mean time several persons, for fear of the consequences, leaving their effects and families behind, escaped out of the city, glad to save their lives. Many others, being hard pressed for their quotas, to save their reputation, killed themselves. Among whom were Allim Allab, the adopted son of Sidi Fâdâ Khân, and his Naïb. On the sixth of April, Tabmâsh Khân ordered one of the ears of Mijilis Ray, the Duan (E) of the Wazîr Kamro'ddin Khân, to be cut off in the presence of his master; who going to intercede for him, Tabmâsh Khân told him in an angry tone, that it would be his turn by-and-by, which presently silenced him; and six days after this disgrace, the f Duan killed himself. Several of the emperor's Muttasiddis were so beaten with sticks, that the blood flowed from all parts of their bodies. Sitâ Ram, and Chukl Keshvir, the Bengâl Vakîl, were so violently drubbed, that the latter went home and murdered himself and family^b.

In the interim; viz. the twenty-seventh of March, Nesr Ali Mirza, son of Shâh Nâdir, The Mirza was married to the daughter of Jesdan Bukhsb, son of Ram Bukhsb, and grandson of Aureng married. Zib; on which occasion there were fine illuminations, and fire-works played-off on the banks of the river. Mohammed Shâh made the young prince's a present of jewels to the value of

^a FRASER, ubi supr. p. 184, & seqq.

^b Ibid. ubi supr. p. 190—200.

(C) By the exactest computation, the number was 110,000. See Frazer, p. 222.

(D) The number of people destroyed these two ways, joined to those who died of famine and other hardships, amounted to above 7000. See Frazer, p. 223.

(E) The deputy and general accountant of the lord lieutenant. Frazer.

6,250 pounds, and the same sum in money. Some days after, Nâdir Shâb sent her jewels to a the value of 62,500 pounds^c.

Cruelties exercised.

WHEN the list of names was ready, Sirbullind Khân, one of those appointed to collect the money, pressed so hard on the people (F), that several killed themselves; which made Nâdir Shâb remit 250,000 pounds to great men who were found indigent, out of 3,750,000 pounds, which remained to be gathered. For want of knowing people's circumstances, they were very unequally taxed. Some, worth 125,000 pounds, were only set down 625 pounds: others, who could not muster 12,500 pounds, were set down 15,000; and when the sum was once fixed, there was no redress to be had: but, if they did not pay, they were beaten so unmercifully, that many died of the blows. Those who came-off best, had either a leg or an arm lamed: this so dispirited the inhabitants, that one Kuzzlbâsh might have used 10,000 of them with what severity he pleased. This work went on till Nâdir Shâb left the city; by which time near five millions were collected from the people; of which 175,000 pounds were sunk b by his Omrâs. The goods likewise which the Shâh took were under-rated. Thus a horse, worth sixty-two pounds, was valued at no more than twelve or thirteen pounds; and the like was done with jewels and other effects.

Shâh Nâdir takes leave

DURING this time, the Kuzzlbâsh horsemen went about plundering the villages, and killing the inhabitants, who made any resistance (G). The first of May, 1739, all the Omrâs being ordered to be present at Mohammed Shâb's apartment by five in the morning, they then put on forty-two kalaets, sent thither by Nâdir Shâb. At eight o'clock, the emperor went in a royal litter, with several of the Omrâs, to the general divân: at the door all the Omrâs alighted, and followed the litter to the door of the private divân; where the emperor got-off, and went in to Nâdir Shâb. After they had embraced, they breakfasted together. The Omrâs likewise c had breakfast given them. Presently after there were brought in for Mohammed Shâb, a crown set with jewels; a sirpeach, or band for the turbân; a bazow band, or bracelet; a girdle; a sword; a Dekkan sword with a strait blade, called dhowp; and an enalled kutteri, or dagger, all set with jewels. The crown Nâdir Shâb put on with his own hands, making him an apology at the same time; and took his leave after giving him some advice. Among the rest, he counselled him "to seize all the jâghîrs, or lands allotted them for maintenance, " and pay them out of his treasury. To suffer none to keep forces of their own, but keep " constantly himself 60,000 horsemen; to be acquainted with the name, family, and merit, " of each; and not allow any to be idle. When he had occasion to send out troops, to put " them under the command of one whom he could trust for conduct, courage, and fidelity; d " and recall them as soon as the expedition was at an end, it being dangerous to let any person " stay too long in command; particularly to beware of Nezâm al Muluk, whom, by his conduct, he found to be full of cunning, and self-interested, and more ambitious than became " a subject^d."

of Mohammed Shâh:

gives him advice:

MOHAMMED SHAH was very thankful for this instance of his good-will to him; and desired him to appoint those whom he thought most deserving of the principal posts: but Nâdir Shâb said, that would not be at all for his interest; since such officers would have but little respect for him in his (the Shâh's) absence. He therefore advised him, when he was gone, to dispose of employments himself; promising, in case any should rebel, to send forces to chastise them; and, if necessary, come with them in person. In effect, Nâdir Shâb recommended, e during all the time of his stay, no more than one person to the post of Khân Saman, or steward of the emperor's household; and that was Danishmend Khân, whose brother Mulla ali Akber, was the Shâh's Mullah Bâshi, or chief Mullah.

threatens the Omrâs:

THE second of May, Nâdir Shâb sent for Nezâm al Muluk, Sirbullind Khân, and other Omrâs, whom he enjoined obedience to the emperor; and, threatening to punish them in case they rebelled, took his leave. It was reported, that he declared before some of his own Omrâs, that he had acted indiscretely in regard to two things: one was, his giving the empire to Mohammed Shâb; who being unequal to so great a task, the affairs of India would become worse than before: the other, his giving quarter to Nezâm al Muluk; who being so very subtle and crafty, it was more than probable he would raise new disturbances: but as, by the decrees f of providence, and their own good fortune, he had once passed his word to them, he could not act contrary thereto.

THE fourth of May notice was given, that, after the troops began their march, none should remain in the city, or carry with them any male or female, excepting bought slaves, or women married to them: nor even those slaves and wives to be carried contrary to their inclinations, under forfeiture of such person's life and estate. Upon this, almost all who were

^c FRASER, p. 197.

^d Ibid. ubi supr. p. 200, & seqq.

(F) However, he was forced to do this much against his will, for he succoured many underhand. Fraser, p. 217.

(G) There were massacred on this occasion to the amount of 25,000. See Fraser, p. 222.

a married at Debli sent back their wives, on finding them unwilling to leave their native country : only a few of the chief commanders and officers, by intreaties, prevailed on some to seem contented to go. But, after some days march, Nâdir Shâh, being informed thereof, ordered them all to be sent back.

ON Sunday, the sixth of May, the Shâh began his march, having first ordered his army to be mustered ; and, it being found that 400 soldiers and servants had deserted, he commanded the Kutwâl of Debli to find them out. That officer, after diligent search, discovered about sixty, and sent them with a party of horse after the army, which they overtook at Sherbind ; where the Shâh ordered all their heads to be cut-off : for this reason, others, who were taken, were let go again by the emperor's command. In his way he plundered and killed the people of Tanisîr, and other villages, to the number of 12,000 ; because the country people killed and stripped his straggling foragers. It was said that he gave the Zemidâr (H) of Karnâl 5000 rupis, towards peopling a village on the spot where he gained the battle ; and directed him to call it Fatteh abâd, or the habitation of victory. In his passage, he left Labûr on one side, after having accepted 1,250,000 pounds ; which was all the inhabitants could raise *.

MEAN time, on the 13th of May, the emperor appeared in the general divân ; where the Omrâs came to pay their obeisance, and make him their presents. But, from that day, when the Shâh left Debli, till the 20th of June, nothing was done or proposed relating to the state of affairs in the empire : nor did the late dreadful calamity awaken the sufferers, who were intoxicated with pride and self-conceit, ill-will and malice to each other. Some days after, twenty-two Omrâs and Mansebdârs, who had run-out of the field of battle, were all discharged the service.

SINCE the battle of Karnâl to Nâdir Shâh's departure, the loss sustained by the emperor and the people, in jewels, treasure, goods, and destruction of fields, besides that of the buildings, amounted to near one arrib of rupis, or 125 millions sterling. Out of this Nâdir Shâh carried away to the value of 70 krons, or 87,500,000 pounds, in jewels and other effects (I) : his officers and soldiers, 10 krons, or 12,500,000 pounds. The charges of his army, while he continued there, the arrears, pay, and gratuity advanced them, with what goods were destroyed by fire, and fields laid waste, came to near 20 krons, or 25 millions more. Of the inhabitants of the empire, since the Shâh's arrival in Hindûstân till his return to Labûr, were destroyed 200,000.

BESIDES the immense riches, which Nâdir Shâh carried away with him, he obtained from the emperor in writing, dated the 4th of Môbarram, 1152 (K), a cession of all the countries to the west of the river Attok, the river Sind, and Nala Sunkra, which is a branch of it ; that is to say, Peyshor, with its territories ; the principality of Kâbul ; Ghoznavi (or county of Ghâzna) ; the mountainous residence of the Afghâns ; the Hazârijat, and the passes ; with the castle of Bukkar, Sunkar, and Khowd abâd ; the rest of the territories, passes, and abodes, of the Chokias, Balluches, and other people ; with the provinces of Tâtta, the castle of Ram ; and village of Terbin ; the towns of Chun, Sumawali, Ketra, and other places dependant on Tâtta. In short, all the fields, villages, castles, towns, and ports, to the west of the Attok, from its rise, as far as Nala Sunkra, where it falls into the sea : but all countries to the east of that river, the Sind, and Nala Sunkra, with the castle and town of Lobri-Bundar (or Bendar), were to remain to the empire of Hindûstân †.

THUS we have brought the history of the Mogols in Hindûstân to the end of this great revolution ; the most remarkable, unexpected, and easily accomplished, of any which hath happened in the world for many ages past.

* FRASER, ubi supr. p. 207, & seqq.

† Ibid. ubi supr. p. 24, & seqq.

(H) Zemidârs are the Râjahs, or Indian lords, who have free estates in land, paying a small acknowledgment to the emperor. Fraser.

(I) In jewels, from the emperor and Omrâs, twenty-five krons. Utensils and weapons set with jewels, with the peacock throne, and nine others set with jewels, nine krons. Gold and silver rupis, twenty five krons.

Gold and silver plate, which he coined into money, five krons. Fine cloth and rich stuffs, two krons. House-furniture and other goods, three krons. War-like weapons, cannon, &c. one kror. Besides 1000 elephants, 7000 horses, 10,000 camels.

(K) Second of April, 1739.

B O O K XIV.

A description of the countries contained in the hither peninsula of India.

C H A P. I.

General division and history of this peninsula.

General division,

THIS great peninsula, in its largest extent, is bounded on the north by an east and west line, drawn from the gulf of Kambaya to the north of the river Ganges; or, if you will, with the twenty-second parallel of latitude; and on the three other sides by the ocean (A). Within these limits are contained several spacious countries, namely, the provinces of Bāglāna, Ballagāte, and Tellingāna, or Telenga, all comprehended under the general name of Balagātte; the kingdom of Vijaypūr, which, with the other three provinces, are comprised under the name of Dekkan; the kingdoms of Golkonda and Orisha, or Orixa; the kingdom of Karnāta, or Karnatek, a part of which was formerly called Bīsnāgar, and Narsinga; the kingdoms of Messūr, Madura, Marava, and Tanjaor; lastly, the kingdoms of Kanāra and Malabār.

and history.

Dekan kingdom founded.

FOR many ages these countries were governed by their own Rājahs, or Kings. But since the Mohammedans got footing in Hindūstān, they have undergone various revolutions: of these, however, we have as yet very imperfect accounts. The first expedition we meet with in this peninsula, is that of Mahmūd Shāh, king of Debli, surnamed Nasro'ddin, who ascended the throne in the year 1264; and is famous for his great conquests over India^a. We are told that this prince, descending from the north with a powerful army, conquered all the Hindūs, as far as the kingdom of Kanāra, with part of the country possessed by the ancestors of the king of Bīsnāgar (B). Then returning to Debli, he left Habed Shāh to prosecute his conquests. This general, by his conduct and valour, became so great, that he coped with his master. His nephew Madūra (C), following his good fortune, possessed himself of the kingdom of Kanāra; and casting off his allegiance to the king of Debli, gave to his new-founded dominion the name of Dekan (or Dekkan) from the various kinds of people whereof his army, which conquered it, was composed; for Dekkan signifies bastards (D). Then dividing his territories into eighteen parts, he gave the government of them to so many of his slave-commanders; obliging each of them to build a palace at Bedir (E), which was his royal seat, and leave his son behind for hostage. In process of time the number of those governors diminishing, they who remained grew more powerful; while the king of Dekan had scarce any thing more left than his capital city, and the name. In short, when the Portugueses arrived first in the Indies, in 1498, there were in Dekan only seven descendants of those usurping slaves; whose names, or titles, were Nizamaluk, Madremaluk (F), Mālek Veridi, Kofa Mokadam, Abeshjapado (or the Abyssine eunuch), Kota Maluk (G), and Sabay; which last was at that

^a D'HIERCEL. Bibl. Orient. p. 289, art. Debli.

(A) In a less extended sense, its northern boundary will be a line drawn from the city of Kambaya, at the head of the gulf of that name, south-east to the coast of Masulipatan, on the bay of Bengal.

(B) By this account, Dekan must have extended southward only, over Kanāra, and part of the Karnata.

(C) Barros calls him Mahmūd Shāh.

(D) Others call it also Dakem, or Daken, as if so named after king Dakem, mentioned lower down

(E) Or Bider, in Tillingāna.

(F) All these names are sadly corrupted, according to the European manner. The two first should be Nizam al Maluk, that is, the regulator of the empire; and Imād al Maluk, the pillar or support of the empire.

(G) It ought to be Kutob al Maluk, the axis or pole of the empire.

a time lord of Goa, and the most powerful among them (H). This prince deceasing about the time when Albuquerque formed his design against that city, in 1510, Kuso Hidalkan (I) possessed himself thereof, and put it into the hands of his son Ismael ^b.

This is one account of the Mohammedan kingdoms in the peninsula of India. Dr. Garcia ^{Divided into provinces.} D'Orta relates another. This author tells us, that a certain commander of Bengâl, lord of some mountains there, having first slain the king, subdued the kingdom of Debli (not long after the Mogols had conquered it), with other kingdoms, and assumed the name of Xa Holam (Shâb Alem), or king of the world, founding an empire 800 leagues in compass: that his acquisitions being too large for one sovereign, he conferred the government of Dekan and Kunkam on his nephew Dakem; who being fond of foreigners, intrusted the government of his provinces to them. To one named Adel Khân he gave all the maritime country from Anjediva (K), in the south, to Sifardam (L), in the north; extending about sixty leagues, with the adjoining inland regions. Another, called Nezâm Mâluk, he set over the provinces which reach from Sifardam to Negatona, the space of twenty leagues, adding thereto other inland provinces, with that of Kambaya.

NONE but these two lords had any share in Kunkam, which stretched from the coast to the Kunkam. mountain of Ghâte (or Gâtte), in Balaghâtta, which signifies the country beyond the mountain ^{Bâlaghate.} (M). The government was divided among three others, Imâd Maluk (N), called by the Portugueses Madremâluk, Kotal Maluk (O), and Veridi.

ALL these governors were foreigners, excepting Nezâmô'l Muluk, who is said to have been a natural son of Dakem; but the rest were slaves, bought with the king's money.

For some time these governors did their duty; but at length, growing weary of subjection, ^{The governors} they joined in conspiracy, set up for themselves in their respective provinces, and, seizing ^{usurp.} king Dakem in Beder, capital of Dekan, gave him in custody to Veridi. There were concerned in this conspiracy, certain Hindûs, as Mohadum Kojâ, and Veriche, to whom were given large countries, with some wealthy cities. On Mohadum, for instance, were bestowed Visiapur (which, when our author wrote, was the residence of Adel Khân), with Solapur (P), and Paranda (Q); which were afterwards taken by Nezâm Maluk: but Veriche kept possession of his province, which bordered on Kambaya, and the province belonging to Nezâm Maluk ^c.

THIS relation of D'Orta, though of great use for the general, both to the geography and ^{The time of} history of these countries, is yet very much out with regard to the time when the founder of this great empire lived, if not as to his name also: for if he drove the Mogols out of Debli, our author must have confounded him with Cber Khân, or Shîr Khân, the Pâtân, who, after conquering Bengâl, in 1540, obliged Humayûn to fly into Persia, as hath been related in the reign of that Mogol prince ^d; and in effect Thevenot (whose account of this revolution agrees nearly with D'Orta's) says, that Cber Khân, after defeating Humayûn, assumed the name of Shâb Alem. But this contradicts the Portuguese history; by which it appears, that at the time of their arrival in India, in 1498, the several potentates before-mentioned were then existing, ^{this revolution} and consequently could not have their original from the conqueror of the Mogols, about forty ^{examined into.} years after. The same history gives an account also of Shîr Khân's victory over Humayûn; but mentions nothing of his conquering Dekân, nor of any revolution having happened in that country through all the sixteenth century ^e; which could not have been the case, had any such come to pass. In short, the fact, so far as relates to the date of this revolution, as assigned by D'Orta, is overthrown by the evidence of that author himself; for he says, the great grandfather of the Adel Khân then reigning, who was one of the conspirators, and from whom the Portugueses twice took Goa, died in 1535 ^f. Now this death was five years before the expulsion of the Mogols by Shîr Khân; and the city of Goa was twice taken in 1510. In this same year, 1510, he likewise places the death of Veridi, another of the conspirators; consequently, the revolution in Dekân must have happened, by his own account, before that period.

^b FARIA Y SOUSA, Port. Asia, vol. i. ch. 5. p. 163, & JUAN DE BARROS. De Laet, Ind. Vera. p. 158, & seqq. ^d See before, p. 7.

^c FARIA Y SOUSA, Port. Asia, vol. i. p. 411. ^f DE LAET, Ind. Vera. p. 160.

(H) Thus writes De Faria: but he could not be the greatest of them, unless he was king of Visiapur, whose title was Adel Khân, mentioned within a line or two.

(I) Hidalkan, or, as it is often written, Idalkan, and Dialcan, should be Adel Khân; that is, the just king or lord. Barros says he was the son of Sabay.

(K) Opposite to Sinkatora, at the mouth of the river Aliga, 16 or 17 leagues south of Goa.

(L) Between Dabul and Chawl.

(M) Bala, in Persian, according to our author, signifies lofty, and Ghâte, a mountain: therefore that vast province beyond it is called Balaghâte, as who should say, the mountain or ultramontane province.

(N) Rather Imad, or Emadal Muluk, the pillar or support of the kingdom.

(O) Rather Kotbb al Muluk, the pole or axis of the kingdom.

(P) Solapur is placed by De l'Isle on the river Krishna, about 20 leagues to the south-east of Visiapur.

(Q) Paranda is mentioned by Bernier, and others, as a place of consequence; but they say not where it is situated.

AND this is conformable to the account of Castanneda, one of the earliest Portuguese writers a of the Indian affairs, as well as of some later travellers, who place that event in the fifteenth century. Bernier, with whom Dr. Frier pretty nearly agrees, tells us, that scarce 200 years before the time he wrote (R), all this great peninsula of India, in its largest limits, was under the dominion of a heathen prince, named Ram Ras (S); who having raised three Mohammedan slaves of the Sbiyah sect, to great honour, gave to one the major part of those countries, at present possessed by the Great Mogol in Dekan, about Dowlet abad, from Bidar (or Beder), Paranda, and Surât, as far as Narbadar; to the second, all the other lands of Dekan, comprehended under the kingdom of Vifiapûr; and to the third, all which is contained under the name of the kingdom of Golkonda. These three slaves growing rich, and being supported by a good number of the Mogols, who were in the service of Ram Ras, joined in a general revolt; and b having killed that unfortunate prince, each set up for himself in his respective government, and assumed the title of Shâh or king. The issue of Ram Ras not finding themselves strong enough to oppose the usurpers, were content to betake themselves to that country of the peninsula commonly called Karnâtek, but in our maps, Bifnâgar; where their descendants remain to this day, with the title of Rajâhs c.

As to the titles of those usurpers, which Bernier has omitted, authors generally agree, that the first, who had the tramontane provinces, was stiled Nezâm Shâh (1); the second Adel Shâh, who seized Vifiapûr; and the third, Kotbb Shâh, who possessed Golkonda.

Extent of Dekan.

AND here it may be proper to observe, that Dekan, or Dukkan, was not of so large extent as some authors have imagined; for, from the several accounts above-cited, it appears that c it comprised no more of the peninsula than what lay within the dominions of Nezâm Shâh and Adel Shâh; that is, the provinces of Bâglâna, Ballagâte, and Tellenga, with the kingdom of Vifiapûr. The first three provinces being to the north of the mountains called Gâte, went under the denomination of Ballagâte, or the tramontane provinces; and under Vifiapûr we include Konkan, or Kunkam, which was that part lying between the Gâte and the Indian sea, or western coast, where the river Bate, near Bazaim and Bombay, separated it northward from the dominions of Nezâm Shâh; and the river Aligâ, on the south, from Kanara and Bifnâgar h.

g BERNIER, Mem. Mog. Emp. part 2. p. 158, & seqq. FRYER'S Trav. p. 165.

h DE FARIA, ubi

(R) That is about 1667; from whence deducting 200 years, you have that of 1467 for the year of this revolution. Fryer, p. 165, reckons about 250 years before 1675, which puts that event in 1425.

(S) So he is called by Fryer also. Even Thevenot makes his Cher Khân a Râjah of Bengal.

(T) That is, King Nezâm; changing, probably, the title of Nezâm al Muluk, after his usurpation, into that of Nezâm Shâh. The like may be understood of the other two.

S E C T. II.

Empire of Bifnâgar.

Empire of Bifnâgar.

THIS kingdom, called Bifnâgar (U), from the capital city, and Narsinga, from the d name of one of its Râjahs or Kings, bounded Dekan on the south; and was, at the time of the above-mentioned revolution, or soon after, the most rich, potent, and extensive monarchy in the Indies, comprehending almost all the countries in the peninsula south of the sixteenth parallel: for, besides the large kingdom of Karnâta or Karnâtes, which was the hereditary dominion, and made the body of the empire, it contained the kingdoms of Kanara, Messowr, Travankor, Madûra, Marava, and Tanjaor; in short, all that vast region washed on three sides by the ocean, was subject to the king of Bifnâgar, excepting that part of Malabâr which belongs to the Zamorin, or king of Kalekut i. The inhabitants were Pagans, and called Badagus, as are those of Karnâta at present; they spoke the Tamul or Damul language, which is the same with the Malabaric; but the Badagun was used at court. e

City of Bifnâgar.

THE city of Bifnâgar, which still subsists, lies eight days journey (X) from Goa, and six from the diamond mines. Cæsar Frederic, who was at this capital of Narsinga in 1567, reprei DE FARIA, vol. i. p. 95, & seqq. vol. ii. p. 83, 142.

(U) The Portugueses called it Bifnaga: but we are told by the Jesuits of those times, that its true name was Vissan agor; another author says, Vidianagar. See Purch. Pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1746, and Della Valle's Trav. p. 93, & seqq.

(X) This is confirmed by the Jesuits map of the hither peninsula of the Indies, inserted in vol. xxiii. of the Lettres Édifiantes; which puts it 105 geometrical miles east of that city. Yet former geographers, and even De l'Isle, place it near three degrees to the south-east more within land.

a sents it as a very great city, twenty-four miles in compass, whose walls, inclosing certain hills, were washed by the river Nigondin. The buildings were all of earth, excepting the pagods, and three palaces. Of the many courts of kings which this traveller had seen, none could compare with that of Bezenegar, for the grandeur and order of the palace, which had five courts leading to it, with each a gate, and guards. But when Frederic was there, the city was destitute of people, although the houses were standing; the place having been sacked two years before^k, as will be related presently.

ACCORDING to the Portuguese writers, the kingdom of Charnataka (Y) had no sovereign prince till the year 1200: it began then in Boka, a shepherd, who stiled himself Rau, or Râjab, History of Bisnâgar. that is, emperor; which title has descended to all his successors. Boka, in memory of a defeat b which he gave to the king of Dehli (who attacked these southern provinces), built the famous city of Visajanâger (Z), corruptly called Bisnâgar. The crown continued in his line till it was usurped by Narsinga, from whom this kingdom took its name, as well as that of Bisnâgâr, from the city^l.

WHATEVER the king of Bisnâgar might have lost by the usurpation of the Mohammedan Khristna governors before-mentioned, yet we find him still a very powerful prince about the year 1520: Râjah. for Khrisna Râjab, the then king, resolving to take the city (A) of Rachol from Adel Khân of Viziapûr, as having belonged to his ancestors, he covered the hills and plains with an army of 35,000 horse, and 733,000 foot: besides these, were 586 elephants, carrying castles, each with four armed men in it, 12,000 water-carriers, and 20,000 common women. As Rachol c was very strongly fortified, stored with artillery, and garrisoned by 8400 men, of which 400 Hi. warlike forces. were horse, the Râjah could not take it by assault in three months; at the end of which Adel Khân coming to its relief with 18,000 horse, 120,000 foot, 150 elephants, and much heavy cannon, a battle ensued. At first Khrisna Râjab was worsted; but recovering himself, he fell on with such fury, that very few escaped the sword, or captivity. Among the slain were forty Portugueses, in the service of Adel Khân, who had escaped by flight. The principal booty consisted of 4000 horses, 100 elephants, 400 great cannon, besides small, and other riches.

As Khrisna Râjab returned in a rage against Rachol, Christopher de Figueredo, with twenty Portugueses, brought some Arabian horses, in order to sell them to that prince; who falling Defeats Adel Khân. into discourse about the siege, Figueredo, after being permitted to view the place, undertook to reduce it. Accordingly, in the second assault, being backed by the king, the city was forced. Khrisna, puffed up with this victory, when Adel Khân's officers came to beg the booty taken in the former battle, answered, that it should be restored, provided Adel Khân would come and kiss his foot, as supreme lord of the empire of Kanâra. This base condition was accepted, but the execution prevented by several accidents^m.

AFTER this we met with no dispute between the two kings for many years. At length, Rama Râjah about 1558, a Portuguese, of the city of Meliapûr, or St. Thomas, on the coast of Choromandel (one of those, saith our author, who worship their interest more religiously than the heathens do their idols; and of these, adds he, there are many in the Indies), persuaded Râma Râjab, e then king of Bisnâgâr, to march against the city; telling him, the plunder would be worth two millions; and that it would be of great service to the images in the pagods, which were there thrown down by the Christians. He was a good Christian, says De Faria, who was so zealous for idols (B). The king, hearkening to the hopes of gain, set forward with 500,000 men. Peter de Atayde encouraged the inhabitants to defend themselves; but they, to palliate their fears, said, It was but reason that the king should be admitted to what was his own. Upon f this answer, Atayde went away to Goa; and the townsmen, preparing for the king's reception, sent him a present of 4000 ducats, wherewith he was somewhat appeased. He encamped, and would not enter the city, but ordered all the inhabitants of both sexes, with all their effects, to be brought into his presence; which being done, he found that the whole value of their substance did not exceed 80,000 ducats. Enraged at the wickedness of the informer, the king ordered him to be thrown to the elephants, who tore him in pieces. After which he dismissed the citizens, and restored all their goods so punctually, that only a silver spoon happening to be missing, it was sought for, and returned to the ownerⁿ.

BISNAGAR was about this time resorted to by merchants from all parts, as being the greatest, Bisnâgar at-acked, A. D. if not the only mart for diamonds, in the east. Its riches were equal to its great extent. This 1565.

^k PURCHAS'S Pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1704, & seqq. vol. i. p. 236, & seqq.

ⁿ Ibid. p. 154, & seqq.

^l DE FARIA, ubi supr. vol. ii. p. 118.

^m Ibid.

(Y) Karnatak, Karnates, or Karnata, as it is variously written. Our author, De Faria, says Kanara (which is the name of a kingdom on the sea-coast) is a corruption of Charnataka.

(Z) The Jesuit Fimenta, who wrote in 1607, calls it Vissanâger; and Dille Vall, Vidianâgar, as before observed.

(A) Situated in the island of Salfette, near Goa. De Faria, vol. iii. p. 417.

(B) The Romanists say the images of all other saints but their own are idols; altho' there is no difference either in the manufacture or the worship.

happy state of the kingdom exciting the jealousy of the kings of Dekān, namely, Nezamo'l-muluk, Adel Shāh, and Kotbb Shāh (C), they entered into a league to suppress it; and for this purpose they took the field with 50,000 horse, and 300,000 foot. The king of Bīsnāgar (D) met them with double that number, and had the better at first; but fortune changing to the other side, he lost his life, at the age of ninety-six; and the enemy became victorious. They spent five months in plundering the capital, although the inhabitants had, in three days time, and destroyed, carried away 1550 elephants, loaded with money and jewels to the amount of above one hundred millions of gold; beside the royal chair for state days, whose price could not be estimated. For all this, Adel Shāh found a diamond, as big as an ordinary egg, on which the feather of the late king's horse used to be fixed; likewise a second, of an extraordinary size, tho' not so large as the first; besides other jewels, of an incredible value. After the aged Rājah's misfortune, the kingdom of Bīsnāgar was divided among his sons and nephews. This dissolution of the monarchy proved extremely hurtful to trade, which, in that year, was reduced to a very low ebb°.

by the Dekān kings.

SUCH is De Faria's account of this great revolution, which happened in 1565: but Cæsar Frederic, who was at Bīsnāgar two years after, that is, in 1567, is more particular; and besides, relates it with different circumstances. According to this author, Rezenegher, or Bīsnāgar, was attacked by four kings, Viridi being joined to the three before-mentioned. Yet was not their success owing to their power, but to the treachery of two of Rāma Rājah's chief commanders, who were Mohammedans, and had each under his power seventy or eighty thousand men: for after the battle had continued near four hours, they went over to the enemy: which so astonished the rest of the king's army, that they immediately fell into disorder, and took to flight. On this news, the inhabitants of Bīsnāgar abandoned that city, and the four kings entered it in great triumph. They stayed there six months, searching all places for plunder, and then withdrew, as not being able to keep so large a kingdom in their hands.

Revolution there.

RAMA RAJAH was not the lawful sovereign, but an usurper, who held the rightful king in prison. He, with his two brothers, Timi Rājah, and Bengāter, were commanders under the former king; who dying thirty years before (E), and leaving his son very young, the three brothers seized the government; Rama Rājah assumed the title of king; Timi Rājah undertook to manage the affairs of state; and Bengāter was made chief general of the army. As for the king, they kept him prisoner, and only shewed him to the people once every year. These brothers were all in the late battle; from which Timi Rājah only escaped, with the loss however of one of his eyes. Upon the defeat, the wives and children of the three tyrants fled from Bīsnāgar, together with the prisoner king. Afterwards Timi Rājah returning to the city, began to repeople it. He likewise sent to invite the merchants at Goa, and other places, to bring him horses, promising to pay a good price for them: but when, by this means, he had drawn together as many as he could, he dismissed the owners, without giving them any thing for their cattle.

New troubles.

IN 1567, the king, displeased with Bīsnāgar, on account of the late misfortune, removed with his court, to reside at Penegonda (F), a castle eight days journey farther within land. We learn nothing more concerning the affairs of Bīsnāgar from Cæsar Frederic, excepting that the son of Timi Rājah put to death the lawful king, with design to remove all obstacles to the throne; but that the grandees would not acknowledge him for king. Hence arose great distractions; so that in a little time the country became divided among many princes, who set-up for sovereigns^p.

Kingdom at rest.

NOTWITHSTANDING this, in 1597, we find the provinces of Bīsnāgar united again under one king, named Wentakapati. Whether he was of the race of the former kings, or the founder of a new dynasty, we know not: all we learn from authors is, that he kept his court at Chandegri (G), a city situate within land, exceedingly strong by nature, and defended by a castle built in the midst of it, so that it was reckoned impregnable; that his ancestors reigned as far as Goa and cape Komori; but that lately the Naiks of Travankor, Madūra, Tanjaor, and Jinji, had thrown off his yoke^q.

° DE FARIA, p. 252, & seqq.

^p CÆSAR FREDERIC'S VOY. ap. Purchas, vol. ii. p. 1704, & seqq.

^q Epist. de Reb. Japan. & Indic. ab HAYO. collect. p. 774, 803, & seqq.

(C) Cæsar Frederic makes four confederate kings; Dial Can (or Adel Kkân), Zamaluc (or Nezâm al Muluk), Cotomaluc (or Kotbb al Muluk), and Viridi.

(D) Named Rama Rājah; the same, doubtless, who attacked Meliâpûr.

(E) This will fall in the year 1535.

(F) Or Penewkonda, as in the Jesuits map of the peninsula; according to which, it lies to the south-east of Bīsnāgar, about 31 leagues distant, on a river which falls into the Krishna, the north boundary of Karnâta; and is at present the seat of a Nabâb, or Mogol viceroy.

(G) So written by the Portugueses; by the Italians, Ciandergi; it is also written Chandegrin by some. In the Jesuits Epistles, p. 770 and 836, it is said to be only three miles distant from a famous pagod called Tripeti, seated on a hill. This we judge to be the place named in the Jesuits map Ticoupati, about 27 leagues west-north-west of Fort St. George; in which neighbourhood Chandegri appears to have been.

FROM

- a FROM this time nothing of moment occurs in authors, relating to the affairs of Bisnâgar, till the entire ruin of that large monarchy, which happened about the middle of the last century. In order to explain the occasion of this great revolution, it will be necessary to look back to the affairs of Dekan, and see what was doing on that side. The descendants of the Is invaded a- three kings, Nezâm Shâh, Adel Shâh, and Kotbb Shâh, so often mentioned before, maintained ^{new,} their possessions so long as they preserved a friendly union, and assisted one another against the Mogols, who frequently made war upon them. But when that good understanding began to cease, they soon found the bad effects of their divisions: for their potent enemies watching their opportunity, about the year 1627 (H), possessed themselves, within a short time, of all the country belonging to Nezâm Shâh (I), the fifth or sixth descendant of the first slave^r, containing the provinces of Balagât, Telenga and Baglana^s; and at length took him prisoner in Dowlat abad, his capital, where he died (K). As this misfortune was owing to the envy of the other two kings, who refused to assist him, they were not long without the punishments due to their bad conduct: for some years after, Aureng Zib, third son of Shâh Jehân, being made governor of Balagât, that prince invaded the territories of Adel Shâh, king of Viziapûr, who immediately applied to the king of Bisnâgar for succour. But that Râjah neglecting to furnish his ally with troops, the Mogols took from the latter Bider, Paranda, and other considerable cities. This so exasperated Adel Shâh, that, making peace with Aureng Zib in 1650, ^{and quite de-} he entered into a league with the king of Golkonda against him of Bisnâgar, whom they vigo-^{lously} attacked, and at last stripped of his dominions. Kotbb Shâh seized the provinces along the coast of Coromandel, while Adel Shâh, having taken what lay next to him, pursued his conquests; seized Velûr, then the capital city, with Jenji (or Finji), and several other towns of Karnâta, as far as Porto Novo, and cape Nega Patan. As for the unfortunate Râjah, he fled into the mountains, where he remained in 1667, when our author, Thevenot, was on his travels^u. Thus was an end put to the kingdom of Bisnâgar, which about twenty years after fell under the power of the Mogols, by the conquest which Aureng Zib made of the kingdoms of Viziapûr and Golkonda.

^r BERNIER, part 2, p. 160.^s THEV. Trav. third part, ch. 2. p. 91,^t BERN. ubi supr.^u THEV. Trav. part 3. p. 92, & seq. TAVERNIER, part 2. p. 66. BERNIER, part 2. p. 171.

(H) Bernier says 35 or 40 years before the time he wrote; which brings it to about the year mentioned in the text: but the provinces of Tillingâna (or Talinga), and Buglâna (or Buglâni), were taken by Shâh Jehân; and, consequently, some years later. As Dowlat abad is the capital of Balagât, so these three provinces must have belonged to Nizâm Shâh.

(I) Thevenot erroneously gives the title of Nezâm Shâh to the king of Viziapûr; and, what is worse, assigns that of Adel Shâh, a Mohammedan title, to the Râjah of Bisnâgar, who was a heathen.

(K) Fryer, agreeable to what we gather from other authors, makes Nezâm Shâh to have reigned in the countries between Viziapur, Golkonda, and the Mogol's empire; and says Aureng Zib put an end to his race, in return for the hospitable reception he gave him at Jeneah, when he repaired thither, under the colour of a Fâkîr, and one who had been banished from court. The doctor adds, that he saw at Jeneah the sumptuous palace which Nizâm Shâh had built for that prince's reception.

C H A P. II.

Of the countries comprised in the kingdom of Dekan, or Dekkan.

S E C T. I.

Describing Bâglâna, Balagât, and Telenga.

- a FROM what has been said in the former chapter, it appears, that the kingdom of Dekan, ^{Division of} Dakan, or Dukkan, as it is variously pronounced, comprehended properly no more than ^{Dekan.} the four large provinces of Baglâna, Balagât, Telenga, and Viziapûr, as it was before the destruction of the empire of Bisnâgar, in the last century. Although some authors, without sufficient authority, include Golkonda, and even Oria or Orisba, with the countries as far as Bengâl and the Ganges. The three first of the four provinces may be comprised under the general name of Balagât, as they lay to the north of the mountain Gâte: for Balagât, as hath been already observed, signifies the tramontane provinces, or those beyond the mountains. This northern part was likewise by much the larger or more considerable of the two; and therefore its kings, stiled Nizâm Shâh, were called kings of Dekan, till it was conquered by the Great Mogol Shâh Jehân; after which the title was given to the kings of Viziapûr, who possessed the remaining part of Dekan; while the Mogols, with more right, added the crown of Dekan to their other titles, as having subdued the larger half of it. This being premised, a we shall give our readers some account of each province in particular.
- b

Province of Balagât.

THE province of Balagât, properly so called, is largest of the three which composed the northern Dekan. It has Kbândish and Berar, in the Mogol's empire, to the north; Tellinga, to the east; Bâglâna, with part of Guzerât, to the west; and Viziapûr to the south. This province, since it fell into the hands of the Mogols, has taken the name of Dowlet abâd, from its former capital. It is a fruitful pleasant country, abounding with cotton and sugar. The chief city at present, called Aureng abâd, is very great; yet has no walls. The governor, who is commonly a prince, resides there, as did Aureng Zib in the time of his father. The houses are mostly of free stone, and pretty high, with pleasant gardens, and trees planted before the doors. They have sheep here without horns, and so strong, as, when bridled and b saddled, to carry boys ten years old. This is a great trading town, and well peopled, with excellent ground about it^a.

Dowlet abâd. DOLT ABAD (or Dowlle abâd) is two leagues and a half northward of Aureng abâd; and was the capital of Balagât, before the Mogols conquered it. It belonged to Dekan (A), and was a place of great trade, which Aureng Zib removed to the present metropolis. The city is pretty big, much longer than broad, extending from east to west. It is walled with free stone, and has battlements and towers, mounted with cannon. It is reckoned the strongest place in all Hindûstân, on account of an oval hill within the town, which is strongly fortified; being invironed at the bottom with a wall of natural rock, defended by three forts, and having at top a good citadel, with the king's palace. These fortifications made the Indians deem the c place impregnable.

Pagodsof Elo-
ra.

THREE hours march from Dolt abâd are the famous pagods of Eiora, standing in a plain about two leagues square. In this space there are a great number of tombs, chapels, and spacious temples, full of pillars and pilasters; with many thousand figures, all extremely well cut out of the natural rock, and polished. It is a stupendous work, surpassing in appearance human force; and to be admired by Europeans, although the architecture and sculpture be not so delicate as with us. There is a famous pagod on the road to Golkonda, between the towns of Indûr and Indelway: it is called Chitanâgar, or the lady Chita, because dedicated to Chita, the wife of Râm (one of the Indian saints or demigods). It is built with a kind of Theban stone, and has a lovely frontispiece, adorned with figures of men and animals in d relievo, as finely sculpted as if they had been done in Europe^b.

Tillingâna, or Telenga.

TELENGA, Tillinga, or Tillingâna, lies on the east of Ballagât Proper, south of Berar, and west of Golkonda, having also Golkonda and Ballagât on the north. It was formerly the principal province of Dekan, and reached as far as the Portuguese lands towards Goa: but since the Great Mogol became master of the northern parts of this country, with the towns of Beder and Kalion, it has been divided between him and the king of Dekan; who is only stiled king of Viziapûr (or Vijapûr), and is reckoned among the provinces of Hindûstân. It has on the east Golkonda, on the west Baglâna and Viziapûr, on the north Balagât, and on the south Bisnâgar.

THE capital at present is Beder (or Bedr), which did belong to Balagât when it had kings, e and for some time to Dekan. This is a great city, encompassed with brick walls, which have battlements and towers, mounted with huge cannon, some three feet wide in the bore. Here is commonly a garrison of 3000 horse and foot, with 700 gunners, as being a frontier against Dekan. The governor lodges in a castle without the town, and makes a considerable advantage of his post. The Hindûs are no-where more superstitious than in this province. It has a particular language, called the Telenga, which some make the same with the Kanûri.

Baglâna.

BAGLANA, or Buglâna, has on the north Guzerât and Ballagât; on the east, this last province; and on the south and west, that part of Viziapûr called Konkan, belonging to the *Mâbarâtta*s. It ends in a point, at the sea-coast between Daman and Balsera. It is the least of all the provinces of which the Mungl empire consists; and its capital is called Mouler. The f Portuguese territories begin in this province at the port of Daman, twenty-one leagues south of Surât; and run along the coast by Bassaim, Bombay (now belonging to the English), and Chavel, to Dabûl, almost fifty leagues to the north of Goa. In this province, as in the rest of Dekan, they marry their children at four or five years of age, and suffer them to bed when the boy is ten and the girl eight: but the females who have children so young give over conceiving at thirty, and grow extremely wrinkled^c.

^a THEVENOT, ubi sup. p. 72.

^b Ibid. p. 76—79.

^c THEVENOT, ubi sup. p. 180, & seqq.

(A) Vanden Broecke, who was at Dolt abâd in 1617, says it was then the capital of Dekan.

S E C T. II.

Kingdom of Visapûr, or Viziapûr, described.

^a THE kingdom of Viziapûr (B), called by the Mogols Bijapûr, is bounded on the east by Karnâta, from which it is separated by the mountains of Gâte, or a branch thereof; ^{Kingd m of Viziapûr.} on the west by the sea, on the north by the provinces of Baglûna and Balagât, and on the south by Karnâta and the kingdom of Kanûra. These were its bounds before the destruction of the empire of Bisnûgar in 1667, which became divided between its king and him of Golkonda, by a line drawn from the borders of Viziapûr, south-eastward, to the coast of Choromandel, north of Porto Novo; which fell to the share of Adel Shûb, with the coast to Cape Negapatan. Within land he had Velcwr, then the capital of Karnâta; Finji, and other considerable cities; his dominions being bounded on the south by the Naik of Madûra. After the extinction of the kingdom of Nezâm Shûb, who reigned in the Balagât provinces, the title of king of Dekan passed to him, as being possessed of all which remained of it: but by the removal of that barrier, through the neglect of him, and the king of Golkonda, his power daily declined, and the Mogols gained ground, till at length they became masters of Viziapûr in 1685.

^b THE capital of this country is the city of Viziapûr (C), from whence the kingdom took its name. It is about four or five leagues in compass, fortified with a double wall, on which ^{The capital city.} are many cannon mounted, and a flat-bottomed ditch. The king's palace is in the middle of the town, and is very large, encompassed likewise with the ditch, full of water, wherein are some crocodiles. To the city belong several large suburbs, full of goldsmiths and jewellers shops; yet it hath but little trade, and not many things worth notice. Besides this capital, ^c there are many other considerable cities in the kingdom, with three or four ports; namely, Dabul, Râjabpûr, Karapatân, and Vingûrla.

THE coast of Visapûr, or, if you will, of Konkan (which makes the western part of Visapûr), is in a manner divided between the Portugueses and the Hindû states, lately erected in those quarters. About four miles south of the river Seragoung, which separates them from the Great Mogol's dominions, lies Damân, twenty-two leagues south of Surât. This city was formerly a place of good trade, but latterly was reduced to poverty. It belonged to the Portugueses till about the year 1740, when it fell, with the rest of their possessions between Surât and Goa, into the hands of the Mûharâttas or Marats. ^{City of Damân.} It stands at the mouth of a river, about three quarters of a mile from the sea-shore; and is naturally very strong, by a deep marsh which surrounds it. It is about half a mile long, and near as broad, surrounded with a good stone wall. The houses are built of the same materials. The streets are not paved; but very strait, and all very neat. It had six churches, a convent, monastery, nunnery, and an hospital; also a fort, on the opposite side of the river, garrisoned with 400 men; of which the Portugueses were more careful than of any other they had in the Indies. It was always a great eyefore to the governors of Surât; who often besieged it, but without success; although the Mogol army was at one time 40,000 strong ^d.

FROM Damân to Bassaim is about eighteen leagues: and half-way lies Trapor, or Tarapor, ^{Trapor and Bassaim.} a small but very rich city, when under the Portugueses, and dependant on Damân. Bassaim is about two miles in circumference, and inclosed with a wall; but its fortifications are but ^e slight. The churches were very magnificent, the market-place large and handsome, the streets clean and regular. It is divided from the island of Sâlsê by an inlet of the sea, which washes the walls, and affords an harbour for small ships; but is too shallow to admit any of great burden. It was a place of small trade; because most of its riches lay buried in their churches, or in the hands of indolent country gentlemen; who loitered away their days in ease, without having the least sense of the poverty and calamity of their country ^e. There lived more gentry in and about this place, than at Goa itself; whence the Portuguese proverb, Fidalgos of Bassaim. In short, it was one of the most considerable places the Portuguese had ^f; the governor being stiled general of the north; having had under him Diu, Damân, and Chawî, with all their territories.

^a THEVENOT, ibid. p. 92. TAVERN. part ii. p. 72. vol. i. p. 178, & seqq. DELLON's voy. p. 183. ^b supr. p. 187.

^d HAMILTON's new account of East-Ind. ^c HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 180. ^f DELLON, ubi

(B) It is variously written, or pronounced, Vizia-pore, Visapore, Vidiapore, Vijapûr, and the like.

(C) Situated on the river Mendoua; and in the latitude of 17° 30'. P. Bouchet, ap. Lett. Edif. tom. xv. p. 58.

Sâlfet isle.

THE island of Sâlfet is about twenty-five miles long, and in some parts ten broad. It was stocked with villages and churches when the Portugueses had it; but has no city on it, excepting one, called Kanra, hewn out of the side of a rock, with many antique figures and columns, curiously carved, besides several good springs of water: but, in our author's time, it was inhabited only by wild beasts and birds of prey*. Bandura is the most remarkable village, fronting Matrim in the island of Bombay, about a mile distant, of which mention has been elsewhere made. Passing Bombay, and some small islands in the hands of the Siddi and Konna ji Angaria, you meet with Chawl, which lies about seven leagues south-east of Bombay. The town was fortified by the Portugueses, and formerly a noted place for trade, having a river for small vessels, but latterly became miserably poor. Seven leagues still more south is Dandi Râjahpûr, a town belonging to the Siddi, who generally lies there with a fleet of the Great Mogol's vessels and ships of war, besides an army of 30 or 40,000 men. This place affords a good harbour, and the adjacent country feeds store of black cattle, from whence the English at Bombay are mostly supplied, when they keep in good terms with the Siddi; otherwise he makes them feed on fish. There is a rock within a league northward of the mouth of the river, fortified by the Seva ji (D); as are the two little isles, called Horney Coat, opposite the river of Zeferdan.

Dabul.

FIVE leagues to the southward of this last place stands Dabul, at the mouth of a large river; and, of old, was a place of trade, where the English had a factory. There is an excellent harbour, called Sangusîr, eight leagues to the south of Dabul: but the country, being inhabited by robbers, is not frequented; neither is Râjahpûr, seven leagues further down, although it has one of the best harbours in the world, and had formerly both an English and French factory settled there (E); the betillas and muslin being the finest in all India; but now there is no encouragement for such.

Râjahpûr.

Ghiria.

GHIRIA (F), the common residence of Konna ji Angaria (or Angria), lies about two leagues to the south of Râjahpûr, and is well fortified by a strong large castle, washed by the sea (G). Twelve leagues more southward is Malwan, an isle, two miles in circuit, inclosed with a stone wall. It lies about one mile from the main land, and is governed by an independent Râjah; who, with three or four grâbs, robs all he can master at sea.

Vingurla.

VINGURLA, which lies four leagues south of Malwan, was formerly a place of trade, and the Dutch had a factory there for cloths: but, in 1696, a Râjah, called Kempason, over-ran that country; and, under pretence of visiting the chief factor, seized and plundered the factory. The trading people, for their security, fled to the Portuguese dominions of Goa, which lie within six leagues of Vingurla; and, on the viceroy's refusing to send them back, entered his territories, and burnt as well as plundered whatever came in his way, not sparing the churches and images; for which sacrilege the Portugueses gave him the name of Kema Santo, or St. Burner: and, after bearing his inroads for many years, were obliged to buy a peace, by allowing him a pension. His army consisted of 7 or 8000 men, and he had two piratical grâbs at sea: but having a dispute, about a prize, with Konna ji Angria, this latter, who was much superior in power, burnt his grâbs; and, landing at Vingurla, destroyed the villages about the town¹.

Country of Sundah.

Country of Sundah.

SOUTH of the Portuguese territories, which end at Cape de Rama, or Cape Ramus (as the English call it), lies the country of the Râjah of Sunda; whose dominions extend along the coast about fifteen leagues from the said cape to Merzee (or Merzeou), and sixty or seventy leagues within land, being bounded on the south by Kanara. He is at present tributary to the Great Mogol; but was formerly feudatory to the king of Visapûr, of which Sunda was a part*. In Fryer's time he resided at Sunda; whence the whole country took the name. It is mountainous, and lies on both sides of the Gâtti, or Gâte; maintaining them in pay 12,000 foot and 3000 horse¹.

THERE is no river or harbour for shipping till you come to Sevasîr; and that is no good one, though covered with a large castle.

* HAMILT. ubi supr.
Trav. p. 162, 163, 169.

¹ Ibid. ubi supr. p. 243—248.

* Ibid. p. 261.

¹ FRYER

(D) That is, the successors of Seva ji.

(E) It lies exactly in 17 degrees of north latitude, above four leagues up the river of the same name; which runs with a gentle stream. Our author says, the English were dislodged by the Indians. How the French came to quit it we do not find. He adds, that the chief commodities are saltpetre, callicoes, but especially pepper, which grows there in plenty. De lon Voy. East. Ind. p. 56. c. 19. Cornwall, p. 36, says it belongs to the Siddi.

(F) Our author, Capt. Hamilton, doubts whether Ghiria be also called Vizendruk, or lies seven leagues more southerly. But Captain Cornwall, in his observations on several India voyages, p. 36, makes them the same place.

(G) Karapatan, or, as it is called in our charts, Careptam, lies about three leagues to the south of Râjahpûr river.

- a KARWAR lies seven leagues south of Cape Ramus, with a good harbour, and a river capable to receive ships of 300 tons. The English have a factory here, fortified with two bastions, and some small cannon for its defence^m. Five days journey from hence lie the pepper mountains of Sundab, producing the best pepper in the world; known in England by the name of Karwar pepper: but as the Rajah finds a trade for it up the country, at the best rates, therefore but little of it is transported into *Europe*ⁿ. Hamilton says, the vallies abound in corn and pepper, the best in all India; and the mountain-woods with many sorts of wild beasts, as tigers, wolves, deer, elks, monkeys, hogs, and cattle of a prodigious size. He saw a bull killed whose four quarters weighed a ton: the horns measured twenty-three inches about the roots; and the bones so large, that he took out the marrow with a common silver spoon: but the flesh is not so well tasted as that of small tame cattle.

b THIS country is so famous for hunting, that, in the year 1678, two English gentlemen of distinction went thither incognito, in one of the East-India company's ships, to enjoy that diversion. There are three species of tigers in Karwar woods; the smallest, which is not above two feet high, is the fiercest, and delights much in human flesh. The second sort is about three feet high, and hunts deer and wild hogs. The largest size tiger is three feet and half high, less rapacious than the other kinds, sooner frightened, and seldom greedy of man's flesh. One of them, after killing a buffalo, bemired in a bog, and sucking the blood, pulled him out, and threw him over his shoulder, as a fox does a goose, and was carrying him with his feet upwards to his den; but let him fall, on seeing the people pursue him^o.

^m HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 262.

ⁿ FRYER, ubi supr. p. 163.

^o HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 263 & seqq.

S E C T. III.

History of Visapûr, or Vijapûr.

- c THE kingdom of Visapûr had seven kings, of the Pâtan race, who all enjoyed the title of Adel Shâh, assumed by the founder; whose names are given us by Dr. Fryer; viz. 1. Adel Shâh. 2. Afsof Adel Shâh. 3. Bissab allah Adel Shâh. 4. Ibrâhîm Adel Shâh. 5. Soltân Mahmûd Adel Shâh. 6. Allah Adel Shâh. 7. Soltân Sokodr Kawder Adel Shâh; who reigned in our author's time.

- d ON the death of this last prince's father, Allah Adel Shâh, the great officers were divided in their interests. It was reported, that Allah was the son of an elephant-keeper; who, on a time when the choicest of those animals were stabled near the women's quarters, to hide them from the Great Mogol's ambassador, found means to get into the apartment of Soltân Mahmûd's queen. The issue of this correspondence was Allah Adel Shâh; whom his mother, after the old king's death, settled on the throne: nor did any stir to dispute his right during his life: but, on his death, Soltân Sokodr (or Sekânder) being an infant (H), some of the children of Soltân Mahmûd raised forces, to oppose his succession. However, after several hot disputes, the factions were suppressed by Kowis Khân, who by the late king had been appointed protector of the kingdom. This lord, who was an Hobsi, or Arabian (I) Kafir, kept Seva ji in no small awe. However, the nobles, who held their provinces as feudatories, or rather vassals, of him, taking advantage of the king's minority, began to withdraw their allegiance.

- e KOWIS KHAN, though an excellent commander, yet being addicted to wine, the distracted laid to his charge not only all miscarriages in the government, but also the loss of the country, which had been over-run by Seva ji. Bullul Khân, the general, was indeed sent to oppose that rebel, and was able to have put a stop to the growing mischief: but the Pâtan envying the authority of Kowis Khân, he let the enemy proceed without opposition; and, impatient to usurp his post, soon after he had been called from the expedition, basely murdered him. To effect this he invited that minister to a treat in his tent, where he took care to ply him with liquor till he became drunk, and fell asleep. Then Bullul Khân, surprising his few followers with 12,000 Pâtans, forced his way into the castle, and seized the young king: after which he put Kowis Khân to death, and usurped the government of affairs. However, being no less envied by the Dukkan princes, than his predecessors had been envied by him, he watched their motions, and hindered them from joining their forces. Mean time Vizapûr was in the utmost danger of being ruined; for, besides the factions, which tore the state to

(H) Other authors say, that, being an orphan, the late king and his queen adopted him for their son: that the king before his death caused him to be proclaimed; but, being an infant, the queen was proclaimed regent: and, having made peace with Seva ji, went to Mekka; from whence she returned in 1604.

See Tavernier's Travels into India, p. 92. Tavernier, p. 72.

(I) These Kafirs were preferred to the chief employments, under the title of Siddâis; and only in Vizapûr arrived to great preferments, as being the frizzled woolly-pated Blacks.

pieces within, the kingdom was threatened without by Seva ji on one side, and a great army of Mogols on the other. This happened about the year 1675, when the young king was scarce ten years old. The new protector endeavoured to gain the interest of the great lords ; but to no purpose, so long as he refused to resign his power ^p

Seva ji's success.

A. D.
1680.

SEVA JI, taking advantage of the times, sends a detachment, under his son Sam'a ji, from his army at Pundit before Goa ; which, marching through the country, proceeded as far as Bâghnâgur, capital of Golkonda, plundered and burnt that city : but, as Bullul Khân watched his motions, he did no harm to Viziapûr. At the same time Seva ji himself, with another detachment, advanced to Surât ; which gave him the usual pishekush, or present. On his return he treacherously seized on the Râjah of Râmnâgar's territories in the mountains, through which he obtained leave to pass ; and returned a bold answer to Bullul Khân, who had sent to demand a reason for his proceedings. The Khân, foreseeing from thence that a storm was gathering against him, took the field to prevent it ; and, surprising Serji Khân (Râjah of Sunda), and Timi Naig, general of Kanâra, who were going to join the Dukkaneses, the first fled, and the latter was trodden to death in the confusion, after most of his forces had been slain by the pedereros, carried on the war-camels.

Mogols attack Viziapûr.

THESE auxiliaries were to have been seconded by Badur Khân, the Mogol general, who, some time afterwards, appeared twice before Viziapûr, with a formidable army ; pretending to support the rights of the Dukkaneses, and call Bullul Khân to an account. But he was both times repulsed by the protector, at the head of 12,000 Pâtans ; who the last time forced him to leave his Hâfnah, or military chest, with 1000 camels, some elephants, and several pieces of ordnance. There were likewise slain 4 or 5000 Mogols, with the Basha of Busserab, and his son, whose heads were put on poles, and set up on the city walls ^q.

The kingdom conquered.

FROM this time we meet with nothing remarkable concerning the affairs of Viziapûr for near twenty years, excepting what relates to the proceedings of Seva ji ; who, by degrees extended his power in that country. At length, Pan Naik, a Râjah, relying on the strength of his country, as being situated among twenty-seven inaccessible mountains, called Settais Pale, in which there are villages and cultivated lands, took up arms also, in order to shake off the Viziapurian yoke. At this juncture Aureng Zib, who for a long time had an eye towards the conquest of this kingdom, seeing the forces of the kingdom, amounting to 30,000 horse, and as many foot, employed against those rebels, laid hold of the opportunity ; and, under pretence that the king had given Seva ji (K) passage through his country (which yet he could not have hindered, had the other attempted it), besieged the city of Viziapûr (L). This capital was valiantly defended by Siddi Mansutu (M), a black, who governed during the king's minority : but at length, in 1685 (N), it was taken, with the castle, and the king, named Sikânder (or Sekânder), carried away prisoner : to whom however the conqueror allowed a million of rupis a year for his maintenance. Our author Gemelli saw this prince the same year at Aureng Zib's camp (O). He was a sprightly person, about twenty-nine (P) years of age (Q), of a good stature, and olive complexion ^r.

Power of the lords.

THE ruin of Viziapûr was in a great measure owing to the privilege of inheritance, which the lords enjoyed, contrary to the custom observed in other countries of the Indies : for in Dukkan, the lands descended from father to son among the nobility, although the common people were mere slaves. They built forts, made peace and war, fell-out with one another, and with their king, at pleasure : in short, were restrained only from raising men in his name, and for his use. This made them insolent and stubborn, so that it was difficult to get them to unite for the common good ; and many times they sided with the enemies of their country.

How checked.

IN some measure to balance the power of his lords, the king of Viziapûr bought Kafirs, or Blacks, whom he educated, and, according to their merit, promoted to the chief places of honour and trust, in the same manner as the king of Golkonda made use of eunuchs, who

^p FRYER'S Travels, p. 147. 167, 168.
ap. Church. collect. vol. iv. p. 148.

^q FRYER'S Trav. p. 163, & seqq.

^r GEMELLI Trav.

(K) Seva ji died in 1680 ; so that his successor must here be understood.

(L) Hamilton says, he had an army of 3 or 400,000 men, and soon conquered the open country ; but the city being built on a flat mountain, of difficult access, and room enough to sow corn on it, it took him up a blockage of seven or eight years to reduce it. Hamilt. new Account of the East-Ind. vol. i. p. 262.

(M) The same, probably, whom Fryer calls Siddi Massute (or Massud).

(N) This is the true year, not in 1695 ; in or about which year Viziapûr was conquered, according to Bracms ; and Golkonda quickly after, as will be observed hereafter.

(O) It is likely that this prince was but newly conquered, and had not been yet out of Viziapûr : for if he had been once carried into the Mogol's dominions, it is hardly to be supposed that he would ever have been brought back into those which were lately his own.

(P) That was in 1665 ; which agrees not very well with Fryer's account ; who says, that, in 1675, the king was scarce was ten years old.

(Q) According to Captain Hamilton, he was a good simple prince ; whom the conqueror carried in triumph, along with his victorious army, near the space of thirty years ; at the end of which he died.

- a were his slaves. By this policy the lords were partly kept in awe: and, if at any time they who raised disturbances fell into his hands, he not only cut-off their heads, but confiscated their estates, and gave them to his favourites; which bound them still stronger to his interest^s.

^s FRYER, ubi supr. p. 167.

C H A P. III.

The history of Seva ji, and the Mâharâttas.

- b S EVA JI was descended from an antient line of Râjahs, of the warlike tribe of the Boun-^{in birth} selos. His grandfather, named Vangu ji Râjab, and his father, Shâb ji Râjab, were both in esteem under Nisbâm Shâb, king of Dukkan, by whom the latter was made governor of Jeneab Gur; where he had two sons, Seva ji (R) and Samba ji, by his first wife; and by his second, a third son, called Ekow ji. On the downfall of Nisbâm Shâb (which happened in 1650), Shâb ji Râjab and his two younger sons put themselves into the service of the king of Viziapûr, who gave them considerable employments, which they held in 1675, when our author was in India.
- c As for Seva ji, he, being of a turbulent nature, sought to raise himself by the ruin of refless spirit, others; setting the lesser lords at variance with their prince, and sharing in the spoils of those who were defeated. For this reason his father disinherited him (S), and at his death settled his youngest son Ekow ji in the Râjahship of Benglûr, which was yet of no great value, having suffered much in the troubles of Dukkan.
- d THE king of Viziapûr, observing the aspiring genius of Seva ji, with an intent to blast deceives Abdol him in the bud, sent a potent army against him, conducted by Abdol Khân, an experienced Khân; soldier. As soon as Seva ji understood that this general had taken the field, while the main body of his army was at a distance, he sent him flattering messages; intimating withal, that, in case the Khân would stop his march, he would meet him at a certain chowlti, and kiss his feet. Abdol Khân, believing him sincere, contrary to the intreaty of his friends, at the day appointed, set out with his son and a select number of his men to the rendezvous; near which Seva ji had placed an ambuscade, and with a few attendants waited the general's coming. As soon as Seva ji perceived him at a distance, he advanced, and falling at his feet, with feigned tears, craved pardon for his offence; nor would he rise, till Abdol Khân had promised to intercede for him. After this, as they were going to enter the chowlti together, he cries out, that his lord, so he stiled the general, might possibly take away his life. Hereupon Abdol Khân, to remove all suspicion, delivers his sword and poniard to his page, and bids Seva ji enter with courage. The treacherous Dukkaneze entered accordingly; and, after some discourse, watching his opportunity, slips a dagger from under his coat-sleeve, and strikes it to the heart of the general. At the same time, the signal being given, his men came from their ambuscade: on which a skirmish ensued, wherein Seva ji received a wound from the son of Abdol Khân; but the latter with difficulty escaped, in disguise, to the camp, when the soldiers were so dismayed with the news of the disaster, that they immediately dispersed and kills him.
- e S EVA JI, elated with this success, resolves not to return till he had sacked Panala, one of Attempts Pa- the most strong and wealthy cities: but, finding much opposition from the garrison, though nala, small, he sends 7 or 800 of his men, as deserters, to the city, to complain of his barbarity, and offer their service. This offer was accepted; and they were set to defend the walls, while the citizens themselves guarded the gates. But one night the pretended deserters received the enemy under covert of the trees, which were planted along the ditch; and, having opened the gates, let in the rest of Seva ji's forces, who cut down the trees, to prevent their doing the like mischief to themselves^s.
- f M EAN time the son of Abdol Khân, being reinforced with new troops, joins Rustam Jemma, and Viziapûr another general, in order to revenge his father's death: but Seva ji having gained Rustam, ^s FRYER'S Trav. p. 171, & seq.

(R) Thevenot says, he was born at Bazaim, then belonging to the Portuguses: and as the same author makes him thirty-five years of age when he plundered Surât in 1664, he must have been born in 1629. See These Trav. Ind. part iii. chap. 16.

(S) According to Thevenot, he rebelled in his father's life time; and keeping the mountains with the robbers and debauched young men, who followed him, could not be reduced by the forces sent to attack him. The king, suspecting that his father held intelligence with him, caused him to be arrested; and he dying in prison, his son was so incensed that he resolved to be revenged. In a little time after, he plundered part of Viziapûr.

by

by a sum of money, whose influence the most loyal of those people are not able to resist, a when the two armies were ready to give battle, that general withdrew with his cavalry, leaving his colleague with but a few forces to the mercy of his enemy. For all this, young Abdol fell on like a lion; calling out, Thou coward, Seva, here am I. But Seva did not go near him; saying, He is a rash youth, let somebody else kill him. Abdol broke through the enemy two or three times; till, being tired, he founded a retreat, and hastened to Viziapûr, to complain of Rustam's treachery. This general with some of his friends went over to Seva ji; advising him to follow his blow, and set upon the capital itself; which he did, and would have taken it, had not Siddi Jor come to its relief with a vast recruit.

Outwits Siddi Jor; UPON this Seva ji retires to Panala, whither he is pursued by the Siddi, who closely besieges the place; but after he had lain a long time before it, Seva ji, by his connivance (as it was b thought), stole out by night, and, by means of a false firmân, gets possession of the Siddi's town of Râjapûr; pretending that the Siddi was to surrender it in exchange for Panala. On this general's return to Viziapûr, the king dissembled his resentment for letting that traitor escape, and dismissed him with thanks: but, having made Bullul Khân commander in chief, he dispatches him after the Siddi; who, suspecting his design, attacks and puts him to flight. Upon this the king takes the field with his general; who did by fraud what he could not effect by force; for the night after the two armies were in view, the Omrâs, who were with the Siddi, forsaking him, he was slain, and his head brought to the king, without any more strokes given on either side.

Seizes several places: SEVA JI, being thus delivered from an enemy whom he was not able to cope with, he, at c his leisure, seizes on smaller places, such as Dandê Râjapûr; whose prince being forced out of his possessions, excepting the strong castle at that town, which is encompassed by the sea, but within shot of the land, applied to the Great Mogol for his protection. Hereupon that monarch assisted him with succours by sea, which enabled the castle to hold out against the batteries of the enemy (T).

and makes peace. DURING these transactions the king of Viziapûr dies (U), and leaves an infant to dispute for the throne. The queen, who became regent, did all she could to reduce Seva ji to duty: but her endeavours proving unsuccessful, she accepted of the peace which he proposed to her. After which she lived at rest.

Invades the Mogols. MEAN time Seva ji, who could not be out of action, plundered some places belonging to d the Great Mogol, Aureng Zib; which obliged that monarch to send forces against him, under the conduct of Shasta (or Shâb Hest) Khân, his uncle, who was governor of Aureng abâd. Shasta Khân's forces being much superior to those of Seva ji, he vigorously pursued him; but as he was very vigilant, and his retreat was always in the mountains, the Khân could not surprise him. However, that experienced general resolved to continue with his troops on Seva's territories; concluding, that his turbulent spirit would at length oblige him to make some false step. This patience of Shasta Khân being very irksome to Seva ji, he had recourse to a stratagem. He ordered one of his captains to write to the Mogol commander, offering to go over to his master's service, and carry with him 500 men, who were under his command. This was done with so much art, that at length Shasta Khân, believing the e officer sincere, gave him leave to come to the Mogol camp.

Almost surprised. THE pretended deserter, by reviling Seva ji, and ravaging his lands with greater fury than any other, gained so far at length on the good opinion of Shasta Khân, that he made him captain of his guards. But, some time after, being appointed to be upon guard on a certain night at the general's tent, he sent word to Seva ji; who repaired thither at the time appointed. Shasta Khân, awaking with the noise, flew to his arms, and was wounded in the hand (X). However, he made a shift to escape; but a son of his was slain: and Seva ji, thinking that he had killed the general himself, gave the signal to retreat. This he did in good order, carrying off the Khân's treasure, and his daughter, who was treated with the greatest respect, and afterwards sent back, on payment of the ransom demanded. He wrote f afterwards to Shasta Khân, desiring him to withdraw off his lands, for that otherwise he should certainly lose his life, by the stratagems which he continually formed against him.

Seva's march; THE Khân, not thinking it prudent to slight such advice, informed Aureng Zib that it was impossible to force Seva ji in the mountains, without ruining his troops; and received orders to withdraw, under pretence of a new enterprize. Mean time Seva, pursuing his resolution of revenge against the Great Mogol, in 1664, formed a design to plunder Surât; which he knew at that time to be full of riches. As his territories lay chiefly in the mountains on the □ FRYER'S Trav. p. 172, & seq.

(T) When Fryer wrote, in 1676, Seva ji had lain before the castle 15 years.

(U) This must have been about 1663, or 1664.

(X) Bernier says, this attempt to seize and carry off the Khân was made in the city of Aureng abâd; and that this bold and enterprising lord gave Shâb Hest Khân more trouble in Dekan, than all the forces of the king of Viziapûr. Mem. Mogol. Emp. part ii. p. 149.

a road between Bassaim and Cbawol, he divided his forces into two bodies, each of which encamped near one of those cities. Then, having ordered his commanders not to plunder, but pay for every thing they had, he departed, in the habit of a Fakir, for Surât. In that disguise he observed every part of it at leisure, and returned to his army; from whence, being followed by 4000 men, he marched back, with all the secrecy he could, and encamped near Brampûr gate. To amuse the governor, who sent to know his business, he demanded guides, under pretence of marching to another place (Y): but that lord, without giving him any answer, retired into the castle, with his effects, and sent for assistance on all hands; while most of the inhabitants in consternation fled into the country ^x.

HEREUPON Seva ji's men entered the city, and plundered it for four days, burning several ^{plundered Surât.} houses. None escaped pillage, excepting the quarters of the English and Dutch; who, ^{A. D. 1662} instead of an attack, received his compliments, seeing them so well provided with cannon. We are told likewise, that he spared the Christians at the instance of a Capuchin friar. Neither did he attempt the castle, where he knew most of the wealth of the place was lodged; because it was capable of making a vigorous defence, and he was afraid the forces of that country would gather before he could execute his designs. However, it was computed that he carried away, in gold, silver, and jewels, to the value of above thirty French millions (Z).

As Jessom Seyn Râjah was suspected to have held intelligence after this with Seva ji, he was recalled from Dekan, and Jessyn sent in his room, accompanied by Soltân Mawzm (Aureng Zib's eldest son), though without any power. This Râjah vigorously besieged Seva's principal fortresses; and, being more expert than all the rest in matters of negotiation, he so managed the business, that Seva surrendered before it came to extremities. After this, he drew him to ^{de lared a} the Great Mogol's party, against Viziapûr; whereupon Aureng Zib declared him a Râjah: ^{Râjah:} and, taking him under his protection, gave the pension of a very considerable Omrâ to his son.

SOME time after (viz. in 1666), Aureng Zib, designing to make war against Persia, wrote ^{goes to Dehli} very obliging letters to the new Râjah; wherein he extolled his generosity and abilities to such a degree (A), that, on the faith of Jessyn, he went to Dehli. But the wife of his uncle Shâh Hest Khân (who was then at court) persuaded Aureng Zib to arrest the person who had murdered ^d her son, wounded her husband, and sacked Surât. So that one evening Seva ji saw his pavilion beset with three or four Omrâs: but he made shift to get away in the night ^y. This is the account given by Bernier, with which that of Dr. Fryer agrees: but Thevenot relates the fact in a somewhat different manner. According to this author, Seva ji at first met with all imaginable caresses: but some months after, perceiving a coldness in the king's behaviour, he complained of it; and boldly told him, that he believed his intention was to put him to death, although he was come voluntarily, on the security of his royal word, to wait on him: that, however, if he perished, there were those who would revenge his death; and that, in hopes they would do so, he was resolved to die by his own hands. Then, drawing his dagger, he made an attempt to kill himself; but was hindered, and had guards set upon him.

^e AURENG ZIB would willingly have put him to death; but feared an insurrection of the ^{escapes from} Râjahs. They already murmured at the treatment he had received, after the promise made ^{thence:} to him; and the rather, as most part of them came to court upon no better security. This consideration obliged the king to use him well, and make much of his son. He assured him that he never had it in his thoughts to put him to death; and promised to give him a considerable government, provided he would go with him to Kandabâr; which he intended to besiege. Seva ji pretended to consent, on condition that he might command his own forces; and having, with that grant, obtained a passport for their coming, he resolved to make use of it for withdrawing from court. Accordingly he ordered those, whom he trusted with it, to provide him horses along the road: mean time he got himself and his son to be conveyed ^f in panniers to the river-side. As soon as they were over, mounting the horses, which were ready for them, he told the boat-man he might go and acquaint the king, that he had carried over Râjah Seva ji. They posted day and night: but the son, unable to bear the fatigue of ^{his son died:} such hard riding, died on the road. Seva left money to have his body honourably burned, and arrived in good health in his own territories. Aureng Zib was extremely vexed (B) at his

^x THEVENOT Trav. part iii. p. 27, & seqq. BERNIER's Mem. part ii. p. 149.

^y BERNIER, ubi

(Y) Bernier says, that he spread a report on the road, that he was a Râjah going to court.

(Z) In getting this wealth, he is accused by Bernier, and others, of using extreme cruelty; cutting off the inhabitants, to make them discover their treasures. Bernier's Mem. of the Mogol. Emp. part ii. p. 151.

(A) Thevenot, who places this affair in 1666, says these letters were written to insnare him; Aureng Zib having resolved to destroy him: but Bernier, who was then at court, may be presumed to have known the circumstances better.

(B) Yet Fryer, with others, says it was not without his privity.

escape²; which made a great noise at court: every body accusing the eldest son of Râjah Jesséyn to have assisted in it³, as hath been already observed^b. On the other hand, Seva ji, in revenge of this usage, at his return, went and plundered Surât a second time. Afterwards he enlarged his territories southward, as far as the walls of Goa: from whence he proceeded to the borders of Kanôra and Sunda Râjah's country^c.

plunders
Baghnâghar,
seizes Râmnâgar:
HAvING finished this expedition, Seva ji encamps at Pundit, before Goa; where leaving the main body of his army, he detaches two bodies of troops: one he gives to his son Samba ji; who marches quite through Viziapûr, as far as Baghnâghar, the capital of Golkonda; which he plunders and burns. This done, he returned the way he went; but without doing any harm to the country: because he was observed in his passage by Bullul Khân, who was then protector, as well as general of the army. However he set upon and plundered Hublay, Rabay, and other mart towns. With the second detachment, Seva ji marched to Surât, which he called his treasury; and although they shut their gates against him out of form, yet they gave him his usual pishkush, or present. As the Mogol forces possessed the plain country, he obtained leave of Râjah Râmnâgar to carry his army, in his repeated expeditions, over the hills, which reach within thirty miles of Surât. By this means, having made himself acquainted with the avenues into that Râjah's country, he, in his last return from Surât (C), seized upon it; giving only this reason for his treachery, that it was inconvenient to trust him with the door of his exchequer. The inhabitants of Râmnâgar are the savages called Kûleys.

reply to Bullul Khân:
BULLUL KHAN, being at the helm, sent to demand how he durst attempt to rob those places? O, quoth he to the messenger, go tell thy master, I wonder how he durst dispossess any great man of life, or place, without having first advised with me (D). I did this only to let him know, that I, not he, am a member of Viziapûr. The protector, foreseeing by this answer that a storm was gathering, steps forth to prevent it; and, by surprising Sergi Khân, and Timi Naig, who were advancing to join Seva, broke all his measures^d, as hath been already related^e.

his dominions:
AT this time, Seva ji was master of all Konkhon; extending along the coast from Balfore hills, a little to the south of Surât, to the river Gongola, a little to the south of Goa, the space of 250 leagues. Within land his possessions were not very great in the plains: but he had intire dominion over the Goat, or chain of mountains which are piled one upon another. Nor did the Dukkaneſes attempt to retake any of his acquisitions, altho' he had blocked up their ports, so that they had none left them free, excepting only Porto Novo (E), beyond Tuttikori (or Tuttikorin). Neither were those which the Portugueses and English possessed of any great account to them, in respect of trade, since he hindered the Kaffilas from repairing to their ports; not more to the detriment of the Europeans than his own: whereas the profits arising from commerce would have been of infinite more service to him, than ravaging countries, and murdering the inhabitants. He had taken and maintained above sixty strong hills against the Mogols; who, not caring for such rugged places, chose rather to desert than defend them. On the other hand, as they were masters of the plains, Seva ji was unable to do any thing there, but rob from time to time, and presently retreat to the high lands; whence Aureng Zib called him his mountain rat^f.

invests the Mogols:
marches to Surât:
IN (or about) the year 1678, Seva ji marched again towards Surât^g; which motion of his so frightened the merchants, who had suffered by him formerly, that although the city was then surrounded with walls able to resist a strong force, yet they would not venture it, but fled with their wealth and families. The Râjah, ever since the time that he had so cruelly plundered Surât, considered it as under contribution to him, and came to receive the usual tribute; while the governor taxed the Baniyans to satisfy the enemy's demands, even after the walls were built. This being represented to Aureng Zib, he, in May 1679, sent Morâd Bek, his armour-bearer, to command that city; who the same month marched to put a stop to the incursions of Seva ji's troops, who ravaged the neighbouring places: and although Aureng Zib's eldest son (Soltan Mahmûd) advanced to Brâmpûr with a formidable army, yet Seva ji plundered the country; knowing that the Soltân could not break his forces to hazard a battle, till he saw how his father sped against the Raspûts; that he might be the better able to judge what was most proper to be done, in order to promote his own designs of mounting the throne. But not long after, death delivered the Mogol monarch from this troublesome enemy; who died on the 1st of June, 1680^h.

² THEVENOT, ubi supr. p. 30.

ubi sup. p. 174.

³ See before, in the reign of Aureng Zib, p. 116.

⁴ BERNIER, ubi supr.

^d FRYER, p. 162, & seq.

^b See before, p. 114.

^c See before, p. 142.

^h FRYER, p. 412, & seqq.

^e FRYER, p. 170, & seq.

(C) About the year 1674, or 1675.

(D) This alludes to Bullul Khân's having usurped the protectorship, by the murder of Kowis Khân.

(E) This place, called by the Malabars Pirinki

Potey (a), is on the coast of Choromandel, in the kingdom of Finji, and a factory of the Dutch, between Tranquebar and Pondichéry.

(a) See the Propagat. of the gospel in the East, by Danish missionaries, part ii. let. 6. p. 41.

a SEVA JI, as to his person, was short of stature, and of a tawny complexion; but had very quick eyes, which indicated a great deal of wit. He usually ate once a day, and preserved a very good state of health. If he was 35 years of age when he plundered Surât, in 1664ⁱ, it from thence follows, that he was no more than 51 when he died.

ON Seva ji's death, the two chief ministers were at variance about settling the succession: one was for advancing his younger son; the other declared for Samba ji, the elder: who, at length prevailing, was declared Maw Râjah (F), or the lawful heir to his father's conquests^k.

WE know very little concerning the successors of Seva ji, whom some authors speak of as living many years after his death (G); while others seem to give that name, or title, in common to all his descendants. Thus much, however, we learn from several hands, that, instead of losing ground, they continued to enlarge their territories on all sides.

IN 1683, we are told that Seva ji Râjah (by whom must be understood Samba ji, his immediate successor) got footing on the island of Goa; and, having raised some batteries against the city itself, would have annoyed it very much, had not a Portuguese heroine, in a sally, forced into a redoubt of the enemy, and cut them all to pieces: which struck such a terror into the Râjah's army, that they quitted their posts and fled. The lady, named Donna Maria, received the pay of a captain ever after (H) that noble exploit; which was not the first she had achieved: for a gentleman, who had promised her marriage, having deserted her, and passed to India in quality of a captain, thinking that way to avoid her resentment, she followed him thither in man's apparel; and, when she had found him out, challenged him at sword and pistol. But he prudently chose to make up the quarrel by marriage, rather than put the matter to an issue; which, whatever turn it took, could not but end in his disgrace^l.

THESE Râjahs continued to invade their neighbours by turns; nor does it appear, that they lost any thing by the conquest which Aureng Zib made of Viziapûr, about 1685: for although this monarch is said to have subdued that kingdom, which he in effect put an end to, yet in reality not much above half the country fell by that means into his possession: for the successor of Seva ji was then master of the western part from the mountains of Balagât to the sea (I), while other Râjahs kept the parts which they had before seized. And although by degrees the Mogol emperor not only reduced those Râjahs to a submission (K), but even subdued other countries to the south and east; yet the successors of Seva still maintained their footing against the Mogol generals, in spite of whom they made frequent expeditions, both into Karnâta, formerly called Bisnâgar, even as far as the coast of Choromandel; and into the Mogol empire itself, where they levied tribute on several provinces.

WE must not neglect to mention what we are told by a certain author, that at the funeral obsequies of the princes of the race of Seva ji, all the officers of their household (who amount to a considerable number) are burned with their corpses; and that the same custom is practised in several of the other petty kingdoms of the Indies^m.

THE subjects of those princes are called Mâharâttas (L), or Ganîms; who have of late acquired a surprising power by such incursions. They have also taken the island of Sâlsset, with the castle and town of Bâzaim, besides other places, from the Portuguese; maintaining on foot above 200,000 horse (M) in the northern, southern, and inland provinces. Their present prince is named Sabow Râjah, and keeps his court at Settara, in *Dekkân*ⁿ.

OF their expeditions south-eastward into the peninsula of India, we find mention particularly of three, made in the years 1695, 1705 (N), and 1740: of which last only we are able to give our readers some account.

IT has been already remarked, in our account of the late revolution^o in the Mogol's empire, that Nezâm al Mulûk (otherwise called Azof-ja (*)) was for a long time governor of Dekkân; where he staid without going to court, under pretence of keeping the Mâharâttas, or Ganîms, in awe. The truth is, they never ravaged the empire, excepting when, to serve his own designs, he set them to work: but, being at length prevailed on to return to court, the Mâharâttas (O) took advantage of the troubles which ensued, and descended like a torrent from their mountains; with no less a design than to subdue the whole western peninsula of ⁱ THEVENOT, ubi supr. p. 30.

p. 254.

^k FRYER, ubi supr. p. 416.

^l HAMILTON'S Trav. vol. i.

^m DELLON'S Voy. E. Ind. p. 51.
p. 121, & seqq.

ⁿ FRASER'S Hist. Nadir Shâh, p. 33.

^o See before,

(F) Rather Mâha Râjah, that is, the great prince, in the Sansekerrit language, or that of the Brammans.

(G) Gemelli speaks of Seva ji's subjects; and tells us, he passed through his territories in the year 1695.

(H) She was living in 1705.

(I) Which part was formerly called Konkân, Kunkbân, or Konkam: afterwards they extended it southward to the coast of Malabâr; part of which also they subdued; and northward, till within a little way of Surât.

(K) As the Sundab Râjah, who is now tributary. See Hamilton's new Account of the East-Indies, chap. 22. p. 261.

(L) Corruptly, by some, Maraffes and Morats.

(M) P. Saigne says 140,000. See Lettres Edif. & Curieuses. Recueil 26, p. 260.

(N) See Ovington's Voy. to Surât, p. 183; and Lettres Edif. tom. xxiv. p. 257, & seqq.

(*) Or Azof-ja, Azofia, in our author and others.

(O) P. Saignes, and others, calls them Marattes, or Marats.

A. D. 1740. India, and root out the Mohammedan government. In the year 1740, they made an incur- a sion as far as the Ganges : then, turning towards the west, they seized all the country in India belonging to the Portugueses ; excepting the city of Goa, which they besieged, and would have taken, but for the forts which defended it.

they invade Karnata :

defeat the Mogols :

AFTER this expedition, their prince Sito ji began his march southward with 50,000 horse, and passed the mountains belonging to the Paleakarens (P), or Indian princes : who made no resistance, but seemed to be engaged in the combination to throw-off the Mohammedan yoke. However that be, as soon as the Mogol governors were apprised of this invasion, they gathered forces, and went to meet the enemy with an army nearly equal to theirs. The Mâbarâttas, it is true, were repulsed, and obliged to retire to their hills : but a detachment having slid down by another defile which was not guarded, and appeared behind the Mogols ; b these latter, taking them for a reinforcement sent them from the city of Arkat (Q), suffered them to approach without opposition, till they discovered their error ; but then it was too late. This surprize put the whole army in confusion ; which being shut in by the mountains, had not room to draw out in order of battle ; so that the Mâbarâttas, attacking them both in front and rear at the same time, cut them all in pieces ; except a few who either escaped, or were taken prisoners ^P.

plunder Arkat :

Velowr and Kanjivoran :

pillage the pagods, and churches :

raavage Messûr,

Among the slain, there fell the Nabâb, who was general of the army, with his son, and some other lords, gallantly fighting. As soon as this news reached Arkat, that lord's second son, his mother, wife, children, and a great number of quality, fled with their effects to Ponticherri, which is but three days journey from that city, under a guard of 7000 horse. Some time after, the Mabarâttas arrived at Arkat ; which, though very large, is defended only by a despicable citadel, built of earth : so that the garrison, making no resistance, for fear of being put to the sword, suffered the enemy to plunder the city without molestation. From thence they marched to Velowr, another considerable city, whose citadel is built with a double wall, of free-stone, fortified with bastions, and a large ditch full of crocodiles : so that being impregnable without cannon, and the Mâbarâttas having left theirs beyond the mountains, they proceeded to Polowr, a town where there resides a Nabâb ; which they took and plundered. They did the like to Jingama, Tirowna-Maley, Kanjibowran (R), and all the towns and villages whither they went. However, they did not burn many places, nor kill the inhabitants ; excepting such as opposed them : but sometimes, not having the patience to wait while the women took the rings out of their ears and noses, they, to make short work, tore them out. Several principal persons in the villages were so cruelly chabowked, or horse-whipped, to make them discover where the provisions and goods were hidden, that they died under the lash. d

AT Tirowna-Maley, the inhabitants put all their riches into the pagod of Rowtren ; imagining, that the Mâbarâttas, out of respect, would not meddle with them. But they were mistaken : for the enemy, not having had so great a veneration for their deities as they expected, carried-off not only the goods, but also the dancers, and such other girls belonging to the temple as they took a fancy to. They served the Romish churches, which came in their way, in the same manner ; the missionaries flying on all sides to Pondicherri ; where fourteen e got safe. Four Portuguese Jesuits fell into the hands of the enemy ; and Pere Madeira, after being cruelly flogged, was exposed several days naked in the sun, tied to a post, and with only just victuals enough to keep him alive. This was done at the instigation of a Brâmmen, who said he had hidden great treasures : and, when none could be found, advised the Mâbarâttas to tell him that he should be put to the most tormenting death, unless he got his disciples to redeem him, with a large sum which they demanded. Instead of this, the missionary forbade them to advance the money ; declaring, that he would rather die, than they should, on his account, be reduced to extreme necessity. In short every thing was prepared for his execution. The iron chair and cask were made red-hot : the first for him to sit in, and the second to put on his head : when one of the Mâbarâtta commanders taking pity f on him as a stranger, desired that he might be set at liberty ¹.

THE king of Maisfour (or Messûr) sent a powerful army to guard his frontiers : but the enemy, having defeated it, entered his country, and committed all sorts of robberies. The people, who dwelt near the woods and mountains, fled thither for refuge ; but gained little

^P P. SAIGNES ap. Lettr. Edifiantes, tom. xxvi. p. 260, & seqq.

¹ P. SAIGNES, ubi sup. p. 264—271.

(P) The kingdoms of the southern India are divided among several Paleakarens ; who, though dependent on the kings of their respective countries, are yet absolute masters of their little states.

(Q) In the map of the hither peninsula of India, made by the missionaries, and inserted in the 23d recueil, this place is called Arkate, and placed on the river Palamalerow ; which falls into the bay of Bengâl, at Sadraspatan, about two stages to the east by south. In Saignes's Letter it is printed Arkar.

(R) Or Kanjivoran, as others write. It is a large city of Karnâta, a little to the north of the river Pale-malerow ; which falls into the gulf of Bengâl, at Sadraspatan : but is not inserted in the missionary's map of the peninsula of India.

a by escaping from the Mîbarâttas: for the Paleakarens made them pay dearly for the shelter given them, under pretence that they were obliged to raise new troops to guard and defend them. The greatest mischief which the enemy did, and what was most regretted, was their seizing on children of both sexes; whom they carried into their own country. Mean time, ^{and Madûra:} the rainy season came on; but that did not put a stop to their incursions: for they pushed forward as far as Porto Novo (S), a factory of the Dutch, on the coast of Choromandel; which they plundered. With the same design they advanced within three leagues of Pondicherri, and even to some villages belonging thereto: but the French having detached troops to repulse them, and the enemy being informed of the strength of that place, they turned-off towards the kingdom of Madûra; continuing their ravages all the way they went.

b THE conquest of this country cost them but little trouble. They burned two churches in ^{take Tirow-} their route, and plundered the rest. The missionaries, who were able to get to Tirowchirapali, ^{chirapali} a pretty good city, and capital of a kingdom of the same name, fled thither, under the protection of Skander Sabe; who had lately conquered it, and been made a Nabâb by the Great Mogol (T). This Mohammedan lord, unable to keep the field, with 11,000 men retired into the citadel; where he defended himself with much valour for two months. Bara Sabe, his his brother, coming to his assistance with 4000 horse, slew in the first encounter 2000 Mîbarâttas. However they still pushed on the siege, and summoned Skander Sabe to surrender; ^{from the} threatening otherwise to destroy all with fire and sword. In short, 3000 ladders were already ^{Nulâb:} prepared to scale the walls, when the Nabâb resolved to put all to the risk, and make a sally with the whole garrison. He did so, but with very ill success: for his brother was killed, his troops cut to pieces, and himself taken prisoner. Of all their conquests, the Mâbarâttas kept none excepting this place; where they left 15,000 men to command the country, till they had their king's orders^r.

THE design of the Mâbarâttas was not to stop here. Their intentions were to go and ^{their farther} dethrone the king of Tanjaour; and having placed another prince in his room, to return along ^{designs:} the coast of Choromandel, by Pondicherri, Kareykal, Sadrâspatan, Madras (or Fort St. George), and other cities belonging to the Europeans, with a resolution either to oblige them to pay contribution, or to take them by force. Their resentment was levelled chiefly against Pondicherri, for having deprived them of their rich prey, in giving protection to Dost al Khân, the late Nabâb's son, and the treasures of Arkat. That lord informed Azof-ja (or Nezâm al Muluk) of the kind reception given him and his family by Mr. Du Mas, the governor; who thereupon received a letter of thanks from the Wazîr, accompanied with a habit, turbân, and scarf of honour.

As the Mâbarâttas make war purely for the sake of pillage, and not to keep the places ^{they quit} which they conquer, they abandoned Arkat six days after they had taken possession of it. ^{Arkat:} Hereupon Dost al Khân, having reassembled part of his troops, to the number of 20,000 horse, he left Pondicherri, and returned to that city; where he came to a treaty with the enemy, by paying them a considerable sum of money.

c THE Mâbarâttas had never penetrated so far into this part of the peninsula, since the time ^{their success} that Aureng Zib had driven them out of it: because the Mogol governors had always, either by ^{owing} their policy or valour, hindered them from crossing the mountains which separate Karnâta from their dominions: but jealousy having sown discord among the governors of Arkat, Velowr, Pelowr, and Tirowchirapali, although relations, they refused to succour one another; and by ^{to Mogol} that means were beaten each in his turn. On this occasion the empire suffered considerably: not ^{discord.} only by the loss of the usual tribute, but the country was also so ravaged, that no provisions were left on the lands; and what was worse, the people had not grain to sow them. It was reported, that the Wazîr had ordered his son to fall upon the territories of the Mâbarâttas with an army of fourscore thousand horse, in order to oblige those robbers to return home^s: but this is all which our memoirs inform us concerning this remarkable expedition (U).

f THE Mâbarâttas, or Ganîms, are sometimes confounded with, at other times distinguished ^{Rise and success} from, the people called Siddîs in the parts about Surât, from their prince, who is stiled the Grand Siddî, at least by the English. But however fortunate he hath been elsewhere, he has of late years been incroached upon by Konna Ji Angria, a famous Indian pirate. This Angria, ^{of Angria.} about the year 1710, first seized Kanneri, a little island near Bombay, from whence he did the English great mischief; and in a short time increased so much in strength by the natives, who flocked to him in numbers, that he attacked and defeated the forces of the Grand Siddî; who

^r P. SAIGNES, ubi supr. p. 271, & seqq.

^s Ibid. ubi supr. p. 275, & seqq.

(S) Called by the natives Pirenki Potey. Propagation of the Gospel in the East, part ii. let. 6. p. 41.

(T) Soltân Mohammed Shâh, the late emperor, is here to be understood.

(U) These people took part in the wars which ensued; first among the governors, and then between the English and French.

at length, to get rid of the danger, thought fit to give him his daughter in marriage, and a make an alliance with him, which has proved of great use in his wars against the Great Mogol^c. These Mábaráttas have a peculiar language: for Fryer occasionally mentions the Moratti tongue^u.

^c DOWNING'S Hist. of the Indian Wars, p. 1, & seqq. & p. 232.

^u TRAV. p. 78.

CHAP. IV.

Of the kingdom of Golkonda.

SECT. I.

Description of the country.

Kingdom of Golkonda:

THE kingdom of Golkonda is bounded on the east with the sea of Bengál; on the north, a with the mountains of the country of Orixa (or Orísba); on the south, by that part of Bísnágar, or Narsínga, which heretofore belonged to the king of Viziapúr; and on the west, by the province of Balagát.

weather:

WINTER begins here in June, by rain and thunder. The thunder, when our author was in Golkonda, continued not above four days; but the rains poured down, with furious storms of wind, till the middle of July, with some intervals of fair weather. The rest of that month was pretty fair; but in August, September, and October, there fell great rains, yet without thunder; which swelled the rivers so prodigiously, that there was no passing over the bridges. The river of Bágnágar threw down near 2000 houses, in which many people perished. The air was somewhat cold in the night and morning; but the heat, during the day, was as b moderate as in France in the month of May: and thus it continued till February following, when the great heats began again. These rains render the land exceeding fertile; especially in produce:

fruits. Vines are very plenty there; and of the grapes, which for the most part are ripe in January, they make white wine. They have two crops of rice and several other kinds of grain.

ports there:

GOLKONDA has some good and well frequented ports on the coast of Choromandel; particularly Masulipatan, Paliakata, and Madraspatan. The first lies E. S. E. from Bágnágar, on an excellent coast. The English and Dutch have factories in this place; where our author bought a sheep for twelve pence, a partridge for one penny, and a fowl for less than two pence. Provisions bear the same price almost all over the coast of Choromandel, which extends from c Masulipatan to the cape of Negapatan. At Paliakata is Fort Guedria, a factory of the Hollanders; and at Madraspatan, commonly called Madras, is Fort St. George, the chief factory of the English in the East Indies. A little to the south stands Meliapúr, or St. Thomas; which was taken from the Portugueses by the natives, in 1662. The kingdom of Golkonda extends along the coast from Siakola, or Sikokel, to about two leagues south of St. Thomas^a; although Karnátes reaches thirty or forty leagues lower to the south of Sadráspatan, where the Imperialists have a factory.

Bágnágar the capital:

THE capital of this kingdom is called Bágnágar (by the natives), and Hayder abád by the Persians. It is fourteen or fifteen leagues from the borders of Viziapúr, in a very long plain, surrounded by little hills. It is washed on the west side by the Nerva, a small river; d which, in the rainy season, is as large as the Seine at Paris. It is crossed by a stone bridge of three arches; which joins the city to a large suburb on that side. The town makes a kind of cross, much longer than broad, being 5,650 paces in length; not in a strait line, but with a sweep. Beyond it is another large suburb. The houses are built with earth, and thatched with straw: they are likewise so low and ill contrived, that they seem no better than huts, excepting those of the quality; but they have all fine gardens.

king's palace:

THERE are several medâns, or public places, in the city; but the fairest is that which lies before the king's palace, which stands on the north side. Over-against it is a portico, where the musicians repair several times a day to play on their instruments, when the king is in town. The palace, which takes up one side of the square, is 380 paces in length; and is e continued to a building called The Four Tours. The walls, which are of great stones, have at certain distances half-towers; and facing the square is an open gallery, from whence to behold a the fights of elephants, and other spectacles. Nobody enters the palace but by express orders from the king.

^a THEVENOT'S Trav. part iii. p. 93, 104, & seqq.

THE Four Towers is a square building, about forty-two feet high. Each front is sixty feet long, and has an arch in it twenty-four feet wide; each arch facing a street of the same width. This building has two galleries, one above the other, and a balcony, or turret, at top: at each corner is a decagon tower, sixty feet high, with four galleries each. The whole is adorned with roses and festoons, pretty well sculpted. It is arched underneath, and appears like a dome, surrounded on the inside with balusters, and all open. There are several doors in the walls to enter at; and under the dome stands a large table on a divan, raised seven or eight feet from the ground, with steps to go up. All the galleries serve to make the water mount, so as to be conveyed to the highest apartments of the palace. Although nothing in the city is so beautiful as the outside of this fabric, yet it is surrounded with ugly wooden fruit-shops, covered with straw; which spoil the prospect ^b.

THERE are many fair gardens in Bâgnâgar; whose beauty consists in having long walks, kept very clean, and lovely fruit-trees: but they have neither beds of flowers, nor water-works; contenting themselves with cisterns, or basins of water. The loveliest gardens are without the city; among which there is one remarkable for its beauty.

THERE are in Bâgnâgar many rich merchants, bankers, and jewellers; besides vast numbers of very skilful artificers. There are likewise many Franks; especially fugitive Portugueses: the English and Dutch have settled there, and the last make great profits. Public women are allowed in this kingdom; and the common people give their wives great liberty, as to walk through the town, visit their neighbours, and drink fari, which the Indians here are very fond of. Theft is punished by cutting off both the hands. A trading city.

THE castle, where the king commonly kept his court, is two leagues west of Bâgnâgar, and called Golkonda; from whence the kingdom take its name. In the middle of the castle rises a hill, like a sugar loaf; the sides of which are surrounded by the king's palace. This fortress, for largeness, may be called a city. The walls are built of stones three feet diameter, encompassed with deep ditches, divided into tanks full of good water. After all, it hath no fortifications except five round towers; which, as well as the walls, are mounted with a great many cannon. The palace is very large, and well situated for air, and has a prospect over Bâgnâgar itself. One must pass through twelve gates before he comes to the apartment of the prince. All the Omrâs and great lords have houses in the castle; where there are several good bazars, with all sorts of necessaries: but, besides the lodgings of some officers, there is no good building in the castle. The king, before the conquest, used to make jewellers, and other artificers, live in the palace; where the former were fully employed in cutting diamonds, and other stones, of which the king had great quantities. He hath likewise store of excellent bezoars; keeping goats which produce them. It was sold for forty crowns the pound. The sepulchres of the king, who built Golkonda, and his five successors, are about two musket-shot from the castle; each in the middle of a garden, with the tombs of their relations about them ^c.

THIS king had vast revenues arising from the property of lands, customs of merchandizes, and provisions; but chiefly the diamond mines: for Golkonda might be said to be the country of diamonds. They who were allowed to dig those towards Masulipatan, paid him a pagod every hour they worked, whether they found diamonds or not. His chief mines were those in the kingdom of Karnâtes (or Bisnâgar) in several places towards Viziapûr; he had 6000 men continually at work in them, who daily found near three pound-weight of those precious stones: and nobody dug there but for the king. King's riches.

THIS prince wore on the crown of his head a jewel almost a foot long; which was reported to be of an inestimable value. It was a rose of great diamonds, three or four inches diameter; and on the top of it was a little crown, out of which issued a branch, shaped like a palm-tree branch; but round and crooked at the top. This branch was an inch thick, and about six long. It was made up of several sprigs, which served as leaves, with each a lovely pearl (shaped like a pear) at the end. At the foot of this posie were two bands of gold, in form of table-bracelets; in which were incased large diamonds, set round with rubies. This, with large pearls which hung dangling on all sides, made an exceeding brilliant shew. These bands are fastened to the head by diamond clasps. The king of Golkonda had many other rich jewels in his treasury; and surpassed all the Indian monarchs in precious stones. Jewel for the head.

THE Omrâs, or great lords of Golkonda, were of the same nature with those of the Mogol's empire; being for the most part Persians, or the sons of Persians, and all very rich: for, besides the great pay belonging to their respective offices, they made great advantage by the soldiers; as they kept in pay scarce half the number which they were obliged to maintain. The king also gave them lands and villages for life; where they committed great extortions, by the Brammins, who were their farmers. These Omrâs always made a handsome figure in the The great Omrâs.

^b THEVENOT, ubi supr. p. 94. & seqq.

^c Ibid. ubi supr. p. 96. & seqq.

Their state. streets; either riding on horseback, or carried in a palanki, preceded by music, forty or fifty a troopers, with an elephant or two, and men carrying banners, at their head. The lord himself is attended by thirty or forty footmen; some clearing the way; others, with fine napkins, driving away the flies: one holds an umbrella over his head, another his tobacco-pipe; others carry pots with water. The palanki, with its porters, come next. Lastly, a camel or two, with men beating of timbrels on their backs, close the procession. When the Omrâ chose his palanki, he was seen lying in it effeminately, with flowers in his hand, smoking tobacco, or chewing betel. All, who had any considerable pay, imitated the state of the grandees. The Dutch interpreter at Bâgnâgar went with such an equipage; nor was there a cavalier but had his umbrella-bearer, his two fly-drivers, and his cup-bearer.

Lesser Omras. THE lesser Omrâs, for there were several orders of them, proportioned their equipage to b their revenue: but then the quality of Omrâ was become so common about the year 1665, and so much liberty allowed to take the title, that the Indians who guarded the castle, and the outside of the king's palace, to the number of a thousand, would needs be called Omrâs; although their pay did not exceed one crown a month. However, some of the great Omrâs was exceeding rich: among whom might be reckoned the Amîr Jemla. He was the son of an oil-man of Ispâbân, and had the wealth of a prince. He left the service of the king of Golkonda; and, going over to that of the Great Mogol, died governor of Bengal. He was very powerful there; and, could he have drawn his son from the court, would have made himself king of that province. He had in diamonds the weight of twenty mâns, which make c 408 pounds of Holland weight. This vast wealth he got by the plunder which he made in Karnâtes, at the head of the king of Golkonda's army; when that prince, in conjunction with him of Viziapûr, made war on the king of Bisnâgar. That general took many places in a short time; but finding he could not take the fortress of Gandikot (U) (standing on the top of an inaccessible rock) by force, he drew out the governor by fair promises, and then detained him till it was delivered up^d.

^d THEVENOT, ubi supr. p. 102, & seqq.

(U) It is within ten days journey of St. Thomas, Meliapûr, or Fort St. George, on the coast of Choromandel.

S E C T. II.

Latter state of Golkonda, and conquest by Aureng Zîb.

Amir Jela enwied: THE king of Golkonda maintained in pay above 500,000 soldiers; but as Abdo'llah Kotbb d Shâb, who reigned in 1667, did not keep so good an army on foot as his father, he became tributary to the Great Mogol Aureng Zîb; who about eight years before, when governor of Aureng abâd, surpris'd Bâgnâgar^a; which happened on the following occasion. Amîr Jimola (or Jemla), generalissimo of the forces of Golkonda, having been sent to reduce certain rebellious Râjahs, whose territories lay upon the Ganges; according to custom, left with the king both his wife and children, as a pledge of his fidelity. He had several daughters, and but one son; who made a great figure at court. During the Amîr's absence, the enemies, whom his reputation and riches had procured him, endeavoured to render him suspected by the king, as if he intended to dethrone his majesty, and set his own son upon the throne. The method they propos'd to make away with Jemla, was to poison him; and Abdo'llah, being c easily persuaded, gave them leave to act as they thought most proper for his security. Under this authority they set their instruments to work; but, having missed of their aim three or four times, the Amîr's son got intimation of the plot, and gave his father notice.

his son ill treated: As soon as the messenger returned, the young lord, naturally high-spirited, went to the king; and, representing the great services of his father, who had been the chief instrument of setting the crown on that prince's head, reproached him with ingratitude in no very respectful terms. The king, offended with this liberty, having withdrawn, the lords who were present fell upon the Amîr's son, and treated him very roughly. At the same time he was arrested and committed to prison, with his mother and sisters. This affair made a great noise at court; and coming quickly to the general's ears, he resolved to be revenged for the injury done him. f To compass his design, he wrote to Soltân Sujâb, Shâb Jeshân's second son, who was governor of Bengâl, near which the general then was; promising, in case he would join him with his forces, to put him in possession of the kingdom of Golkonda. But Soltân Sujâb, instead of accepting so advantageous an offer, sent the Amîr word, that the person who could betray his natural prince, might betray him; and therefore he would not trust him.

^a THEVENOT, ubi supr. p. 100.

UPON

- a Upon this unpolite refusal, Jemla wrote to Aureng Zib, who was then governor of Bram-pûr; and, not being so nice as his brother, readily embraced the proposal. The two armies ^{surprises Bâgnâgar.} being at length joined, they arrived at the gates of Bâgnâgar, before the king was in a condition to oppose them. He had only time to escape to his fortress of Golkonda; to which the Mogol prince, after he had rifled the city of Bâgnâgar, and plundered the palace (A), laid a close siege. Kotbb Shâh, finding himself thus vigorously pressed, sent the Amîr Jemla his wife and children, in an honourable manner. He did an action still more generous than this: for a cannoneer, observing Aureng Zib on his elephant, riding about to view the fortifications of the castle, told the king, who was standing on the bastion, that, if he pleased, he would bring down the Mogol prince with a ball. But the king forbade him; saying, it became
- b princes to spare the lives of one another. The gunner obeyed; and, instead of shooting at Aureng Zib, took off the head of the general of his army, who was a little before him: which ^{Aureng Zib besieges Golkonda.} put a stop to the assault they were about to have given. Abdo'l Jaber Beg, who commanded the king of Golkonda's army (B), understanding the disorder which the loss of their general had put the enemy into, attacked them furiously while they were in that confusion; and, putting them to the rout, pursued them for four or five leagues, till night put a stop to their career. Some few days before this event, the king of Golkonda, finding provisions fail in the fortress, was about to have delivered the keys to Aureng Zib. But Mirza Mohammed (C), his son-in-law, and kinsman to the great Sheykh of Mekka, snatched them out of his hand, and threatened to kill him if he persisted in that resolution^f.
- c AURENG ZIB, being thus constrained to raise the siege, spent some days to rally his forces; ^{Peace brought about,} and, having received a reinforcement of fresh troops, returned to the leaguer with new resolution. However, Amîr Jemla, who still retained some kindness for the king of Golkonda, would not suffer the Mogol prince to use the utmost extremity: but by his wit and good management obtained a suspension of arms. Shâh Jebân, after the battle which he lost against his father Jebân Ghîr, fled for refuge to the king of Golkonda; and, having met with a very kind reception, entered into a strict friendship with him; swearing to his benefactor, never to make war against him, upon any pretence whatever. Amîr Jemla, therefore, knowing that it would be no hard matter to bring two kings, who had such ties upon them, to an ^{by Amîr Jemla;} accommodation, wrought underhand with both towards a peace, and so brought it about,
- d that Abdollah Shâh humbly wrote a letter to Shâh Jebân, wherein he requested "that monarch to become an arbitrator between the prince, his son, and him; promising to submit intirely to his decision, and sign such articles as he should propose." On the other hand, Shâh Jebân was prevailed on by the Amîr's persuasions, in answer to the king of Golkonda's letter, to propose a match between his second daughter and Soltân Mohammed, son of Aureng Zib, on condition that, after the death of the king her father, the son-in-law should inherit the kingdom of Golkonda; which proposition being accepted of, the peace (D) was concluded.

As for the Amîr Jemla, he quitted the service of the king of Golkonda, and went to Brâm-pûr with Aureng Zib; who, by his powerful assistance, afterwards obtained the crown of Golkonda. ^{who quits Golkonda.}

e Hindistân. Soon after Shâh Jebân made him his prime minister, and generalissimo of his armies. According to our author, who had occasion to speak with him several times, he was a man of great parts and dexterity, in dispatching affairs which came before him^e.

THE king of Golkonda had two other daughters: the eldest was married to Mirza Mohammed, a relation of the Sheykh of Mekka, as mentioned before; whose courtship was attended with some very uncommon circumstances. This Sheykh came to Golkonda in the habit of a Fakîr, or religious mendicant; and for some months lodged without the gate of the palace, disdainng to give any answer to the several courtiers, who demanded what his business was. At length, the affair being made known to the king, he sent his chief physician to enquire the reason of his coming to Golkonda. The physician, and some other lords of the court, ^{Mirza Mohammed:} who likewise discoursed with him, finding him to be a person of great wit and learning, carried him to the king; who was very well pleased with his aspect and deportment: but at length the Sheykh coming to declare to his majesty, that the end of his coming was to espouse the princess, the king was much surprised at the proposal, and most of the court lords judged that the Sheykh was out of his senses. The Kotbb Shâh laughed at him at first; but when he found him persist in his demand, and even threatened the kingdom with great calamity, unless the

^f TAVERNIER'S Trav. part ii. p. 67, & seq.

^e TAVERNIER, ubi supr. p. 68, & seq.

(A) Thevenot says, even to the plates of gold, where-with the king's apartments were covered.

(B) Gemelli says, it consisted of 70,000 men.

(C) In Owington's memoir of the revolution in Golkonda, he is called Meera Mamood [that is Mîr, or Mirza. Mahmûd.] Voy. to Surât in 1689, p. 527.

(D) Thevenot says, this peace was obtained from Aureng Zib by the address of the queen-mother; and that the son-in law, whom he calls Mahmûd, should succeed, in case the king died without children; meaning, doubtless, male issue.

princess was given to him in marriage, he was committed to prison; where he lay a long time. At length the king sent him in a vessel, which carried pilgrims from Masulipatan to Mokka in Arabia, in order to travel to Mekka.

his strange history.

For all this bad success, the Sheykh was not discouraged: but two years after returned to Golkonda, and managed matters so well, that he espoused the princess, and grew into high reputation, as well as power in the kingdom; which he governed with great applause. Before the siege of Golkonda the king had no great love for him; but after that bold action, by which, as before mentioned, he prevented his surrendering the fortress, Abdollah Sháh took a great affection to him, and did nothing without his advice. He was a passionate lover of all who understood mathematics, and a zealous Mohammedan; so that, to hinder the great pagod in Bágnágar from being finished, he threatened the whole kingdom with some signal calamity, if that work went forward ^b.

Abdo'llah

THE third princess of Golkonda had been promised to Soltán Sejed, another Sheykh of Mekka; and the day was appointed for celebrating the nuptials: but by the instances of Abdol Jabber Beg, general of the army, and other lords, the match was broken off, and the princess married to Mirza Abdol Kofing; to whom she would have been given before, but for his debauched courses, which however he forsook after his marriage. He had by her two sons (E); which, says Tavernier, quite annulled the pretensions of Aureng Zib's son; who was then imprisoned by his father in the castle of Gwaliyár, for joining with his uncle Sujáb against him. Now, continues the same author, the king of Golkonda does not stand in so much fear of the Great Mogol as before; for, in imitation to him, he keeps his money within his own country, and has already hoarded up treasures sufficient to maintain his wars. Besides, he was devoted to the sect of Ali, as well as the king of Viziapúr, who was married to the sister (F) of him of Golkonda; for which reason the Persians, who repaired into India to seek their fortune, chose rather to offer their service to these kings than to the Great Mogol ^h.

Golkonda's

THEVENOT, who was at Golkonda much about the same time as Tavernier, gives an account very different of this prince's affairs; and which seems to agree better with the revolution, which some years after followed in his dominions. According to that author, notwithstanding the peace before-mentioned, the king of Golkonda was in continual fear of another visit from Aureng Zib. After sending 200,000 men to the assistance of the king of Viziapúr, who was vigorously attacked, he was obliged to recall them, and pretend they were sent without his knowledge. This shewed how low the power of Abdo'llah was reduced. He durst not put to death his Omrás, even for crimes; for which, on being found guilty, he only fined them, and took the money. The Dutch themselves insulted over him, and obliged him to abandon an English ship, which they had seized at Masulipatan; although he had undertaken to protect her ⁱ.

Power of the Omrás.

THE weakness of this prince's reign, and power of his chief Omrás, are confirmed by the testimony of a later English author (G); who hath written the history of Mirza Abdallah Koffin, or, as that writer calls him, Soltán Abdulla Hoosan (H), till he ascended the throne of Golkonda; of which he was the last king. Our author begins with the circumstances of this prince's marriage; which he relates at large, in the following manner.

Sudden rise of KOTHE SHAH, being old, and perplexed with the factions of his ministers, to whom he had wholly left affairs, resolved to marry his third daughter, whom he loved exceedingly, to some person of quality and courage; who might be able to curb the factions at court, and worthy to become his successor. For he hated Soltán Mahmúd, eldest son of Aureng Zib, who had married his eldest daughter: nor had he any affection for his second daughter, or her husband, Mirza Mahmúd; who was an Arab of high birth. This princess was courted by Sind Soltán (I), another Arab, descended from Mohammed; and as he was a man of wit and spirit, the king of Golkonda thought him a proper person to execute his designs, and accordingly encouraged his addresses: but this person, presuming too much on the favour of the king and princess, by his insolent behaviour disobliged the ministers; who, fearing worse treatment in case he came to the crown, resolved to hinder the match.

Mirza Abul Hassan.

THE three who managed the business of the state were Moso Khán, Sind Mirza Zaffer (K), and Mushúk; for Mirza Mahmúd, not being in favour, was out of employment. However ⁱ THEVENOT, ubi supr.

^b TAVERNIER, ubi supr. p. 66. p. 100, & seq.

^h TAVERNIER, ubi supr. p. 69.

(E) By Sheldon's account, hereafter mentioned, he had but one son and two daughters: nor was this lord reckoned debauched.

(F) Thevenot says, to the fourth daughter of the king of Golkonda; but other authors say he had no more than three.

(G) Late revolution of Golkonda, by Mr. Daniel Sheldon, inserted by Overton in his Voy. to Surát, p. 527.

(H) It is hard to say, whether by Kofing and Hoosan is to be understood Husséyn or Hassan. If this was the king, from whom Golkonda was conquered, his name, according to Frazer, was Abul Hassan.

(I) This is Soltán Sejed of Tavernier. It should perhaps be Seyd.

(K) Afterwards named Zind Mir Zaffer,

a he had free access at court, and was respected by all, as one who was likely to succeed the king. These hopes made him jealous of Sind Soltân, and put himself at the head of the party, which was formed against him. The old courtiers therefore set upon the king; and having persuaded him to break off the match, by representing the young Arab as a person of great ambition, and one likely to form dangerous designs, Muslik advised his majesty to marry this princely to some person of birth and courage, but small fortune, and rather given to pleasure than business; as qualifications which would render him obedient, and divert him from ambitious views. This counsel being approved of by the king, he ordered them to look for a person of that character; and they pitched on Mirza Abdallah Hassan ^{*}.

b This young nobleman was the son of an Arab of quality, but low circumstances; who, coming to Golkonda to seek his fortune, had a small government conferred on him by the king: ^{The Vizir's contrivance} from which, by his good behaviour, he was advanced to one of the most considerable commands in the kingdom. But at his death, the king being heir to his estate, his son was reduced to a very poor condition, and forced for subsistence to enter into the army; where he received the pay of five or six pounds per month. As soon as the affair was agreed upon, Zind Mir Zaffer sends for the young soldier to his house, that the king might have a sight of him; and, having held him in discourse for some time, about his father's merit and his own circumstances, promised to provide for him, and then dismissed him. When he was gone, Kotbb Shâib objected, that he was not so comely a person as he had been represented; nor discovered so much life and vigour as he expected. This being imputed by Mir Zaffer c to the dejection consequential to his sudden fall from grandeur into poverty; he told the king, that he would find a change presently in Abdallah, had he but money to make an appearance.

HEREUPON the king, resolved to make the experiment, orders Mir Zaffer to contrive ^{to supply his wants} some way to furnish him, without letting him know from whence it came. The minister immediately sends for some Sherafs, or money-brokers, and orders them to furnish him with whatever money he required; promising to repay them: but enjoined them, under pain of death, not to discover the affair. Away the brokers go to Abdallah; and under pretence of desiring his assistance in business they had with some great men (for persons of high birth, though ever so poor, are respected in those countries), after two or three visits, growing d more familiar, they told him he looked melancholy; and, as they believed he might have occasion for money, offered to lend him two or three thousand pounds. At first he thankfully refused the offer; fearing to borrow money, which he had no prospect of being able to pay: but at length, overcome by their importunity, and his own wants, he accepted of a considerable sum: for which they not only refused security, but bid him live like the son of so great a father; promising to supply him with more, when that was spent ¹.

THE young cavalier, naturally inclined to gallantry, and high living, presently took a house, with servants, and all things fit for a person of quality. Mean time Mir Zaffer, who ^{He lives splendidly:} presently perceived the alteration which he expected both in his person and behaviour, desires the king to see him again; which his majesty does; and now likes him so well, that he e orders Zaffer to give him frequent opportunities of seeing him; and the more he sees him, the more he is taken with him. At length, resolving to marry his daughter to him, without delay, the king one evening sends the Devîr, or secretary of state, with an Omrâ, called Jabber Begh, and a guard of horse to conduct Abdallah Hassan to court. The young gentleman was entertaining some friends at his house, when word was brought, that some great officers belonging to the court were at the door. His company, with the dancing women, immediately retired by a back-way, while he went out to meet the officers, to conduct them in. As soon as he beheld two such eminent persons, attended with a guard, he was greatly surprised; and his fears were much increased at the sight of a rich vest, which the secretary presented him with from the king; for he took it for granted that it was poisoned. However, f after mentioning his father's services, with his own fidelity to the king, and apologizing for his present way of living, he put on the vest; and, at the same time, desired the secretary to present his duty to the king, and tell him, that his majesty had more reason to preserve such subjects as he was, than to take away their lives only for his pleasure.

THE secretary, who had orders to observe every thing which he said and did, having ^{Marries the princess:} helped him on with the vest, made a low reverence, and assured him, that they were not sent by the king to execute any sentence of his displeasure, but to conduct him to his favour, and the greatest honour which he could bestow on him. On this he goes with them, not very well assured of his safety, till they brought him a fine horse, with rich furniture: on which mounting, he rode between the secretary and Jabber Begh to court, where he was the g same night married to the princess; and the whole business was managed with so much privacy, that Mirza Mahmûd, who had married the king's second daughter, had not the least nues, the auditing of which he gave to Mufsbūk, who then became his favourite. He rewarded bountifully those who did their duty; and although he condemned none to death, yet he punished offenders after other manners, very severely^a. As our author mentions no dates, we cannot precisely fix the beginning of Abdollah Hoofan's reign; but judge it must have been between the years 1670 and 1673, when Dr. Fryer landed at Madras; for he speaks of this king (R) as then on the throne. However that be, we find nothing more relating to the transactions of this king's reign, or of his affairs there, till the conquest of his dominions by the Great Mogol: with regard to which revolution we are informed as follows.

* OVERTON'S Voy. to Surât, p. 528, & seqq.

¹ OVERTON, ubi sup. p. 527, 532, & seqq.

Aureng Zib AFTER the peace made with the king of his country, whom our author calls Tana Sháb, on condition of giving his daughter to Soltán Mahmúd, as before-mentioned, the Mogols attempted nothing against Golkonda for several years. But at length Aureng Zib having resolved to make a conquest of that kingdom (S), after he had quashed the rebellion of his fourth son, Akber, in 1680, sent his second son, Sháb Alam (T), with a powerful army, to attack Golkonda afresh: but the Mogol prince, either thinking the conquest difficult, or overcome by Tana Sháb's (U) promises to give him his daughter in marriage, and assist him to secure his father's throne, so managed affairs, as to obtain his father's consent to conclude a peace. And altho' afterwards he received many repeated commands, could never be prevailed on to return to the siege; but casting his limiter at his father's feet, told him that he was a Mussulman, and could not violate the peace which he had promised to keep.

besieges the fortrefs, UPON Sháb Alam's thus refusing to renew the war, Aureng Zib, after he had made himself master of the kingdom of Viziapúr, marched in person, with a mighty army, to conquer that of Golkonda. At his first arrival near Bágnágar, he secured the passage of the river, and that city: then, without staying to fortify it, by the advice of the Franks, who were in his service, and gave our author this account, he proceeded to besiege the fortrefs of Golkonda, whither the king had retired. As this place was built with stones of vast dimensions, and incompassed with a deep ditch, it held out a siege of nine months, tho' battered with many pieces of cannon, particularly by three pieces of such a prodigious size, that each of them was drawn by 500 elephants, and 200 men: for they could make but a small breach in the citadel, which was not inclosed with walls, but a solid rock. At length want of provisions, and distempers which raged in the place, joined to the presents and promises made by the Great Mogol, not only prevailed on the soldiers to desert to him, by getting down the walls at night, but also corrupted the governor, who surrendered the fortrels against the will of his sovereign. The king of Golkonda offered to pay a tribute of three millions and seven hundred thousand rupís, and become his vassal: but Aureng Zib refused, and entered the place in triumph, in the year 1687 (X).

and takes it, THE king, who had on a collar of inestimable value, presented it to Azem Sháb, who carried him away prisoner, on an elephant. Aureng Zib observing that his hands were not bound behind him, calling out to put his son in mind of it; Azem Sháb answered, that he was a king, and that they ought to be satisfied with depriving him of his kingdom and liberty. The unfortunate king was shut up in the fort of Dawlet abad, where his conqueror allowed him the wretched maintenance of twenty rupís (or about ten crowns) a day (Y). But a son being born to him in prison, a blessing which he never had while upon the throne (Z), in pity to the infant prince, he raised the father's pension to 500 rupís. Pan Naik (A), who

^a OVERTON, p. 549—552.

(R) He does not name him; but it appears to be Abdollah Kofing, or Hoofan, from the account given of his marriage, eleven years before, with his predecessor's daughter; which is related nearly in the same manner as in Sheldon's memoir.

(S) To which the claim, in right of his son Mahmúd, as before mentioned, was doubtless both a pretence and a spur.

(T) This must be Mohammed Mauzm, as in Frazer, who succeeded his father.

(U) Gemelli here commits a great mistake, by making the king, who gave his daughter to Soltán Mahmúd, the same with him who was conquered by Aureng Zib; or confounds Abdallah with Abúl Hassan; as appears from the authority of other credible authors: besides, Abdallah had but three daughters, all disposed of before the year 1660 or 1662.

(X) Gemelli places this event in 1686; but it happened not till the year after. The siege began the second of February, 1687, and ended the twentieth of October following; which agrees very well with what that author observes about its duration. Scarce any of the travellers mention the exact time of this important conquest. Ovington, who was at Surát in 1690, says nothing of it: nor does Frazer himself mention it in his Short History of the Great Mogols. Braems, who left Batavia in 1696, in his report to the States General [See Recueil des Voy. de la Comp. Introd. p. 133.] observes, that according to the last advices which they had from the coast of Choromandel, the Great Mogol having subdued Viziapúr, was marching to conquer Golkonda; as if it happened the last-mentioned year: so shamefully careless and inaccurate are some of those who go into foreign parts. But we learn from Count Forbin's memoirs, that on his return from Siam, in 1687, the ship put in at Masulipatan, at which time Golkonda was besieged; and that, being but 30 leagues distant, he would have gone thither to see the Indian way of making war, if he could have met with a boat to carry him; Masulipatan having been almost depopulated by the plague.

(Y) Our author says he was 60 years of age in 1695.

(Z) Mirza Abdallah Kofing, or Hoofan, had a son before he came to the throne; which seems to corroborate the opinion that Abúl Hassan (the king here spoken of) was his son.

(A) Mentioned in our description of Viziapúr, or Vijapur.

- a had with considerable forces assisted Aureug Zib in conquering the kingdom, was rewarded with death, upon very slight jealousies. His son, enraged at his father's treatment, refused to pay the tribute, and retired among inaccessible mountains: but a few years after (B), the greater power prevailing, he submitted to pay tribute, and to receive a governor, appointed by the Great Mogol to reside within his dominions^r.

^r GEMELLI'S Trav. ap. Churchill's Collect. vol. iv. p. 248, 249, 232.

(B) This farther proves, that the conquest of Golkonda was not in 1695, according to Braems's report; for this must be supposed to have happened while Gemelli was in Golkonda, where he was in 1695.

CHAP. V.

The kingdom of Kanora, or Kanâra.

- a KANORA, or the Kanatick country, begins at Gongola, a village about 40 miles to the south of Goa, and extends along the coast to the dominions of the Zamorbin (or Zamorin) of Kâlekut; and within land, up to the pepper mountains of Sunda, and the district of Serji Khân, in the kingdom of Viziapûr^a. This country has on the north the principality of Sundab; on the west, the sea; on the south, Malabâr; and on the east it is bounded by the mountains of Gatti, or Gattam, which divide it from the principality of Ikkéri, and part of Messûr.

THE air of Kanâra is very pure, and sufficiently pleasant; the country also is so fertile, that it supplies all Europe with rice, besides several parts of the Indies^b. Besides this grain, the soil produces store of betel nuts, and wild nutmegs, used in dyeing. There is likewise

- b some pepper, but not comparable to that of Sundab; and wild elephants are found in the forests.

THE capital city of Kanâra is called Bedmur (A), situate four days journey from Mirja (or Merzee); a castle on the shore at the mouth of the river of the same name, mentioned before. In our author's time, about 1675, it was the residence of the Râna, or relict of Sham Shanker Naig, or Naik, Râjah of Kanora, who was murdered by his nobility. She then governed, during the minority of her son, Bassépî Naig, the young Râjah, in conjunction with Timi Naig; who from a feller of toddi, by his cunning more than valour, raised himself to be general and protector. He was slain in battle, going to join Seva jî^c, as already mentioned.

- c A LATE author informs us, that this country is generally governed by a lady, who may marry whom she pleases; but her husband never gets the title of Râjah; altho', if she has sons, the eldest of them does. Yet neither husband nor son has any thing to do with the management of affairs, while she lives; nor are queens obliged to burn themselves with their husbands^d.

THE Râjah, or Râna, keeps generally about 15,000 soldiers on their Malabâr frontiers, with forts of earth; wherein are kept two or three hundred soldiers, ready to encounter small parties of their neighbours, who slip in clandestinely, with design to rob or steal. There is likewise another army to cover the borders, against the subjects of the Seva jîs: for those two nations being poor, in respect of the Kanârins, watch all opportunities to borrow their

- d superfluities^e.

THE Kanârins are of a tawny complexion, and middle-sized, wear their hair long, and dress not unlike the Hindûs of Surât. They are generally good soldiers, and most expert in mining: nor do they fight so disorderly as the Malabârs: but they are not quite so brave, being more addicted to commerce, which carries them to all parts of the Indies. Neither do they follow the laws and customs of the Malabârs, especially in what relates to the distinctions and degrees of their tribes; but conform themselves, in most respects, to those of the Hindûstân pagans^f.

- e THE prime nobility have the title of Naiks, or Naigs, as those of Malabâr are called Nairos. The language is peculiar, and called Kanâreyn, being spoken every-where with some variation of dialect, from the borders of Malabâr as far as Surât.

^a FRYER'S Trav. p. 162.

^b DELLON'S Voy. p. 154.

^c FRYER, ubi supr. p. 162, 164.

^d HAMILTON'S New Account of East India, vol. i. p. 282.

^e Ibid. p. 286.

^f DELLON'S Voy.

p. 154, & seqq.

(A) Hamilton calls it Baydour, which he places two days journey from the sea coast. De l'Isle writes Bed-dour, and sets it about 25 miles to the north-east of Mangalor.

Women burn themselves. KANARA hath several customs peculiar to it; and many of them have spread into remote countries. Here it was that the practice of widows burning themselves with the corpses of their deceased husbands had its beginning. Before this law was invented by the Brâmmans, the women were so ready at poisoning, that the least quarrel cost the husband his life. Our author had seen several burned, in different manners, as already related; with this addition however, that on the edge of the pit a huge log of wood, at least 500 weight, was placed so as to fall in upon the woman, on drawing a cord, in order to dispatch her the quicker, or at least run her down. There, if the victim hesitates, the priests thrust her in with long poles; at the same time making a hideous noise, to deafen hers, and dancing round the fire^g.

Men sacrifice themselves. ALTHO' the men do not burn themselves here with their wives, yet they take their turn also in making themselves voluntary sacrifices another way. To explain this, it must be observed, that to the wheels of the waggons, on which their images are carried in procession on festival days, great iron hooks are fastened; and on these some of the superstitious-zealots are accustomed to throw themselves; so that being turned round with the wheels, they are cut to pieces. Others lie sprawling on the ground, for the wheels to pass over, and crush them to death^h. The like is done in other parts of the Indies.

Few offenders. No man is permitted in Kanâra to ride on horses, mules, or elephants, but officers of state, or troopers; oxen or buffalos being the common voiture: nor are any suffered to have umbrellas held over them by servants, but they must do that office themselves, to keep off sun or rain. In all other respects people are at liberty. The laws are so well obeyed in this country, that robbery and murder are scarcely ever heard of among them: and a stranger may pass thro' the country without being asked where he is going, or what business he is aboutⁱ.

Cruel punishment. This may be owing, in great measure, to the manner of executing their criminals, which is very cruel: for they strip them stark naked, and thus tied hands and feet, expose them on the sands to the scorching heat of the sun, and stinging of the flies; where they die a most miserable and lingering death^k.

Onor. THERE are on the coast of Kanâra several considerable places. The most northern is Onoar, or Onor, situated on a river capable to receive ships of two or three hundred tons. It has a castle on a low hill, about a mile within the bar, built of old by the Portugueses: but the Râjah of Kanâra, unable to bear their insolence, reduced it by famine, after a three years blockade. There is a pagod here, called Ramtrut, visited yearly by a great numbers of pilgrims. The image, which resembles a monkey more than a man, is sometimes carried in procession. He is placed in a coach, in form of a tower, with a pyramidal top, about fifteen feet high; where eight or ten priests are set to bear him company, and sing his praises. The coach, which goes on four wheels, is drawn thro' the streets by means of a good strong rope, attended by a great mob, who are always fond of superstition^l.

Batakola. THE next port southward, is Batakola, which has the vestigia of a very large city, standing on a little river about four miles from the sea. There is nothing worth notice now remaining, except ten or twelve small pagods, covered with copper and stone. The country produces good quantities of pepper; and the English had a factory there; but, about the year 1670, one of their ships coming there to lade, the chief begged a fine bull-dog of the captain; which sometime after killing a cow, as they were out a hunting, the priests raised a mob, who slew the whole factory, eighteen in number. Since which time the English never resettled there, but often repair thither to buy pepper.

Barseloar. AFTER Batakola follows Barseloar, standing on the banks of a broad river, about four miles from the sea. The Dutch have a factory here, about a mile from the river's mouth, which has a castle on the north side for its guard. Their business here is purely to buy up rice, with which the adjacent country abounds, for their garrisons on the Malabâr coast. The Portugueses also get supplies of the same grain for Goa; and have six or eight ships there, which carry rice to Muskât, in Arabia, bringing back horses, dates, pearls, and other commodities, in exchange. To the south of this place, in the road to Mangulore, there is a walk eight or ten miles long, planted with four rows of trees, whose spreading branches afford umbrellas to passengers; who are likewise refreshed, from time to time, with fine clear water, given gratis by some old people, placed there in little huts, at the charge of the state. Between Barseloar and Mangulore lie Bakkanoar and Molkey; by whose rivers the large quantities of rice which their fields produce are exported^m.

Mangulore. MANGULORE is the greatest mart for trade in all the Kanâra dominions: having the conveniency of the united streams of three rivers, which are made by the great rains and dews falling from the mountains of Gâtti, twenty-five or thirty leagues distant, and join about a mile from the sea. The town is poorly built along the streams, and has no defence but two small forts, one on each side of the river's mouth. The fields bear two crops of corn yearly; and the higher grounds produce pepper, betel nuts, sandal wood (or sanders), iron, and steel, ⁱ DELLON, ubi supr. p. 154.

^g HAMILTON, ubi supr. p. 280.

^h DELLON, ubi supr. p. 154.

^j HAMILTON, ubi supr. p. 278, & seqq.

^k HAMILTON, ubi supr. p. 282.

^l Ibid. p. 282, & seqq.

which

a which creates a pretty good trade. The Portugueses have a factory for rice at Mangulore, and a pretty large church, because great numbers of black Christians reside there: but, says our author, both priests and people are the very dregs of Christianity. The clergy are so shameless, that they will bargain with a stranger to pimp for him; and the laity look on whoring, thieving, and murder, as no sins, provided any gain can be gotten by them.

In 1695 the Muskât Arabs came with a fleet, and plundered the sea coast of Kanâra, burnt Barfeloar and Mangulore, and carried away a rich booty. The same coast was insulted in 1720 by Konna ji Anguria; but on landing some men, he found so much resistance, that he embarked again without doing any great mischief.

b THERE is only one small sea-port more in Kanâra, called Manguzîr, about five leagues south of Mangulore, and three from Dekulli; which is a large fort, built on an island close to ^{part.} the continent. And three leagues farther south is a small river, which divides Kanâra from the Malabâr territories".

" HAMILTON, p. 285, & seqq.

CHAP. VI.

The dominions commonly called the coast of Malabâr.

SECT. I.

The country described.

a THE country of Malabâr, taken in its larger sense, contains not only the country under that name, to the west of Cape Komori, but also those to the east, as far as Nagapatan: ^{bounds} for so far the inhabitants are called Malabârs; and the Malabâr tongue extends a great way beyond, within the kingdom of Karnâta. Taken in the more contracted and modern sense of the word, Malabâr includes only the countries so called to the west of Cape Komori, otherwise denominated the dominions of the Samorîn. This country begins at the small river three leagues to the south of Fort Dekulli before-mentioned, and ends at Cape Komori, the most southern point of the peninsula of India intra Gangem, the space of about 350 miles. Its greatest breadth is about eighty miles; in some parts it is not more than twenty broad. It is washed by the sea on the west; and on the east is bounded by the mountains of Gâtî, or Gâte, b which divide it from the kingdoms of Messûr and Madârey.

THE air all over Malabâr is very good, the coast delightful, and the soil one of the most ^{Soil and pro-} fruitful in all Asia; affording two crops a year^o: yet rice is not very plenty, much being ^{dice.} imported from Kanâra (B): but the coast being low and sandy, it nourishes vast numbers of kokoa-nuts, betel, and arekka trees, whose fruit brings in much riches from abroad^p. Here are likewise store of other kinds, excellent in their nature, but very different from those of Europe; such as the jakka, of a prodigious bulk. Its fruit is divided into many partitions, ^{Fruit-trees.} which contain a substance of a yellow colour, and taste, like melons, inclosing a sort of chesnuts, which are the seed. The mango is a much more excellent fruit, resembling the nectarine. They are of different colours when ripe, as red, white, and green; some the size of an egg;
c others bigger than the largest pears. The skin is hard, and the pulp soft; they are excellent either to preserve or pickle: but the Malabâr mangos are the worst in the Indies; those towards Surât are better, and those of Goa best of all^q.

THE higher grounds produce pepper and kardamums; which, we are told, grow no-where ^{Pepper and} in the world except in the kingdom of Kannanore, near the mountain six or seven leagues from ^{kardamums.} the coast. They need neither sow nor plant it: it is enough, after the rainy season, to burn the herbs which grow on the spot, whose ashes produce this grain; which is the grand seasoning of the eastern countries. Cinnamon grows on the Malabâr coast; but it is not comparable to that of Seylân. The arbour de reys, banyan, or war-tree, is no-where so plenty as in this country^r. The mountains yield iron and steel, but not so good as the European. Their woods, d besides store of game, furnish teak-timber, and angelique, for building; sandal-wood, or

^o CORNW. Obs. on Ind. Voy. p. 55. DELLON, ubi supr. p. 61. ^p HAMILTON, vol. i. p. 292. ^q Ibid. ubi supr. p. 61. ^r Ibid. p. 66.

(B) Particularly from Farfalore; because the Malabâr rice will not keep above three months out of the husk; but in the husk it will keep a year. Hamilton's New Account, p. 331.

landers, white and yellow; cassia fistula, nux vomica, coculus indiae, and other drugs, in a plenty'. The soil likewise produces all sorts of pulse; and, among the rest, beans, four inches long, inclosed in a pod a foot and an half in length: but they are only used by the poorer sort of people, as having no good taste.

Beast and reptiles.

MALABAR abounds with wild-fowl and tame, the same as in other parts of the Indies; likewise with tigers of the three sorts already mentioned; jackalls, or addives, buffaloes, civet-cats, and monkeys: but no animal is so noxious in this country as the adders, especially a green kind, whose poison is incurable. Some, tho' long, are very small; those of the largest size are near twenty feet long, and of so vast a thickness, that they are able to swallow a man. But they are less dangerous than the other sort, because they are sooner discovered, and more easily avoided¹.

Division into kingdoms.

THE country of Malabâr was formerly united under one emperor, called the Samorin (C), who, in his old-age, turned Mohammedan; and resolving to make the pilgrimage to Mekka, before he put to sea divided his dominions, by will, among his four nephews. To the eldest he bequeathed Kallistra, whose sea-coast reaches from Dekulli to Tikorey, about twenty-four leagues; to the second, whom he loved best, he left from Tikorey to Cbitwa, the same extent of coast, with the title of Samorin; to the third, Attinga, which reached from Cbitwa to Cape Komori, about fifty leagues; because that part of the country is confined between the sea and the mountains of Gatti (D); and divided by rivers from those mountains, by more than 1000 islands between Cbitwa and Quoyloan (or Koulam). The youngest had Koyl, which reached from Cape Komori to the river of Nagapatam, about fifty leagues beyond. In process of time each of these kingdoms came to be divided into many lesser principalities, as they are at present (E). However, many of the Hindû tribes continue tributaries to the provinces mentioned in the old king's will; although a much greater number are become independent².

No villages.

It is remarkable, that although cities and towns are frequent enough in Malabâr, yet there are no villages to be seen all over it; every one having his separate habitation and inclosure in the country: and, as it is an established custom among them not to make use of their neighbours water, every house which does not stand by the side of a river has a well of its own³.

Mount Delli.

BETWEEN Dekulli and mount Delli (F), there is no harbour; but a fine deep river runs all the way for about eight leagues, never above a bow-shot from the shore, and falls into the sea at the foot of the mount, over rocks and sands, in a chanel half a league broad. A small river also runs on the south side: and three leagues lower down is a spacious river called Baliapatam; where the English company had once a factory for pepper.

Kannanore.

NOT far from thence, southward, is Kannanore, a town formerly belonging to the crown of Portugal, with a strong fort, built on a point of land almost surrounded by the sea. But the Dutch, joined by the natives, who were weary of the Portuguese tyranny, took it about the year 1660, with very little trouble: for a Fidalgo being killed by a cannon-shot, the first day on which the enemy opened their trenches, the governor fled in the night, and left the garrison to shift for themselves; who capitulated the next day. The Dutch demolished the town, and with the stones fortified the fort, which has a garrison but of forty soldiers, their trade being small. However, there is a pretty large town built in the bottom of the bay, belonging to Adda Râjah, a Mohammedan prince; who can bring near 20,000 men into the field. His government is neither absolute nor hereditary. He has not so much as the command of the public money: but when there is occasion for any, the Râjah, the commissioner of trade, the chief judge, and the treasurer, meet, to take it out of the chests, where it is lodged, by means of holes in the lids, of which each has a key. The coin is all gold.

Adda Râjah.

IN 1668, this prince paying a visit to the Dutch captain, his men attempted to surprise the fort, but without Adda's knowledge; for which the ringleader was put to a cruel death by his order⁴.

King of Kallistri.

EIGHT or ten miles from Kannanore the king of Kallistri keeps his court: whither our author, with another Englishman, went in 1702. His palace was built with twigs, and covered with kadjans, or kokoa-nut tree leaves, woven together. The king, named Omni-

¹ HAMILTON, ubi supr. p. 291.

² DELLON, ubi supr. p. 108.

³ DELLON, p. 77, 85.

⁴ HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 292, & seqq.

⁵ HAMILTON, ubi supr. p. 291.

(C) Hamilton says, this emperor reigned when the Portuguese first entered the Indies by sea, in 1498. But De Faria y Sousa, and other Portuguese authors, place the reign of this Samorin, called Perimal, 600 years before. As to the division, De Faria says he gave to the chief of his relations the kingdom of Koulam, where he placed the head see of the Bramman religion, and called him Kobritim; which is the same as high priest. This dignity was afterwards translated to Kochin. To his nephew, Perimal gave Kalikût, with all the temporal dominion, calling him Zamori, which is the same as emperor. See Portug. Asia, vol. i. p. 100, & seq.

(D) So is the whole country; and this part broadest of all.

(E) Of these captain Hamilton has given a list, p. 287, as it was procured in 1694 by the Heer Van Rede, commissary of the Dutch East India company.

(F) Or mount E'li; that is, Eli's mount; as Dellon, and some others, name it. Voyage to East India, ch. 21. p. 61. Engl. edit.

- a tri (G), was about forty years old, and successor to the eldest son of the Samorin before mentioned, who died in his voyage towards Mekka. They paid their compliment each with a gold ckekîn, and a few grains of rice laid on it. He treated them with toddi wine, some plantains, and young kokoa-nuts. His dress was only a silk lunjey, or scarf, which was fastened about his middle by a girdle of gold plate, and reached to his knees. He had great jewels of massy gold, set with rubies, emeralds, and pearls, hanging at his ears; but no ornament on his head, except his hair, which hung over his shoulders, and was very beautiful. His queen and daughters were in the same habit, only their hair was tied up behind; being all naked above the navel, and barefooted. Her majesty had a chearful countenance, and was very affable, distributing betel and arekka with her own royal hands.
- b ABOUT the year 1680, three princes of the royal blood conspired to cut off Omnitri, and his family: but, being detected, they were beheaded on altars, built square, of stone, about three yards high, and four in diameter, two miles from Kannanore.
- ADDA RAJAH's dominions reach but ten miles to the south of Kannanore to Tellicherri Dormé-river; near which he has a harbour, called Dormépatam. The entrance is embarrassed with patam. rocks, and has an island opposite to it, about a league from shore, invironed with the same dangers. The same Râjah is likewise in possession of the Lakka Diva islands (H), which lie Lakka Diva about forty leagues off the Malabâr coast, between the latitudes of eight degrees thirty islands. minutes, and twelve degrees thirty minutes. Our author had seen eighteen of them (I). They are all low, and have many dangerous shoals about them. There is a large chanel
- c between them and the Maldiva islands, called the eight-degree chanel. They produce nothing but kokoa-nuts and fish; which latter they export dried to the continent. From the nut-kernels they express oil; and of the fibres of the husk, called kayar (or kayro), they make cordage and cables for shipping. Sometimes in the south-west monsoons they find ambergrise floating on the sea. Captain Hamilton saw a piece in the Râjah's possession as big as a bushel; and he valued it at 10,000 rupis, or 1250 pounds sterling. The inhabitants are, like their prince, Mohammedans ^z.
- THE next province to Adda Râjah's dominions is Tellicherri (K); where the English have Tellicherri. a factory, pretty well fortified with stone walls and cannon: but to little purpose; since it has no river near it to protect it, nor can it defend the road from the insults of enemies. The - d town is inclosed with a stone wall, and stands behind the fort, within land.
- TWELVE or fourteen miles farther southward stands Burgara, a sea-port belonging to Bal- Burgara port. lanore Burgarey, a formidable prince, whose country produces pepper and the best kardamums in the world. This prince and his predecessors have been lords of the seas, time out of mind; and all trading vessels between Cape Komori and Daman were obliged to carry his passes. Those of one mast paid eight shillings yearly, and those with three, about sixteen. But when the Portugueses settled in India, they pretended to the sovereignty of the sea; and this occasioned a war, which has lasted ever since. This prince keeps some light gallies; which Lord of the cruize along the coast from October to May, in order to make prize of all such vessels as have seas. not his pass. He, without any scruple, went on board Captain Hamilton's ship, who was there
- e in 1703, and treated him nobly on shore: but would drink nothing on board; telling the Captain, that his water was polluted by his touch. And, when our author had paid his visit, he caused an apartment of his palace, built with reeds, and covered with kokoa-nut leaves, to be new thatched; because, in walking together, the stranger's hat had chanced to touch the roof.
- THE dominions of this prince end at Tikorey, about twelve miles south of Mealey (L). Midway is Kottika (M), famous for seizing vessels which traded without their lord's pass. Off Kottika, about eight miles, lies Sacrifice Rock: so called, because, when the Portugueses first Sacrifice rock, settled in India, the cruizers of that place sacrificed on it the whole crew of a Portuguese

^z HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 296, & seqq.

(G) Dellon, who calls him Onitri, says it is a title belonging to all the kings of Kannanore, as he makes him to be; and that he was in his time the most powerful of all the kings in Malabâr; and much superior in strength to the Samorin, tho' his territories were not near so large. See Voyage to the East Indies, part i. ch. 21. p. 61. also ch. 38. p. 117. But ch. 40. p. 123, he says the Samorin is the most powerful of all the Malabar princes.

(H) In Dellon's Voyage, p. 118, he is, doubtless by some mistake of the press, called Atitaja; and is said to be king of several of the Maldiva islands (instead of the Lakka isles); yet subject to the king of Kannanore; meaning Onitri, or Omnitri.

(I) In effect, the large ones do not exceed that number. Captain H. Cornwall has given a chart of them in his Observations on several voyages to India, p. 40.

(K) Or Tilseri, as the French call it: but its true name is Tatishere. See Dellon's Voy. East-Ind. p. 118, ch. 38.

(L) Or Meali, two leagues north of Bargara (or Burgara). Dellon's Voy. part ii. ch. 1. p. 138.

(M) This doubtless is Kota, or Kognali, a bazâr, or market-town; whose lord was a great pirate: but Dellon, p. 138, places it not above a mile and half from Bargara. Kota signifies a fort.

vessel, which they had seized. It is observable, that those Europeans could never get one foot a of ground in the Balanore's country, although they often attempted it ^a.

Samorin's country.

THE country of the Samorin (N) reaches along the sea-coast of Malabâr, from Tikori to Chitwa, about twenty-two leagues. Its products are, pepper in abundance; betel-nut and kokoa-nut, whose tree yields jaggheri, a kind of sugar; and kopera, or the nut-kernels dried, which affords a clear oil. Here are found iron, sandal-wood, cassia lignum, and timber for building; which commodities are exported to great advantage.

Kalikut, or Koy Kota.

THE chief city (if it may be called one) of the Samorin is Kalekut (O); where he commonly resides. His palace is built of stone; and there is some faint resemblance of grandeur to be seen about his court. He is reckoned the most powerful king on the Malabâr coast, and has the best trade in his country; which makes both him and his people richer than their b neighbours. The English had a factory there for many years: but are now removed to Tellicherry; whither their pepper is sent from thence by sea. The French have a small factory also, settled in 1698; and the Portugueses a poor church: but the first have not money to carry on trade; nor the latter credit enough to procure converts.

Road of Kalekut.

THE Portugueses formerly built a town before Kalekut; which being undermined by the sea (P), or swallowed up by an earthquake, as some affirm, in 1703, Captain Hamilton's ship, which drew twenty-one feet, struck on some of the ruins in six fathom water, in the road of that city ^b.

Tannore.

FIVE or six leagues south of Kalekut is Tannore (Q) (or Tanor), a town of small trade, inhabited by Mohammedans; who are a little free state; but pay an acknowledgement to the c Samorin. Five leagues from thence, towards the same point, is Pennaney, before-mentioned; which has the benefit of a river, and was formerly a place of trade; where the French and English had their factories till the year 1670, when they removed. About four leagues more to the south, is Chitwa river (R), which bounds the Samorin's dominions on that side; where the Dutch built a small fort, and settled, about the year 1714 ^c.

One odd custom,

MANY strange customs were observed formerly in this country; of which some still continue. One was, for the Samorin to reign no longer than twelve years. If he died before that time expired, it saved him a troublesome ceremony of cutting his own throat on a public scaffold; which he ascended for that purpose, after feasting, and taking leave of his numerous nobility and gentry: who, having buried his body with great pomp, elected a new Samorin. d In place of this custom, at present, at the end of twelve years a jubilee is proclaimed through the Samorin's dominions; and, a tent being pitched for him in a large plain, a feast is celebrated for ten or twelve days, with great rejoicings, guns firing both day and night. At the end of which, any four of the guests, who have a mind to gain a crown by a desperate action, may undertake it; which is, to force their way through 30 or 40,000 of his guards, and kill him in his tent: he who gives the bold stroke succeeding him in the empire.

changed for another.

IN 1695, one of these jubilees happened, and was kept at Pennani (S), a sea-port, about fifteen leagues southward of Kalekut. No more than three men would venture on that extravagant enterprize. They fell in, with sword and target, among the guards; and, after they had killed and wounded many of them, were killed themselves. However, a nephew of e one of the desperadoes, about fifteen or sixteen years old, had like to have carried the prize: for, keeping close by his uncle's side, when he saw him fall, the youth got through the guards into the Samorin's tent, and, making a stroke at his majesty, had certainly dispatched him, if a large brass lamp, which was burning over his head, had not marred the blow: but before he could make another he was killed. Our author Captain Hamilton happened at that juncture to sail along the coast, and heard the guns for two or three nights successively.

Marriage customs.

WHEN the Samorin marries, he must not cohabit with his wife till the Nambourey, or chief priest, has enjoyed her; and, if his sanctity pleases, he may have three nights of her company. Because the first fruits of her nuptials must be an holy oblation to the god she worships: and some of the nobles are so complaisant as to allow the clergy the same tribute. f However the common people cannot have that honour done them, but are forced to supply the places of the priests themselves ^d.

^a HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 299, & seqq.
^d Ibid. ubi supr. p. 399, & seqq.

^b Ibid. p. 318, & seqq.

^c Ibid. ubi supr. p. 322.

(N) Or Zamerlim, as Fryer and Cornwall say.
(O) Called in the Malabâr language Koy Kota; that is, the fort of the cock, or cock fort; because the Samorin's kingdom was of no greater extent formerly than you might hear a cock crow. Dellon's Voy. to East-Ind. p. 140.

(P) Dellon, p. 141, imputes this to the inundation caused by the south-west winds, which blow from May to September. The fort, he says, lies half under water: and those inundations removed the trade from Kalikut to Goa. The same author says, gold dust is found among the sands on the sea shore.

(Q) The king resides about a league from thence: and though his dominions are not above eight or ten leagues long, and as many broad, yet he is as absolute as any in Malabâr, and tributary to none. Dellon's Voy. p. 144.

(R) It is about ten leagues to the north of Kochin.

(S) Pennancy, or Panancy; sometimes the place of the Samorin's residence.

^a THE king of Kouchin's (or Kochin's) dominions are next to the Samorin's, and extend from Chitwa about twenty-four leagues to the southward. So many rivulets descend from the mountains of Gatti (or Gite), which reach within eight leagues of the coast, that they reckon above 1000 islands made by their streams, which join at Kranganôr, five leagues below Chitwa; where they make one great outlet to the sea. Kingdom of Kochin.

THE first place of note after leaving Chitwa is Kranganôr; where the Dutch have a small fort, which retains the same name, standing about one league up the river. Formerly it bore the name of a kingdom, and was a republic of Jews; who once could reckon 80,000 families, but are now reduced to 4000. They have a synagogue at Kochin, not far from the king's palace, about two miles from the city, in which are preserved their records, engraven on copper-plates in Hebrew characters; and when any of the characters decay, they have them new cut. Jews there;

MYNHEER Vanreede, before-mentioned, about 1695, had an abstract of their history translated into Low Dutch. They declare themselves of the tribe of Manasseh, a part whereof was, by order of N. bukkadnezzar, carried to the most eastern province of his large empire, which it seems extended as far as Cape Komori: and this journey 20,000 of them performed in three years from their setting out from Babylon. their history.

^c WHEN they arrived in Malabar, they were received with great civility by the inhabitants, who allowed them liberty of conscience, and the use of their own customs. There, having increased in number and riches, they at length purchased the little kingdom of Kranganôr; and chose two sons of an eminent family to govern the commonwealth, and reign jointly over them. But one of the brothers, ambitious to reign alone, killed the other at a feast; and his son, having revenged his father's death by that of the murderer, the state fell again into a democracy; which still continues among these Jews. Many of them, through poverty, have embraced the Hindû religion; the lands having for many ages reverted into the hands of the Malabars.

^d To the south of Kranganôr, and within the island of Baypin, which reaches from thence to Kochin, there is an old Portuguese fort; and five leagues up the rivulet is a Romish church, called Verapoli, served by French and Italian priests; whose superior can raise 4000 men, all of the church of Rome. But there are many more Christians of St. Thomas, who will not communicate with those of St. Peter; and some *Portuguese*s, called Topases, who communicate with neither: for they will be served by none but Portuguese priests, because they indulge them more in their villanies, and let them have absolution from their crimes at an easier rate^e.

^e THE water of this country near the sea-coast from Kranganôr to St. Andrea (T), about twelve leagues to the south, has the bad quality to give the constant drinkers of it swelled legs; some it affects in one, some in both. Our author has seen legs above a yard about at the ankle. It causes no pain, but itching: nor does the thick leg seem heavier than the small one to the owner. The Dutch at Kochin, to prevent that malady, send boats daily to Verapoli for water to serve the city: and yet Captain Hamilton has seen both Dutch men and women troubled with that distemper; to heal or prevent which, no remedy hath yet been found. The Romish legends impute the cause of those great swelled legs to a curse St. Thomas laid upon his murderers and their posterity. But St. Thomas was killed (they say) by the Tillinga priest at Meliapûr, on the coast of Choromandel, about 400 miles distant, and the natives there are not afflicted with this distemper. Swelled legs.

^f THE *Portuguese*s, who were the first Europeans settled at Kochin, built there a fine city on the river-side, about three leagues from the sea: but, the latter gaining on the land yearly, it is not now above 100 paces from it. However, the situation among rivulets and canals makes it exceeding pleasant. It was a mile and a half long, to one mile in breadth; but the Dutch having taken it about 1660, with the assistance of the king of Kochin, whose friendship had been destroyed by the Portuguese insolence, they contracted it to almost one tenth of its former magnitude: it being now about 600 paces long by 200 broad; but fortified with seven large bastions, and thick curtains. The garrison consists of 300 men. The king of Kochin, who at best is but a vassal to the Dutch, has a palace built of stone, about half a league from the Dutch city; and there is a straggling village not far from the palace which bears the name of Old Kochin, with a bazâr, or market-place, in it; where the country merchandizes are sold, but no curiosities. His majesty's ordinary residence is at another palace, six leagues to the south of Kochin, and two from St. Andrea; but he keeps only a small court. City of Kochin.

ON the shore of St. Andrea, about half a league out in the sea, lies Mud Bay, a place which few in the world can parallel. It is open to the wide ocean, and has neither island nor bank to break-off the force of the billows, which come rolling with great violence on all other parts of the coast in the south-west monsoons, but on this bank of mud lose themselves in a moment; and ships lie on it, as secure as in the best harbour, without motion or disturbance. It reaches about a mile along-shore, and has shifted from the northward in thirty years about three miles ^a.

^e HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 323, & seqq.

(T) This is only a village with a church in it, dedicated to St. Andrew, and served by priests of St. Thomas; who are generally both poor and illiterate. Hamil. p. 332.

Porkah
principality.

ABOUT two leagues south of St. Andrea begin the dominions of Porkat, or Porkab, which are of small extent, reaching not above four leagues along the coast. The prince is poor, having but little trade; although it was a free port for pirates when Avery and Kid robbed on these shores: but since that time they infest the northern parts, where they find richer prizes, among the Mokka and Persian traders. The Dutch keep a factory at Porkab; but of small consequence.

Kali Koulam.

KOIL KOILOAN (or Kali Koulam) is another little principality contiguous to Porkab, where the Dutch keep a factory: and next to it is Koyloan (or Koulam), another small principality, and city. It has the benefit of a river, which is the southermost outlet of the Kochin islands; and the Dutch have a small fort within a mile of it, on the shore, which they took from the Portugueses. It has a garrison of thirty men; and its trade is inconsiderable. At Erwa, two leagues to the south of Koyloan, the Danes have a small factory, being a poor looking thatched house by the sea-side, with a trade suitable to it: and two leagues beyond Aujengo fort. Erwa lies Aujengo, a fort, built by the English in 1595. It stands on a sandy foundation, and is fortified by the sea on one side, and a little river on the other: but there is not a drop of water for drinking but what comes from the Red Cliffs, three miles to the north; which would have been a much better situation. The country produces good quantities of pepper, and long cloth, as fine as any made in the Indies. Their factory is in the dominions of the queen of Attinga. Before it was built, the English had two others in her country, to the south of Aujengo; one called Brinjan (or Bringjohn), the other Ruttera (or Reytora): but, being naked places, they left them, to avoid the insults of the needy courtiers.

Queen of Attinga.

In those times they sent a yearly present to the queen of Attinga, whose court is about four leagues within land from Aujengo: and, in 1685, it being carried by a young beautiful gentleman, her black majesty fell in love with him, and next day made him proposals of marriage. But, although he modestly refused so great an honour, yet, to please her majesty, he staid at court a month or two; and when he came away, she made him some presents. About 1720, the annual present being demanded by the queen's officer, and the English chief refusing to pay it to any but the queen herself, she invited him to court; where, to appear great, he carried two of his council, and some others of the factory, with most of the military belonging to the garrison: but they were all cut off by stratagem, excepting a few black servants, who made their escape.

Tengapatam.

TEGNAPATAM (or Tengapatam) lies about twelve leagues southward of Aujengo, in a country producing pepper and coarse cloth. Here the Dutch have a factory. Kolicha (or Kolechey), situate between the middle and west point of Cape Komorin (or Komori) affords good cloth and salt; but neither the English nor Dutch trade thither. Close by Kolicha, at the said middle point (U), there is a secure harbour for small vessels ^e.

FROM the borders of Koyloan, above-mentioned, as far as this cape, is called the kingdom of Travankôr: and, as we are told on one hand that it belonged to Attinga, and on the other, that it was governed by the queen, it may be presumed that she was the same just now mentioned. Besides the places on the sea-coast already taken notice of, this country has several considerable ones within land; among which are the cities of Travankôr, Kali, and Kotate.

City of Kotate.

This last is situate at the foot of the mountains (of Gatti) about four leagues from Cape Komori, and is very large and populous ^b; but without either walls or ditches, as are most of the towns in these parts.

Cape Komori.

AT this famous cape, which makes the most southerly point of this peninsula of India, one experiences two opposite seasons of the year, winter and summer at the same time; for in that tongue of land, which is not above three leagues in extent, sometimes even in the same garden, which is not more than 500 paces square, one has the pleasure to see those two seasons united; the trees being loaded with flowers and fruits on one side, while on the other side they are stripped of all their leaves. This surprising phænomenon is owing to those mountains; and our author, who relates this fact on the testimony of others, himself observed that on the opposite sides of the cape the winds are constantly opposite, and as if at strife: so that at the same time the winds blow from the west on the western side, they blow from the east on the Strange variety.

^f HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 325, 328, & seqq.
Lettr. Edif. tom. xv. p. 44, & seq.

^g Ibid. ubi supr. p. 333, & seqq.

^h BOUCHET ap.

(U) By the context our author must mean the point commonly called Cape Komorin; but Kolicha is above fifty miles to the north-west of it, by the late map of the Jesuits sent from India; although De Lisse and the charts place it near the cape.

a eastern side¹. More than this, those mountains of Balligâte (or Gâtti) being covered with a very fine sand, light as dust, it is carried by the winds as far as the island of Seylon, and is very troublesome at Tutukurin, on the Fishery coast: besides, as this sand is red, the reflection of the sun's rays makes the sky seem all on fire; which is a sight dreadful to behold^k.

¹ TACHARD, ibid. tom. iii. p. 209, & seq.
and BALDÆUS, ibid. vol. iii. p. 583.

^k NIEUHOFF. ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. ii. p. 262.

S E C T. II.

The inhabitants of Malabâr.

- b THE inhabitants of Malabâr are generally well-shaped, all of them black, or at least Inhabitants. very deep tawny; but are not near so ugly as the Africans. They let their hair grow to a great length; but shave their beards close: excepting a few, who wear whiskers. They do not want ingenuity; but very rarely improve it by any useful arts or sciences. They are very treacherous, breach of faith being their daily practice; in which, says Dellon, they almost outdo the Mohammedans, their masters. However, they are generally very patient, and not easily put in a passion. Besides, it ought to be mentioned to their honour, that when injured Character, or affronted, they have recourse to the most generous methods of taking satisfaction, and never revenge themselves by clandestine means; poison not being so much as known among them.
- c THE Malabâr females are for the generality well shaped, and not ill-featured: but little women are in greater esteem than tall ones¹.
- THESE people are distinguished, as in other parts of India, into several degrees or tribes. Divided into The first is that of their princes, the second of their clergy; the third consists of their Nayers, tribes, or nobles; the merchants make the fourth; and under the fifth may be comprised the mechanics, husbandmen, fishers, and the inferior kinds of people.
- WITH regard to the first order, or that of the princes, in each kingdom of the Malabârs Crown hereditary, there are several families which are branches of the royal stock, superior in rank to all others; ary. and, for the general, the most antient of all the princes succeeds without opposition: so that a young sovereign is the greatest rarity that can be seen among the Malabârs.
- d THE first thing which a new king does, is to appoint a lieutenant-general, or first minister: Prime minister. for although this post be exposed to sale, yet the king reserves a power of chusing from among the candidates, him whom he judges most capable of executing that important trust. And whether a Nayer or Shati be invested with this dignity, he will make himself obeyed even by the princes themselves, no less than if a person of the first quality had been elected. The king leaves the whole management of affairs to his conduct; and, for the most part, lives in a retired place; but with a great deal of magnificence. This governor-general has the whole direction of the treasury, as well as of making peace and war, in concert with the king; in whose presence he always stands. He permits not any of the courtiers or guards to enter his majesty's bed-chamber; and never speaks to him without laying his hand on his mouth. The least neglect in any of these respects would be attended with the loss of his office, which is only during pleasure: however, such changes rarely happen^m.
- e WHEN the king (for instance, him of Kannanôr), goes abroad, he is carried either on an The king's elephant, or in a palanki; having on his head a crown of gold, shaped like a ducal bonnet, state. weighing somewhat above 200 guineas. It is always given by the new governor-general, and repositied in the treasury of the chief pagod when the king dies. His majesty is surrounded with his guard of Nayers, before whom certain officers march to clear the way, and give notice that the king is coming; who marches under the sound of drums, trumpets, and other warlike instruments. The prince and princesses, when they go abroad, appear with the same pomp: but the prime minister is only attended by his guards, without martial instruments, or any to clear the way; unless he happens to be a prince, and then he enjoys those honours in respect of his birth, and not of the dignity of his office.
- f THERE are in the Malabâr countries many degrees or dignities in the church, as well as in The clergy. the state. The clergy consist of three orders; Nambouri, Brâmans, and Buts. The Nambouri are the first in both capacities of church and state: and some of them are popes, being sovereign princes in both respects. Of these priests there are two ranks or orders; the first called Iregale Nade, the second Nambiar. The Brâmans are the second degree of clergy, and concerned in spiritual affairs only. The Buts, or magicians, says our author, are next to them, and in great venerationⁿ. Such is the authority of the clergy here, that in all matters which concern religion, the kings are subject to the Nambouri and Brâmans.

¹ DELLON'S Voy. to Ind. p. 91, 106, 107. 114.

^m Ibid. p. 101.

ⁿ HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 290. 312.

Nayers, or gentry, THE Nayers, or, as others write, Nairs, Nabors, and Nayros, are the gentry. These are a very numerous °. They may be easily distinguished from the rest, by their civil deportment and conversation.

serve as guides It is an antient law or custom for all strangers or others, who are not pagans, never to travel without a guard of one of these Nayers; insomuch that the princes never take cognizance of any violences offered to travellers who neglect this precaution. These Nayers, whose pay is no more than eight tares, or four pence a day, never betray or abandon those they guard upon the road: but if a man happens to lose his life while he is under their care, they will not survive him. If they should do otherwise, they would be looked on as cowards: and where-ever they chance to violate their trust, none are so forward as their own wives and kindred to be their executioners. For all this, a traveller is more secure under the guidance of a son of a Nayer, than of several Nayers themselves: because it is a sort of law among the Indian robbers, never to hurt children, or such as are not able to defend themselves; whereas they spare none who are provided with arms.

WHEN the Nayers children go into the country, they only carry in their hand a twisted stick, about a foot and half long, with a handle at top, like that of a dagger, and a large knob at the other end. None but the sons of the gentry are allowed to wear such a stick, by which they are distinguished from others; and their wages is not above three halfpence a day. But although this is the securest way of travelling, yet none but the poorer sort of people use it: because travellers are respected in this country according to the number of their guards from place to place ^p.

Teyvis. THE Teyvis are next to the gentry, and the farmers of kokoa-nut trees. They apply to husbandry, and gathering the palm wine. These may bear arms; but not without a licence.

Chatims. MERCHANTS are of all orders, excepting that of Nambouri; and are in some esteem.

Maynats. THE Maynats, or whiteners of linen, the weavers, and those who make it their employment to draw it, are divided into so many different classes or families.

Poulias and Mukwas. THE Poulias produce the labourers and mechanics. These Hamilton thinks are inferior to the Mukwas (X), or fishermen; who are obliged to live near the sea, and are not permitted to follow any other employment, or to bear arms, even in case of the greatest extremity. But Dellon says, the Pouliats are the vilest and most contemptible of all the Malabârs; if he does not confound them with the Poulichis (or Pulchis), who, according to the former author, are the lowest class of human creatures, and excluded from the benefit of laws both human and divine.

If a Poulia, or Teyvis, meets with a Nayer on the road, he must go out of the way to let his worship pass, on pain of a severe chastisement, if not of death, at his hands. But the Poulichis, or Pulchis, are in a much worse condition: for, by the law, they are not permitted to converse with any other tribe (Y); nor to wear any kind of cloth, but only a little straw to cover their nakedness, made fast by a cord round their middle. They must not build houses or huts (Z) on the ground, nor inhabit the plains where there is corn-land: but are doomed to dwell in the woods, and build on the branches of trees, like birds, with grass and straw. If they happen to see any body coming towards them, they howl like dogs, and run away; lest those of quality should take offence at their breathing the same air. Not being permitted to till the ground, they plant fruits and roots in obscure places of the woods, stealing the seed in the night from the neighbouring gardens: but if they are caught, they are put to death on the spot, without any form of law. When they want food, they come to the skirts of their woods, and howl like foxes. Upon this signal, the charitable Poulias and Teyvis relieve them with rice, kokoa-nuts, and fruits; which they lay down within twenty paces of them, and then withdraw, that the Poulichis may come and carry it into their forests. They are very swift of foot, and dextrous in catching wild beasts and fowl ^q.

Religion. THE inferior tribes have liberty of chusing their deities. Our author had seen at the houses of many Mukwas, or fishers, a stake with a few notches cut about it, fixed in the ground two feet high; and this, covered with kadjans, or kokoa-tree leaves, serves both as a temple and god to that family. Some get a tree consecrated for their worship: others pay their devotion to the first animal, let it be cat, dog, or serpent, which they see in the morning; and this serves for the day. Their temples are neither large nor beautiful, but dark; their images all black and deformed, with lamps continually burning before them. However, they all

° DELLON'S Voy. p. 104.
DELLON, p. 91, & seqq.

^p HAMILT. ubi sup. p. 94. & seq.

^q HAMILTON, p. 312, & seq.

(X) In the English translation of Dellon they are called Moconas; perhaps by mistake.

(Y) Dellon says, if a Nayer has a mind to try his arms by killing one of the Pouliats, he may, with impunity.

(Z) Dellon says, they live in wretched huts, made of palm-leaves; and that their whole business is to watch the rice fields.

a believe in one supreme God, of whom they never make any image : and the transmigration of souls is a doctrine universally received by them^a.

THESE people eat carrion and vermin, which contributes to render them so odious ; especially Reckoned in- their not scrupling even the flesh of oxen and cows which die a natural death. They are so filious. despicable, that no offering to the gods, or presents to the prince, will be accepted from them, unless it be gold or silver : and then they must lay it down at a distance, and retire twenty paces ; while the Nayers, who are the prince's guards, come to take it up, and give them an answer at that distance. They are often fined in very great sums ; which they are able to pay, because they rob the graves of the Malabars, most of whose gold and silver is buried with them. But this being considered as a kind of sacrilege, they are looked upon as forcerers, b and an infamous generation, capable of the most enormous crimes. For this reason they are, on the least suspicion, accused, and condemned to death ; whereas no person belonging to the other tribes can be convicted, without very substantial evidence^c.

THE laws which forbid an upper Hindû tribe or family to have any commerce with an inferior, particularly as to eating and drinking, are no-where more strictly kept up than among Superiority of families the Malabars ; or, in other words, the folly of family pride, which reigns in most nations, is carried here to the greatest pitch of extravagance. They will not suffer their victuals to be dressed by one of a lower rank ; nor will they drink of the wells used by such : nay, if one of an inferior tribe enters their houses, the Brâmmans is sent for to take away the infection, by certain ceremonies used for that purpose. But this rule is observed with the greatest exactness strictly kept up. c when they contract alliances by marriage : nay, the women (A) are even debarred having commerce with a man of inferior degree. Thus, a man may marry a woman of the next class below his own, but not of a superior rank. In such case both parties are punished with death ; except the females descended from the Nambouris and Brâmmans : for, in such case, they are left to the disposal of the prince, who sells them for slaves ; and as they are generally the handsomest among the Malabars, foreigners are eager to purchase them at a dear rate ; of which our author saw an instance.

If a man of an inferior degree be accused of having received a favour from a lady of a rank A cruel law. superior to his, they conduct him, with fetters on his hands and feet, to the prince, where he is put to death. Nor is this thought a sufficient atonement for the offence ; but the d nearest akin to the lady have liberty for three days to kill all such relations of the criminal as they shall meet with in the district where the fact was committed. The Nayers have a power to exercise this cruelty on such occasions against the Teyvi, and Sheres or weavers ; as these have the same power over the Mukwas or fishermen ; and these again over the Poulchis. The Nambouri and Brâmmans not being allowed to kill any body, their authority extends no farther than to deliver up those poor victims to slaughter. This cruel custom would be intolerable, were it not that they commonly respite the offender for eight days, that his relations may have time to get out of the way, till the three days allotted by the law for revenging the affront, are expired^e.

In point of habit, there is scarce any difference between the men and women in Malabâr. Habit. e They wear their hair, which is black, and very long ; and go naked as far as the middle. The princes themselves, if they sometimes make use of a small vest, leave it open before. About their middle they fasten a piece of cloth, which reaches to their knees, and never make use of shoes or stockings. In other countries ladies pride themselves in rich gold and silver stuffs : but, on the contrary, in Malabâr such cloaths are worn by the meaner sort ; while the wives of the Nayers, and others of chief rank, wear nothing but fine white callico ; placing their fondness rather on girdles of gold, and bracelets of silver or horn. They never adorn themselves with any jewels, unless it be a ring. Both men and women have ears hanging down to their shoulders, occasioned by the weight of the pendants, sometimes exceeding two ounces, f gold chains : but these are only such who have merited that favour from the king by some remarkable action.

THEIR houses are commonly built with earth, and covered with kokoa-leaves ; it being rare Houses and to meet with one of brick or stone. Nor is their furniture more sumptuous, consisting only furniture. of some baskets, with a few earthen pots and dishes. Their cups are of the same materials : nor do their kings make use of better. As they have no chimnies in their houses, on account of the heat of the climate, their victuals are dressed without-doors, and without sauces ; consequently unsavory. When they eat, they always turn their backs to the light. At night they make use of lamps supplied with kokoa-nut oil. Their beds are nothing but deal boards, a which the rich cover with tapestry, and the poor with mats¹.

^a HAMILTON, p. 514, & seq.^c DELLON, p. 92.^e Ibid. p. 97, & seqq.

(A) That this law should respect the women and not the men, as in the English translation of Dellon, appears from what follows ; which otherwise would be a contradiction.

Marriages of princesses;

PRINCESSES are here married to either the Nambouri, or Brâmmans; and their issue are princes, and capable of inheriting the crown in their turn: but, as there is not a sufficient number of princesses to furnish all those ecclesiastics with wives, they are allowed to marry women of the same rank, or family, with themselves; and their children are either Nambouri, or Brâmmans, according to the quality of their mothers: for all pedigree and inheritance among the Malabârs, runs in the female line. For this reason the princes never marry any princesses, but the daughters of Nayers, to whose race the children belong, and not to that of the princes. The Nayers are obliged to marry one of the same quality, or a woman of the next degree or family to themselves; namely, the Minats, or the Sbeti. The other tribes and families have the same liberty in wedlock; but the females must not debase themselves by marrying below their rank, on pain of death.

female polygamy:

THE Malabâr princes, the Nambouri and Brâmmans, as also the chief Nayers, commonly have only one wife; whom they endeavour, by the most obliging means, to dissuade from taking another husband: for they cannot compel them to refrain, as they are allowed by the law of the country to marry as many husbands as they please². Thus says Dellon. But, according to Captain Hamilton, every woman is stinted to twelve husbands at one time; while the men are not confined to a set number of wives. When a woman is married to her first husband, she has a house built for her; and he cohabits with her till she takes a second, or her legal number. In which case the husbands agree to live with her in their turns, for ten or more days together; each maintaining her for the time³.

how regulated.

WHAT is most surprising (and shews the force of custom), this female polygamy is not attended with the least disorder or jealousy; for if one husband sees the arms of another at the lady's doors, he is satisfied that the place is taken up; and rests contented till he finds the coast clear. It is some consolation however, to the men, under this female usurpation, that their marriage-engagements are only during pleasure: and that, whenever the parties are weary of each other, they part as freely as they meet. Nor are these marriages any great expence to them: for the usual present, which the new husband makes his wife, is a piece of linen to cover her⁴. During the time of such cohabitation, she serves the husband as purveyor and cook; and also keeps his cloaths and arms clean. When she proves with child, she declares who is the father; and after she has brought it to walk, or speak, he takes care of its education⁵.

Inheritances.

IT is from this custom of the women marrying so many husbands, and quitting them again at pleasure, that the children derive their pedigree from their mothers; it being impossible to know their true fathers: neither are the sons here considered as the next heirs, but the nephews; who besides must be the sister's sons⁶: and if she has none, then the nearest in blood from the grandmother; which custom is followed even by the Mohammedan Malabârs, although they keep a watchful eye over their wives⁷, and practise a different kind of polygamy.

Marry very young.

THEY marry their daughters for the most part at twelve years of age; and many have children before that time, who are generally very small; possibly because their mothers marry so young. For all this, their labour is so easy, that midwives are unknown in these parts (and indeed throughout the Indies); any woman, who is somewhat advanced in years, taking upon her to perform that office. The Malabâr, as well as African women, as soon as they are delivered, wash themselves; and take no farther care of their infants than to give them suck.

Burials.

IN Malabâr all dead bodies are interred; excepting those of their princes, the Nambouri, Brâmmans, and Nayers; which are burned: but the privilege of marrying so many husbands as they please, exempts the women from the cruel obligation of burning themselves⁸.

Theft rigorously punished.

JUSTICE is administered in Malabâr with much impartiality. Murder is seldom punished with death, nor does the law appoint any punishment for it; leaving it to the discretion of the kindred to take what satisfaction they think fit: but they are the severest people in the world in case of theft; for whoever steals but a bunch of pepper, or the value of it, pays for it with his life.

Their prisons.

THEY have no close or barricaded prisons in Malabâr; nor are their criminals strongly guarded. They only load them with fetters; which are never taken off till they are either discharged or executed.

Trial by ordeal.

ALL causes, both civil and military, are pleaded before the prince; where both parties produce their evidence: but if witnesses be wanting, or they do not sufficiently clear the point, the accused may purge himself in the following manner. They cause a piece of iron, not unlike a hatchet, to be made red hot before him; then laying upon his hand a leaf of the bananas-tree, at top of that they lay the hot iron; which he is not to throw on the ground, till after the

¹ DELLON, p. 106, & seq.

p. 105.

² HAMILT. p. 105.

³ DELLON, p. 106, 112.

⁴ Ibid. p. 104, & seq.

311.

⁵ HAMILT. p. 311.

⁶ DELLON, p. 105.

⁷ DELLON,

⁸ HAMILT. p. 312.

a redness is gone. This done, the superintendant of the prince's laundry wraps a napkin, dipped in rice-water, round his hand ; and having tied a cord or ribband about it, the prince puts his seal upon it. Three days after, the napkin is taken off ; and, if any mark of the hot iron appears on his hand, he is deemed perjured, and punished accordingly ^d. In other places, the accused is obliged to put his bare head into a pot of boiling oil ; and if any blister appears, the party is found guilty. Our author had been credibly informed, both by English and Dutch gentlemen, as well as natives, who had seen such trials, that the innocent person had not been in the least affected with the scalding oil (B) ; in which case, the punishment due to the crime is inflicted on the accuser ^e.

THE prince in person always pronounces sentence ; from whence there lies no appeal : and b if the criminal be condemned to death, he is forthwith led out of the palace, and executed Sentence and punishment. without delay. As the Indians of these parts look upon it the most glorious action they can do to obey their prince without reserve, they have no occasion for common executioners ; the Nayers belonging to the guards being the most forward to do that office. Nay, if the crime be very heinous, it is common for the next kindred of the criminal to strive who shall give him the fatal blow ; to wipe-off, as they say, the stain which he has brought on the family. Their usual way of putting to death is by running a lance through the criminal's body : after which they cut it into quarters, and hang them upon trees ^f.

THEY have a good way of arresting people for debt. An officer is sent with a small stick Recovery of debts. from a judge, who is commonly a Bramman ; and when he finds the debtor, he draws a circle round him with that stick ; charging him, in the name of the king and judge, not to stir out of it till the creditor is satisfied, either by payment or surety : and it is no less than death for the debtor to break prison by going out of the circle.

THE Malabârs make no use of pens, ink, and paper ; but write on leaves of flags or reeds, Write on leaves. which grow in morasses. They are generally about eighteen inches long, and one and a half broad, tapering at the extremities ; having a small hole at one end for a string to pass through. This leaf is thicker than our royal paper, and very tough. They write with the point of a bodkin, or style ; holding the leaf athwart their left thumb-end, over the foremost finger. The impression does not pierce above half way through ; and on two or three of such leaves they will write as much as we can on a sheet of small paper. All their records are written in d the same manner. After the leaves have been strung, and rolled up in a scroll, they are hung for some time in smoke, and then locked up in their cabinets. Our author saw some such smoke-dried leaves ; which they told him were above 1000 years old ^g. The Malabâr language is spoken not only in the country to the west of Cape Komori, and in the Maldivé islands, but also in those to the eastward of it ; viz. Madûra, Tanjaor, and Karnâta, as far as the mountains near Ponganowr, in that kingdom ; in which parts it is called the Tamul, or Damul language.

THE arms of the Malabârs are the lance, simeter, the bow, and musket ; at all which they Their arms, are exceeding dexterous. Their muskets are very light, though six feet long. In giving fire, they lay the butt-end of their piece to the cheek, not the shoulder ; and are excellent marksmen.
e Their bows are six feet long, and their arrows three, which they carry in their hands, and not in a quiver, as at Surât ; and are masters of it to such a degree, that Dellon has frequently seen them shoot one arrow into the air, and hit it with a second. Besides these arms, they have fastened to their sides, with an iron hook, a large bayonet, about six inches broad, and a foot and a half long ; which they use in close engagements. They who wear simeters, make use of and exercise. bucklers. All carry their arms naked, which are very bright, without scabbards, or other covers. They train their children to the bow, from the time they are able to walk ; and in each kingdom there are academies maintained at the prince's charge, where the youth are instructed at their weapons ; who often perform their exercises before the king, or others of eminent rank. Some, who have an opinion of their own skill, at certain times invite persons of quality to be f judges of their ability, in feats of arms ; when the prize is given to such as acquit themselves best. On these occasions, being animated by a double motive, of honour and interest, they attack one another with so much vigour, that it commonly costs the lives of several young fellows.

If there happens to be a family-quarrel among the Nayers, they choose one or more of their meanest vassals to decide it ; who, armed with certain knives, or bayonets invented for the Single combat. purpose, fight naked before the king and his whole court, till one of them is slain ; which terminates the dispute.

^d DELLON, p. 100.
supr. p. 318, & seq.

^e HAMILTON, p. 315.

^f DELLON, p. 101.

^g HAMILTON, ubi

(B) That is, they supposed such to be innocent. But nothing can excuse the superstition, as well as stupidity, of this barbarous custom ; which not long since prevailed among ourselves, and still subsists in the countries of our enlightened neighbours, where confessions are forced by torture, and witches are tried by throwing them into water, bound hand and feet. They must reform these, and many others as irrational customs, before they have a right to reproach the Indians.

Their wars.

THEY march without order, and fight without discipline. When they do go to war, it is barely out of a point of honour; or, at most, for a little pillage: it being a custom, generally agreed on among the Malabâr princes, to restore, as soon as peace is concluded, all that was taken on any side during hostilities^h.

Commerce.

VERY few of the Malabâr Hindûs, especially the Nayers, apply themselves to commerce; which is the reason that most of the commodities, either imported or exported, pass thro' the hands of strangers; that is, the Mohammedans. These have for many ages settled in the country for sake of trade; chiefly on the sea-coast, near the mouths of the rivers, for the convenience of foreign merchants; who are for the most part Europeans.

Mohammedans settled there:

THESE Mohammedans, living among the Malabârs, are obliged to accommodate themselves in all respects to their laws and customs, which are not directly opposite to their religion. They are distinguished from the Hindûs only by their beards, turbâns, and vests: but, according to Dellon, are a vile and treacherous sort of people. Besides, many of them live by piracy; and these are more ignorant and barbarous than the rest: for they attack all they meet, without any respect to religion or nation, sparing friends no more than foes. Nor have they the least regard to passes, although given by such lords or princes as they stand in awe of. Indeed piracy is looked upon as a free exercise in those parts; and the kings take no cognizance of what is transacted on the open sea; which they consider as out of their jurisdiction. The rather, as they have an interest in such robberies; those corsairs paying the tenth of what booty they take, to the prince under whom they live.

great pirates:

THEIR vessels, called paros, are shaped like galleys, and generally carry five or six hundred men; running with them all along the Indian coast, even as far as the Red Sea (or Arabic gulf). They very rarely attack European ships; especially if of any defence: and when they do take any, it is commonly by surprize, not force. They strip all of their goods, but seldom make slaves of Mohammedans or Pagans, unless they be persons from whom they expect an extraordinary ransom. But they detain all Christians; who are sure to die in captivity, unless they are ransomed, or turn Mussulmans. In this last case, they are much respected, and commonly made captains of their paros. At their first going abroad with one of these vessels, they resolve to sprinkle it with the blood of the first Christian they happen to take: but of all Europeans, the Portugueses are most liable to feel the marks of their cruelty. For this reason, they are declared enemies to those rovers; and when they take any, carry them generally to Goa, where they are chained to the oar, or sent in irons to the powder-house, from whence there is seldom any redemption: for these pirates seldom offer to redeem any but captains of their paros; and the Portugueses, to requite their cruelties, rather choose to let them die in bondage than release themⁱ. What our author relates of the cruelty of the Mohammedans to the Spaniards may possibly be strictly true: but he ought at the same time to have acquainted his readers, that the horrible cruelties exercised by the Spaniards upon the Mohammedans, especially on their first settling in the Indies, is the cause of it.

cruel to Christians.Pagodis,

THE pagods, or temples of the Pagans, are without the cities; though some of the richer fort have them in their houses. They are commonly large, and very magnificent; being generally covered with copper, and sometimes with silver. Each has a basin near it, for the people to wash in, before they approach their images; and entertains a number of Brâmmans, according to the largeness of its revenues. Every day, a certain quantity of rice is allowed, as well for the use of the poor who live near it, as of strangers of all religions, who pass that way; and are entertained in certain barracks, without the pagod (for they must not enter it); where they may sleep, if night surprizes them in their journey. Besides the ordinary revenues, must be reckoned the daily offerings of the people; which consist usually of eatables, seldom of money. These are delivered to the Brâmmans, to set before their images; who devour them, in the belief of the people: but, in truth, the priests make use of them for the maintenance of their families.

and church-lands:

SOME of the richest temples have large territories belonging to them, from whence arise their revenues. These church-lands are held so sacred, that if any person happens to shed blood upon them, though under the greatest necessity, and in his own defence, he is punished with death, without regard to his merit or quality. Nay they are so rigorous in this respect, that if the offender escapes by flight, the next a-kin to him must suffer in his stead; of which our author saw an instance^k.

Objects of worship.

THE Hindûs not only worship many images, which have no resemblance to any thing in the world, but they adore several kinds of living creatures, and above all the sun and moon. All days are alike to them (as to worship); and the sacrifices, which they make to their gods, consist always, like their offerings, of things that are inanimate: nor are their altars ever stained with blood, the shedding of which they hold in the greatest abhorrence of all things. As at the appearance of the new moon they make great rejoicings; so, when she is eclipsed, they

^h DELLON, ubi supr. p. 112, & seqq.ⁱ Ibid. p. 115.^k Ibid. p. 52, 108, & seqq.

- a come forth of their houses, making most horrible outcries, to frighten away the dragon; who, as they say, is then endeavouring to devour her. They approach their kings with the same veneration as they do their gods; and reverence old-age in so high a degree, that the most eminent of the Nayers will not sit down before those who are considerably older than themselves, although their enemies.

THEY reckon their time by the moon; yet their festivals are not fixed, but depend on the will of the Brâmmans. These priests are very exact in their fasts; and upon any solemn day, after notice given, bring forth the image out of the temple, and carry it in procession on an elephant richly harnessed, while the people prostrate themselves before it as it passes along; and the Nayers, with fans at the ends of long canes, drive away the flies, which would otherwise, as the Brâmmans say, be troublesome to their gods, or rather themselves. Then one of the Brâmmans, holding a two-edged simeter, with some little bells at the handle, runs round the elephant; and after a thousand ridiculous postures, which are looked upon by the people as mysterious, wounds himself in the head, offering his blood as a sacrifice to the image. Mean time, the croud make a confused noise with divers instruments, mixed with their joyful acclamations. In short, after they have taken their appointed rounds for that day's solemnity, they carry the image back to the temple¹.

¹ DELLON, p. 52, III.

C H A P. VII.

Description of the remaining countries of the Peninsula.

S E C T. I.

Kingdom of Madûra, or Madûrey.

- a AT Cape Komori, commonly called Komorin, begins the kingdom of Madûra, or rather Madûrey. It is bounded on the east by the dominions of the king of Tanjaor; on the south by the Indian sea; west, by the country of Malabâr (from whence it is severed by the mountains of Gâtti, or Gâte); and north, by the territories of Mayssûr (or Messûr), and those belonging to the governor of Jinî. This kingdom is as large as Portugal, extending about three degrees and a half from south to north; and is in breadth about eighty miles, where most dilated. It is reckoned to contain seventy Palleakarens, who are absolute lords in their respective states; but pay a tax which the king of Madûra lays upon them. This prince may easily bring into the field 20,000 foot and 5000 horse. He has besides 500 elephants; which are of great service to him in war.

- b THE capital of the kingdom, which lies about two degrees more north than the cape, and bears the same name of Madûrey, is inclosed with a double wall; each fortified, after the antient manner, with square towers, having parapets, and well furnished with cannon. The fortress is square, surrounded with a broad and deep foss, whose scarp and counterscarp are both very strong. Instead of the glacis, one sees four handsome streets, which answer to the four sides of the fortress; whose houses are accommodated with large gardens. The inside of the fortress, which one may walk round in less than two hours, is divided into four parts; of which those to the east and south contain the king's palace; which is a labyrinth of streets, ponds, groves, halls, galleries, and colonades, intermixed with houses here and there. When the kings of Madûra resided there, it was filled wholly with women and eunuchs. The plan of this palace is said to have been made by an European; and indeed there are several ornaments of European architecture mixed with the Indiân^a.

- In the second part of the fortress stands the temple of Shokanaden, who is the idol adored at Madûra, surrounded with a triple wall; the whole magnificently built: and near one of the porticos a stately car, for parading the image on its festival day. Not far distant are three other triumphal cars: one of which is so very large, that it may require 4000 men to draw it, as they say it does; for at these times no fewer than 400 men, of different functions, are placed upon it; and there are five stages, or stories, sustained by great posts, each stage having several galleries. When this machine is covered with painted calicoes, silks of different colours, streamers, banners, festoons, and such-like ornaments, it makes a very agreeable spectacle; especially if seen in a dark night, by the light of a thousand torches. The car is drawn under the sound of drums, trumpets, hautboys, and other instruments; and moves so slowly, that they are three days going round the fortrefs. a Court removed to THE Romish missionaries have a church here. The river which passes by Madûra, and is called Vaygbey, is a very good one: but they have drained it considerably by canals and ponds. The city likewise has lost much of its antient splendor, since it was ruined in part by the king of Messur, and the latter kings transferred their court to Trishirapâlli; which is thus become the capital of the kingdom ^b.

^a BOUCHET, ap. Lettr. Edif. tom. xv. p. 60, & seqq.

Trishirapâlli city, TRISHIRAPALLI is a very populous city, and of great extent: it contains above 300,000 inhabitants; and is the largest fortrefs between Cape Komori and Golkonda. They reckon it forty leagues distant from Madûrey (A), on account of the way one is obliged to go about to avoid the woods; which are infested with robbers: but, to make amends, your road lies through an agreeable walk, set with trees on both sides ^c. It has been often besieged by numerous armies, without success; so that the Hindûs say it is impregnable. It has a double inclosure of walls; each fortified with sixty square towers, eighty or a hundred paces asunder: the second wall, which is higher than the first, is mounted with 130 pieces of cannon, and divided into two fortresses, called the fortrefs of the north and of the south. In this latter is a high mountain, which serves to discover the approach of an enemy. Towards the middle of the hill stands the arsenal, and at the foot of it the king's palace. The inside of the interior fortrefs is agreeable enough. It is a great square amphitheatre, with stairs on every side to go up to the ramparts. Besides the above-mentioned towers on the walls, there are eighteen others much larger, for laying up provisions and military stores, for which there is not room in the arsenal. The garrison consists of 6000 men, and sometimes more. c

River-Kâwêri. THE ditch, which surrounds the fortrefs, is wide and deep; is full of water, and has some crocodiles in it. The city has four large gates, which face the four cardinal points. Every night the guards go the rounds three times, and sometimes four. The river Kâwêri, which is a branch of the *Kolorân, washes the fortrefs from west to east; and above Trishirapâlli they have cut from it a large and deep canal, which conveys the water round the city, where one sees many public squares and bazârs: among which there are two considerable ones adjoining to the two principal gates. Beyond the Kaveri runs another branch of the Kolorân; and between these two great rivers stands the pagod of Shirangam, the fairest which our author had ever seen. d

The king's palace. THE palace of Trishirapâlli is not inferior for beauty to that of Madûrey. Our author, who had been within it on three several occasions, says it consists in a collection of halls, galleries, and inner apartments. The divân, or court of justice, is supported by fine pillars, very high, contrary to the custom of the Indians. The gardens are not comparable to those of Europe. There are in them four or five jets of water; and at the entrance of one, a large hall, open on all sides, and surrounded with pretty deep ditches, which are filled with water when the queen goes there to take the air: on those occasions also the pillars of the hall are covered with gold-brocade, and the ceiling with festoons of flowers, and pieces of silk-damask. The Romish missionaries have some churches in the city; and another three leagues off, where they reside for more security. e

Fishery coast. To the kingdom of Madûrey belongs most of the Fishery Coast for pearls; which begins at Cape Komori, and ends at the promontory of Koil, in the principality of Marava. On this coast there are several places in the kingdom of Madûrey; the chief of which are two, Manupâr and Tutukurîn. The first lies about the middle of the coast, where the Dutch have a factory; which stands on a high ground, about a mile from the sea. It was formerly a beautiful Romish church; but afterwards the Hollanders converted it to another use. Tutukurîn (or Tutekarîn), is the principal if not only city on the Fishery Coast, the rest being no better than large towns and villages (B). At a distance one would take it for a place filled with magnificent houses: but, although it be well peopled, it is in nothing superior to the other cities of India. The Dutch, to whom it belongs, have built there a small fortrefs ^d. It stands at the mouth of the river Perie Arrû; where there is a good safe harbour, made by some islands which lie off it (C). The country produces much cotton-cloth, but none fine. This colony superintends a pearl-fishery, that lies a little to the northward, and brings the Dutch company 20,000 pounds yearly tribute, according to report ^e. They are bred in oysters (D), of a very large size; f

^b BOUCHET, ubi sup. p. 65, & seqq.

^c Ibid. p. 74:

Ibid. p. 69, & seqq.

^e HAMILTON, p. 336.

(A) It lies about one degree more north than Madûrey, and sustained several sieges in the late wars, begun in 1740. Its indigenous name is Tiru-chira-pâlli, or Tiru-china-pâlli.

* Others make the Kolorân, or Kolb râm, a branch of the Kâwêri, or Kaveri, which is a holy river, and disputes precedence with the Ganges.

(B) Tutukurîn itself is considered by some travellers only as a village, the chief of seven others, which are sea-ports on that coast, and belonging to the Dutch. See Nieuhoff & Baldeus. Yet the Jesuit Martin, who was in these parts in 1700, says it has 50,000 inhabitants. See Lettr. Edif. tom. v. p. 81.

(C) Nieuhoff says, it never rains here, but 'tis pestered sometimes with sand from the mountain Gâtû.

(D) These oysters live six years.

a some in the flesh, which is rank, yet eaten; others in the liquor; and some fixed to the shell. They yield from five to eight; but all have not pearls in them. They are sized by sifting. Seed-pearl is found in the sand. Sea-horns, or flankos (chankos), are found on this coast; of which they make bracelets all over the Indies. The divers, made use of in the pearl-fishery, are the Parias, or Parvas; who by use stay a long time under water to gather the oysters.

THE coast of Madura is destitute of grass, herb, or plant; excepting thistles and houseleek: The soil bad. nor will cocoa-trees grow there; yet it abounds with hares and partridges. Here are mice as large as cats, who dare not attack them. This country was part of Bisnâgar, or Narsinga, from which the Naik, who was governor, revolted. The inhabitants are by some called Badagas (E); good soldiers, but inferior to the Malabârs^f.

^f NIEUHOFF'S Voy. ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. ii. p. 260.

(E) The Badagas are the proper inhabitants of Karnâta, formerly Bisnâgar; of which Madura, Tanjaor, and the other countries to the south of it, were a part.

S E C T. II.

Principality of Marava.

a TO the east of Madûrey lies the kingdom, or principality, of Marava, or the Maravas. Marava. It has to the south and east the sea, and to the north Tanjaor. The capital city, where the prince resides, is at Ramanadaburam, six or seven miles from the eastern coast, and twenty from the promontory of Koyel, or Koil, the most south-eastern part of Marava; which makes an oblong square, about eighty miles in length from south to north, and forty in breadth from east to west.

THE point of Koyel bounds the coast of the fishery eastward, and begins that of Choromandel. Due east about three quarters of a mile, is an isle named by some Ramanankor; by others Râmana Koyel; which signifies the temple of Râmma, or Râma. This isle is joined to the point by a bridge, not composed of arches, but of rocks, or great stones, which rise b two or three feet above the surface of the sea, which is very shallow in that place, and leave Adam's gaps for the current to pass through. They are of an enormous size. Our author measured bridge. some stones, which were eighteen feet diameter, and others more. They leave spaces between them from three to ten feet wide: and the gaps, or intervals, through which barks pass are still wider. It is not easy to imagine, that this is a work of art; for one cannot conceive from whence such enormous masses could be taken, and still less how they could be brought hither. But, supposing it to be a work of nature, it is one of the most surprising our author ever beheld. The Hindûs say, it was built by their gods, when they went to attack the capital of the island of Seylan. But this is certain, that the prince of Marava (F), when pursued by the kings of Madûrey, used to retire into the isle, by means of great beams laid upon those rocks, which are so many platforms; over which he passed his army, with all his train of cannon and c elephants^g.

THE isle of Râmmâna Koyel abounds with cattle; yet is not very fertile. The temple, Râmana or pagod, whence the island takes its name, stands near the sea-side, and is said to contain an Koyel. immense treasure. The foundation is supported by stones of a vast bigness, and break the force of the raging waves when the south winds blow. The Teuver, or lord of the isle, has built a strong castle facing the continent, furnished with cannon, which command a narrow passage, leading to Manaar, Jafnapatnam, and Negapatnam. Besides, he might at pleasure hinder the navigation, by only sinking a few stones in the chanel.

FROM this is continued a reef of rocks and sands, commonly called Adam's Bridge; which d extends as far as the island of Manaar, on the coast of Zeloan (or Seylon). This reef has so little water on it, that the smallest boats cannot pass but at Manaar; and there the chanel has not above six feet water on it, so that none but small vessels can pass: besides they must unlade, and pay customs to the Dutch; then, the vessel being hawled over the bridge, they take in their cargo again^h. Reef of rocks.

^g BOUCHET, ubi supr. p. 34, & seqq.
HAMILTON, ubi supr. p. 337.

^h BALDÆUS, ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 584.

(F) He has lately shook off the yoke of Madûra, according to Martin the missionary. See Lett. Edif. tom. v. p. 99.

S E C T. III.

Kingdom of Tanjaor.

THE kingdom of Tanjaor (G) lies to the north of Marava, and to the east of Madûrey, being washed on the east by the sea. The lands of this little state are the wonder of all the southern India, and watered by the river Kaveri; which, being a branch of the great Kolorân, divides in several arms. The prince's revenues amount to several millions. Tanjaor, which is the capital city, was originally no more than a pagod, or temple, as were most of the fortresses in these petty sovereignties. This fortress has a double wall, like that of Trishirapalli: but is not so well built. Its ditches also are shallower, and not so easily filled with water. The inner fortress is divided into north and south; in the first of which is the king's palace, with some pretty towers, but no appearance of magnificence. In the southern part is the temple of Peria Oureyar; to the north of which is a great pond, or tank, bordered with free-stone. The Indians excel in making these ponds, which would be admired in Europe itself. The country about Tanjaor is watered only by a small rivulet; but farther north you meet with the river Vinarrow; and beyond that the Kaveri before mentioned.

Negapatam. THE coast of Tanjaor, parting from that of Marrava, takes a sweep from south to east, for one half of its extent to Cape Kalliamera, or Kallamedou; from whence it runs north: and six leagues beyond it lies Negapatam, which the Indians call Negapatenam; that is, *the city of serpents*¹. It is a Dutch colony and fortress, taken from the Portugueses by the assistance of the king of Tanjaor. It stands on the river Waddawarrû, which terminates Golkonda, and formerly bounded the dominions of Malabâr; although their language was, and still is, used farther northward (H). However, the waters of this river, which is a branch of the Kâwêri, and washes the walls of the fort, being found very unwholesome, the town is supplied from another four leagues distant. This colony produces very little, besides tobacco and long cloth^k.

Trankebar: THE next place of note on this coast to the north is Taranganbouri, called by Europeans Tranquebar and Trinquebar. The name signifies the city of the waves of the sea. It is at the mouth of the Kâwêri. This is a colony belonging to the Danes since 1620. The streets are strait, and the houses handsome. The square fortress, called Danesburgh, appears very agreeable when viewed from the sea. A great number of Portugueses are settled here; and to them the Danes owe the preservation of the fort, when it was besieged some years ago (I) by the king of Tanjaor, who was constrained to retire¹. This fort is strong, the sea washing one half of its walls; but the colony is miserably poor. In 1684, they were so distressed, that they pawned three bastions of their fort to the Dutch for money to buy provisions: but next year they redeemed all again by an unknown fund (K). They still keep their fort, but drive an inconsiderable trade. What they live by is the hire which they freight their ships for to certain parts of the Indies. The product of the country is cloth, white and dyed. The Danish missionaries reside here^m. Half a day's journey farther north is Kaveri Pattevam, called by Europeans Kaveri pattam, which was formerly a great city, and very famous among the Indians; but at present lies almost wholly in ruins. The air is good, and the French have a factory thereⁿ.

^a Danish colony.

Kaveri pattevam.

¹ BOUCHET, ubi sup. p. 32, 74, & seqq.
ubi sup. p. 30.

^k HAMILTON, ubi sup. p. 348, 351.
^m HAMILTON, ubi sup. p. 351.

¹ BOUCHET, ubi sup. p. 32.
ⁿ BOUCHET, ubi sup. p. 32.

(G) By the Dutch called Tanjower, Tanjouwer, and sometimes Teaver, according to Nieuboff.

(H) Hence it is that in letters of the natives, sent from Tranquebar in this country, by the Danish missionaries, they call themselves Malabars, and the country Malabâr.

(I) This was written in 1719.

(K) It was suspected that the English ship Formosa was taken and sunk by two of their ships, which at that time cruised between Surât and Cape Komori.

S E C T. IV.

Kingdom of Karnâta.

TO the north of Tanjaor lies the kingdom of Karnâta (L), Karnâtika, or Kârâtek, as the Mogols call it; which was formerly a monarchy of great extent, as well as splendor, under the names of Bisnâgar and Narsinga^o. At present it is reduced to much narrower bounds

Kingdom of Karnâta:

^o See before p. 138.

(L) We are told, that it takes its name from a famous fortress called Karnâta, situated on a mountain three leagues from Attipakam, a town or village, about 27 leagues almost due west of Pondicherri (on the coast of a bounds, though still of considerable dimensions; and is become a province of the Great Mogol's empire. It is bounded on the east by the bay of Bengál; on the north by the river Krishna, which divides it from Golkonda; on the west by Visapúr, or Visapúr; and on the south by the kingdoms of Messúr and Tanjaor: being in length, from south to north, about 345 miles; and 276 miles in breadth, from east to west (M).

THIS large country is for the most part champain, fertile, and populous. Towards the middle there are some mountains running northward, which seem to be branches of the Gátti, or Gáte. The inhabitants are called Badagas. To the east and south of those mountains, the Tamúl, or Damul, language (the same with the Malabáric) is spoken; and to the west and north-west of those hills, nothing is in use but the Talank (Talenga), or Kanarín^p; which prevails in Visapúr, and from Malabár to Surát, and the provinces between that city and Golkonda. inhabitants called Badagas :

AN account has been already given of the revolutions in this kingdom, so low as the year 1650, when the monarchy was subverted, and the kingdom over-run by the kings of Golkonda and Visapúr; who divided it between them. The descendants of the Râjah, who then reigned, retired to the mountains above-mentioned; and seem to have preserved some kind of sovereignty in the most southern parts: for at one time we find Velour^a the capital of Karnate; and at another time Kanjivoram, about forty miles east by south of the former; the Râjab, or king, removing his court, as pressed by those who were in possession of almost all the country. About the years 1685 and 1687, the Mogols seized on all which was in the hands of the two kings before-mentioned; and since then have not only reduced the whole in a manner under their power, but are advancing still southwards: with design to subdue the lands as far as Cape Komori, containing Messúr, Madúrey, Tanjaor, and Marava; which formerly belonged to Bisnâgar and Karnâta. possessed by the Mogols,

HOWEVER, a great number of the princes of Karnâta, called Palliagarens, still retain their possessions; either by not being conquered, or by becoming tributary to the Mogols, like the Râjahs of Hindústân. So that the whole may be divided into paliagaren, or little principalities; whose Naiks, or princes, are all sovereigns in their respective dominions; tho' many of them are dependant on the Great Mogol, as lord in effect of the whole. and certain princes.

WHAT little we know of this county in its present state is owing to the French Jesuits; who, in their late missions, have penetrated into the middle of it, and transmitted a map, which gives a quite different idea of that region, from what we find before from others.

KARNATA is full of large and populous cities. The first we meet with towards the south is Jinji, not many years since the capital of a kingdom of the same name. It stands about twelve leagues north-west of Ponticherri, on the coast of Choromandel. Chief cities

ABOUT five leagues north-west of Jinji is Shettam pettou, at present the metropolis of all Jinji: Karnâta, and seat of the Nabob, or viceroy of the Great Mogol, in the latitude of about 12 degrees 30 minutes. The capital of this country was Kanjivoram, or Kanjibouram, a noble city, four leagues distant from the river Palamalerow, eighteen leagues north-eastward of Shettam pettou, and one day's journey from Meliapúr. It contained within its walls more than 300,000 inhabitants, if one may believe the Indians; and there were to be seen, as elsewhere, towers of a very large size, temples, public halls, and very handsome tanks. But the Mogols having, about the beginning of this century, taken it from the Hindús, they laid it almost in ruins, and made the other place the chief seat of their conquest; which afterwards they removed to Arkat, the present capital, about thirteen leagues distant to the north by west. Shettam pettou, the capital:

PROCEEDING still northward from Shettam pettou, about nine leagues, you meet with Arani, a large city on the river Karva, or Karvey, subject to a Palli-agars (†); and four leagues farther Arkat, another, on the river Palaru, or Palamalerow, subject to the Mogols, under the government of a Nabob. Arani Arkat:

FIVE leagues west of Arkat, on the same river, you find Velour, another great city, the Indian capital of Karnata (N), before it was removed to Kanjibouram; but now in the hands of the Mogols, and seat also of a Nabob. It is the last place which continued in the hands of the Marasts (or Maharattas), being taken from them by the Mogols in 1702, after a siege of several months^a. Velour city.

ABOUT twelve leagues north-east-by-north of Velour, and twenty-two west-north-west of Tiroupati Fort St. George, is Tiroupati, Troupadi, or Tripeti, a city on a hill, with a famous pagod. mous pagod.

^p P. MAUDIT, Lett. Edif. tom. vi. p. 41. See before, p. 138, & seqq. Collect. Voy. vol. iii. p. 588.

^r BOUCHET, ubi supr. p. 78, & seqq.

^a BALLÆUS, ap. Church.

^s P. TACHARD, ap.

of Choromandel), near the borders of Messúr. See Lettr. Edif. tom. xxiv. p. 187, & seqq.

(M) Baldæus says, Karnatika is 60 Badagarian leagues, each equal to three Dutch miles, from north to south; and 40 broad from Paliakatta to the Malabar coast. Churchill's Collect. Voy. vol. iii. p. 588.

† Palli-agars, or angurs; whence the word Angur seems to be derived.

(N) It was the capital of Karnata about the year 1650. when it was subdued by the king of Visapúr. See Tavernier's Trav. part iii. p. 92.

Chandegri, the capital of Karnâta, or Bisnâgar, about the year 1590, was in being within a three miles to the north, or north-west, of this place, as already observed ¹.

Koralam. ABOUT twenty-five leagues west by north of Velour stands Koralam, or Koralam, a great city of the Mogols: between the two lie several others, as Pallikonda, Goulialam, Jedudourgalow, Kadapanatam, and Moula-Vakili, to the north, under the same masters; and to the southward Peddanajam dourgam, and Venkatigbirri, in the hands of Palliagars, or Hindû princes.

Kangondi. STILL more to the south, near the borders of Messûr, are Kangondi, Kapiganati, and Ani Kallow, Palliagars likewise; and farther west, Bengoulourow, a great city about twelve leagues south-west of Koralam, before-mentioned: and eleven leagues to the north-west of this last place stands Chinnaballabaram, another.

Shirpi. ABOUT twenty-five leagues west-north-west of Chinnaballabaram lies Shirpi, a considerable city, the most westward of Karnâta on that side; and not many leagues from the borders of the territories of Ikkeri, adjoining to Kanâra, on the western coast of the peninsula.

Penougonda. TWENTY leagues north-east of Shirpi, and as many north-north-west of Chinnaballabaram, is Pennakonda, or Pennagonda, on the river Pennerow, formerly the capital of the empire of Bisnâgar; whither the Great Râjah removed his residence, after the ruin of the capital of that name by the kings of Visapûr and Golkonda, in the year 1565. It is now in the hands of the Mogols.

Gummi Paleam, Kapada. TWELVE leagues north-east of Chinnaballabaram is Gummi Paleam, a very considerable city, the seat of a Palli-agar; and twenty-two leagues more from Gummi Paleam, in the same direction, occurs Kadapa, a great city, with a Mogol governor.

Gandikotta city, and strong fortrefs. THIS city lies within a few leagues of the river Pen-arû; which passes by Nellarû, and falls into the gulf of Bengâl, 10 miles beyond Gangapatnam. Higher up, on the same river, about 16 leagues north-west of Kadapa, stands Gandikotta, a considerable city and famous fortress, in the latitude of fifteen degrees. It is the seat of a Nabob, and was taken by Amîr Jemla, the king of Golkonda's general, from the Hindûs, in the year 1652. Tavernier, who arrived there eight days after it was taken, informs us, that it is situated on the point of a high mountain; there being but one ascent, in some places not above seven or eight feet wide, cut out of the hill, which has on the right hand a most hideous precipice, at the bottom whereof runs a vast river. On the top there is a plain about half a league long and one quarter broad, sowed with rice and millet, as well as watered with many little springs. The top of the plain, on the south side, where the city is built, is encompassed with precipices; two rivers running at the bottom, which form the point (O); so that there is but one gate to enter the city from the plain; and that too fortified with three good walls of free-stone: besides moats, paved at the bottom with the same materials. Thus the Hindûs had only one quarter of the city, containing 500 paces, to defend. Yet they had no more than two iron guns; one, a twelve pounder, planted on the gate; the other, an eight pounder, on a kind of bastion. For all this, the Nabob could not have taken the place, but for the assistance of some European engineers, who mounted four pieces of cannon upon an ascent; which obliged the Râjah, though famous for his courage and experience, to capitulate, after a siege of three months ².

Tadimeri, Anantapouram. TWELVE leagues south-west of Gandi Kotta, and twenty-two almost due north of Gummi Paleam, you meet with Tadimeri, a great city, belonging to a Palli-agar; and eight leagues from thence, north-west by north, another, called Anantapouram, on a river which falls into the Pen-arû.

Raydourgan, Ranibeddalourou. To the west of Anantapouram eighteen leagues, stands Raydourgan, the seat of a Palli-agar, on a river which falls into the Krishna, the utmost bounds of Karnâta northwards; and twenty-two leagues west of Raydourgan, is Ranibeddalourou, another great city, and Palli-agar, on the river Tunje-badra, which runs north-eastward into the Krishna. Gandi Kotta, Anantapouram, Raydourgan, and Ranibeddalourou, lie nearly in a line from east to west, and in fifteen degrees of latitude; this last being the most western city of Karnâta, of any considerable note, and not far from the borders of the countries of Ikkeri and Sonda; which last borders on the territories of Goa, belonging to the Portugueses.

Bisnâgar city. LASTLY, proceeding north-eastward from Ranibeddalourou about twenty-two leagues, and near the same distance from the Krishna, lies Bisnâgar, the antient capital of Karnâta, when in its splendor, then known by the names of Bisnâgar and Narsinga, as hath been already

¹ See before, p. 136.

² TAVERNIER'S Trav. part ii. p. 98.

(O) The junction of two rivers at Gandi Kotta is conformable to the map of the Jesuits; but, by the same map, that fortress must stand on the north, or north-west side of the plain, not on the south side; it being washed by the Peuerow on the north, and another river on the west. Neither can we reconcile its situation in the map with its distance from Golkonda, as given in leagues by Tavernier, who travelled the road. And yet we make no doubt, but Gandi Kotta is the same with his Gandika.

remarked.

a remarked, It is situated about forty leagues almost due east of Goa, eighteen north-west by north of Raydourgam, and three leagues west of the river Tunje-badre.

THESE are the principal inland cities of Karnâta, at least known to the Jesuit missionaries; but among them lie interspersed a great many others, partly in the hands of Palli-agars, or Palli-agarens, and partly in the possession of the Mogols. Having thus given our readers some idea of the inland parts of Karnâta, let us next give him a view of the sea coast, commonly called Choromandel; which the commerce of Europeans has made better known to us.

THE first place of note, which we meet with on this coast, is Porto Novo, so called by the Porto Novo. Portugueses, when the coast of India belonged to them. But when Aureng Zib subdued b Golkonda, the Great Mogol set a Fouzdâr in it, and gave it the name of Mohammed Bander (or Mohammed's (P) Port). The country is fertile, healthful, and pleasant. Great quantities of cotton-cloth of several sorts are made here, much of which is exported to foreign parts. The Portugueses are numerous here; but the bulk of the inhabitants are Hindûs. The English and Dutch have also some houses in this port *.

FORT ST. DAVID'S is next; a colony and fortress belonging to the English, who bought it Fort St. Da- from a Moratta (or Mâbarâtta) prince, in 1686, for 90,000 pagodas. The fort is pretty vid. strong, and stands close to a river; and the territories extend the distance of eight mile severly way. The country is like the former, and watered with several rivers; which are as good as walls to the colony. About 1698, the fort narrowly escaped being surprised by the free- c booters, who inhabited the neighbouring mountains, and got admittance under pretence of lodging the Mogol's treasure there: but they were all killed, before the ambush without could force open the gate. This colony produces store of long cloths; and without its assistance, that of Fort St. George, on which it depends, would make but a small figure in trade to what it does at present. The black cattle here are small, but plentiful and cheap; while the rivers and seas abound with fish *. Kuddelôr (or Koudelour, by the Hindûs called Kourralour) lies about a mile to the southward, on a river capable to receive ships of 200 tons *.

PONTICHERRI (or Pondicherri) is the next place of note; a colony settled by the French, Ponticherri. about five leagues to the north of Fort St. David. It is the chief establishment which they have in the Indies, and the head-quarters of their missionaries. The fortifications are fine, d regular, and strong; but its trade small. The city is large, and the streets strait. The houses of Europeans are of brick; the Indian of earth. About the year 1690, the Dutch, from Batavia, besieged and took it by capitulation; the French, at that time, being destitute of defence: but, at the conclusion of king William's war, they were obliged to restore it *.

AFTER Ponticherri follows Konnimîr, or Konjimîr, where the English had a factory; which Konnimîr they quitted on the purchase of Fort St. David. Near the town are seven pagods, famous for sanctity; and here the persecution began against St. Thomas, because he could draw a short tree to a great length (Q), as wire-drawers do metals; and the Pagan priests, being ignorant of such art, declared him a conjurer. Beyond Konjimîr is Saderas Patam (called also Sadras and Sadrats), a small factory of the Dutch for buying up cloth. It stands on the Saderas Pa- e south side of the river Palamalerow; and some leagues farther on lies Kabelon (or Kovolam), tam. where the Ostenders have settled a factory b.

THE next place northward, on the coast, is St. Thomas, called also Meliapour, or, to St. Thomas. speak like the Indians, Maylabouram, that is, the city of peacocks; because the princes, who formerly reigned in this country, had a peacock for their arms. The Portugueses, to secure themselves against the Dutch, surrendered it up to the king of Golkonda; but soon after (in 1672) the French, under M. De la Hay, took it: but, after two years, were obliged to surrender it for want of succours from Europe. That king, fearing the French might return and retake it, dismantled both the city and fortress. The Portugueses, however, still retain a part of it; which they have walled, and fortified with little bastions c.

f Two leagues off there are two hills: one is a little dry rock, called The Little Mount, with Ridiculous fa- a cave in it, where St. Thomas retired to hide himself from the priests his persecutors. There ble. being no water in the place, he cleft the rock with his hand, and commanded water to flow out: but when he saw the enemy, who had discovered his retreat, approaching the mount, he came down; and at the foot of it, as a testimony that he had been there, stamped with his bare foot on a very hard stone, and left the print of it. This impression is above sixteen inches long, and in proportion narrower at the heel, and broader at the toes, than the present size of feet among us. From hence he fled for his life to another large mount, about two

* HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 353. BOUCHET, ubi supr. p. 29. p. 356, and BOUCHET, p. 31.

* BOUCHET, ibid.

† HAMILT. p. 353, & seq.

‡ Ibid.

§ HAMILT. p. 357, & seq.

¶ BOUCHET, p. 21.

(P) It is called by the Hindûs Pirenki Patay.

(Q) They say that a lady, in her way to church, wanting to cross a river, which was so swollen that the tree, which served for a bridge, did not reach from side to side, St. Thomas stretched it out to give her passage.

miles distant; but, being overtaken on the top of it, was run through with a lance, and there a buried (R). The Portugueses, when first settled there, built a church over the cave and well on The Little Mount; and another over his grave on The Great Mount, where the lance, with which it is pretended the apostle was killed, is kept as a relique. The city of St. Thomas was formerly the best mart-town on the Choromandel coast: but at present the trade is very little, and the inhabitants very few, and poor, owing to the neighbourhood of Fort St. George, which is but one league distant to the north; a colony and city belonging to the English East-India company.

Madras, or Fort St.
George.

FORT ST. GEORGE is called also Madrās, and Madraspatan, from the city of that name, near which it is situated. The natives give it the appellation of Jenna Pattenam, or, as the English commonly pronounce it, Chinapatam. The town is divided into two parts, called the b White and Black Towns. In the former dwell the Europeans. It is walled quite round, with several bastions and bulwarks to defend it; so that it can only be attacked at the ends, the sea and river fortifying its sides. It is about 400 paces long, and 150 broad, divided into pretty regular streets, and Fort St. George standing in the centre. There are two churches in it; one for protestants, the other for Romish service. There is a good hospital, and mint for coining rupis and pagados, in the city; with a town-hall, and a prison for debtors underneath. They are a corporation, with a mayor and aldermen, formerly chosen by burghers; but, at present, by the governor and his council: which, according to our author, is the reason that every thing is carried as the governor would have it; who can annul all decisions in case of debt or otherwise, made by the court, which is properly a court of conscience d.

Bad situation. THE Black Town is inhabited by Jentows, Mohammedans, and Indian Christians; viz. Armenians and Portugueses, who have their respective churches; all religions being tolerated here. It is walled towards the land, the sides towards the sea and White Town being open. Madras is one of the most incommodious places our author ever saw. It fronts the sea, which rolls there more than in any other part on the coast of Choromandel. The foundation is in sand, with a salt-water river on its back, which hinders all fresh springs from coming near the town, within a mile; and, in the rainy season, causes inundations on one side, while the sea often threatens destruction on the other: again, from April to September, the sun is scorching hot; so that, but for the sea-breezes, the place could not possibly be inhabited. How so bad a situation could be chosen, when the founder had choice of two very good ones d in the neighbourhood, Kabelon (or Kovolam), above-mentioned, about six leagues to the south, and Polikat (or Pallikatta), nine to the north, seems unaccountable. However, the diamond-mines being no more than a week's journey from Fort St. George, these precious stones are pretty plenty here; although few large ones are brought to market, since the time that great diamond, which governor Pitt sent to England, was conveyed hither. Any one may dig at the mines, after agreeing with the Great Mogol's officer for a spot of ground; which is walled about, and sentinels placed round it. All stones above sixty grains weight belong to the emperor, and it is death to secret any of them.

Trade there. THE current trade of Fort St. George runs gradually slower; the trader meeting with great discouragements, and often oppressions (S). The colony produces very little of its own growth e or manufacture for foreign markets; which yet it supplies with foreign commodities, particularly from China, Persia, and Mokba; which commerce it shares with Surāt. The colony is well peopled, there being computed to be 80,000 inhabitants in the towns and villages; among whom may be reckoned four or five hundred Europeans. But, as their provisions are brought from other parts, any enemy, who is superior to them in sea forces, may easily distress them. This place was surpris'd by the French, in the year 1748; who first plundered, and then left it.

Palliakatti. THE next place of note to Fort St. George is Palliakatta, called also Paleakatta and Polikat by authors. This is a town belonging to the Dutch; who have a fort there named Guedria, with a few soldiers in garrison. There is another belonging to the Mogols. It was formerly f the principal factory which they had on the coast of Choromandel.

THERE are several places northward, which formerly had commerce abroad, but are now neglected. Armagan is one, and Kisnipatam another; which last has the benefit of a large

d HAMILTON's New Account of the E. Ind. vol. i. p. 358, & seqq.

e Ibid. p. 362, 370.

(R) Tachard, the Jesuit missionary (see Lett. Edif. tom. xii p. 273) adds many miracles to those mentioned by Mr. Hamilton. 'The effrontery of popish priests, in propagating such evidently lying wonders, would be astonishing, if the credulity of their sheep was not known to be as great as their clergy's knavery. Besides, nothing can be more absurd, than to suppose a man could work such miracles, and yet could not work one to save himself. Christ could have wrought a miracle to save himself, but would not: but Thomas, 'tis clear, would have saved himself, if he could have wrought a miracle.

(S) Captain Hamilton saw a bargain of wheat taken out of a gentleman's hands, after he had bought it by auction; and says, that they who bid for goods against the governor's servants, were brow beaten and threatened; so that many trading people were removed to other parts.

- a river: so has Karera beyond it. Lastly Petapoli, or Pettipoli, seated at one of the mouths of the river Krishna, had once both English and Dutch factories settled in it; but they withdrew many years ago, to avoid the impositions of the inland Râjahs. This place is the utmost bounds of the kingdom of Karnâta, upon the coast^c.

^c HAMILT. p. 372, & seq.

S E C T. V.

Principality of Ikkeri.

- b IT remains only to give some account of the dominions of Ikkeri and Mayssour; two coun-tries formerly belonging to Karnâta, and still to be considered as dismembered parts of it. Among the governors in Vidia Nâgar, corruptly Bisnagar, who after the great revolution in 1567, set up for sovereigns in their respective districts, he of Ikkeri, named Venktapa Nayeka, or Naïka, was one. This prince had been a minister of that monarch; and, as he was a good soldier, soon enlarged his territories by subduing some of his neighbours. After a defeat which he had given the Portugueses, the viceroy of Goa, in 1623, sent an ambassador, in the king's name, to cultivate friendship with him.
- THE country of Ikkeri extends, in length, from south to north about 130 miles, and in breadth 50. It adjoins, on the north, to the Sunda Râjah's territories; on the east it has Karnâta; on the south Mayssour; and on the west the country of Kanâra, from whence it is separated by the mountains of Gâtîi, or Gate^e. The chief city is named Ikkeri; lying about three leagues east of the same mountains, and ten from Batekâla, on the sea-coast. It stands on a fair plain, surrounded with three inclosures; the two outermost consist of very high canes, very thick, and close planted. They are a good defence against horse and foot; being hard to cut, and not in danger from fire: besides they afford much shade, as well as verdure, from the herbs which creep upon them. The inner inclosure is a wall, but weak and inconsiderable. Each inclosure has gates, with forts and ditches. Ikkeri is pretty large, but the houses are thin and ill built. It is mostly taken up with broad and long streets; some of them shaded with handsome trees, growing in ponds of water; of which there are many large ones: besides fields set full of trees like groves. So that from the mixture of houses, lakes, fields, and woods, it makes a very delightful prospect. The prince's palace is in a fortress of no small extent; containing several streets, with houses and shops. The language spoken in the country of Ikkeri is the Kanarî^h.

^e DELLA VALLE'S Trav. p. 93. Engl. Transl. of his Return.

^h Ibid. ubi supr. p. 120, 121, 144.

S E C T. VI.

Kingdom of Mayssour, and the Malleams.

- e THE kingdom of Mayssour (or Messûr) has to the north Ikkeri and Karnâta; to the east Karnâta; to the south Madûra; and to the west Malabûr. This dominion, of all those not yet subdued by the Mogols, is become most considerable, by the conquest of several fortresses from Madûra, and the other neighbouring states: insomuch that, since the year 1650, it has extended itself from the eleventh degree of latitude to the thirteenth, and beyond. The revenue of the prince is said to amount to near fifteen millions of livres; and he has on foot armies consisting of 30,000 foot, and 10,000 horse.

- THAT which has rendered the people of Mayssour so formidable to their neighbours, is the cruel and ignominious manner in which they treat their prisoners of war: for they cut-off their noses, and, salting them, send them to court (T). The officers and soldiers are rewarded according to the number of prisoners, whom they use in that inhuman manner.

SHIRANGAPATAM (U) is the capital of this kingdom. It stands in the northwest part of the country, on the river Kavéri, about fifty miles from its source, in the mountain of Gâtîi. The fortress resembles our antient cities, which were fortified with towers; and has a good ditch. The pagod is famous; but the king's palace has nothing remarkable.

ABOUT three leagues to the south of Shirangapatam is the city of Mayssura, which has given name to the kingdom. The country is full of towns and villages; especially along the

(T) Fryer says, they use an instrument made to seize on the noses of their enemies; which mutilations spoiling the fashion of their faces, few care to serve in a war against this Râjah. Fryer's Travels, p. 163.

(U) Fryer calls it Saranpatan. See his Travels, p. 163.

river Kavéri: but we meet with no considerable cities besides those already mentioned, excepting two; Darmapouri, towards the north-east, and Darabarou, in the south, on the borders of Madûra, and in the country of the Malleams, which makes the southern part of Mayffour, or *Messûr*ⁱ.

The Malleams:

THE Malleams have their dwellings properly in the high rocky mountains of Gittî, separating Mayffour from Malabâr; at the foot of which live the Christians of St. Thomas. They differ from other Malabârians chiefly in their complexion. They are honest, good-natured, charitable, and without deceit; courageous, ingenious, and of good understanding. There is a thing unknown to them; for they live with their doors open. They inhabit neither cities nor villages; but only certain inclosures in the valleys among the rocks. Their houses are built with canes, very low, and plaistered-up with clay. Some live in woods, building their houses in trees, for security against elephants and tigers. Their lands are fertile, but they do not cultivate any great quantity. The chief settlement, which they possess, is called Priatâ, thirteen or fourteen leagues from the borders of Madûra.

form of government:

THE Malleams are tributary, partly to the king of Turbula, and partly to him of Pagnati Perimal: yet are otherwise intirely free, being governed by their own laws, under captains, or judges, of their own nation, named Arley; each of which has five or six thousand under his jurisdiction. Every inclosure likewise has its own judge, named Pandera; to whom they pay strict obedience. Their arms are the same with those used by the Malabârs. The Malleams have but one wife at a time; and pay great respect to the sepulchres of their ancestors. Their dress is the same with the Malabârs; except on festivals they wear a long gown and turbân, like the Mohammedans. At these solemnities, the maidens play on rush pipes, small flutes, and drums. They wear jewels in their ears and noses.

many converted.

SINCE the year 1599, a great number of the Malleams have embraced the Romish religion; and a church was erected to St. Michael in the village of Priatâ. Before they had no temples but their houses, where they worshipped domestic gods. They pretend to converse with devils, only to know future events; but not to do mischief^k.

ⁱ BOUCHET, ap. Lettr. Edif. tom. 15, p. 79, & seqq.

^k NIKUMOF, ap. Church. Collect. vol. ii. p. 243.

C H A P. VIII.

The religion of the Hindûs.

S E C T. I.

Of their sacred books, with an abstract of the Shâster.

Hindû religion treated

HAVING now gone thro' the history and description of the countries inhabited by the people who are properly called Hindûs, we come, at length, to treat of their religion: which we reserved for this place, in regard the peninsula of India being more independent than Hindustân, it is there where their worship appears in its full light. But although so many travellers have visited these countries, and missions have been settled in every part of them, for so many years, yet nothing can well be conceived to be more imperfect and confused, than the accounts which authors have given of it. This is doubtless owing to two causes: first, the different opinions and objects of worship, which have been introduced by the Brâmmans in different parts of India; secondly, from Europeans taking their memoirs from what they observe themselves, or gather from the information of the natives, instead of having recourse to their sacred books; which may be presumed to contain some uniform and consistent system, whatever variations are to be found in the popular worship. In effect, the Hindûs, like almost all other nations, to derive authority to their own religion, and give it preference to those professed in other countries, affirm it is of divine original, and contained in a book called the Vedam, or Wedam (A): which they say was delivered to their law-giver, Brâmma, by the Deity himself.

confusedly by authors.

(A) Or Vedham, the dh being pronounced like the English th in this, that, and the like words.—Hence the Mogols pronounce Vedh: Europeans write variously, Ved, Bed, Bet, Beth, and the like. Beth, according to Bernier, signifies science; because they say all sciences are contained in the four books. Mem. Mogol. Emp. part iii. p. 145.

- a THIS sacred volume is divided into four parts, or books; the Rogo Vedam, Iffura Vedam, Sama Vedam, and Addera Vedam (B). Hence the Vedam is termed by the Hindûs the four books of the law^a. (1) The Rogo Vedam treats of the first cause, and the first matter; of angels; the soul; the reward of good men, and punishment of the wicked; of the generation of creatures, and their corruption; what sin is, and how it may be pardoned; by whom it is remitted, and upon what conditions it is done. (2) The Iffura Vedam treats of superiors, or governors, who are vested with the sovereign power and dominion. (3) The Sama Vedam, relates wholly to morality, inciting to the love of virtue, and hatred of vice and wickedness. (4) The Addera Vedam, treats of the ceremonies observed in the temples, in sacrifices and on festivals: but this last part has been, for a long time, lost (C). The Brâmmans say, that they have lost with it a great deal of their power and authority; and that if it was now in being, they would be in greater power and esteem than the kings themselves. We learn farther, with regard to this Vedam, or these four sacred books, that they seem to be only a collection of the superstitious practices of their ancient Risbi, or Mouni, that is, Penitents, and Anchorites; to which are joined their opinions concerning the nature of God, the soul, visible world^c, and so forth, as before-mentioned: that the first two books are followed most in the peninsula of India, and the two latter in the north, or Hindûstân^d: that they contain the theology of the Brâmmans^e; and are read solely by them; so that the Weinjas (or Beniyâns) must, in their prayers, make use of the words not of the Vedam, but of the Shâster; and the Soudra, or common people, must neither mention the Vedam, nor learn the Shâster^f.
- c AFTER all, these books are not read and explained in the pagods; not only because they contain mysteries surpassing the vulgar capacity, but also because the Brâmmish language cannot be translated into the Malabâric^g. Others say they are not understood by many of the Brâmmans themselves^h; and that they are scarce half understood by their ablest doctors. The reason is, that they are not written, as hath been reported, in the Samskroutam (or Sanskrit), which is the learned language known to the Brâmmans; but in a language still more ancient. So that the Samskroutam is only of use in explaining certain passages inserted in their books of theology, especially those taken from the latter books of the Vedam; which appears, from the difference of language and stile, to be written five centuries after the firstⁱ.
- d BESIDES the Vedam, there are two other sets of books; the first called Shâster, the second Pûrân; which the Brâmmans persuade the people came down also from heaven for their instruction^k. The Shâster (D) contains all the doctrines, and various ceremonies, found in the four books of the law; being properly the explanation and comment on the Vedam^l. We are told it was made to settle the sense of the Vedam, and prevent disputes^m; but do not find it has had that effect. As Shâster, or Shâstrum, signifies Science, we find books treating of other subjects, particularly philosophy and astronomy, under this title. It is permitted to the Chudrers (or Shudrers), priests of the Shudderî, or Baniyân sect, to read the Shâster; but they must not touch the Vedam, which is monopolized by the Brâmmans.
- e THE Pûrân, or Powrân (E), are the historical books of the law, and contain the explanation of the Shâster (F), together with the antient histories of the Hindûs, both sacred and profane. These are comprised in eighteen books; to which may be added, the twenty-four Agamangol, which are likewise historicalⁿ.

THIS is the account we have of the Pûrân, from the Malabûrs themselves. But we have grounds to believe, that they contain the history not only of their first kings, heroes, prophets,

^a ROGER MOEURS de Brammins, c. v. p. 35. ^b PHILLIPS'S Account of Malabar, p. 4. 11, 37. ^c PONS ap. Lett. Edif. tom. 26. p. 233, & seqq. ^d Ibid. ^e Ibid. ^f ROGER MOEURS des Bram. p. 36. ^g Danish Confer. p. 139. ^h CALMET, ap. Lett. Edif. tom. 21. p. 457. ⁱ Idem. ibid. tom. 24. p. 458, & seqq. ^k PHILL. Account of Malabar, p. 4. 40. ^l Ibid. p. 4. 10, 15, 40, 41, 43. ^m ROGER, ubi supr. p. 35. ⁿ PHILL. Account Malabar, p. 4. 15, 50.

(B) With Roger agrees Baldæus, another Dutch minister, both as to the order and contents of the books; but differs somewhat in the names, writing, 1. Roggo Vedam. 2. Jadlara Vedam. 3. Sama Vedam. 4. Fara Wana Vedam. This list is according to the Bramans; but by the Malabars they are named Ikka, Ikkisha, Saman, and Adarwan (1). Pons, a Romish missionary, writes Reukeu Vedam, called Rek bed in Hindûstân. 2. Tajour Vedam. 3. Sama Vedam. 4. Latharwana Vedam, or Brâhma Vedam (2). A Malabarian, in his letter to the Danish missionaries, places them in a different order; 1. Sama Vedum. 2. Urukku Vedum. 3. Edirwana Vedum. 4. Air Vedum. (3). Here Urukku Vedum is the same with the Rogo Vedum; and Air Vedum with the Iffoure Widum, of Roger; but, by some mistake, must be misplaced.

(C) Baldæus says, he could never be convinced that the fourth part was lost; yet elsewhere tells us, that the first part is wanting. See Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 767, and 812.

(D) So it is called by Lord, and Mr. Frazer. Roger calls it Jastra. In the account of the Malabâr religion, the books of which it consisteth are called Sasteran Gol; Sasteran being the plural of Sâster, or Shâster; which signifies Science; or, according to others, System.

(E) Pûrân, or Porân, signifies Poems: these histories being written in verse.

(F) All the doctrines and instructions contained therein are taken out of the four books of the law and the Shâsters. Phill. Hist. Malab. p. 11. There is an abridgment of these eighteen books, called Chadda Kari raga Mandirum, ibid. p. 15. Roger mentions these Porâns in his Manners of the Brâmmans, p. 64, 68, 102, & alibi.

(1) Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 812. (2) Lett. Edif. tom. 26, p. 233. (3) Phill. Account

Malabar, p. 57. See also Bernier Mem. of Empire Mogol, part iii. p. 145, and others penitents, and other eminent men : but also of their inferior gods or divinities. In short, the Pûrân joining both the former systems together, seems to have formed the religion of the vulgar ; by introducing the doctrine and worship of those inferior deities, whose history is in these poems displayed with monstrous fictions. The Brâmmans pretend that the three sets of books before-mentioned were all delivered by God to Brâmma : but it is obvious that they were published at different times, doubtless to serve different purposes ; and that the Pourân appeared long after the other two, when the present idolatry, to which it is accommodated, came to get footing in the Indies.

The popular theology

AMONG the Pûrân, or Powrân, which signifies poems, are the Harma Pourân°, which, we are told, contain the popular theology, or most approved polytheism ; and, among the Shâsters, is the Harma Shâstrum, composed out of the Brâmman, and popular divinity. It signifies the holy science, or science of virtue ; and contains the practice of the different religions (or sects), with the sacred rites or ordinances, and laws for administering justice ; which treatises of the Harma Shâstrum, written by various authors, are multiplied ad infinitum P.

kept from the laity.

THERE are, besides the before-mentioned, many other books explaining the law ; all which are kept out of the hands of the common people, or laity : yet there are a great number of books current among the Malabârs, which contain the exploits of their gods Chiwens (or Iffuren) and Wishtnou ; the history of the wars of the giants with the gods ; with their miracles, and the way of worshipping them. Among these, there are many porân and local histories of their gods, peculiar to some places in the country of Malabâr ; and this, no doubt, is the case in other parts of India.

Hard to be procured.

As the Brâmmans, or priests, have the keeping of their sacred books, which they will not communicate to their own laity (G), much less to strangers, great sums have been offered, to no purpose, by *Europeans, for a copy, or only a translation of the Vedam ; because it is written in a language (H) which is reckoned sacred on that account, and known only to the Brâmmans. Some, from the difficulty of coming at them, have supposed that there are no such books in being ; for the Danish missionaries could never get the Brâmmans to produce it : and one of the Romish tells us they, for a long time, thought it was impossible to find it ; but, at length, he got a copy of it (I), by means of a Brâmman convert†. And, doubtless, they might have been had long ago, if properly sought after (K) ; since the Mohammedans have had translations of them (L) for a long time, from whence at least a version might have been made, and Mr. Lord procured an abstract of the Shâster early in the last century.

Great neglect of

THIS abstract is very short ; yet as the Shâster contains the substance of the Vedam, it may supply the place of it until a translation come to be made public : and as we find in this abstract the original of those beings, whom the Hindûs at present worship as gods, and of the facts on which the Brâmmans have grounded so many fictions, it serves as a key to open the mystery, and account for many things which otherwise would be inexplicable. Notwithstanding this, we do not find that any author has made use of it to clear up the confusion and difficulties, which he complains of, in the accounts of others, relating to the Hindû religion. Even Bernier himself, one of the most intelligent of the travellers, although he had read Mr. Lord's book, and tells us he was obliged to him for many things‡, yet takes no notice of the use that might be made of it on this occasion ; as if either he had overlooked this consideration, or thought the matters contained in it were agreeable to the present system of the Indians.

Romish misjonaries.

ON the other hand, the missionaries, altho' seemingly diligent in search of the Vedam, never took the least notice of this abstract of the Shâster ; as if it had no relation to the religion of p. 37, 38, 53, 121, 125. Also Dan. Confer. p. 140, & seq.

° PONS. ap. Lett. Edif. tom. 26. p. 233, 239.

p. 161 —Danish Lett. part i. p. 20, 22.

Lett. Edif. tom. 21. p. 456, and tom. 24. p. 437.
part iii. p. 157.

P Ibid. p. 34, & seq.

¶ See PHILL. Malab.

† BERNIER, Mem. Emp. Mogol, tom. 3.

‡ DAN. Confer. p. 138, & seqq.

§ CALAMET. ap.

|| BERNIER'S Memoirs of the Mogol's Empire,

(G) Only the tribe of Kuttari, or the Râjabs, are allowed to read the Vedam ; and that of Shudderi, or the merchants, are permitted only to read the Shâster.

(H) Our authors call it the Samskörtam, Samkrou-tam, Sankrit, and Hanskrit. But it appears, from what has been observed before, to be another language. The Samskörtam, which signifies synthetic, or composed, is harmonious, copious, and strong. The grammar is a wonderful contrivance, and masterpiece of art. It was formerly a living language, spoken in the north, or Hindûjân : as the Grandam was in the south India. The Danish missionaries call this latter the Kirundum ; and say their sacred books are written in it. Whether it differs from the other, and in what respects, they do not tell us. See Lett. Edif. tom. 15. p. 53. tom. 21. p. 457. and tom. 26. p. 22, & seqq.

(I) Calmet was employed to procure it for the French king's library ; which he did about the year 1733.

(K) They were procured, by order of the present French king, to put in his library.—Mr. Frazer has lately brought from India the Shâster and Pûrân, in the Sanskrit language, but not the Vedam. See Append. to Hist. of Nadir Shâh.

(L) P. Pons tells us it is in the French king's library, in Arabic. See Lett. Edif. tom. 26. p. 233.

- a the Brâmmans. It is true, neither the Shâster, nor Pourân, seem to have been known to them till of late years; nor does Lord himself, however it happened, once mention the Vedam, much less that the Shâster is an explanation of it; on the contrary, by some mistake, he speaks of the Shâster as the book of the law delivered by God to Bremaw, or Bramma (M). However, if this abstract of the Shâster had been known to them, we have no great reason to believe that they would have made use of it; since we do not find they have made any of the Vedam itself, although they have been in possession of it ever since about the year 1730. Perhaps they do not think the best way to convert the Hindûs, is to let them see that their religion was originally free from that gross idolatry in which it is at present involved; at least that method would not answer their ends. They make use of images as well as the Hindûs;
- b and therefore are obliged to take a more difficult course: which is, to persuade them that the Romish saints and images are more holy, and fitter objects of worship, than theirs.

(M) It is true, the Brâmmans pretend so; and according to a lay Malalâr, both the Shâsters and Pourâns are reckoned divine; but yet inferior to the Vedam, and as derived from it.

S E C T. II.

Abstract of the Shâster.

- c THE Great God being alone, and resolving to make his excellency and power manifest, by creating a world stocked with intelligent animals; he, in the first place, as the ground-work, made four elements, earth, air, fire, and water. These elements being confusedly mixed together, he next divided; and, out of them, formed the several parts of the visible world, in the manner following:

- FIRST, by some great cane, or like instrument, God blew upon the waters; which rising in a bubble of a round form, like an egg, and spreading by degrees to an immense space, made the firmament, which, so clear and transparent, encompasseth the world. Of the earth and moisture which remained as the sediment of the waters, the Lord framed a kind of ball, or globe; the more solid parts whereof became the earth, and the more liquid the seas. Then,
- d by a great noise, or humming sound, he placed it in the midst of the firmament, every way equi-distant from it, and called it the lower world. Next he created a sun and moon in the firmament, to distinguish the times and seasons. The four elements being thus separated, and assigned to their proper places, began to discharge their several offices: the air filled up whatever was empty; the fire nourished with his heat; and the earth, as well as seas, brought forth their respective animals; to whom the Lord conveyed a seminal virtue, that they might be fruitful in their several capacities.

- In the last place, therefore, God created man, as a being more worthy than the rest, and capable of contemplating his works. At the Lord's command he rose out of the earth, his head first appearing, and then his body, formed with all its parts. God next conveyed life into him, which, as soon as he had received, manifested itself: for colour began to redden in his lips; his eye-lids to disclose the two lights of nature; the several parts of his body put themselves in motion; and his understanding being informed, he acknowledged his maker, and rendered him worship.

- THAT this man, who was made a sociable creature, might not live alone, God gave him a woman for a companion; who resembled him no less in the qualities of his body than mind. This first man's name was Pourous (or Powrows), and the woman's Parkouti; who lived together as husband and wife, feeding on the fruits of the earth, without the destruction of any living creature. In process of time, these two had four sons, named Brammon, Kutteri, Shudderi, and Wife; who differed in their nature, according as the elements prevailed in them. For Brammon was of an earthly constitution, and therefore melancholic; being also ingenious, God appointed him to impart his precepts and laws to the people: for which office his grave and serious countenance best suited him. On this account, therefore, the Lord delivered to him a book, containing the form of divine worship, and the principles of religion.

KUTTERI (N) was of a fiery temper, and had a martial spirit; God therefore vested him with power to sway kingdoms with the sceptre, and bring men into order: for this purpose the Almighty put a sword into his hand, which is the instrument of victory and dominion.

As Shudderi, being of a flegmatic constitution, was mild and conversible, it was thought fit that he should be a merchant, to enrich the commonwealth by commerce, and bring home plenty, by means of shipping. To put him in mind of his business, a pair of scales were^a put into his hand, and a bag of weights hung at his girdle.

(N) Kutteri signifies a Dagger; from whence, probably, this martial man and tribe took their name.

Wife. WISE (or Weyz), who was of an airy temper, was endued with invention; and being full of contrivances, was able, as first thought, to form any thing in the handicraft or mechanical way. To help him in his profession, he had delivered to him a bag, with variety of tools or instruments necessary to execute any piece of work which his fancy should devise.

Four women created, THE world being in this maiden state, the Almighty gave not Pourous and Parkouti any daughters: but that the work of generation might be free from impurity, God made four women for these four men; and, for better conveniency of dispersing, placed them at the four winds; Sawatari in the east; Toddikastri in the west; Visagunda in the north; and Jejunogunda in the south^x.

for wives to the MEAN time the sons of Pourous growing up, God commanded them to travel each a different way, in order to find out the four women who were to be their wives. Brammon travelling eastward, at length met with Sawatari, and married her, conformable to the rules prescribed in the book delivered to him. Kutteri, proceeding westward, found Toddikastri, and, after a terrible combat between them, which lasted three days, they came to a conjugal agreement. Sbudderi took his journey northwards; and, after discovering pearls and diamond mines, lighted upon Visagunda. Lastly, Wife, called also Viskermah, or the hand-man, from his skill in manual arts, after crossing seven seas in a vessel, made by him for that purpose, stopped on the coast of Derpe, and built him a house there. After some time, he saw Jejunogunda walking by the shore, and made his addresses to her: but as she treated him with scorn, Wife prayed to God that he would turn her heart in his favour. This request was granted, on condition that he should erect pagods for God's worship, and adore images under green trees; because the Almighty had under their shade manifested himself to him by vision^y.

The earth peopled. THESE things are related at large in Mr. Lord's abstract, with several agreeable circumstances. The four brothers, having in this manner peopled the earth, resolved to return to the place of their nativity, in order to see their parents: so leaving their sons and daughters behind them, in several different places, they began their journies back towards the middle of the earth; where, on their arrival, they found Pourous and Parkouti, who received them with banquets and rejoicings. In process of time the four brothers (and their wives) became^d parents of many new generations, who strictly conformed to their division into four tribes, without mixing; and followed the instructions of their respective founders. But, as multitude and plenty beget many evils, every thing, by degrees, fell into disorder: Brammon grew negligent in his piety; Kutteri became cruel and over-bearing; Sbudderi cheated his brethren with false weights; and Wife set exorbitant rates upon his ware, to maintain his extravagancies. And as they were evil in themselves, so they were evil one to another; for Brammon envied Kutteri's greatness; and Kutteri, disdaining the quiet and solitary spirit of Brammon, forbore to pay him the respect due to his birthright: nay, he carried his contempt so far, as to prize his own laws and government before those of God, only because they came thro' the hands of Brammon. On the other side, he delighted in the slaughter of those who displeased^e him, laid taxes upon Sbudderi, and drained the profits of Wife's labours; whilst they, to revenge his injurious treatment, defrauded and exacted on their brethren. Wife likewise, to render Brammon still more contemptible than he was, sought to introduce a new form of religion, concerning the worship of images, and bowing to pagods (O), with other ceremonies, which had been communicated to him in vision, as before-mentioned: but, as these were things not contained in Brammon's book, a great dispute arose, whether they should be received as canonical: however, upon Wife's swearing that he had them from God, they were admitted as part of the ceremonial law.

World destroyed. THE ill examples of the parents sowed the seeds of corruption and wickedness, which increased in their posterity: so that at length the Deity growing angry, the heavens put on^f a face of darkness and terror; thunder and lightning flashed from the poles; while the seas, swelling in a frightful manner, sent a flood upon the earth, which overwhelmed all the race of mankind: but although their bodies were destroyed, their souls were lodged in the bosom of the Almighty. And thus ended the first age of the world, named Kurlayn^z.

Second age. HAD things continued in this ruinous state, the design of creation would have been frustrated. God therefore determined to renew the race of mankind, and begin the second age with three persons of greater perfection and excellency than the former. In order to this, descending from heaven upon a great mountain called Meropurbati, he said, Rise up, Bre-

^x LORD'S Discovery of the Banian religion, ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. vi. p. 301, chap. 1. p. 303, & seqq. ch. 2, 3, 4, 5.

^y Ibid. p. 309, & seqq. chap. 6.

^z Ibid.

(O) By pagods, doubtless, our author means images; and uses a term different from what is here used in the Shâster.

- a maw (P), the first of living creatures in the second age: hereupon the earth brought forth Bremaw, who immediately worshipped his maker. In like manner, by a second and third Three persons created. command, Vistney and Rudderi (Q) were produced, who, with no less reverence, adored their Creator. The design of making these three persons, was that they might act as deputies to God in the work which he was about to perform: to Bremaw therefore he assigned the office of making the creatures; to which purpose he indued him with the power of creation and production. To Vistney he gave the charge of preserving the creatures: for this end he constituted him lord of the sun and moon, of the hills and vallies, of the weather and seasons: he likewise made him the conferrer of riches, health, honour, and whatever conduced to the well-being of man, and other animals. Lastly, he vested Rudderi with a commission to destroy his creatures, because he knew they would be wicked, and deserve a punishment at his hands: for this end he appointed him lord of death and judgment, with all the train of common evils, such as sickness, famine, war, pestilence, and whatever else might be deemed a punishment for sin; the better to enable him to be the executioner of divine justice.
- b To each of these three persons was allotted a time for remaining on earth, conformable Time on earth. to the nature of his office. Because the work of creation was finished in the second age, therefore Bremaw was to be taken up to heaven at the end of it: and as each of the following ages were peopled by some who were reserved from destruction in the preceding ages, therefore Vistney was kept on earth double the term of Bremaw, because there was longer need of him, in his preserving quality. Lastly, in regard the world was to end by a general destruction, therefore the continuance of Rudderi on earth was to be three times as long as theirs.
- c THESE three persons being thus created with full powers, the next business was for them to put those powers in execution. Hereupon Bremaw consulting with himself how to discharge Bremaw's labour. his commission in the best manner, was seized with such extraordinary pain in all parts of his body, as foreboded some great alteration was to follow, as in effect there did: for he fell in labour; his belly swelling to such a degree (that altho' he far exceeded the stature of common men), he felt grievous torture, till, at length, the burden forcing it way thro' both his sides, there sprung forth twins, male and female, at full growth. These two having given worship Brings forth twins. to God the creator, and to Bremaw their producer, this latter named the man Manow, and the woman Seteroupa: after which they were sent to a mountain called Munderpurvûl, from thence to spread their generations towards the west, north, and south. Being arrived at the place appointed, Seteroupa brought forth six children; three sons, Priauretta, Outanapautba, and Sûmeraut; the three daughters were named Kammab, Sûnerettaw, and Sumbû. When these The world peopled. persons grew in years, they were dispersed according to Bremaw's command: Priauretta and Kammab were sent westward, to the mountain Segund; Outanapautba and Sûnerettaw to the mountain Bipola, in the north; Sûmeraut and Sumbû to the mountain Supars, in the south; who all encreased (R) and multiplied.
- d THUS Bremaw made man and woman, and replenished the earth with other living creatures; while Vistney, on his part, provided all things necessary both for the support and preservation of them. On the other side, Rudderi dispersed calamities, sickness, death, and judgments, according as the sons of men did by their wickedness draw down those evils upon them.
- e THE Almighty knowing that there would be no good order, where there was not the establishment of his worship and fear, by proper laws, among this new race of mankind; New book of the law, therefore descending upon the mountain Meropurbatî, he called Bremaw to him; and telling him, out of a dusky cloud, which yet revealed some rays of his glory, that his reason for destroying the former inhabitants of the earth, was because they did not observe the instructions set forth in the book delivered to Brammon, put another into the hand of Bremaw, commanding him to acquaint the dispersed generations with the matters contained therein; which he accordingly performed.
- f THIS book, called by the Baniyans the Shâster (S), consisted of three parts: the first contained their moral law, or precepts, with the explanation of each, and its application to the tribe or tribes which it concerned: the second comprised the ceremonial law; setting forth the rites which were to be observed in worship: the third tract divided mankind into tribes or classes; and prescribed the rules which were to be observed by each. To speak more particularly with respect to each of these tracts;

* Lord's Discovery of the Banian religion, p. 311, ch. 7.

(P) He is called by others Bramâ, Bramâb, and Brammâ.

(Q) Vistney is by others written Vishnu, Vishnou, Vishnav, and the like. Rudderi is written Ruderen, Rutteri.

(R) Here brothers and sisters go together; which was not suffered in the first age, as a thing in itself evil.

S. We are much at a loss here. The chief book of the law among the Hindûs is the Vedam, or Wedam; of which the Shâster, which signifies a System, is only the explanation or comment: but as our author Lord says this latter was delivered to Bremaw, and we are informed elsewhere that it is believed, as well as the other, to have come from God; therefore we must either suppose the Vedam was the book mentioned in the text, as delivered to Brammon; or else, that Lord has mistaken one for the other.

The moral law how distributed

THE first tract, containing the moral law, consisteth chiefly of eight commandments. The first forbids the killing of any living creature whatever ; because it has a soul, as well as man. a

THE second forbids beholding, giving ear to, or speaking, what is evil ; also the drinking of wine, and eating of flesh ; with the touching of things defiled.

THE third commands the observation of times of devotion, with washings, worshipping, and prayers to God.

THE fourth forbids telling lies, with design to defraud others in dealings, bargains, or contracts.

THE fifth commands charity to the poor, in meat, drink, and money, according to his necessity, and the giver's ability. b

THE sixth forbids oppressing, injuring, or doing violence to the poor ; likewise to use one's power unjustly, to ruin another.

THE seventh commands the celebration of certain festivals, without excess : also, to set apart certain seasons for fasting ; and break off some hours of sleep for watching, in order to be fitter for devotion.

THE eighth forbids stealing any thing, how small soever, of what is committed by another to one's trust, in the way of his business or profession ; and commands being content with the hire which such person gives him : because no man has a right to what is the property of another.

among the tribes.

IN dividing these eight commandments among the four tribes, two are appropriated to each : the first and second are assigned to the Brammans, who are the priests, as placing the strictest parts of religion in the preservation of living creatures from destruction, and abstinence from things forbidden. These precepts are likewise enjoined the merchant-men, who, in their way of worship, nearly agree with the Brammans : however, the third and fourth, which enjoin devotion, and forbid fraud in dealing, are more particularly intended for Shudderi. c

THE fifth and sixth commandments are ascribed to Kutteri, that is, to rulers and magistrates ; because those in power are most guilty of oppression, as well as most able to relieve the necessities of the poor. Lastly, the seventh and eighth are referred to Wise, as the handicraftsmen have need sometimes of recreation, yet are apt to squander their earnings ; and as they work in other people's houses, they are therefore restrained from theft. d

EVERY tribe is obliged to observe all the commandments in general ; but is more particularly exact in keeping those which are appropriated to their own. And as there is great conformity between Brammon and Shudderi, in their customs and religious worship, so is there a like between Kutteri and Wise. e

THE ceremonial law, or injunctions, comprised in the second tract delivered to Bremaw, relates to the following particulars :

Ceremonial law.
Frequent
washing.

FIRST, They are obliged to frequent washings of their bodies in rivers, after this manner : on their entrance they besmear themselves with mud, as an emblem of man's filthiness and corruption by nature ; then, walking farther in, and turning their faces towards the sun, the Bramman utters this prayer ; O Lord ! this man is foul and polluted as the mud of this river : but the water thereof can remove the defilement : do thou, in like sort, cleanse away his sin. Then the party plungeth himself three times in the stream, whilst the Bramman repeats the name of that (T) and other rivers, famous for such ablutions. Being risen up, he shakes in his hand some grains of rice ; and, having received absolution (of the priest) for his past sins, is dismissed. f

Anointing.

SECONDLY, They use a kind of unction in the forehead, with red paint, and certain grains stuck in it ; which betokens that God has marked them for his people. This is done to keep them in mind of their baptism ; and, as the sign wears off, it is daily renewed by them, according to their washings : the action being accompanied with certain words, to put them in mind of being such as become God's mark.

Green-tree-worship.

THIRDLY, They are enjoined to tender certain offerings and prayers under green trees : which practice was introduced by Wise (or Weyz) ; to whom God appeared in a vision under a tree, as before-mentioned. The Brammans therefore under such green trees erect temples to pagods (U), where they attend to perform religious rites and ceremonies. [The tree appropriated

^b LORD'S Discovery of the Banian religion, p. 312, & seq. chap. 8.

(T) "Wherein he washeth," saith Lord, "called Tap-fer, with those of Ganga (or Ganga), Nerboda, and "the like." These must be the words of Lord, and not those of the Shâster ; which he has, throughout his abstract, mixed with his own, in such a manner that often they are not to be distinguished one from the other. The Tappi, or Tapti, is the river of Surât, and the other two are in its neighbourhood ; where the Baniyâns chiefly dwell.

(U) We observed before, that this word cannot be taken from the Shâster ; as a farther proof of which, our author confounds the temple with the image : for pagod is a corruption of Pout Gheda, a Persian word, signifying the house of idols ; and therefore used only by a priated to this kind of worship is called by some the Indian fig-tree (X). From the branches stems shoot downwards, and, taking root, produce another tree, whose branches propagate in like manner: so that one tree spreads over a large tract of ground. This tree is supposed by the Hindûs to be so sacred, that they believe some great mischief will befall the person who hurts the least bough of it. To this tree they bring offerings: under it they receive unctions, and sprinklings of variously coloured powders. There they pay their adorations; which they number by a clapper of a little bell. There they pray for health, riches, a numerous issue, and the like. In short, there they often celebrate their festivals, with a great concourse of people. (Y).

b FOURTHLY, They are commanded to say certain prayers in their temples [not unlike those Prayers to used among the Christians.] This devotion consists in the repetition of certain names of God, God. explained and descanted on. They likewise use processions, with singing, and loud tinkling of bells; which chaunting is among their commandments (Z); with offerings to images, and such-like services (A).

FIFTHLY, They are enjoined pilgrimages to remote rivers, as the Ganges; there to wash Pilgrimages. their bodies, and pay their offerings: [so that the gold and jewels thrown into that famous river are of inestimable value.] The person likewise, whose palate, when dying, is moistened with Ganges water, is accounted blessed, and purified from sin.

c A SIXTH article of their worship is the invocation of saints; to whom they attribute the Invocation of power of assisting their votaries on many occasions. They who would be happy in marriage, saints. pray to Hurmount: they who undertake works of architecture, to Gunnex: such as want health, to Vagenaut: the soldier, going on to attack an enemy, cries Eimobem: the miserable call upon Siyer; and they who are in prosperity offer up their orisons to Meykasser (B).

SEVENTHLY, They are commanded by their law to worship God, upon sight of any of his Creature wor- creatures after sun-rise: [particularly they pay their devotion to the sun and moon, which they ship. call the two eyes of the Deity. Likewise to some beasts, whom they hold more clean than others, their treatment is exceeding kind; such as kine and buffalos. To these they ascribe so much innocence and goodness; on account of the souls of men entering into them, as they believe; that they besmear the floors of their houses with the dung of those cattle, and think the ground sanctified by that means.]

d THE eighth precept relates to baptizing, or naming their children; the ninth to marriages; Other pre- and the tenth to burials, which have been already set forth among their civil customs. cepts.

THE third tract of the book delivered to Bremaw treateth of the order and distinction proper to be observed among mankind. And, because nothing could be more commodious Division into than to have, as in the first age, Brammans, to instruct the people in matters of religion; tribes. Kuttereys, to sway the scepter, and keep men in obedience; merchants, to follow traffick and commerce, like Shudderi; and mechanics, to supply mankind with necessaries of their manufacture, as did Wise; therefore they were by this tract divided into the same tribes or classes, and obliged to confine themselves to their respective tribes, as well as the employments peculiar to each.

e WE have already given an account of the three last tribes; and, as we shall postpone that of the Brammans, till we come to speak more particularly of the priests among the Hindûs, we pass on to the other matters contained in the abstract of the Shâster ^d.

THE book above-mentioned, comprising the plan of religion and government which was The law pro- to be established in the new world, having been delivered to Bremaw, as before set forth; it mulg'd. was by him communicated to the Brammans of those times, and by them published among the people, who readily conformed themselves to the injunctions prescribed in it. They divided themselves into four tribes, and each tribe began to exercise the function appointed for them. The rulers kept the people in order; the priests or Brammans counselled them in matters of devotion; the merchants pursued traffick; and the handicraftsmen followed their f several professions.

THUS all things had a good beginning in this second age: religion was cultivated; prayers Men grow were offered up to God, and the three persons, Bremaw, Vistney, and Rudderi; the banks wid'd.

^c LORD'S Discovery of the Banian religion, ap. Church. Collect. p. 317, & seq. ch. 9. p. 320, ch. 10.

^d Ibid.

by the Mohammedans; the name for a temple among the Hindûs being Deura, which we presume signifies the same thing. See Owington's Voy. to Surât, p. 195, and Bernier's Memoirs of the Great Mogol's Empire, tom. iii. p. 131, & passim.

(X) By the Portugueses, Arbor de Reys; by others, the Banians tree, and the war tree.

(Y) We have put between hooks such matters as seem to be additions of Mr. Lord, and not to be contained in the Shâster.

(Z) This is spoken as if the other rites were not. But where are these commandments referred to? for he has produced none in which chaunting is enjoined.

(A) Here is an omission of certain rites.

(B) Did the Romish church take invocation of the dead from the Indians, or fall into it as a natural consequence of idolatry?

of the rivers were frequented, and daily washings were not neglected. But as mankind multiplied, they became worse and worse: the Brammans grew full of hypocrisy and ostentation; the Kuttereys, swelled with pride and ambition, sought to enlarge their territories and power by unjust means; the merchants committed all sorts of fraud in their dealings; and the mechanics grew idle, setting too great a price on their labour. The Lord, provoked with the iniquity of the world, descended on mount Meropurbati, and acquainting Bremaw with what he had observed, this latter went down, and gave them notice of the impending judgment; which, for a while, wrought a reformation in their manners: but, by degrees, they returned to their old course of wickedness. Hereupon Bremaw interceded with God for the human race (A); but the Almighty would not be pacified: on the contrary, the time of Bremaw's abode on earth being expired, the Lord took him up into his bosom, that he might not behold the evils of the time to come.

The world
destroyed.

THEN God made known his purpose of destroying mankind to Vistney; who, in virtue of his office, as preserver of the world, interceded likewise for them: but the Lord, resolving not to withhold his wrath, commanded Rudderi, whose office it was to bring judgments and destruction on sinners, to cause a wind to rise out of the bowels of the earth, and sweep the nations as dust from off the face of it. Rudderi, in obedience to the Almighty's order, put the winds in a violent motion; which, bursting from their subterraneous prisons, set the great body of the world a trembling. The day seemed to change colour with the night; the mountains and hills were torn from their foundations; and, as some report, the river Ganges was forced out of her wonted channel to take another course. In a word, this furious tempest destroyed the whole race of mortals, excepting a few, whom the Lord permitted Vijiney to cover with the skirts of his preservation; as a reserve for the propagation of mankind in the third age. And thus concluded the second age, called Duaper ^c.

The third age.

RUDDERI having at length restrained the stormy winds, all became calm again: but it was lamentable to behold the universal desolation which overspread the earth, especially the dead carcases of men and animals, which covered its surface; some blown from the tops of mountains, others bruised to mash, all drowned and destroyed: insomuch that the Almighty repented him of what he had done; and Rudderi was sorry to have been the instrument of so great fury and havock. But because the ill government of the kings and rulers was the source of all the disorders in the second age (as they had been in the first), therefore the Lord utterly rooted out all the tribe of the Kuttereys; those who were preserved being only some few of the other three tribes. However, as that tribe or order of men was so necessary in the world that it could not subsist without them; therefore, that it might be renewed from a more holy stock, the Lord appointed that the line of the Râjabs should be restored from that of the Brammans (B). This was performed in the person of Ram, youngest son of Duserat, chief of the Brammans (C), who were preserved by Vistney.

The Kutteris
extirpated.

Brammans made kings.

It was presumed that this person, being religiously educated, would favour piety as well as policy; and, with holiness joined to prudence, govern men in their several tribes. Accordingly Râm was a patron of the Brammans, and exceedingly promoted religion. [This prince became so memorable for his worthy actions, that to this day his name is honoured among the Hindûs; who, when they meet, salute one another, saying, Ram! Ram! as a word importing the wishes of every thing that is good.]

A third destruction.

It is likely that many worthy kings succeeded him; but the world degenerating in length of time, the same wicked practices which had infected the four tribes in the two former ages, began to infect them anew; till at length, the Almighty being incensed that mankind should not be warned by so many judgments, spoke to Rudderi: who, by his order, caused the earth to open and swallow them up alive; reserving only some few of each tribe, as a last trial, for peopling of the world. Thus ended the third age, named Tetrâjû.

The present age.

Kistney.

Last day.

AMONG those who were preserved was one Kistney (D), a famous ruler and pious king, the most renowned in the beginning of this fourth and last age. As he was exceeding zealous to propagate religion, virtue flourished in his reign ^f.

AT this period, Vistney's time of residing on earth being expired, the Lord took him up also into heaven, as there was no farther need of his preserving care: for, when the present age is brought to a conclusion, there will be a final end of all things. [However, the Brammans say, that this age, name Kolî, will be longer than any of the former; and that

^c LORD'S Discovery of the Banian religion, ap. Church. Collect. p. 325, ch. 13.

^f Ibid. p. 326, ch. 14.

(A) This is like Abraham's intercession for Sodom.

(B) Yet it does not appear that all the Râjabs are Brammans; for all those of Hindûslân, as well as many of those in the peninsula of Indiâ, seem to be of the Kutteri race.

(C) According to the vulgar tradition, Dufferat (or Duserat) was one of the Râjabs, who, with his wife, had been destroyed; but both were reanimated it seems by the souls of two departed Brammans; and thus produced the race of Bram-Kutteri. So that Mr. Lord must have committed a mistake here, or the Brammans must have altered the tradition, in order to make the fact more agreeable to the present state of things.

(D) By others, Kisna, Kishna, Krisna, and Kristna.

a at the end thereof Rudderi shall be taken up into heaven, as Bremaw and Vistney have been already.]

As to the manner of this final judgment, they hold that it will be more dreadful than any of the former; and it shall be by fire: that Rudderi shall then summon up all the powers of destruction: that the moon shall look red, and the sun shed his purling light like flaming brimstone: that the lightning shall flash with unusual terrors; and the skies change into all sorts of colours; but that fiery redness especially shall overspread the face of heaven: that the four elements, of which the world at first was constituted, shall be at variance, till, by this last agony, she is turned into her first confusion.

b THAT the final destruction of the world shall be by fire, they infer from a supposition, Final destruction. that it shall be brought to its dissolution by the same principles which gave it a being: and that as it hath already been destroyed by three of the elements, it shall be ultimately destroyed by the fourth. Then (say they) shall Rudderi carry up with him to heaven the souls of all No resurrection. mankind, there to rest in the bosom of God; but their bodies shall all perish; being of substances too gross to enter into so pure a mansion.

c THIS is the intire substance of Mr. Lord's abstract of the Shâster, which teaches the belief and worship of one only God, called the Almighty and Supreme Being, not of many: that Bremaw, Vistney, and Rudderi (named also Eswara, or Ishura, and Chivens), who are now worshipped as so many Gods, were no more than three persons, or beings, created by the Deity as his deputies or workmen, to make the visible world, and under him govern the affairs thereof for a limited time, pursuant to certain powers delegated to them; likewise that Ram, and Kistney, or Kristna, who are at present adored in their pagods with so much devotion, were no other than two men, famous for their good actions in the ages wherein they lived. In short, in Lord's abstract we find nothing of those wild genealogies, and romantic adventures, told by travellers, of the Hindû gods; nor even so much as the famous transformations (E), of Vishnû, or Wishnû, which fill their Pûrân with fables, and their temples with statues. Primitive Hindû religion.

d THUS the primitive religion of the Hindûs seems to have been intirely free from idolatry: for although in the Shâster we find the worship of images introduced, yet it is evident, from the place itself, that it was not originally a part of the Indian religion; since it is expressly said there was no mention of those things in the books delivered to Brammon, which was the first Hindû bible, or revealed book of the law: nor is image-worship taught in the eight commandments inserted in the said book delivered to Bremaw, which is the second revealed book of the law. It may be farther observed, that images were to be worshipped under green trees, as not worthy of being placed in temples, where we find them at present: the pagods seeming at first to have been dedicated solely to the worship of the one God; and in the Shâster itself this image-worship is not established as a point of doctrine, but only brought-in, as it were by the by, among the ceremonies of the Indian religion. Free from idolatry.

e BESIDES this silence of the Shâster with respect to the present idolatry, we meet with nothing in it which in any-wise tends to authorize the extravagant notions which obtain, concerning the number of different worlds and heavens; the long duration of this world; the creation of man, and future state; with many other absurd opinions. Nay, we do not so much as find any mention of the favourite doctrine of the transmigration of souls, though as old at least as the time of Pythagoras. Which shews, that this, as well as all the rest, were invented by the Brammans; since the Shâster was written, and imposed on the people by means of their Pourân, which are properly the legends and traditions of the Hindû church. and other modern extravagances.

§ LORD'S Description of the Banian religion, ap. Church. Collect. p. 326, ch. 15.

(E) It may be objected, that Lord has possibly suppressed things of both these kinds; and the rather as he tells us, in his introduction, that he had, for the most part, left out such prodigious fictions as seemed independent on sense and reason. It is true, Mr. Lord has omitted many things, relating to political and other matters: but then he gives his readers notice. Neither is it probable, that if Bremaw, Vistney, and Rudderi, were either termed gods, or declared to be such in the Shâster, or had any worship assigned them, that he would have suppressed matters of so much consequence; especially as he has not concealed the introduction of image-worship. Nor indeed do such matters come within the construction of prodigious fictions, to which alone his suppressions must be confined, whatever the transformations aforesaid may: yet even these are so essential a part of the present religion of the Hindûs, that we cannot think he would have been intirely silent about them, in case there had been any mention made of them in the Shâster.

S E C T. III.

An account of the present idolatry of the Hindows.

IT is not our intention to enter into a large detail of the Hindû religion, as at present taught and practised in the Indies; the account we have given of their antient principles, and objects of worship, may save us a great deal of that trouble. After having shewn from their Cautions to be observed sacred sacred books what was the original of all things, as well as of those beings whom they now principally worship as gods, it will be enough to point out the chief additions which priest-craft, never satisfied with enlarging, hath farther added thereto; without collecting all which authors have written on the several subjects, or engaging ourselves far in the recital of those endless fictions and extravagant romances, invented to propagate the different superstitions, and link them together.

in reading authors.

WITH regard to the variation which is found in the accounts of authors relating to those several particulars, and which contributes not a little to perplex the reader; it is to be ascribed in good measure to the different traditions and opinions of different countries and sects of Brammans dwelling in them. Thus, the Brammans of the western Malabâr seem to have one set of doctrines and legends; those of the eastern Malabâr another; those of Karnâta, a third set; and those of Hindûstân, or the Mogol's empire, a fourth. This appears from the relations of authors, particularly Baldæus, the Romish and protestant missionaries, Abraham, Roger, and Bernier (F); who visited different parts of India, and whose disagreement in most respects is owing to those local variations.

The Hindûs
believe

THAT the sacred books of the Hindûs establish and require the belief of one only God, is manifest from the abstract already given of the Shâster; and there is a particular sect of the Brammans who acknowledge no more than one God^b. The rest, who are engaged in supporting the popular religion, or polytheism, yet acknowledge one supreme God, who created all the rest, as his deputies or vicegerents, to create, and, under him, govern all other beings^c. To this supreme God they give infinite names, according to his various powers and attributes (G); the number of which last they make to be one thousand and eight^k. The Brammans of Hindûstân call God the Creator, Asbar; that is, immoveable, or immutable^l. Tampiran is the name of God among the Malabârians; who stile that being Barabara Wastu, or Parabara Wastu, that is, the supreme being of all; also Saru Wesuren, and Dewadda Duwam. Sometimes, more expressly, Barabara Wastu Wagbira Saru Wesuren; that is, the supreme independent being, Lord of all^m. We are told also, that the only One Divine Being is called Isparetta, which signifies the Deity, who is the cause of all things. Every sect seems to have its own names for the supreme God: and indeed to confound the inferior gods with him; which authors do not sufficiently attend to; and hence in a good measure arises this diversity of names. The Baniyâns, we are told, call the Deity Mîbadew (H), or the great God: but one sect of Brammans ascribe that name to Ishuren, or Rud-diren; another to Wistnû, or Wistnum, two of the subordinate divinities. As to the residence of this Prime Being, they place it above that of the other gods; assigning three mansions or heavens, called Kaylasom, Lilaweykontam, and Weykontam, for his abodeⁿ.

one supreme God;

his attributes,

To this supreme Deity, or God of gods, they ascribe all the sublime attributes of power, wisdom, and goodness. They say, there is no government or motion but through him; and that the other gods cannot move a single straw without his permission^o: that he is incomprehensible, and without form; nor to be considered under any figure^p. Agreeably to this notion, they make no image of the Supreme Being. The Malabârs (both priests and laity) likewise declare, that they worship but this One Divine Being (I), who is the author or cause of all other beings^q. And yet no prayer is directly addressed to him; nor any hymn offered in his praise to the pagods^r. He is likewise considered as the author both of good and evil^s; or as the fountain from whence both proceed, seeing all things are believed to be derived from him. They likewise say, that the subaltern gods and other beings were made for his pastime: that he diverts himself with beholding the wicked as well as the good actions of mankind; and, in short, that this world is one of the sixty-four comedies with which he is entertained^t. As to his providence they tell us, that the Deity does not mind things of little moment in this world; but leaves them to his three created vicegerents: who have, for that purpose, their subordinate gods disposed in proper stations^u. However, one of the missionaries says, that he never met with so much as one atheist, or a person who denied the existence of a Sovereign Being and a future state^x.

and providence.

^b See hereafter. ^l PHILLIPS'S Account of Malabâr, p. 71, 170. Dan. Confer. p. ii. 6. 166, & seq. ^k PHIL. Malab. p. 50. ^m DAN. Lett. p. 85, 166. Dan. Confer. part i. p. 29. part ii. p. 19. ⁿ ROGER, ubi supr. p. 102. ^o PHIL. Malab. p. 42. 170. ^p Ibid. p. 13. 42. ^q DAN. Confer. part ii. p. 19. ^r PHIL. Malab. p. 171. ^s Ibid. p. 7. 313. ^t Ibid. p. 45, 173. ^u DAN. Lett. part ii. p. 20. ^x Ibid. p. 24.

(F) To these we may add the account given by de Faria y Sousa, in his Portuguese Asia; which seems to be that which Roger, in his preface, p. 2. says was discovered to the Portugueses by a Bramman; but never had been published that he knew of.

(G) The Brammans have written many books upon the existence and attributes of the Supreme Being. Dan. Confer. p. 165.

(H) The word Deu, or Deu, found in this name, in Dewetas, and in other words, has a great affinity with Deus.

(I) This those say who yet worship Wistnou, or Ishuren, as the supreme God.

- ^a THIS in general is the substance of what the Brammans believe and teach concerning the subordinate supreme God. With regard to the subaltern or inferior gods, they are divided into three classes. The first consists of those three created beings, Bramma, Vishnou, and Ruddiren. The second class comprises the wives, children, and prime friends or favourites of the first three. The third class is composed of those they call Deutas, or Devetas; who are a kind of angels, employed to govern and take care of the several parts of the universe, under the gods of the first class. To these may be added a fourth class, comprehending those they call Ashuren, who are giants or demons. All these gods, whose number is excessively great, have their respective offices, degrees of power and worship, their wives and children. The Brammans have likewise furnished them with officers and equipages suitable to their stations: among ^b the rest, they have taken particular care to provide every one of them with a Wabannam, or beast of carriage; which serves him instead of a horse, to carry him instantaneously from one part of the world to the other.

I.

Gods of the first class.

- ^c THE three gods of this class have a great number of names assigned to them. One of their names them has often more than a hundred ^{divers}; for every act done by him intitles him to a new name ^a. But the appellations by which they are most generally known are those of Bramma, Vishnou, and Ruddiren, or Isburen; which yet vary according to the different languages, dialects, or humours of people, in different parts of India (I). Thus Brama, or Bramma, is by some pronounced Bræma, Bruma, Brumma, Eiruma, and Ram; Vishnou is named Vishnou, Vishnou or Wishnou, Vishnum, and Beshen or Beshno; Isburen is named Ijuren, Ixora or Isbora, and Eswara ^b. These three divinities are included under the general denomination of Dirumurtigol ^c; by which name their class or order is distinguished from the rest.
- ^d IT is difficult to give a clear account of the Hindû belief, concerning these three gods, from the writings of travellers, or even the missionaries; who either deliver the opinions and doctrines of some particular sect for those of the whole, or mix those of different sects together, without distinguishing them, and, in a manner, not to be separated; from whence chiefly arises that great disagreement and confusion which we find in their relations. Opinions of them various;
- ACCORDING to some authors, these are three beings created by the sovereign God, and ^{by some created} vested with the powers mentioned in the Shaster; Bramma to create, Vishnou to preserve, and Ruddiren, or Isburen, to destroy. From this number of three, and the offices of those beings, some would infer, that the Hindûs have some notion of the trinity ^d: but this does not appear from their sacred books; and Mr. Lord rightly observes, that there is rather a quaternity, since the supreme God will make the fourth ^e. Besides, it is probable that those books were in being long before the Christian æra. However that be, we are told by the same authors, that they ^{and subordinate} are not held for gods, but only considered as God's servants and soldiers ^f; that they are no more than God's ministers, to execute his commands; and, at best, his deputies and vicegerents (K), to govern under him ^g: that they have but borrowed beings, subject to various changes, as well as other creatures; and are vested with precarious employments, each having his fixed time of life and government, to continue only till the restitution of things ^h. For all ^{yet omnipotent} this, they are reckoned omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent, as well as most holy, just, and good: and it is upon this supposition that the Brammans say they direct their prayers to them, and honour their altars with burnt-offerings; alleging for so doing the strict orders of the Supreme Being ⁱ. But it is not mentioned where those orders are to be found; although ^f some Brammans have quoted the Vedam in support of this creature-worship, as appears from Roger.

THESE are not to be considered as the sentiments of all the Brammans, much less of the people; but only as the opinion of some particular sects, or private persons, who adhere more ^{Some say Vishnum,} strictly than others to the documents of the Vedam. For we learn elsewhere, that both the Brammans and people ascribe much higher prerogatives to these three beings; especially two

^y See ROGER's Mœurs de Bramins, p. 240, & seq. Malab. p. 41, 71.

^z Dan. Lett. part ii. p. 11.

^a PHILLIPS's

^b See BERNIER's Mem. Mogol, part iii. p. 150. BALDÆUS ap. Church. Coll. Trav. vol. iii. p. 766. PHIL. Malab. p. 4. 91. Dan. Confer. p. 167.

^c PHIL. Malab. p. 4. 94.

^d BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 151. BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 766.

^e LORD's Relig. of the Banians, in his conclusion. ^f Dan. Lett. p. 57. part i.

^g Dan. Confer. p. 168.

^h Dan. Conf. Ibid.

and Dan. Lett. part ii. p. 21, & seqq.

ⁱ Dan. Confer. p. 168.

(I) The same may be said with respect to the European authors of different nations, who mention them.

(K) They are considered also as mediators, to present the petitions of the Malabârs to the Great Supreme Being. Phillips's Account of Malabâr, p. 5.

others Ishuren, of them, Wistnow and Eswara or Ishuren: some affirming the first to be not only a god, but ^a the Supreme God (L); others the second *. And between these two opinions the generality of the Hindûs in all parts of India, at least the southern, seem to be divided; each party contending zealously for the superiority of his god: whence some Bramman sects assume the name of Wistnowists, others Ishurenists. However, we are informed by the same author, that there are some of the first-mentioned sect, who say neither of those two is God; but that both sprung from Chekti, who is the Sovereign Being ⁱ. In consequence of exalting the three deputies to the rank of true gods, those sects have also given them a genealogy also, different from the Vedam and Shaster; each likewise in favour of their own god, or according to their fancy.

^b Their origin and genealogy Some tell us the Malabârs believe, that the Dirumurtigol, or three gods above-mentioned, were born of the goddess Chaday (or Chatti), who originally existed in the Supreme Being as the feminine faculty, and was afterwards separated from the masculine power ^m. According to others, the same people look for the origin of all things in the Linga, or privy-member of their god Ishora ⁿ. Some of them say the Linga or Quivelinga (which is the privities of both sexes in conjunction) sprung from an egg, into which the Ishureita, or Ispareita, transformed himself: and others, that the Quivelinga is the Deity himself ^o. As the Linga relates to Ishuren, who is the favourite god of the Malabârs, these genealogies are, doubtless, calculated to honour him, though different among themselves: and we meet with one differing from all the rest; wherein the three deities are deduced in the following series. First, we are told, that the Being of all Beings, or the Supreme God, created eternity: eternity brought forth Chiwen (M): by this Chiwen the goddess Chadai was created. This goddess produced Putadi, ^c or the elementary and visible world: by Putadi the sound, or ringing, was framed. The Sound's offspring was nature: Nature afterwards begat the great god Chata Chiwen: and this again brought forth another great god called Maghesburn: from Maghesburn sprung Ruddiren, or Ispuren; from Ruddiren the great god Wistnum; and Wistnum created Brama ^p (or Bramma).

^d contrary to the Vedam: In this jargon-genealogy of the three gods two things are remarkable. First, Ruddiren, who, according to the Vedam and Shaster, was created last, is here produced first, and made the parent of the other two. Secondly, that Bramma is not qualified with the title of Mahadew, or great god, like the other two: the reason is, that he is in no great esteem with the southern Indians. On this occasion it must be observed, that each of the three goods has his particular party or votaries. The Brammans and Hindûs of the Mogol's empire seem to adhere to Bramma: those of Karnâta prefer Wistnou; and the Malabârs exalt Ruddiren, or Ishuren (N). The interest of Bramma is so much declined in Karnâta, that they will not allow him a pagod, at least in the country about Palliakatta, on the coast of Choromandel: and although the inhabitants of that country, and Malabâr in general, allow him the privilege of creating (which however some divest him of), yet they say even that was delegated to him by Wistnou (O). But of this, and the Linga, more in particular when we come to speak of these gods separately.

^e how reconciled. If it be objected to those above-mentioned sects, that in making these three subordinate gods the same with the supreme God who created them, they contradict their own principles, and assert a manifest absurdity; they endeavour to defend themselves, by saying: that those deities are the same with God, as being comprehended in the divine essence; and that therefore there can be no great difference between them and the Supreme Being. For they hold that all things are parts of God, or produced out of his essence; into which at the end of the world they shall return ^q.

BUT, supposing this reasoning was admitted to be sound, the qualities and actions which their Pourân ascribes to these three gods do not at all correspond with the perfections which belong to the nature and character of the Divine Being. For there they are represented not only as full of imperfections, some of which have been mentioned already, but even as being guilty of the most exorbitant vices and enormous crimes, such as adultery, theft, and murder; of ^f which instances will be produced in the short history we are going to give of each of them.

* ROGER Mœures des Bram. p. 17. 22, 23.

ⁿ BALDÆUS ap Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 813. Lett. part i. p. 19, 20. 56.

ⁱ Ibid. p. 26.

^m PHIL. Malab. p. 3, & seq.

Portuguese Asia, vol. ii. p. 378.

^o Dan.

^p Ibid. part ii. p. 21.

^q PHILLIPS's Malabar, p. 141, & seq.

(L) That is, the same with the supreme God, as we apprehend, and yet derived from and produced by him; namely, out of himself.

(M) Ishuren is the same with Chiwen; or this is one of his names.

(N) Agreeable to this, Baldæus observes, that some acknowledge Wistnum for their supreme God; but most of them Ixora (or Ishuren). See Church. Collect. Voy. vol. iii. p. 754.

(O) This is, doubtless, supposing Wistnou to be the supreme God.

i. Of Brâmma.

^a ALTHOUGH the Vedam and Shâster declare expressly, that Brâmma (P) rose out of His origin, the ground at the command of the supreme God, yet the Brâmmans, not fearing to contradict their sacred books, give him different origins. Some say, that when God was disposed to create the world, he caused to float on the water (which then only existed besides the Deity) the leaf of a tree, in the form of an infant with its big toe in its mouth; and that from his navel he caused to spring out the flower Tamara (Q), from which Brâmma had his existence^r. This is probably the account of the Wistnou sect: but others, who seem to be the votaries of Isbûren, derive his origin from the Quivelinga^s. All the remark we shall make on this occasion is, that the Brâmmans swerving so egregiously from the express letter of their sacred books, is a plain evidence that they do not believe them to be divine, as they pretend they are.

^b BRAMMA having been thus produced, the Almighty gave to him the power of creating the universe, and all the beings existing in it: that is, he himself created the several worlds, families, and tribes of people; but left to others, his deputies, to create things of small moment, such as herbs, plants, and the like; which power, however, the Baniyans and Malabars say was communicated to him by Wistnum^t. On the other hand, the Brâmmans ascribe to him the preservation of animals^u; which yet is Wistnum's province, according to the Shâster. This shews that the sects change and contradict their sacred books at pleasure, in opposition to one another. The Brâmmans attribute to Brâmma not only the creation of the world, but the conduct and government of every thing in it. They say, that God does not meddle with those matters; but like a king, who, to avoid the trouble of minding all affairs himself, commits many things to the care of his officers. They likewise affirm, that Brâmma fixes the fate or fortune, good or bad, of all people, and the time they have to live: that all events are by his direction; and, in short, that nothing happens in this world but by his special order^v. To ease Brâmma in this troublesome employment, they assign him a reasonable number of assistants: that is, a governor to each of the eight worlds; with a governor-general over them^w, who is as it were his prime minister.

To these fictions about Brâmma they have added a multitude more. Among the rest, they pretend that originally he had five heads: and, whereas he is represented by his image with only four, they say, that he lost one of them in a quarrel with Isbûren. This is related several ways, like every thing else: according to one account, Brâmma, swelled with pride of his own power, having spoken contemptibly of Isbûren, this latter, in his anger, brought forth Beyrewa, who with his nail scratched or cut-off the middle head of Brâmma. They add, that Brâmma, having atoned for his fault by a copy of verses made in praise of Isbûren, Isbûren was so well pleased, that he promised the other should enjoy his four heads with satisfaction ever after; and clapped the fifth, which had been scratched-off, upon his own^x. Others give a different relation. They say, that Isbûra (or Isbûren) happening one day to drop some words, which seemed to intimate that he was the greatest being in the world, Bramma and Wistnum raised a contest about it: to decide which, Isbûren told them, that whoever of them could take a full view of him from head to foot, should thenceforward be accounted the greatest. Wistnum, after digging in the ground, in shape of a hog, to come at his feet, desisted, on meeting with a poisonous serpent, which startled him: but Bramma, soaring in the air, mounted on his Wabannam, or bird of carriage, was gotten very high; when three flowers, which met him, told him, his labour was in vain, Isbûren's head reached to so vast a height. Bramma, discouraged at this news, changed his resolution; and, to come-off the better, desired the flowers to tell Isbûren, that he was prevented from proceeding any farther by a sudden giddiness in his brain. This they promised to do, and performed: but Isbûren, being sensible of the deceit, cut-off one of Bramma's heads (R), and cursed the flowers for their pains^y. The reader has here at once a sample both of the great contrariety and extravagance which reigns through the Indian legends.

^r ROGER Mœures des Bram. p. 141. also the Genealogies before recited. p. 176, & BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 812. ubi supr. p. 812. ^s Idem. ibid. p. 757.

^t BALDÆUS ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 812. See ^u ROGER, ubi supr. p. 141, ch. i. & 176, ch. v. ^v Ibid. ^w ROGER, ubi supr. p. 145, & seqq. BALDÆUS, ^x ROGER, ubi supr. p. 144. ^y BALDÆUS, ubi supr.

(P) The word Bramma, or Brahma, from whence the Brammans derive their name, signifies penetrating into all things. Bernier Mem. Mog. Emp. part iii. p. 150. But this probably is a forced explication.

(Q) Which is common in the Indies, growing in their tanks, or ponds.

(R) On this occasion, we are told, that Ruddiren stabbed Wistnu, or Vistnum. Danish Conferences, p. 105.

His residence: IF it be asked where Brâmma has his dwelling, they tell you, that he resides in Brâmma a Lokon, or Logum (S); which is the highest of the eight worlds, and next to heaven, where God himself resides^a. They likewise hold, that he is to die at a certain period of time (T), and be revived again. Nay, according to some legends, he dies and comes to life again every year^b.

wives and children. THE Hindûs give to Brâmma two wives. The first Sarasvati (U); who, we are told, was his own daughter. Whence comes the proverb, You must not do like Brâmma^c (X). The second, Quiatri. This last was barren^(*): but by the first we find mention of a son, named Dasba (Y), who was the father of Parvati, Ishuren's wife^d: and from the blood which flowed from his neck, when his fifth head was scratched or cut-off, sprung up his son Sagatrakavashen, who had no fewer than 500 heads and 1000 hands^e. Brâmma had likewise b the power given him by God of producing sons at pleasure; of which number was Kassiope, father of the good and bad angels; and perhaps^f another, whom we find mentioned under the name of Wisbrukra^g.

his temple. ALTHOUGH Brâmma was the first created, and consequently the eldest of the three gods, or celestial triumvirs; yet, as we have observed before, the Wishtnouwists have degraded him in their genealogies, to give precedence to Wishtnou. In those places too, where that sect prevails, there are probably no temples erected to his honour; which made the Dutch minister at Palliakatta, on the coast of Choromandel, who found none in that country, conclude there were none dedicated to him any-where else^h. However, that does not prove to be the case: on the contrary, he has his pagods, as well as the other two, in other parts of India; c and even no farther off than Tranquebar, only a few days journey lower on the same coastⁱ.

2. Of Vistnou, Vistnum, or Wishtnum.

Names of Vistnum: THIS name seems to be the same with Beshen, which Bernier gives to the second of the three gods of the first class, according to the Brâmmans of Hindûstân, and interprets penetrating into all things^k. Besides this name, and that of Perumal, by which too he is most generally called, he hath many others, with several surnames; among which last are those of Naraina and Aquanama, almost continually repeated by his votaries during the fast of d Masaupasa, celebrated in his honour^l.

origin and attributes: THIS god also, according to the Malabârs, draws his origin from the Quivelinga^m; or, according to others, from Ruddiren, or *Ishuren*ⁿ, who is the god most generally worshipped by those people. However, Wishtnum is in great esteem among them^o, being accounted the second in rank next to Ishuren^p; and is held by some for the Supreme God, instead of Ishuren^q. Thus his votaries ascribe to him infinite extension, affirming that he fills all space^r; and yet he is said to reside in the Milk Sea^s: of which more hereafter. They likewise give him for a bed a serpent called Annatan, with five heads; two whereof serve him for pillows, one for a bolster, and two for resting his hands upon. Upon this account they reverence serpents as celestial spirits, and never kill them, although often hurt by those reptiles^t.

and offices: THE votaries of Wishtnum are not content to ascribe to him the office of preserver of the universe, which is given to him in the Vedam and Shaster, but they strip Brâmma of his prerogatives, to confer on his rival: for they will have it, that he not only distinguished mankind into three sorts, as to wealth, namely, rich, poor, and middling; but that he also created the several worlds, and even Brâmma himself^u. e

IN consequence of this, they vest him with the power of appointing guardian spirits in several parts of the universe; of whom Indre, or Devendiren (Brâmma's prime minister) is the chief^v: and also of changing and moving them at pleasure. Thus he first made Mavalî king of the infernal regions, and then door-keeper of paradise^x. The injuries, which the

^a ROGER, p. 148, 181. ubi supr. p. 152.

p. 798.

Mem. Mog. Emp. part iii. p. 150.

^m Ibid. ubi supr. p. 766.

supr.

755.

Asia, vol. ii. p. 384.

^b BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 813 & 755.

^c BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 758.

^h ROGER, ubi supr. p. 243.

ⁿ Danish Lettr. part. ii. p. 21.

^q Ibid. p. 754. and ROGER Mœurs des Brâm. p. 22.

^t Ibid. p. 766.

^x BALD. ubi supr. p. 777.

^e Ibid. p. 813.

^f ROGER, p. 161. 185.

ⁱ Danish Lettr. part i. p. 20.

^l BALDÆUS, ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 820.

^o Ibid. p. 22.

^r BALD. p. 744.

^v Ibid. p.

^w DE FARIA, Port.

(S) According to Baldæus, he resides in Sattialogum, or the highest place in heaven.

(T) According to the Shaster, he was taken out of the world, when his time for being on earth was expired.

(U) So named by Roger, in his Manners of the Bramins, p. 152. The letters of the Malabârs call her Sarasvubadi (Phill. Account of Malabar, p. 94); and Baldæus, Sarossedi, ubi supr. p. 813.

(X) They who made the proverb were better men than either Bramma, or those who forged his history.

(*) Baldæus says both were barren.

(Y) Or Dasba; in Roger, Dastsja; which is pronounced alike.

a Wishtnouwists have done to Brâmma, do not end here: for, whereas the Vedam and Sbaster declare, that the prime sacred books were delivered to him by God, they affirm, that Wistnum found the Vedam inclosed in a Chanki shell (Z). Hence it is, that the Vedam and Chanki, as well as the Sakkaram, or sword, are found in the hands of his image^y.

WISTNUM, it seems, had a great number of wives; whom he took for a time to indulge his amorous inclinations, and then dismissed. There were among them only two whom he never parted with, and kept for sake of getting children by them^z. The first was called Laetzemi, Leshimi, or Maga Leshshimi. She was the goddess of fortune^a; others say, she was the Indian Venus, and sprung from the froth of the sea^b: or, according to another legend, she was found in a large rose floating on the sea of milk. It is added, that her office is to scratch her husband's head^c. She is always near him in the pagods, in a little chapel^d. The second wife is named Siri Pagoda, also Pumi Divi (A), that is, the goddess of heaven. In her lap Wistnum lays his feet; which she is to rub with her hands^e. Besides all these wives, he had a thousand concubines in his seraglio. For all this, we do not find that he had more than one son, called Kashen, or Kushen; whom Chidey bore to him. This infant, it seems, being brought to the Risbi, or prophet, in whose house it was born, for his benediction, while he was intent at his prayers over it, with his eyes probably turned upwards, the mother came and stole her child away. The prophet, who was no conjurer, concluding that some wild beast had carried off the infant, made a fine baby out of a log of wood; and, being endowed also with the gift of lying, would persuade Chidey, that it was her own. She could not but be surprised at this adventure. However, the child was brought up by her, and called Lawen; so that, adds the Malabâr (who wrote this idle story, and believed it as true as gospel), we may say Wishnu had two sons^f. To these may be added a third, named Vareu; who, we are told, proceeded from the blood, which came out of Wishnu's cut finger^g.

THIS is in brief the account given us by authors of Vistnou, or Wishtnum: but that which renders this god most famous in the Indies, is the history of his ten transformations. Under these, we are told, are hidden the chief mysteries of the Pagan religion, on both sides of the Ganges^h; and the Brâmmans are so industrious to conceal these things from strangers, that Roger could never prevail on one of them, who explained other matters to him, to open himself freely on this chapter. Particularly he declares, that he could never thoroughly learn the reasons of the third, fourth, sixth, ninth, and tenth, transformationsⁱ. Nay, the Danish missionaries, after all their enquiry, tell us, that the Indians don't pretend to any certainty themselves, in relation to the eighth^k; although Roger seems to have been better acquainted with that than any of the rest: and Baldæus long ago has published a copious account of it, accompanied with cuts. This last author, resolved to come at the knowledge of these mysteries, which Roger could not attain to, at length procured it from a Brâmmann who had turned Christian^l; and it is to him chiefly that the public is beholden for the discovery.

THE Brâmmans pretend, and the Hindûs believe, that this god Wishtnum has been already incarnated nine times, and will appear in the flesh once more. His first transformation was into a shark, called Matja, in order to recover the Vedam from a certain demon (B), who had stolen it from the Devagol, or Dewetas, and hid himself at the bottom of the sea^m.

THE second transformation of this Indian Protæus was into a Kourma, or tortoise; in whose shape he got under the world, when sinking with the weight of the mountain Merowa (or Maba-Meru), which was thrown into the sea, in order to find the amortam (or ambrosia). This amortam was to be an antidote against a certain virulent poison. But there are different accounts given of this matter by the different sectsⁿ.

THE third metamorphosis of this god was into a hog; to follow a very tall giant, who had rolled up the earth like a sheet, and carried it on his shoulders to the infernal regions, called Padalas (or Patalas): but, not being able to place it upright again, employed a little saint, who was no more than an inch high, to set it strait; which he not only did, but, the sea having laughed at him for his pigmy size, he drank it all up, and then pissed it out again; from whence comes its saltness. But the Baniyans and Jentews of Hindûstân give a different account of this transformation; which takes up 2700 years in the first ages, or period of time^o.

^y BALD. ubi supr. p. 768.

^z ROGER, ubi supr. p. 151, 155.

^a PHILL. Malâb. p. 95.

^b ROGER,

p. 150.

^c BALD. ubi supr. p. 766.

^d ROGER, p. 151.

^e BALD. p. 766.

^f PHILL.

Malâb. p. 95, & seqq.

^g BALD. ubi supr. p. 758.

^h Ibid p. 766.

ⁱ ROGER, ubi supr.

p. 158.

^k Danish Lett. part i. p. 24.

^l BALD. ubi supr. p. 767.

^m Ibid. p. 766. ROGER,

ubi supr. p. 159.

ⁿ BALD. ibid. p. 768, & seqq.

^o Ibid. p. 771, & seqq.

(Z) By us called the trumpet-shell, of the periwinkle kind.

(A) Elsewhere we find it written Puma deney; perhaps it should be Dewey.

(B) Roger names these demons Raetsjasja; which we write Râsbaja; and Baldæus, Raxiata, according to the English orthography Râsbajâ. This last author adds, alias Adirem; and says he is called by the Baniyans Sere Miasben and Sankasoor.

4th incarnation:

VISTNUM's fourth transformation was into a monster, half man and half lion; which shape ^a he assumed to punish a giant, who, through power given him by Bráhma, having subdued the whole earth, would suffer no-body to be adored but himself. He was torn in pieces by the Man-Lion; and thus ended the first period of time¹.

5th incarnation:

His fifth transformation was into a mendicant *Brámma*n, to cheat Mavali, an inferior god, out of the government of the world; in order to introduce a distinction of degrees and circumstances among mankind, who were then upon a level every-where. To effect this design, he begged of Mavali three feet of ground only to build a hut upon; which being granted him, he re-assumed his own form, and covered the whole earth with one of his feet, and paradise with the other: then, removing it, he placed it over the infernal regions, and thus got all three into his possession. However he made Mavali door-keeper of paradise^b.

6th incarnation:

VISTNUM's next incarnation was in the shape of Prassaram, or Paresha Rama, a beautiful boy; who, in obedience to his father's commands, cuts-off his mother's head: but, at his request, his father restores her to life. He then devotes himself to Vistnum for twelve years, by sitting cross-legged on the ground without intermission. Mean time, a potent Rájah slays his father, although his brother-in-law; because he refused to give him Kamdega, the white cow of plenty, which he had borrowed of Rájah Inder, king of the blest souls, in order to entertain his relation handsomely. Prassaram, being informed of this by the cow, went and slew all those of the race of Rajabs, or Kutteri's, to be found on earth. However, the souls of his father and mother were sent to reanimate the bodies of Rájah Dasserat and his wife, by order of Vistnum, who had promised to exalt their posterity; as an earnest of which, they had a ^c son named *Ram*², who makes the subject of the seventh incarnation. The design of this sixth seems to be to promote the doctrine of the metempsychosis; and also to shew, conformable to the Shaster, how the race of Kutteri's were first destroyed, and then restored.

7th incarnation, Ram.

RAM, or Rama, called also Siri Rama, and Dajerratha Rama (D), to distinguish him from Paresha, or Pareja Rama, before-mentioned, married Sitra, daughter of a potent Rájah; whom he won by shooting in opposition to the giant Rawan. This giant, besides ten heads and twenty arms, obtained from Isburen the privilege to live many thousand years. Some time after, Ram's brother having cut-off the ears and nose of Rawan's sister, by his order, and slain several armies sent to revenge the injury; Ravan, in the shape of a mendicant *Brámma*n, carried-off Sitba to the isle of Seylan. Ram pursues, and by the assistance ^d of Hanuman, or Anamonta, and other apes (E), passed the sea (at Ramanakoil) into Seylan, over a bridge of swimming stones; and after a great many strange exploits, in which invention is stretched to the utmost, kills Rawan, and recovers Sitba. Eleven years after his return, he ascended to heaven, and thus ended the second period of time³. This is the legend, according to the followers of Vistnum; but the sect of Isburen relate matters differently: and, to exalt their god, add that Ram built a famous temple at Ramanakoil, in honour of Isburen. We are told also, that in all the pagods dedicated to Isburen, or Eswara, Ram is represented with ten heads and twenty arms, in memory of the destruction of *Rawan*⁴.

8th incarnation, Kistna:

THE eighth appearance of Vistnum was in the person of Kisna (F), and is reckoned the most ^e considerable of all the rest (G): nor can this be denied, if what is most monstrous and incredible, as well as most ridiculous and absurd, makes a thing considerable. The subject of the legend, which our author has given in great detail, is this: Rájah Kans, king of Mottera (or Matura), to the north of Agra, in Hindústan, finding by palmestry, that his sister Deuki (or Dukki), married to a *Brámma*n of the cow-herds, would bear a son who should deprive him both of his kingdom and life, confined her, and ordered her children, as soon as born, to be destroyed. Kisna, the youngest, was conveyed away by his own power and direction; and, though yet a sucking infant, slew several giants, who were sent to kill him, and flew with him into the air. During his childhood, he performed several miracles; as separating rice, milk, and herbs, after they had been mixed: and stretching his hand from the cow-field to the ^f house, to reach a milk-vessel: yet he made no scruple to tell lies; for after stealing butter from his mother, he denied it stily. When he grew up, he performed many great exploits against giants and serpents; yet left not off his childish tricks or lying. One time he stole the womens cloaths while they were bathing, that he might see them come naked out of the reckoned most eminent:

¹ BALD. p. 772, & seqq. ubi sup. p. 781.

² Ibid. p. 775, & seqq. ³ ROGER, ubi sup. p. 166.

⁴ Ibid. p. 777, & seqq.

⁵ Ibid.

(D) Perhaps rather Dajerrata, from Dajerrat, his father.

(E) According to Roger's account, they were Devetas, or good angels, who assumed the form of apes on this occasion, as Rawan and his associates were Rakshasas, or demons. Both sorts sprung from Kashyapa, a *Brámma*n.

(F) Or Kishna and Kishna: Others write Krishna and Krishnu.

(G) For they say, in others, he appeared with only part of his divinity; but in this he brought with him the whole godhead.

- a water: another time meeting some milk-maids, he broke their pails; and then denied it, when taxed by his mother. Rajah Kans, alarmed at these miracles, sent several giants and armies against him; but he killed them all, and at length the Rajah himself. After this, Kisna did many other famous actions; restored the lame to their limbs, the dead to life, metamorphosed cottages into palaces, pulled down tyrants, and restored injured kings; punished oppressors, and succoured the distressed. Mean time, the cow-herds, who had made him their king, and were increased to five hundred and sixty millions, grew daily more wicked as they became more numerous; wherefore Kisna set them at variance, so that they destroyed one another. After this, having conveyed his 16,000 wives, with a few others, who remained, into heaven, he ascended thither himself. The Hindûs say, that if the earth was of paper, it would not contain an account of all the miracles wrought by Kisna, during the space of one hundred years, in the third period of time^a.

Vistnum's ninth incarnation was in the form of Boudha, or Bodha, by some called Bhavam, 9th incarnation: who, according to the Baniyans, has neither father nor mother, and is invisible: but that whenever he does appear, it is with four arms (H). He spends his whole time in praying with a dejected countenance to the great god, called Mahadew by the Baniyans; and after having continued 34,030 years without performing any miracles, his time on earth will be expired with the fourth period of the world, which is the present and last^b. This is all we learn from Baldæus: to which it may be proper to add, that this Boudha is the same with the god Fo^c, who is worshipped by more than one half of Asia; and is believed to reside at Lassa, in the Great Tibet, in a human form. It is probable, that these ten incarnations had their rise from the example of Fo, who often disappears; and that the drift of the forgers of this ninth in particular, was to derive the religion of Tibet from their own.

THE tenth and last transformation of Vistnum into a white winged-horse, called Kallenkin, 10th incarnation: is yet to come; and is to put an end to the present world. The Baniyans say, that this Indian Pegasus stands in heaven upon three feet only, holding up his right fore-leg, without intermission. They say also, that at the beginning of this metamorphosis, they shall live piously and happily; but that, by degrees, they shall degenerate into all manner of impiety and wickedness, for the space of 40,570 years. At the expiration whereof, the winged-horse shall strike or stamp on the earth with his uplifted foot, with such prodigious force, that the serpent Signaga, being no longer able to support the world, will creep from under it; when the tortoise, finding the whole burden laid upon his back, will run into the sea and drown the earth (I); which is to put an end to this last period or age of time; and then the first is to begin again^a.

III.

Ishuren, or Ruddiren.

- e THIS god, we are told, has no fewer names than 1008^b; but of these, three or four Names number: are chiefly in use. The name which he goes by in the Vedam and Shaster, is Ruddiren, or, as some pronounce, Rutren; yet the name by which he is commonly known in the Indies, at least the southern provinces, is Ishuren, or Iffuren, as it is pronounced in some parts of East Malabâr; or Ispuren, in other parts of it; Ispara in West Malabâr; and Eswâra, or Esvâra, in Karnâta and Choromandel, if the difference does not proceed from some fault in our author's spelling. This deity is, by the Baniyans and Gentews of Hindûstân, qualified with the title of Mahadew, or the Great God. The Malabars likewise give him the same name or title^c; that is, they who are of the sect which account him the chief of the three gods of the first class: and we are told, that he is the principal of all the gods of the Malabarians^d: yet in Karnâta he is only accounted the sovereign god by some^e; for there Vistnum seems to be most in vogue. He has likewise another name adapted to this superiority which is ascribed to him by his votaries, and that is Chiven, or Chivens (K), signifying the True God, or Supreme Being; of whom the Vedam and Shaster treat^f. This name he obtained for guarding the Chive Linga, whereof an account will be given presently.

THE votaries of this god ascribe to him immortality; which they say he obtained by the ashes which remained within the shell, after the Chive Linga was burned^g: and though, agreeable to the Vedam and Shaster, they say his office is to destroy^h, or to put a period to all

^a BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 789, & seqq.

ubi supr. p. 810.

part iii. p. 150. BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 766.

p. 22.

^b PHILLIPS'S Account of Malâb. p. 42.

^c PHIL. Malâb.

^d Ibid. p. 809.

^e Dan. Lettr. part i. p. 21.

^f BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 816.

^g Lettr. Edif.

^h BALDÆUS, ⁱ BERNIER'S Mem. Mog. Emp.

^j ROGER, ubi supr.

^k BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 150.

(H) Kircher gives Bodha four heads also; but this, our author says, is an error.

(I) This is contrary to the Shaster; which says the earth shall be destroyed by fire.

(K) De Faria writes Jivens, Port. Asia, vol. ii. p. 379; and Baldæus, Qui-ven, p. 755.

things at last; yet they give him also the power of creating, at least, two men, named Bira- a patrem and *Quatraquale*¹. They assign him for his Wabanam, or beast of carriage, a bull-calf, called Irisbipatan, instead of a horse; but seem to differ as to the place of his residence.
Those of Karnâta say, that he resides with his wife Parvati, in Kaylasom, which is one of the three places, or heavens, where God converses². According to the Malabârs he dwells in Kala-ja, a silver mount, and kind of paradise, to the south of the famous mountain Maba *Meru*³: again, other Malabârs will have it, that his abode is in *Cbiwalogum*⁴; which signifies the world of Cbiwens.

his person,

To come to the history of Ishuren. They say, with respect to his person, that he is of so vast a bigness, as to encompass all the seven heavens above, and the seven worlds (L.) beneath⁵:
but one day, boasting before some other spirits of his immense size, Bramma and Vishnum b took it ill; whereupon a contest arose; the consequence of which was, that Bramma lost one of his heads, as hath been already related in our account of him. Though Vishnum be black, Ishuren is bright, and white as milk, with three eyes, one of them in his forehead; which last they say is so full of fire, that it consumes whatever it looks upon. He has no fewer and drags: than sixteen arms, and holds something in each hand. His apparel is a tiger's skin; his cloak the hide of an elephant surrounded with serpents. He wears about his neck a collar of fur, with a bell fastened to it; likewise three chains. One is intermixed with roses, and other sweet flowers. The second is made of the heads of Bramma: for they say Bramma dies and revives every year; and that Ishuren, gathering his heads as often as he dies, made this chain of them. The third is made of the bones of Chatti, one of his wives, who dying like- c wise annually, he every time that happens takes one of her bones, and adds it to the rest⁶.
He carries also the same beads as the Brâmmans do; his whole body being besmeared with ashes (of cow-dung) (M), and thus rides in triumph through Kala-ja upon his ox Irisbipatan, to whom they offer certain sacrifices.

turns mendicant

THE Brâmmans say, that Ishuren, to expiate the crime of cutting-off Brâmma's fifth head, turned mendicant for twelve years; begging for alms, with the skull in his hand: for though he received a sufficient quantity from time to time, yet it was instantly consumed by the fiery rays which darted from his third eye. One day, as he was collecting alms among the Mumis, or Risbi, who inhabited the woods about Kala-ja (the place of his residence, where they spent their time in sacrificing), their wives came running with ladles full of blood to fill the skull; d but they were so surprised at his flaming eye, that they not only dropp'd their ladles but their cloaths. The Mumis, seeing their wives naked, fell furiously on Ishuren; one with an axe, another with a serpent, a third set a tiger upon him, and a fourth a wild elephant: but he flew all those animals, and carried off their skins as trophies. At length Vishnum, to deliver Ishuren, appeared to the Mumis in the form of a beautiful virgin; which so surprised them, that they fell into a trance; and thus the god escaped from the men. Towards the end of the twelfth year, Ishuren, being tired of his mendicant life, had recourse to Vishnum; who, commiserating his condition, put out the fiery eye, which consumed the alms as fast as he received them; and then wounding himself in the finger, filled the skull with the blood, which put an end to Ishuren's pilgrimage⁷; but gave birth to the order of the Joghis (N), who, in memory e thereof, lead a mendicant life to this day.

for twelve years:

outrages committed by him,

AMONG other extravagancies related of this god, we are told that, during his pilgrimage, Jeksha Prajava (O), king of the Peringales, and father of his wife Paramesseri, or Parvati, having a desire to see his daughters in their full glory, invited Bramma and Vishnum, who were also his sons-in-law, to a magnificent feast; but neglected to do the same to Ishuren (P): yet, on considering the matter, invited him at last. This, however, the mendicant god took so heinously, that he resolved to spoil the feast. His anger was farther provoked by the treatment his wife received: for having obtained leave from him to go to the banquet, he ordered her to put on her best apparel; and, to set her off to the most advantage, lent her his serpents, his umbrella of peacocks tails, his chain of bones, his tiger's skin, and his elephant's hide. f
Thus equipped, she mounted upon an ox; and with a large attendance of drummers, Pudas and Pishares, came to her father's palace. Her sisters and the other guests, who met her at the gates, seeing her in such a droll equipage, instead of bidding her welcome, burst out into

¹ BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 756, 763.

² ROGER, p. 156, 183.

³ BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 757.

⁴ PHIL. Malab. p. 25.

⁵ Danish Lettr. part i. p. 21.

⁶ BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 755.

⁷ Ibid.

p. 757, & seqq.

(L) They say, that the serpent Batrîga, which embraces the seven worlds and seven seas, was not long enough to serve him for a girdle. Baldæus, p. 755.

(M) This is the form in which he is represented in the pagods. His attendants are Pudas, Pisharos, and Pes. Baldæus, ubi supr. p. 756.

(N) Rather perhaps the Goghis, who are Brâmmans; the Joghis are of another tribe.

(O) Roger calls him Dajza, as the reader will find in the history of Brâmma.

(P) According to Roger, p. 155, the reason he gave for not inviting Efcara, or Ishuren, was, that as he lived by begging his bread, and had not cloaths to cover him, he was not worthy to be invited. On which his daughter Harvati replied, nor I neither; and so leaped into the fire prepared for sacrifice, and was consumed.

laughter;

a laughter; which so vexed Paramesseri, that, without alighting, she returned to Kalaja, loudly complaining of the affront which had been put upon her.

ISHUREN, thinking himself concerned in the ill-treatment given his wife, sent his sons as Prajava's Quenavadi and Superbennia to spoil their mirth: but Vistnum, knowing that the first was fond of cakes, and the latter of hearing stories, took care to throw those amusements in their way, so that they forgot their errand. Ishuren hereupon sent his daughter Patragali; who being likewise detained by some good-cheer she met with in the hall (for she loved her belly dearly), he resolved to go himself. As soon as Vistnum and Bramma got notice of this, they made an apology to their father-in-law, as not being, they said, able to cope with Ishuren; and withdrew, leaving only the Sun and Moon behind. The angry god, entering the palace b presently after, seized Prajava by the hair. At the same instant there stepped forth (the offspring of his anger) a warrior armed cap-a-pie, called Virapatrem, who cut-off the king's head, with the hands of the god of fire, and beat-out the teeth of the Sun^p. This is the Malabâr legend; but that of Karnâta, which differs in several particulars, says, the Moon also had a hearty banging; whence her black spots: and that the king got a goat's head instead of his own^q.

As Ishuren, or Ruddiren, is the true, and, very likely, the original Priapus of antiquity, the Indian so many things are related of him suitable to that character: among the rest, he once forced Priapus: a young she-slave, who refused to comply with his lustful desires^r. He is often spoken of as shedding his semen on the ground; which always gave birth to something. As this happened
c one time just after enjoying his wife Paramesseri, she covered it with some earth; from whence sprung-up a palm-tree, whose liquor so well pleased Ishuren, that he often made use of it. His wife, observing that he always returned intoxicated from the wood, followed him one day; and, finding the juice agreeable, tasted so long of it, that she became fuddled herself^s: so frail, or rather so addicted to vice, are the Indian gods and goddesses. It is perhaps owing to this liquor, that Ishuren is, as we are told, everlastingly dancing^t.

NOR is Ishuren without his incarnations or appearances in human form, any more than Vistnum: for they say, that he appeared no fewer than sixty-four times, and acted so many d comedies before a great many people in the city of Madurey, capital of the kingdom of Madurey, under the name of Tsabokkenaden. Our readers may judge of the rest by an account of one; the substance of which is, that he appeared to a widow in the above-mentioned city, and offered to be her servant, on condition that he should never want for victuals. His mistress readily agreed to the bargain, expecting a good deal of work at his hands; but she quickly found herself deceived in him; for he not only devoured as much as would satisfy several men, but in short would never give over eating; so that neither persuasions nor menaces could prevail on him to do any other business. At length, the widow complained to the king of this insatiable glutton: but, although his majesty gave the lubber such a swinging blow, that it was felt all over the universe, yet this correction could not make Ishuren perform his bargain: for, rather than work, he thought fit to quit the widow's service, and disappear immediately^u. Are not such comedies, or rather farces, as these, very becoming the character of a God?

As the traditions of the different sects and countries differ in other things, so they do with e regard to the wives and children of Ishuren. In Karnâta they seem to allow him but one wife, named Parvati: in each of the Malabârs they give him two: but their names in one country are so different from those used in the other, that we cannot tell whether they be the same or not. In East Malabâr they are called Ispari and Kenkabewanani^x; in West Malabâr, Grienga and Chatti, or Paramesseri^y. As each has many names, the disagreement may possibly arise from thence; different names being used in different places. Parvati was the daughter of Dasba, son of Brâmma by Parasvati. She taking it ill that her father had not invited Ishuren, as well as Brâmma and Vistnum, to the jagam, or feast before-mentioned; and taking still f worse his reason for the slight, which was that Ishuren begged his bread, and had not cloaths to his back, for mere vexation cast herself into the fire prepared for the sacrifice, and was consumed to ashes. Ishuren was so enraged at this affair, that he sweat for anger; and from his sweat sprung Virepadra, who, by his command, committed the outrages already related. As for Parvati (who by similitude of facts appears to be the same with Paramesseri), her soul passing into another body, became the daughter of the mountain Kimmawontam, who likewise bestowed her on Eswara, or Ishuren, for a wife a second time. This god became so fond of her, that he gave her half of his body, and thus became an hermaphrodite; on which occasion the Brâmmans call him Ardhanari, that is half man and half-woman^z, or a man-wife^a. This Parvati, otherwise called Chatti and Paramesseri (according to those of West Malabâr),

^p BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 765.

^q ROGER, ubi supr. p. 155.

^r Danish Confer. p. 105.

^s BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 759.

^t Danish Confer. p. 106.

^u PHILLIPS'S Account Malab. p. 45.

Danish Confer. p. 105, 171.

^x Ibid. ubi supr. p. 96.

^y BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 757.

^z ROGER,

ubi supr. p. 152, 154.

^a BALD. p. 756.

dies and revives once a year, as hath been already mentioned. His second wife is named a Grienga, or the goddess of the seas; whom he always carries in his hair-locks^b.

his children: WE find a local difference likewise as to the number and names of Ishuren's children. Some give him two sons, others three, and some four: but it must be observed, that they distinguish two sorts of children belonging to this god; namely, those gotten by copulation, and those who were produced by his will; of which kind there were two.

ACCORDING to the tradition of Karnâta, he had two sons by his wife Parvati; the first Wikneswara, or, as the eastern Malabârs call him, Wikkeneshuren; he is likewise named Pulleiar. Some say he was only the offspring of his father's will^c.

several sons: THE second is named Komara-Swami, or Shawmi^d; and likewise Subbiramani. As Churapadbama, who ruled over fourteen worlds, and had a thousand millions of soldiers, offered many injuries to the subordinate gods, this Swami was created on purpose to chastise him; which he did, riding on a peacock, by destroying him and all his race; and for that service obtained the highest degree of happiness^e.

HIS sons of volition, were Vierepaddra, who sprung from his anger and sweat, as before-mentioned; and Beyretwa, the offspring likewise of passion; being he who scratched off the fifth head of Brâmma, and is sovereign of the devils, or judge of hell^f.

BESIDES the two first, the Malabârs also give Ishuren two children. One called Waiddionada Shwami, to whom they pray for children: the other Arrigari buddiron; who, we are told, rose out of his semen, which he shed on the appearance of Wishtnu, in the form of a beautiful woman, who came to commit uncleanness with him. To this Arrigari they always make offerings when they begin any enterprize^g.

one son an elephant: ACCORDING to the western Malabârs, Ishuren had five sons and one daughter. Three of the sons were by his wife Paramesseri, or Parvati. The first, named Quenavadi, had the head of an elephant: for one day, as they were walking by a wood, Paramesseri saw two elephants copulate; which so raised her appetite, that she persuaded Ishuren to transform them both into elephants, and play the same pranks; the effect of which frolick was this young monster, to whom she durst not give suck, for fear of having her breast torn in pieces by him. He is represented with long hair, like his father's, tied about with a serpent, an half-moon on his forehead, and red pimples all over his elephant's face. He has likewise four hands, with a large belly girt with a red piece of linen. His body shines like gold, and his legs are adorned with gold rings and bells. They say, that his father caused him to be castrated; because, being once in his mother's arms, he touched her privy parts with his trunk. Others say, he actually enjoyed her; and that therefore the elephants have no testicles.

long granting petitions: THE Hindû mechanicks and others offer the first fruits of their labour to this Quenavadi. After they have devoted themselves to his worship for twelve years, he moves one of his ears to let them know, that they must serve him twelve years more; at the end of which he shakes the other ear, to let them know that he expects still more at their hands: if they hold on twelve years longer, he then opens his eyes, and grants their requests. This god is very voracious: for they say he could devour the world; nor is to be satisfied, but in the Sugar Sea, where he has his residence, and is attended by beautiful women, who are continually employed to lade sugar, mixed with honey, into his mouth; while the musicians divert him with their instruments^h. One night, returning late from a banquet, with his umbrella in one hand, in the other a poem, and under his arm some cakes, of which he was very fond, he ran against a post, although it was moon-light, and fell down, all his things flying about. As the cakes were his greatest concern, he laid hold of them while he lay sprawling, and took a good bite or two, before he offered either to rise, or look for his book or umbrella. The moon, who beheld this pleasant spectacle, could not forbear laughing; which Quenavadi perceiving, he uttered this curse, Whoever, O Moon, shall see thee for the future on this day, shall be damnified in his privities. Hence it is, that the Hindûs will not stir abroad on the fourth day after the new moon in August, or look into the water, for fear of seeing it; altho' they observe the Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, to view that planet at the same time, with receiving any injury.

second son an ape: ISHUREN and Paramesseri were both celebrated dancers. She for her part was so nimble, that one time dropping an ear-jewel while she was in the height of her dance, she took it up with two of her toes, and put it in again, to the incredible surprize of the spectators (Q). Another time, while she and her spouse were dancing, before a great assembly of celestial spirits, invited for that purpose, she happened to spy two apes sporting in the adjacent wood;

^b ROGER, p. 755.

ibid.

^c PHILLIPS, ubi supr. p. 101, 141.

supr. p. 90, 96. Danish Confer. p. 105.

^d ROGER, ubi supr. p. 175. PHILLIPS, ubi supr. p. 34, 96.

^e ROGER, p. 144, 175.

^f PHILLIPS, ubi

^g BALDÆUS, p. 758, & seq.

(Q) Hence Baldæus supposes the custom arose among the ladies of the Nayrs (or Nabers), who when dancing at a certain feast in honour of one of their idols, on a sudden let slip all their cloaths, and remain naked.

and,

a and, taking a fancy to do the like, prevailed on Isburen to transform them into apes, which the uxorious god did; and the fruit of this frolic was an ape: but when the mad fit was over, she, being ashamed of her burden, got the Wind to convey it into the womb of Anbema, one of the ladies attending on the other spirits. Thus the ape got a new father and mother, who brought him forth. He was as white as Isburen; and, being endowed with many peculiar virtues, performed abundance of notable exploits; some already mentioned in the history of *Siri Rama*¹, under the name of Hanuman (or Anemonta). This name was given him by Isburen; because he received no harm from a great knock on the pate, which he received from his father's iron rod, for endeavouring to leap up and snap at the Sun when he was hungry. Another time quarrelling with Akropadia, a white elephant, on which Devandran, king of the celestial spirits, was mounted, he happened to be killed. At this, his presumptive father the Wind was so afflicted, that he hid his face under-ground, till Isburen, at the request of the inhabitants of the earth, ready to perish for want of air, restored Hanuman to life, and recalled the Wind to his proper office.

THE third son of Isburen was called Superbennia, who had six faces and twelve hands; which happened on the following occasion. As Paramesseri was washing herself one day in a cistern, six weavers chanced to pass by, who looking upon her with very amorous desires, she became inflamed no less than they, and the same instant conceived. But, fearing her husband's anger, she spat out the embryo upon the ground; which immediately assuming the form of twelve arms and six faces, very much resembling the six weavers, they carried him with them, and gave him an accomplished education. One time Isburen, entering into an argument with him, was so taken with his wit, that he received him for his son, assigned him a residence at Kala ja, and presented him with a peacock to ride on^k.

FROM this circumstance he appears to be the same with Subbiramania of the eastern Malabârs, before-mentioned. Once upon a time, Isburen, desirous to try the agility of this son and Quenavadi, offered a very fine fig, as a reward to him who should ride round Kala ja with most expedition. The two brothers started together: but as Quenavadi, who was very heavy, and rode only upon a mouse, knew that he would lose the race; he took the opportunity, when Superbennia was gotten a good way before him on his peacock, to turn short and seize the fig. Superbennia having won the prize, and not finding it as he expected, fell with such fury upon Quenavadi, that he beat out one of his elephant's teeth. However, Isburen bestowing on him another fig, the difference was soon composed: but not knowing what to do with the tooth, he gave it to Vistnum, desiring him to restore it to the proprietor. The method Vistnum took to do this, was to put it in a fig, which he presented to his nephew; who, going to eat it, found his tooth. Quenevadi, instead of putting the tooth into his head again, converted it into a nice pen, which he kept to write his poetry with^l.

BESIDES these three sons, the western Malabârs give Isburen two more. One stiled Ega Sourubum, or the true god, is represented with an elephant's head and eleven hands. He is to be worshipped only by the Brâmmans, although others also sacrifice to him. The other son is named Sbewshi. This son had his origin from the impurities which came from the body of Paramesseri one day when she was washing herself in a pond. Isburen, perceiving a man at a distance, and imagining him to be her gallant, hastened thither, and cut-off his head; which, falling at the foot of mount Kala ja, became a coco-tree: and hence the Indians say that the figure of a human face was impressed on the coco-nut. As Paramesseri grieved exceedingly at her son's death, Isburen made an apology for his mistake; and, to comfort her, cut-off the head of a white elephant, and, fixing it on Sbewshi's shoulders, restored him to life again^m.

So much for Isburen's sons: but his daughter is something still more extraordinary: her production was on the following occasion. The giant Darida having, besides a present of a book and some bracelets, obtained from Brâmma the gift of being invulnerable, and appearing as if he had a great many heads, became so vain-glorious that he challenged Isburen. The god, knowing his strength, sent against him a female named Sorga, with six other women; who cut-off all his false or imaginary heads, but could do him no farther injury. On this, Isburen consulted Vistnum; who, while they were talking, sent forth from his body a certain matter, which, entering that of Isburen, passed out again through the eye in his forehead, and falling on the ground, in an instant became a female; whom Isburen acknowledged for his daughter, and distinguished by the name of Patragali, or Patrakoli Pagoda.

THIS daughter had eight faces and sixteen hands, as black as a coal, with great round eyes, and teeth like tusks of a boar. Instead of pendants, her image has two elephants in its ears, and her body is covered with serpents, instead of a garment. Her hair-locks are the tails of peacocks; and in each hand she carries some instrument; such as a sword, a trident, a china basin, a rope, an ape, and the like. This monster went immediately to revenge her father's quarrel, and fought the giant for seven days; but found, after cutting-off seven of his false heads, that he was not vulnerable, so long as he was possessed of the book and bracelets given to him by Brâmma. She therefore applies to Sorga; who, going to Darida's wife in his absence, asked in his name for the said things; which were forthwith delivered to her. By this means Darida, being deprived of his strength, in the next conflict had his real head cut-off by his female antagonist.

¹ See before, p. 198, & seq.^k BALDÆUS, p. 761.^l Idem ibid.^m Idem ibid.

abuses her father :

PATRAGALI, elated with this victory, hastened to Ishuren; who, being undressed, leaped into a cistern to avoid being seen by her; and from thence gave her some flesh and some blood. But finding her not satisfied, he bad her hold out her basin; and, cutting-off one of his fingers, filled it with his own blood. She, far from being yet contented, threw one of her gold chains in his face; which raising many pustules in his skin, he cried out, with great surprize, Basuri! that is, O you revengeful woman! and, desiring her to desist, created two young men, named Birapatrem and Quetraquele, whom he bestowed on her; which made her easy. From this time Basuri signified the small pox among the Malabârs; who say it is the sword of Patragali, and for that reason endeavour to mitigate her wrath by sacrifices. They affirm, that her chief residence is in the pagoda of Kranganor, called the temple of pilgrims, from the vast number of zealots who flock thither. In this temple, near her statue, stands a huge man in marble; whom every day the Brâmmans beat on the head with hammers, to keep him from growing.

how appeased
by him :

passes to Malabâr :

ISHUREN, to get rid effectually of Patragali, besides her gallants, presented her likewise with a ship of sandal wood, ordering her to take a voyage into the world, and reside there incognito; yet to require vows and sacrifices from the inhabitants. But while he was found asleep one morning, little dreaming of a visit from his termagant daughter, he was suddenly awaked by her overturning his bedstead: for, being attacked, as soon as she had put to sea, by some fishermen and ape-hunters, she was forced to return to Kalaja to crave her father's assistance; who having endowed her with new vigour, she defeated the ape-hunters, and landed safely at Koulang, a city of Malabâr; where the queen entertained her for twelve years as her own daughter. After this term she was married to the son of the lord of Kouleta (R); and there lived twelve years more without ever cohabiting with her husband, as boasting herself to be the daughter of Ishuren. Afterwards her father and mother-in-law having been robbed at sea of all their riches by the ape-hunters, she gave her gold foot-rings to her husband to dispose of. He, on the road, met with a goldsmith; who, pretending to buy them, brought him to Pandi, and there accused him of stealing such rings from the queen of that place, which he himself had stolen not long before. On this accusation, the stranger was imprisoned, and afterwards impaled on a palm-tree. Patragali, after waiting six days without hearing of her husband, set out in quest of him, asking news of him from every thing she met with; but experienced very indifferent usage from some of them. A mango-tree was so churlish as not to afford her an answer; a cow gave her a hearty kick by way of reply; a Nairo let her fall into a pit, which he had covered over with twigs to deceive her; and a Nairo's daughter only flouted and laughed when she asked her the question. However, she gave those rude creatures her curse; and, to make her some amends, was treated with great respect by two birds, a Jakotree, a Polea, and a Parrea: so that, although they were not able to give her any intelligence, yet she gave them her blessing. At length she came to the fatal palm-tree; which being too high for her to reach, she obtained by her prayers that it broke, and so delivered her husband: but, although she had not power of herself to make the tree bend down to her, yet she had power, it seems, to bring the dead man to life againⁿ.

her adventures
there.

Ishuren worshipped.

THUS much for the wives and children of Ishuren, or Ruddiren. Let us next see in what manner he is worshipped by the Hindûs. He is represented in the pagods in two different manners; one is in the form of a man, with three eyes, and sixteen hands, dressed in the way already described: the other manner of representing him is in the shape of the virile member, or rather the privy parts of both sexes in conjunction, which they call Linga, or Lingam. In the countries of east and west Malabâr, he is worshipped in both these forms (S); but in some parts of Karnâta he is represented in temples solely in the form of the Lingam. This at least is the case in the country about Paliakatta, on the coast of Choromandel, according to the account of Abr. Roger; who at the same time observes, that in processions he is carried in his proper figure; as the human form is more acceptable to the people than the Lingam^o.

in form of a Priapus.

THEY seem to be hard put to it to find a reason for the Lingam worship: they say that a Muniswara (T), going to visit Ishuren one day, when he was in private with his wife Parvati, was kept waiting so long by the porter, that he grew angry, and dropped some offensive ⁿ BALDÆUS, ubi sup. p. 762, & seqq.

^o ROGER Mœurs des Bram. p. 155, 157.

(R) A country seven leagues to the north of Kalkut.
(S) He is worshipped also under the form of an ox, and name of Nandi. Compare Phil. Maiab. p. 34, and Roger, p. 175, 242.

(T) The Munis are great saints; and Muniswara seems to be compounded of Munis and Esvara, or Ishuren, to denote their particular attachment to him. No doubt there are Munis also devoted to Vishnum.

- a words ; which Ishuren overhearing, asked the Munifwara why he spoke so ? the saint begged pardon, saying, he was in a fret ; and made a request, that they who worshipped the figure of the Lingam might receive more benefit than those who worshipped his image made with hands and feet : which request Ishuren granted ^p. However that be, Ishuren is no less famous on account of this obscene way of representing him, than Vistnum for his ten transformations. There are several sects particularly devoted to the worship of the Lingam, which figure they wear in their hair, and about their necks (U), wrapped up in linen ^q : nay, about Goa, and in Kanara, the infatuation for the Lingam runs so high, that brides are carried to this Priapus to be deflowered, before they can be enjoyed by their husbands ; who thank the bawdy God for saving them so much trouble ^r.
- b THE Brammans observing that all animals were produced by copulation, made a deity of The Lingam, the instruments of generation ; and account for its origin in this manner. They say, that 14 ^{disfid.} worlds being produced from an egg, Ishuretta, or the divinity, taking his place in the highest heaven, there arose on the earth the mountain Kalaja : that on the top of it stood a triangular substance ; and this produced a round substance, called Chive Linga (X) ; which they say is Ishuretta, or the divinity itself. This circular figure was inclosed in three distinct rinds, or shells, which were transmuted into three Gods, Bramma, Vistnum, and Chiven (or Ishuren). Chiva Linga, thus stripped of its shell, was burnt to ashes, and fixed in the triangle ; and being thus become without sense or motion, it was requisite that it should be guarded by somebody. This Bramma and Vistnum refusing to do, Chiven undertook the task, constantly attending on it with prayers and sacrifices of flowers. As by this means he deserved to be ranked before his brothers, he obtained the title of The Great God [Maha Dew] as their poets call him ^s.
- c

THIS doubtless is the legend, or tradition, of the Lingam sects (for all have an equal right of Ishuren's ^{disfid.} forging). The name of the divinity Ishuretta is from Ishuren : Kalaja is his place of residence ; and the name of Chive Linga, which is the thing in his keeping, shews it belongs to, or is a part of, himself. In effect, they make him the offspring of his own privities ; and worship them as a God, the producer of all animal created beings. It is no wonder therefore that they so much extol and magnify the penis of Ishuren : for although they ascribe to him such a prodigious height, as has been mentioned, yet they say it reached to his forehead ; and that being so large, he could not enjoy his wife Chatti, he was forced to cut it in eighteen pieces : after which he lay with her, and from this conjunction proceeded all living creatures, both rational and irrational. Hence it is, that in Kanara, between Kananor and Mangalor, there is a certain religious order, living constantly in the pagods, who appear in the streets stark-naked ; and on their ringing a bell, the women of all conditions, even to the queens, come running out to touch (our author might have said also, to kiss) their privy members ^t.

d

^p ROGER Mœurs des Bram. p. 155, 157.
41. ^r BALDÆUS, ubi supr. p. 754.

^q Ibid. p. 22, 23, and 157. PHILLIPS's Malab. p. 20, 34, ^s Ibid. ubi supr. p. 754. ^t Ibid. p. 813, 817.

(U) The Jaghis do this, and offer their best viſuals.
(X) This he explains the members of both sexes ; yet after, ſays, it ſignifies the Lingam, or member of Qui- ven (rather Chiven, or Chiwen). But this ſeeming contradiction may be reconciled, on conſidering that Chiwens, or Ishuren, is ſuppoſed to be of both ſexes.

S E C T. III.

Gods of the ſecond and third claſs.

- e AS the ſons and daughters of the gods of the firſt claſs make thoſe of the ſecond, and we Inferior gods have already given the reader a ſufficient account of them ; there remains little more to be ſaid upon the ſubject, excepting what relates to a few Dewetas, or divinities of the third claſs : who, on account of the ſervices done to the gods of the firſt claſs, have obtained the privilege of being ranked among thoſe of the ſecond, and found a place in the temples of their patrons.

f AMONG the principal leſſer gods, whoſe ſtatues are ſeen within the incloſure of the great temples, which the Wiſtnowas build in honour of their Wiſtnow (or Vistnum), one meets with thoſe of Garrouda and Annemonta. The former had the ſhape of a red ſpar-hawk, with a white ring about his neck ; and ſprung from an egg, laid by his mother Diti, which was hatched after it had remained 500 years in the ovous ſtate. Diti having brought herſelf into ſlavery to Kaddrowa Winneta (or Additi) another wife of the Bramman Kaſſiopa, through a ſilly wager, which ſhe loſt by the artifice of her rival ; Garrouda, to free her and her offspring from that oppreſſion, conveyed herſelf to Devendre Lokon, where the Amortam was kept ; and after a deſperate conflict, forced it from the Dewetas, and brought it away. His mother being delivered delivered from her bondage, by drinking of that immortal liquor, Wistnow afterwards took a Garrouda for his wahannam, or bird of carriage ^a.

Anemonta, or Hanuman, the Ape. WITH regard to Anemonta or Hanuman, an account has been already given of his exploits in the service of Wistnow ^x. As to his original, we are told, that at the same time Wistnow had commanded the Dewetas to transform themselves into apes, in order to fight the Rashajas, that is, giants or demons, there appeared a female ape, who conceived without converling with the ape her husband, and brought forth Anemonta; who, it seems, is properly the wind, ushered into the world in form of a monkey. For the services done to Wistnow, when in the shape of Ramma, he has been honoured with a small temple, within the inclosure of that god's fane; and while Garrouda attends him in heaven, Anemonta remains on earth, as Wistnow's agent to transact his affairs here, till Bramma's time is expired. After this, when Wistnow shall appear again in the world, Anemonta is to be in the place of Bramma; and Bramma is to perform the office of Anemonta, the wind ^y.

Attendants of Ishuren. THESE are the gods of the second class, in great esteem with the Wistnowas: on the other hand, the Seyvias, or worshippers of Eswara, or Ishuren, join to the children of that god certain other beings for the objects of their devotion; namely, Pudas, Pisharos, and Pes, who are the attendants of Ishuren, and always found in his temples. Pudas is represented like a thick short person, with a huge paunch, and no beard, but serpents hanging down from his head, instead of hair. He wears serpents also for bracelets on his arms and thighs, and carries a staff in his right hand. The Pes and Pisharos are represented much taller, holding lighted torches in the night time ^z. As Roger mentions none of these gentry, it is probable that they are not found in the pagods of Karnâta. However, that author, besides the sons of Ishuren, saw in his temples Nandi, otherwise called Bafwa and Bafanna, who has the figure of an ox ^a; but others say this is Ishuren himself ^b.

Gods of the third class. THIS is all we find relating to the gods of the second class. As for those of the third order, they consist of such as we call spirits, or angels, both good and evil. The good angels, or spirits, they call Dewetas; and the evil ones, Rashajas. These, according to the Hindû tradition, were not immediately created by the gods of the first class, or begotten by them, but had a human original; being the offspring of the first Bramman who was in the world, named Kasshopa. This Bramman, who was the son of Bramma, had two wives, one called Diti, who was the mother of the Dewetas (Y); the other Aditi, who brought forth the Rashajas (Z), or demons. Some of these latter have been wicked men, and therefore are condemned for their sins to wander about the world in the shape of men, and live by begging. As these devils are under the command of Beyrewa, the son of Eswara (or Ishuren), he takes care that they shall not do any hurt to mankind, or pluck so much as an ear of corn, without their permission. The rest of these Rashâjas are those to whom that name properly belongs, and are really devils; having it in their power to do mischief to mankind, and even disturb the Dewetas, or good angels themselves, as appears from the histories of Rawan, and others already related. These are met with all over the world, and even in Surgam, or the worlds under heaven; but not in heaven itself. These devils have stinking bodies, and very deformed shapes. As there are of them both males and females, they propagate their species, who are subject to death like other mortal beings.

place of residence: THE place of their residence is said to be in the island of Andemân, in the way from Palliakatta to Pegu; and they are represented as man-eaters; such as the inhabitants of Andemân are reported to be ^c.

of two kinds. THE Dewetas, or good angels, are likewise divided into two sorts; for the souls of men, who die in a happy state, and go into one of the places of bliss (A), which are under heaven, obtain also the name of Dewetas; and after they have been there for a certain time, according to the degree of their merits, must return to this world, and be born again: but then there are Dewetas who remain always in the lower heavens. Of these there are a great number, among whom are reckoned Suria, the sun, and Shendra, the moon, with all the stars; to each of whom they ascribe a soul and life; and the two great luminaries are held in high veneration by the sects devoted to Wistnum ^d. Besides the above-mentioned, all the governors of the several worlds and paradises, of whom Rajab Inder, or Dew-endiren, is chief, all the guardians of Evil angels worshipped.

^a ROGER, Mœurs des Bram. p. 3, 168, & seqq. p. 172, & seqq.

^x See before, p. 198.

^y ROGER, ubi supr.

^z BALDÆUS, ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 756.

^a ROGER, ubi

supr. p. 175. ^b PHILLIPS'S Account of Malabar, p. 34.

^c ROGER, ubi supr. p. 185, & seqq.

^d Ibid. ubi supr. p. 185, & seqq. item, p. 176.

(Y) Baldæus calls them Devagal, or Dewetas, ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 766.

(Z) Baldæus calls them Raxiaxa [Rashiasa or] Adiren. ap. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 766.

(A) Called Devalogum; which signifies the place of these gods, or divinities. This word Dew, Dew, or Diw, is prefixed to the names of some, as Dew, or Devinderen, mentioned lower down. It is the fourth of the fourteen worlds, lying between those of Wistnu and Brama; which last is the fifth, according to Mr. Ziegenbalg. See La Croz. Hist. de Chrétiens des Ind. p. 464.

a towns and provinces on earth, with the rulers of the infernal regions, and the like, are ranked amongst the gods of this third class (B). These are all worshipped by the Hindûs, according to their fancy; not excepting the devils; among whom Ganga, Gramma, and Gûrnatba, are the chief. There are temples every-where (in Karnâta) erected to Ganga, who is worshipped in the form of a head and four arms; but Gûrnatba is not honoured with any, excepting in one place, which, it seems, is against rule; the gods of this class being, for the general, such whose images are set up only in the fields or in houses.

THE better to comprehend this system of inferior gods, it will be proper to set forth the System of the Indian notion of the universe; which they say is like an egg, comprehending in it the heavens, the earth, and the abyſs. Of these the earth, or this world, which they call Bow Lokon, or Lugom, that is, the place below, possesses the middle place, between the upper and the lower worlds. The heavens, or upper worlds, are of three kinds; those of the first and highest sort are three in number, Kaylason, Lila Weykontam, and Weykontam. These are the places where God himself (or the Supreme Being) resides^c. This account needs some farther explanation. The Brâmmans, that is, those of the sects who make Wistnum, or Ishuren, the supreme Being, assign two sorts of places for the presence or residence of God; one where he exists as a spirit, the other corporally. And as we find that Kaylason (C) is of this latter kind (for there Eswara, or Ishuren, is said to reside bodily with his wife Parvati^d), we presume the other two are reserved for his spiritual appearance, especially Weykontam, where we are told God hath his abode^e. This tradition is doubtless according to the principles of the Seyvias, who acknowledge Ishuren's supremacy: but although Wistnum has not his residence in any of these heavens, yet to those who are wholly devoted to his service, the privilege is granted of going immediately to Weykontam, which is the highest heaven of bliss; from whence souls never return into this world^f.

THE second kind of heaven is immediately under the other three, and called Bramma Lokon, Second sort, from the good Bramma, who resides there.

THE third sort, called by the general name of Surgam, or Sorgam, are rather so many Third sort, paradises or elysian fields, including the infernal regions, whither the souls of people go from this world after death. These, which are eight in number, lie between Bramma Lokon and Bow Lokon, or this earth; taking their names from the spirits who govern them. 1. Indre Lokon, where Indre, or Dewendra, the god of the blessed souls, governs immediately under Bramma, as his deputy; and the seven other chiefs under him; 2. Akni Lokon; 3. Jamma or paradises. Lokon, which is hell; 4. Niruti Lokon; 5. Warowna Lokon; 6. Kubera Lokon; 7. Wajowwia Lokon; 8. Isanja Lokon. Each of the last seven chiefs, besides the government of his world, or place, has also the superintendance of other affairs. Akni (or Vanni (D) takes care, or is the god, of the fire. Jamma (or Padurpati (E))—Niruti (or Nirurdi)—Warrunna (or Varumna, and Varrinem) rules the sea; Wajowwia (or Maril) governs the winds; Kubera (called also Bassironnem) looks after riches. As for Isanja, or Ishananam, we are told he is Ishuren himself^g.

THIS is the order of the celestial regions. With regard to Bow Lokon, or this earth, they say also that it consists of seven worlds, each separated from another by a sea, from whence it takes a name. That nearest the center is surrounded with a sea of fresh water; the next to this is inclosed with a sea of milk (F). The sea which environs the third world, consists of butter; that embracing the fourth is of Tayer, thick milk, or clouted cream. The fifth world is encompassed with a sea of wine; the sixth with a sea of syrup; and the last, which is this we inhabit, with a salt sea. In the middle of the Bow Lokon stands the mountain Merow, or Meruperwât often mentioned before; which is so high, that it reaches upwards above the eight celestial worlds, or regions, and downwards, as low as the great abyſs, called Patalam (or Padalas). Although this mountain is of gold, yet there grow upon it all sorts of fruits, which have the property of preventing the eaters from ever becoming old; but then none have the privilege to eat them, but the Dewetas. This mountain is as it were the axis of the heavens, round which the sun, moon, and stars, perform their revolutions; so that when the sun is behind it, it is night^h.

^c ROGER, ubi supr. p. 245, & seqq.

^d Ibid. p. 290.

Asia. vol. ii. p. 384.

^e Idem ibid.

^f Ibid. p. 182, & seq.

^g Ibid. p. 148, 181.

^h Ibid. ubi supr. p. 156.

ⁱ Ibid. p. 148, 181. Baldaeus, 772, 780. DE FARIA Portug.

(B) These contained in the fourth world, and also the (Agni or) prophets, are under Dewendiren. Zieg. ibid.

(C) It is said to be the highest of the three heavens; possibly by mistake, instead of the lowest; which doubtless it ought to be, as being the most sensual.

(D) Brammas, after Dr Soufa, gives several of these governors, or chiefs, different names, which we have included within parentheses.

(E) Baldaeus makes him king of the evil spirits; and Nirurdi king of the infernal spirits. By the evil spirits must, we presume, be understood the Rashâjas, or Ad-diren.

(F) In this sea of milk Wistnum is said to have his residence.

Patalam, or purgatory.

As to Patalam, or the Padalas (G), that is, the abyſs, we are told they are ſubterranean places, like the purgatory and limbus of the Romanists. Theſe are ſeven in number, whoſe names are Adela, Bidela, Sudela, Taladelam, Sadelam, Mahadelam, and Padelam; which inferior worlds are inhabited by men, who receive no other light but what certain ſerpents, carrying very bright ſtones on their heads, afford them^m.

Ages of the world.

WE have already mentioned the four ages, or periods of time, which are aſcribed to this world, and to each of which the Brâmmans allot a vaſt number of years, very incompatible with our chronology; for, according to them, the firſt period conſiſts of 1,728,000 years; the ſecond, of 1,296,000; the third, of 8,064,000 years; and the fourth, of 4,032,000 years. The three firſt are expired; and of the laſt, to this year 1752, 4852 are already paſt, according to the computation of the Malabârians; but 4853 according to that of the Baniyans of *Surât*ⁿ.

^m BALDÆUS, ubi ſupr. p. 814.

ⁿ Ibid. p. 768.

(G) Our authors ſpeak of theſe worlds, which are in number fourteen, not very diſtinctly. Mr. Ziegenbalg, in his account of the Indians, and their religion, which he left in manuſcript, ſeems to have been more exact. But M. Le Croze has given from thence the names of only five of thoſe fourteen worlds, in the following order; 1. Padala Logum (or Locum) or hell, whoſe king is Emen, the god of death. His court is compoſed of devils [or Rasbejas]; and here the damned ſouls are tormented. 2. Pa Logum, which is the earth we inhabit. 3. Maga [or Maha] Logum, where Wiſhtnu and his court reſide. 4. Deva [or Deva] Logum, or the world of the Gods, in number 330,000, beſides 48,000 prophets, all ſubject to Devendren, king of this world. 5. Chaddia Logum, where Birama, or Brama, has his abode. M. Le Croze forbore giving the names of the other nine worlds, becauſe his manuſcript ſaid nothing in particular about them. But we could wiſh he had either the whole work, or a more complete extraſt than what has been publiſhed by Le Croze; to whom the world however is infinitely obliged for that noble abſtraſt which he has preſented them.

S E C T. IV.

Their pagods, or temples, and way of worſhip.

Pagod, their ſtructure.

THERE are in every town of Karnâta at leaſt two pagods (H), one in honour of Wiſhtnum, the other of Iſhuren. Theſe are well built, and higher than thoſe appropriated to the leſſer gods; but not ſo large as Chriſtian churches. They are low and flat, but without windows, or any light, excepting what comes in by the doors. The pagod is divided into three parts: the firſt conſiſts of an arched iſle, ſupported by pillars, beſet with ſtatues of animals, and open for all to enter; the ſecond part is ſhut with a ſtrong gate, which is open by day, but guarded by Brâmmans, who ſuffer none to go in. In this diviſion are ſeen frightful images, with many heads and hands: the third part is ſecured alſo with a ſtrong door; and there the ſtatue of the god is kept to whom the temple is dedicated. Round theſe temples is a large ſpace of ground, or court, incloſed with walls; on which are built ſeveral little pagods: thoſe of Wiſhtnum contain the temples of his wife Latſemi, Garrouda, and Annemonta. The image of Garrouda is in the form of a man, with wings on each ſide; but Annemonta has the face of an ape. In the plain, or court, belonging to the pagod of Eſwara, or Iſhuren, you meet with the leſſer temples, or chapels of Parvati, his wife, and his ſons Vikneſwara (named alſo Pullari and Winnaika), Komaraweſwara, and Verrepadra; alſo that of Nandi, or Baſwa, the ox, who is the wahannam of Iſhuren; and of Suria, the ſun. As for Sbendra, or the moon, ſhe has no chapel; but yet ſhe does not loſe her veneration, being always placed on the head of Iſhuren^o (I).

Pagod worſhip;

IT does not appear that the Brâmmans aſſemble the people to the pagods, or that there are any days ſet apart for divine ſervice: only on certain nights, once or twice a month, the images of Wiſhtnum and Iſhuren are carried about in proceſſion through the ſtreets. The ſtatue is ſet on a wooden horſe, with his fore-feet raiſed in the air, the other two fixed to a ſquare floor of planks, which is carried on the ſhoulders of four Mukwâs, or fiſhermen. The rider is covered with an umbrella, and has a man with a fan to drive away the flies, while a great many lights march before. On its return to the pagod, the dancers (K), who belong to the ſame, begin their ceremony; and all the while theſe girls perform their duty, ſongs are ſung, and muſick play'd, in honour of the god.

^o ROGER, ubi ſupr. p. 204—208.

(H) From Poat Gheda, a Persian word; Poat ſignifying an idol, and Gheda a temple. Ov. Voy. to Surat, p. 159.

(I) The commentator of Roger ſuppoſes that the Brammans took this practice from the book of Judges, chap. viii. verſe 21, 26; where we are told that the heads of the kings of the Iſhmaelites, or Moabites, were always adorned with little creſcents: but we cannot well conceive how the moon can be ſaid to be placed on the head of Iſhuren, who yet is ſaid to be repreſented in form of the Lingam.

(K) Theſe dancers are all prostitutes, though dedicated to the ſervice of the temples. See alſo Phillips's Account of Malabâr, p. 100, 102.

EVERY

- a EVERY one is studious to render honour to, and adorn, the image, according to his sect; leave p. 217. and because Wistnum would have his statue strewed with flowers, and cloathed with fine garments, richly adorned with precious stones, therefore his devotees spare no cost to please him: on the other hand, Eswara (or Ishuren) likes that his image should be frequently washed with water, or some perfumed liquor; and therefore his worshippers don't fail to oblige him. As a mark of respect also, they light lamps, and lay victuals before their images twice a day, ushered in with the sound of flutes and drums. This is done, in order to sanctify them for the Brâmmans, who eat no victuals but what have been thus offered to, or placed before, the image of their favourite god. On certain feast-days the images both of the gods and goddesses are carried about on triumphal chariots drawn by a great number of men. The people reverence them, by raising their hands on high, joined close together; but none of the lower classes dare so much as touch them. Many are so infatuated, as to lie on the way, or throw themselves under the wheels of the chariot, there to sacrifice themselves, by being crushed to death^a.

THE Brâmmans, when they enter the temples, leave their slippers without the door thereof, and advance with much devotion. The people likewise shew their great esteem for the pagods, by liberally contributing towards maintaining them, and those who belong to them: besides, part of the duties paid for all commodities, both foreign and domestic, are appropriated to the same uses^a.

- c DIVINE service is performed chiefly by Brâmmans, Pantaren, and Antigol (three sorts of Divine ecclesiastics). These getting up early, bathe themselves, and then prepare their drink-offering made of honey, sugar, and juice of kokoa-nut: at the same time they present flowers, and besprinkle all their offerings and images with the powder of sandal-wood (L). Next they proceed to incensing, called Tubum, and Tubaradiney, which they do with sandal and aghil (M), another odoriferous wood. After this they perform their meat offering, consisting of rice, pease, beans, butter, and kokoa-nuts; then they set it before the images, and some time after eat it among themselves; repeating, at the same time, several formularies of prayers; and read the praises of the god to whom the sacrifice is made; which sort of worship is performed daily by them^a.

- d THE women are great devotees here, as well as in Europe, and begin very early. When Females devotion a girl is seven or eight years of age, she gives herself a disciple to her parents priest; and when she is married, lists herself in the catalogue of such priest's disciples: from thenceforth she hears their discourses and documents, going into the pagods; and makes her Shalams, or salutations, to the images, and to the Brâmmans. If she be very young, she goes alone; but if marriageable, is always accompanied with two or three other women, who every now-and-then bestrew themselves with consecrated ashes, and present their offerings; in the mean time repeating the form of prayers, which they had learned of their priests. What they offer in their houses to Pulleyar (N) they give to the poor: they likewise observe fastings, vows, and (if of good understanding) the ceremonial purifications. Some frequent the pagods much; others pay their devotions to the images in the streets, when carried about on festivals; when every one at his doors, with uplift hands, makes a profound Sha'am. The women carry their censer with them, to make their offering, and are very charitable. When the priest comes to their houses, they first hear his instructions, and then set before him victuals, and all sorts of fruit^a.

- f As the Brâmmans have no communication with the class of common people, consisting of husbandmen, mechanics, and the lower populace, these Hindûs choose a priest from among themselves, and likewise a god, commonly of the two lower classes; whose image they set up in their houses. The whole process of their worship consists in the following particulars: on Friday they boil rice with milk; kill he-goats, swine, hens, and peacocks: then taking Suri for drink, and some new linen, never before used, present them all to their image; at the same time desiring that they may be kindly accepted at his hand; and that whatever they pray for may be granted them. When they have performed all their usual ceremonies, they take away the dishes of meat-offerings, and feed on them; distributing part of them among their friends and acquaintance, who are of the same sect. If any one of them falls sick, they pray the image for his health, in these words; O god, restore health, and I vow to give thee ten gilders, which shall be spent in meat-offering; or I will kill a he-goat, or boil rice, for thy use; or else I will make thee an image, &c. Besides this, says our Malabâr author (who was of the class of merchants) the populace have no other religion but their belly^a.

^a ROGER, ubi supr. p. 217—225.
p. 43.

^a Ibid. p. 236, & seqq.

^a Ibid. p. 207, & seqq.

^a PHILLIPS'S Account of Malabar,

^a Ibid. p. 60. & seqq.

(L) This is the service, doubtless, which is performed in temples of Ishuren.

(M) Or Eagle-wood.

(N) Pullayar, or Wikk n Ishuren, one of Ishuren's sons.

Images for the vulgar only.

AFTER all, the Malabarians pretend, that wise and understanding men among them perform their worship without images; these being designed (say they, like the Romanists) for children only, and the duller sort of people, who know not what ideas to form of the celestial beings^a. And, in reality, we shall find that some even of the Brâmmans themselves renounce the use of images; and for that reason do not even frequent the pagods. Many confess the impotency of their images, and acknowledge that the whole system of their divinity is nothing but a perplexed jargon of incomprehensible notions, inconsistent with, and destructive one of another.

^a Danish Letters, p. 20.

S E C T. V.

Religious ceremonies.

Holy ashes.

Pilgrimages.

Penances

for sins.

Purgatory.

Exorcisms.

Several opinions

THE religious worship of the Hindûs is attended with a great number of ceremonies; b such as observing festivals and fasts, of which they have several in the course of the year. Their washings and purifications, in which sprinkling with holy water, and holy ashes, made of cow-dung, are reckoned of no small efficacy. These ashes are made and consecrated by the priests of different sects, and are strewed upon the images of their gods, as well as the bodies of the people, particularly on their foreheads; as a preservative against misfortunes, and charm against evil spirits, in which last capacity beads are also used. Pilgrimages likewise are no less frequent in the Indies than in Europe; and besides the places of particular resort, several of which are to be found in every country of the Hindûs, there are also places of general resort: such as, Kâsi or Banârres, on the Ganges; Matura, near Agra; Kanjevoram, in Karnâta; and Devaraka (or Dawarka) near Surât, with two or three more; to which they flock from c all parts of Hindûstân and the hither peninsula^a.

THIS is reckoned a very meritorious act, and serves as a means to expiate sins. For this end likewise they have penances of several kinds; the most easy of which seems to surpass the most rigid practised by the clergy and laity of the church of Rome. Some will sit, others stand, in the same posture for years together. Some carry vast loads; others drag most weighty chains. Some expose themselves to the scorching sun; others are seen hanging before a fire with their heads downwards. In short, the acts which they perform of this nature, are astonishing, and almost incredible, were they not so unanimously attested by travellers^x. By such severities inflicted on the body, by good works, and a hearty repentance, the Hindûs hope to obtain forgiveness of their sins, and work out their salvation. They have no notion d of a remission through God's free grace, nor of any redeemer but God alone. They say, no man can release another from sin; not even God's son, who they say, is not without sin^y. For all this, they believe their sins may be remitted at a much easier rate; as saying a few prayers, and the Vedamantiram, or prayer of five words, in great veneration with the Brâmmans; who also pretend to transfer the sins of the people upon cows. But this imposition costs the people dear; for, on that occasion, they are obliged to provide no fewer than 200 cows, which the Brâmmans take for their trouble^z.

THE Hindûs believe a future state, with rewards and punishments. They hold also a purgatory, as hath been observed before. They entertain the same notions of the devil, witches, and apparitions, as prevail in Europe. They say, that evil spirits do much mischief in this world; that they kill some men and women, and possess others. In this latter case they are carried to the pagods, where meat-offerings are made to the god intreated to deliver the demoniac. Then they strike the person with a cudgel, to frighten the devil; who, not liking such treatment, marches-off in anger, complaining loudly of the injustice done him to be dislodged. However, among the gang of devils, there are, it seems, three so very obstinate, that they will not go out of the possessed, even though conjured in the name of the One only God, the Supreme Being^a. e

As for the soul of man, they entertain many different opinions about it. Some hold God to be the soul; others hold it to be a part of God. A third sort will have it, that, at the creation, God created all those souls at once, which were designed for the race of mankind. Others again say, that the soul is begotten by the parents; and a fifth sort believe it to be the product of the five elements (A). The greater number believe all souls to be eternal as well f

^a ROGER, p. 263, & seqq. BALD. p. 815, & seq. PHILLIPS, p. 6. 63, 105.

BALD. p. 817. PHILLIPS, p. 27, 57.

BALD. p. 117.

^a Ibid. p. 85, 143, & seq.

^x ROGER, p. 258.

^y PHILLIPS, ibid. p. 155, 156, 163.

^z Ibid. p. 100.

(A) To earth, water, fire, and air, they add the wind, according to Roger, and the heavens, according to Balieu. Perhaps instead of the heaven, we may place the æther, or æthærial matter.

- a as immortal. Of these some affirm them to be contained in the essence of God ; others say they existed out of God, and slept before the world was created. Those who hold they were not from eternity, say they were created before the world, and lodged in the essence of the Deity. Most Indians believe, that every person has two souls, a good one and a bad one^b ; or rather they are thus distinguished : one is called the supreme soul, which is no other than God himself ; the second is the animal soul, which is in man the sensitive principle of pleasure and pain, love, hatred, and other affections. Some will have it to be spiritual, others material ; which latter make it the eleventh sense in man : for they distinguish the active from the passive organs, or those of sensation ; and they reckon ten senses, instead of five^c. Lastly, the Hindûs hold the souls both of men and other animals to be the same.
- b As to the difference which appears to be between them, they say, it is not in the soul itself, but is owing to the different structure and organization of the several bodies, which give greater advantages to creatures of different species, as well as of the same species : and hence it is that some have more understanding than others ; that some reason well, and others reason ill^d.

THE doctrine of transmigration is generally held by all the Hindû nations ; and indeed has spread itself over the greater part of Asia. It is hard to say when it first appeared in the world, or to what cause it owes its origin. Some suppose it took its rise from Wistnum's tenfold incarnation ; others think the prohibition to eat animal food is derived from thence : but, as there is no express command for the belief of the transmigration, nor even mention of it in the Shaster, at least in Lord's abstract of it, it seems rather to owe its rise to that prohibition, by way of accounting for it ; as the alternate destruction and renovation of things seems to have sprung from the transmigration, in conjunction with the notion of the world's being eternal. This state of the soul is a kind of purgatory, and designed as a punishment, not a felicity : for those souls only which are pure go immediately into heaven ; the impure transigrate or pass into several bodies successively, in order to obtain a perfect purification, which requires many regenerations. Sometimes this passage is from a better body or state to a worse : sometimes from a worse to a better. But the souls of very impure persons migrate into venomous (or servile) beasts (as post-horses), or are born in a very abject condition^e.

^b Danish. Lett. part ii. p. 23. ROGER, p. 192, & seq.

& seq. ^d ROGER, p. 190, & seq.

^c P. PONS. ap. Lett. Ediff. tom. xxvi. p. 244.

^e Danish Lett. p. 22. & seq.

S E C T. VI.

Of the Hindû priests, and their several sects.

- d THERE are among the Hindûs three sorts of clergy ; the first by birth, who are the Brâmmans ; the second by adoption, who are of the tribe of Shuâderis, or the merchants, admitted by the Brâmmans ; and the third by nomination or election, being those chosen by the other tribes to perform the office of priests among them.

WE have already given an account of the Brâmmans, as one of the four tribes into which the Hindûs are divided : we shall now consider them in respect of their office ; on which occasion it must be observed, that they are a sacerdotal tribe, like that of Levi among the Jews : like them also, they have been at certain times, and are still in some places, both chiefs and priests. They came originally from the country between the river Jemni and the mountain Hima or Imaus, to the north of Patna^f. They pretend to be descended from the god Brâmma, or Brûmma ; and, in virtue of this original, assume to be perfectly pure, and free from sin^g. Hence it is also that they are esteemed the prime nobility, and enjoy many privileges ; and, among the rest, do not prostrate themselves before kings, as other subjects do, but sit in their presence^h. The belief of their divine original makes them excessively proud, and look upon the other tribes with contempt : not will they touch, converse with, or even administer the priestly offices to, the class of the people whom they hold unclean ; and yet will receive their alms in money, when purified by water.

- It is certain, that the Brâmmans are by the other tribes treated with a profound respect, on account of their pretended descent, and the privileges granted to them by the Vedam, or their sacred books. These are first to celebrate the feast called Jagam : at what time they do two things, which on other occasions they are forbidden, and to which they seem to have the greatest abhorrence ; namely, taking away the life of animals, and eating flesh. For at this feast they sacrifice a beast ; but, to avoid shedding its blood, they strangle or stifle it : then, cutting it to pieces, they eat part of the heart, with other Brâmmans present ; after which they
- f things, which on other occasions they are forbidden, and to which they seem to have the greatest abhorrence ; namely, taking away the life of animals, and eating flesh. For at this feast they sacrifice a beast ; but, to avoid shedding its blood, they strangle or stifle it : then, cutting it to pieces, they eat part of the heart, with other Brâmmans present ; after which they burn the rest. Their second privilege is to teach the Settreas (or Kutteris) (B) the manner of celebrating the Jagam; but they are not allowed to do the same to the other two tribes. The third is to read the Vedam; and the fourth privilege is to teach it to their own tribe and that of the Sattreas; to which they are confined. Lastly, they are allowed the privilege to demand but not to give alms; while the other tribes may give but not demand themⁱ. Thus they have the impious policy to free themselves from the obligation of charity by a divine commission.

^f P. PONS. ap. Lett. Ediff. tom. xxvi. p. 220. Church. Collect. Trav. vol. iii. p. 812.

^g Danish Lett. part i. p. 20. 22.

^h BALD. ap.

never put to death.

WE must not omit another great privilege which belongs to the Brâmmans, and that is, never to be punished with death, for any crime whatever committed by them. Instead of that, they only put out their eyes; it being reckoned one of the five mortal sins to kill a Brâmmân. In this case the Vedam has ordained, that the offender shall perform a twelve-years pilgrimage, begging alms, with the Brâmmân's skull in his hand; and that he shall eat and drink out of it whatever is given to him. At the expiration of the twelve years he is to bestow a great deal of alms himself, and build a pagod in honour of Eswara (or Iskuren). But in case a Brâmmân goes to the war, with an intention to kill others, the crime of killing him is not so great, and may be expiated by building a temple only^k.

Their office,

THE office of the Brâmmans is purely to teach others, not only to write, read, and cast accounts, but also to instruct them thoroughly in the principles of their religion: and this is their principal business, which they are obliged to discharge without any reward for their trouble: but, in case they are poor, they may then receive gratuities from their disciples, not to enrich themselves, but barely to maintain them decently. Indeed the kings (or Rajabs) are under an obligation to prevent their being beholden for a maintenance to those they teach, by providing for them, and assigning the revenues of certain villages for the support of them and their families: but as their number is so great that the kings cannot provide for them all, therefore the inhabitants of the respective countries are obliged to contribute to their subsistence; and the people say, that although the Brâmmans receive more than one third part of the revenue of the land, yet there are still a great number of them so poor that they are forced to beg. Necessity likewise obliges them often to make use of other means, besides teaching, to get a livelihood; as following merchandize, practising physic, and the like. However, they must not put their hands to tillage, painting, or any handicraft trade; neither must they do any servile office for any person, even the king; as to wash his feet, serve him with betel, or the like. For such an offence he would be degraded, and expelled his tribe: but they may officiate as secretaries, ambassadors, or counsellors; and indeed few besides them obtain these employments^l. However, they often take-up with those of a meaner kind, and even serve as guides to conduct travellers.

and maintenance:

born brought up.

THE Brâmmans hold their children and their house to be unclean for the first ten days after their birth, when great ceremony is used to purify both. On the twelfth they make a fire, called Homan, into which they throw incense, and other things, accounting it holy; and when it is consumed, give the infant its name. After this they bore their ears, not to hang jewels in, but to signify their being devoted to Wisnum or Isburen; on which occasion they wish the child much holiness. The next thing they do is to invest them with the little cord called Dsandhem, which is hung on the left shoulder, and descends low on the right side. This is done when the child is five years old: but as it is attended with some little expence, therefore if the parents be poor, it is deferred till the tenth year. When this cord is put on, they are called Brâmma Saris (or the children of Brâmmans); nor are they till then considered as such. They bear this name so long as they remain unmarried; nor can they, during that time, either lie with a woman, or chew betel, which they say excites venery. They likewise are to eat but once a day, and to beg for the victuals they eat. These rules are enjoined by the Vedam, but not exactly observed^m.

The cord.

THE little cord above-mentioned is of fine thread, and consists of three small strings, made by Brâmmans. He never puts this cord off, rising up or lying down; and if it breaks, he cannot eat till he gets another; nor is reckoned of the tribe so long as he is without it. For this reason they renew this cord every August; at which time they give it to children. As this cord is not a badge, as some imagine, by which the Brâmmans are distinguished; those of the other tribes may and do wear it often, in imitation of their ancestors, and to shew their zeal. When their children are fit to learn, they teach them themselves, unless hindered by other occupations; in which case they either take a tutor into their house, or send them to the Brâmmans, who keep school: for none but Brâmmans must teach Brâmmans. And the other tribes, in imitation of them, will not suffer their children to be instructed by those of an inferior family: but masters of superior tribes will teach those of inferior tribes, excepting the ⁱ ROGER, Mœurs des Bram. p. 32. P. 43, & seq.

^k Ibid. p. 3, & seq.

^l Ibid. p. 33, & seq.

^m Ibid.

(B) That is, those of the tribe of Rajabs and Rajpûts.

a children of Perrcas; who, being esteemed vile, those of the fourth and lowest tribe begrudge to teach them^a.

In marrying thir sons, the Brâmmans take care not to chuse a maiden of their own tribe, Their mar- who has not had her monthly visitations. They are no less careful to provide husbands for riages. their daughters before that time; otherwise no person can marry them: but ways are found to get over this difficulty, by concealing their age. In visiting the family where they propose to chuse a wife for their son, they are careful to observe every frivolous matter, which they reckon an ill sign; and if they meet any such three times running, they drop the pursuit. When they break the affair to the girl's father, he usually asks to see the young man; and in case he likes him, as well as the portion, which he is to receive, the youth has then liberty to b visit the family and see his mistress. The ceremonies observed at the marriages of Brâmmans are much the same with those used by the laity of other tribes. When the match is concluded on, and the father has given his daughter's hand to her intended spouse, the latter takes the tali, which is a little girdle, with a golden head of some god fastened to it, and ties it about the neck of his bride, which makes the marriage sure. But it sometimes happens, that when the bridegroom is going to perform that ceremony, and does not give the dowry which the bride's father expects; one of those present steps in, and offering to give what is demanded, carries off the lady, with her father's consent. When the husband dies, the tali is buried Odd custom. with him; except the widow burns herself, and then it is burned along with her. The marriage is concluded by erecting a Pandal, and making a procession through the city, in the c same manner as is done by those of other tribes. When the children of Brâmmans are married, they are no longer called Brâmmasaris, but Grabastas; and then receive the second little cord, which is like the first; and usually they add a third cord, which serves for an upper garment: for, as the Brâmmans are forbidden to go with their breast bare, yet commonly do, if they have their cord on, they think their breast is covered. Every ten years they are obliged by their Vedam to add another string to the former: but they do not all follow its injunctions^c.

When the young Brâmmans are grown more in years, they often take wives out of the other tribes; and even that of Soudra (or Weyz), which is the lowest, and held in contempt Polygamy al- by the upper classes. But the Brâmmans themselves censure this practice, thinking it a great lowed them: sin to leave children by such a woman; and believe, that the father of them will be excluded heaven, so long as they, or any of their descendants, remain on earth. However, the Brâmmans are careful not to marry their children to those who are near of kin to them; for they have an abhorrence to incest, which is one of the five mortal sins, scarce ever to be pardoned. In this case the Vedam ordains, that the offender shall be castrated, and left to die with his genitals in his hand. Our author was told of a Brâmmann, then living, who having, by mistake, lain with his mother, whom he found in his bed; instead of his wife, inflicted that punishment on himself, and would have drowned himself, had he not been hindered. Polygamy is carried to great excess often by the Brâmmans, as well as the other practised to tribes. Barthrouberri, renowned for his proverbs, and other works, had no fewer than three excess. hundred, though his father had only four. The graver sort condemn this custom; but say it is not sinful, because the Vedam has not forbidden it. However, they look on it to be a very bad action for one of their tribe who has many wives to keep a concubine. There is no punishment indeed either for this vice or for adultery: yet when a Brâmmann's wife is inconstant, he sometimes locks her up in a close place, and gives her victuals while she lives: but, in case he loves her much, and finds the other Brâmmans avoid going to his house as before, he makes a feast, and, inviting several of his tribe to it, his wife serves at table; and as the guests receive the victuals from her hand, she is thenceforth looked upon as an honest woman^d.

The diet of the Brâmmans is exceedingly temperate; their victuals consist solely of rice, Their diet tem- fruits, roots, and herbs. Nor is their drink less simple, being nothing but water; except at perate. meals they sometimes take a draught of milk; for which purpose they usually keep a cow. They never make use of any liquor which either hath an agreeable taste (C), or is apt to intoxicate; for they abhor drunkenness, which is one of their mortal sins. This tribe, thro' pride, will never go to the house of those of other tribes to eat or drink, excepting Tayer, or cream; which they believe to be of the same nature with the Amortam, or Neſtar, of the gods, often mentioned before. But nothing will prevail with one of them to eat in such a person's house, or in the house of a Brâmmann of a different sect. Nay, if his wife is of another tribe, she must not eat with her husband; and, as none are permitted, not even the king,

^a ROGER, Mœurs des Bram. p. 47. & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 56—52.

^d Ibid. p. 64—67.

(C) That is, for their own private drinking, and in Karrâta; but in East Malabar they make their drink-offering of honey, sugar, and the juice of ka-koa nut.

which offering, doubtless, they afterwards drink themselves.

to see a Brâmmān eat, the wife also is subject to the same law: so that should the husband, through fondness, permit her that liberty, the other Brâmmāns would neither eat with him, nor in his house⁹.

Dispute about As two of the four tribes, namely, the Brâmmāns and Baniyans, eat nothing but vegetables; and the other two, which are the Settreas (or Kutteris), and the Soudras (or Wise), feed upon fish and flesh, there is no small dispute among them on this account. The Brâmmāns allege, that those two tribes commit a great sin in killing animals: on the other hand, the Kutteri or Râjab tribe maintain, that in so doing they act better than the Brâmmāns: because, say they, to support a great many people, there is no need to kill more than one beast; and in so doing no more than one soul is dislodged from its body: whereas the Brâmmāns, to nourish themselves, are obliged to dislodge many souls from their bodies, by plucking-up roots and plants. For they believe that all vegetables have souls, as well as beasts; and that the souls of men pass into them equally alike.

dislodging souls. To this the Brâmmāns are able only to make the following lame reply; that they do not commit so great a sin as the Kutteri in killing a buck; since the souls which are in roots and herbs are in the most abject of all bodies; and that in being dislodged they change their state for the better, as they pass into the bodies of men or beasts. However, they are so gruelled on this chapter, that they acknowledge they would refrain from eating vegetables, could they subsist without it: and some are so troubled in mind on this occasion, that they content themselves with plucking leaves and fruit, without pulling up any thing by the roots, in order to avoid dislodging souls¹.

Ecclesiastical hierarchy. THE Brâmmāns are as priests both secular and regular: they have likewise a hierarchy among them: but their several orders are not well, if at all, distinguished by authors (D). We have already seen the form of their ecclesiastical degrees, though confusedly and imperfectly, among the west Malabârs. In the country between that and Surât, we are told they are distinguished into two sorts, Buts and Sinâis: from which two roots spring the other branches. The difference was occasioned by a famine in the low lands, where the Sinâis resided, which obliged them to eat fish, to prevent perishing. For this reason they are greatly despised by the purer Buts, who did not violate their law under such pressing circumstances. These latter apply themselves wholly to study, and teaching the mysteries of their religion: they also lead an exact regular life, abstracted from all worldly employments, excepting such as contribute to preserve life (E); the chief and most skilful physicians being of this class of Brâmmāns. These are masters of all their ceremonies, or doctors of their canon law, and instruct the other tribes therein.

THE Sinâis are more biassed to secular offices, and out of them are made their fighting bishops (F); Desîs, or farmers of the king's revenues; Pundits, who are governors of towns and provinces; physicians, accountants, scrivans or secretaries, and interpreters².

Kuru or priests. Kinds. THE learned part of the Brâmmāns [who are those called Buts in some parts of India] are of two kinds. The first called Kûru (or Gourou), who are of the priesthood; and the second termed Sastiriar (or Shastiriar), who are professors of the different systems in divinity. Of the first kind there are (in Eastern Malabâr) three distinct orders, the Wayrawenada Kûrû, the Pancharsha Kûrû, and Mabulley Kûrû. Their office is to prepare the offerings for religious worship. Of the second kind, or Shastiriar, there are four classes; the Chesha Sastiriar, Minalstri Sastiriar, the Chidambara Sastiriar, and Mogarambara Sastiriar. These explain severally the different systems of their divine law, and receive the youth into their schools, in order to make trial of their faith: for if in the end they are not found disposed firmly to believe all the mysteries of their religion, their study will be deemed to no purpose. Besides the two kinds of learned Brâmmāns before-mentioned, there are many others, not much inferior to them in wisdom and erudition; whose business chiefly it is to instruct youth in those points which relate to the ceremonies used in public worship, and solemn festivals, as they are taught in the glossaries called *Sastirangol*³.

Tribes or families: THE Bramens, or Brâmmāns, are divided into eighty-two tribes (or, more properly, families), assuming the names of their respective founders; who were so many wise men or scholars famed among them for learning, and called Augurs, or diviners, of certain towns

⁹ ROGER, Mœurs des Bram. p. 110. 114.

¹ Ibid. p. 108, & seq.

² FRYER's Trav. p. 190.

³ PHILLIPS's Account of Malabâr, p. 9, & seq.

(D) The Brâmmāns, called also Nambouri in Malabâr, are there distinguished into nine classes or kinds. Those of the first four classes wholly devote themselves to the ministry: the five others apply themselves also to merchandize. The first of the nine orders are like bishops. Vinc. Mariu Viagg, p. 264.

(E) Among these then we must reckon astrology, in which we are told they are skilled; foretelling many things to come. Hamilton's new account of India, vol. i.

p. 276. In short, these Buts must be the Pendets, or doctors (in divinity), as they are called in the Mogol's empire, who cultivate the sciences studied in the Indies. See Bernier's Memoirs of the Mogol's empire, tom. iv. p. 144.

(F) Some go to the wars, and take the command of armies; as Romish bishops have often done in these parts of the world.

a where they resided. Thus the Augur (G) of Visalnagra; the second Vulnagran-aughor, or the Augur of Vulnagra; and so of the rest; the disciples of each being termed Brâmmans of such an Augur.

THE ministerial function of the Brâmmans consists in praying with the people, and reading their law. In performing which offices they are to observe the following injunctions. 1. To put their bodies into several droll postures, the better to draw the attention of their auditors. 2. To pray with both hands open to heaven, as ready to receive the things they petition for. 3. To pray with their eyes cast downwards, and knees doubled under them, in token of awe and reverence. 4. Never to read out of the book delivered to Bremaw, but with a kind of singing and quavering voice: which, they say (H), was not only practised by Bremaw, b when it was first published, but also enjoined by God, that they might make his law a matter of rejoicing.

IT belongs also to the Brâmmans to educate and instruct the youths of the same tribe, who gradually advance to the priesthood, in the following manner. First, about the seventh year of their age, they are admitted to discipline, being clean washed, to intimate the purity of the tribe which they belong to: then they are received naked, to shew that they have stripped off all other cares, to apply themselves to study. Next, their heads are shaven; only a lock of hair is left behind, to denote that they must not forsake their study; if they do, by that lock they shall be drawn back again. They are likewise bound to a Pythagorean silence and attention: they are forbidden to talk, spit, or cough: they are obliged also to wear about their waist a girdle of antelope-skin, and a thong of the same about their neck, descending under the left arm. This may be called their initiation or noviceship.
c

ABOUT the age of fourteen (if capable) they are admitted to be Brâmmans, and exchange those leather-thongs for four sealing threads, which pass over the right shoulder, and under the left arm. These they never put off, even when they go to bed; but wear, as the badge of their profession, in honour of God, and the three persons, Bremaw, Vistney, and Rudderi. At the time of this kind of ordination, they are enjoined; 1. Not to change their tribe. 2. To observe all things contained in the law of the Brâmmans. 3. Not to communicate the mysteries of their religion to any of a different persuasion. These are most of the principal duties observed by the true Brâmmans.
Form of ordination.

d THE Brâmmans, pursuant to the precepts contained in the Sastirangol, get-up an hour or two before sun-rise, to perform their daily duty. They first ease nature, and then cleanse themselves carefully. After this, they wash their mouths, and perform that exercise called Ashamen Kirigbey; which is one of the many parts of their outward worship. Their next business is to lift up their minds to God, and read that part of the law which treats of washing and purification; at the same time washing themselves with water. They read their form of prayer, or liturgy, with all its ceremonies; after which they repeat their Kiaddiri (I), humbly beseeching the Dirumurtigol (K) to present all their performances to the great Supreme Being, in the place where his majesty dwelleth. Then they give honour and worship to their images, bringing their offerings before them. Lastly, they address themselves to the Supreme Being, as if he was there visibly present. These ceremonies are so tedious in their practice, that sometimes the greater part of the day is taken-up with this kind of exercise (L): for every part must be regularly and completely performed, and by no means either abridged or interrupted; not even by the presence of the king.
e Daily duty.

DIVINE service, we are told, is performed in Malabâr by Brâmmans, Pantaren, and Antigol.
Service-priests. Whence it should seem, that the two latter orders are not Brâmmans; yet none of the missionaries, either protestant or popish, inform us of what tribe they are, though so frequently mentioned by them. Their neglect in this and other matters makes it very difficult to deliver any thing certain, or complete, concerning the several orders and kinds of clergy amongst the Hindûs. However, from the very faint lights which they afford us, we shall endeavour to give our readers the best satisfaction we are able.
f

THE second kind of clergy are those made Brâmmans by adoption. These are by the Baniyans called Varteas, or Verteai, and by the Mohammedans Sevrabs. They are some of Brâmmans: the tribe of Shudderi, or the merchants, who for devotion take this condition on them; but Adopted

^a LORD'S Account of the Banians, chap. 10. sup. p. 43.

^x PHIL. ubi sup. p. 5. 43.

^y PHIL. ubi

(G) Here we find, perhaps, the origin of the word Augur; and Palliagar may be a compound of the same term.

(H) One would be apt from hence to think, that this remark is not taken from the Shastar: and indeed Mr. Lord so frequently mixes things of his own with the text, that it is difficult often to tell what is to be found in the Shastar, and what not: so that he is to be read with very great caution. And this confounding things together, without any distinction, as well as his omissions, makes a new translation or abstract of the Shastar absolutely necessary.

(I) A form of prayer.

(K) The three inferior gods of the first class; Brâmma, Wistnum, and Ruddiren, or Ishuren.

(L) You have the whole process of it at length in Roger, p. 94; where it appears to be extremely laborious, and even a perfect penance.

they are only a few, in comparison of the true Brâmmans. The Vertea, for his habit, wears a white woollen garment, which reaches to the middle of his thigh; the lower parts being left naked. His head is always uncovered, to testify his perpetual reverence for God above. They shave neither the head nor beard; but pluck out the hairs by the roots, leaving only a lock on the crown.

several classes: THIS sort of Brâmmans is divided likewise into several classes or families; one is called Sankas; and these go not to church, but perform divine service at home. Another is named Tuppas; these go to church to pray. A third order are the Kurtburs; who pray alone without assistants. A fourth is denominated Onkeleaus; and these reject images. A fifth called Pusbaleaus, who are the most strict of them all. These Verteas have a festival, which is kept once every month, and holds for five days; but betwixt every two days they keep a fast. This feast is solemnized at the houses of the richer people; and commonly at those times a pension is given to prevent the death of cattle and other living creatures.

their rules strict. THESE nominal Brâmmans are in many respects more strict than the real. They are forbidden marriage, and are more abstemious in diet: for, of the above-mentioned feasts, they eat nothing but what is given them, and reserve nothing for another meal. They are more careful for the preservation of animals; for they will not so much as drink water till it is boiled; that so the vapour, which they believe to be the life of water, may go out of it: nay, they disperse their very ordure with a broom, lest it should generate worms, which are subject to destruction. They likewise keep hospitals for maimed birds and fowl; which they redeem from slaughter, and endeavour to cure. They have all things in common; and place no faith in outward washings, but rather embrace a life of nastiness.

Chudderers. WE meet with a class of priests named Chudderers (or Shudderers) in East Malabâr. These, from the name, must be priests belonging to the Shudderis, or merchants tribe, commonly called Baniyans; but whether they are real, or only adopted Brâmmans, does not appear from our authors. All we find is, that they are an ecclesiastical order; and have licence only to read the six systems (M) (or Shasterangol). They are allowed also to wear the Lingam, and carry the Panchuchoram, or five letters, composing the words Nama Chiaya; that is, praise the true God.

Elected priests. THE third sort of Hindû priests are those belonging to the fourth tribe, consisting of the mechanics and commonalty. As the Brâmmans will not converse or have any correspondence with these people, they therefore chuse priests from among themselves, as well as gods to worship.

The Vallouvers. NOR are those outcasts, the Parreas, who are elected even by the common people, without their priests; for among them is a sacerdotal family named Vallouvers: nay we are told, that these Vallouvers (N) pretend that they were formerly in the Indies, the same which the Brâmmans are at present. Whence it is conjectured, that the Parreas were the antient inhabitants of the southern India. However that be, they still apply themselves to the study of astronomy and astrology. There are likewise extant some books of theirs containing moral precepts, which are held in great esteem. Perhaps these Vallouvers are the descendants of those fishermen of Malabâr, who are said, in the Purân, to have been constituted Brâmmans by Wistnum, in the shape of Pareshi Rama. These used to wear the thread of a fishing-net about their necks, when performing their sacrifices; and hence perhaps it is, that De Faria affirms, the Brâmmans took their string of three threads from a fishing-net. Let us now return to the Brâmmans.

^y LORD, ubi supr. cap. 10.

^z PHILIPS'S Account of Malabâr, p. 14. 20.

^a Ibid. p. 61.

^b P. PONS. ap. Lettr. Edif. tom. xxvi. p. 219; & seq.

^c BALDÆUS, ap. Church's Coll. Trav. vol. iii.

p. 780.

^d DE FARIA'S Port. Asia, v. l. ii. p. 385.

(M) The Shudderis, or Baniyans, are not allowed to read the Vedam, or have it explained to them.

or Shammanin. of whom M. La Croix, p. 474 & 491, gives an account from Ziegenbalg.

(N) These seem to be the same with the Shamman,

S E C T. VII.

Sects of Brâmmans.

Sects regarding faith. THE Brâmmans may be farther distinguished into several sects or orders, both as to their profession and way of living: but of these, authors have treated so very confusedly, as well as imperfectly, that for the general it is very difficult to ascertain which class they belong to. Mr. Roger is almost the only one who has taken care to range them in order, and bring those of each kind together. According to this laborious and judicious writer, with regard to profession, the Brâmmans are divided into six sects. The first is named Weistnouwa, from their attachment to Wistnum; whom they hold to be the Sovereign God.

- a God. When those of the Soudra (or Wife), which is the tribe of commonalty, agree in sentiments with the Weistnouwa, they are called Dacheri (A), that is, Obligeants; which the Brâmmans say implies being servants to their tribe, which they will have to be an honour to the Soudras.

THE sect of Weistnouwa is subdivided into two others; one called Tadwadi, which signifies The Tadwadi, disputers; valuing themselves on discoursing profoundly concerning God. They are likewise named Madwa Weistnouwa, from one Madwa Acharia, the author of their sect. These are marked with a white line from the nose to the forehead; also on the temples, on the place where the arms join the shoulders, and on the breasts, with a circle as large as a half-crown. They say, this is the mark of Wistnum; and so strong a charm or defence, that while they wear it, neither the devil, nor Jamma, judge of hell, dare lay a finger on them. These Tadwadi have a chief, who lives at Kombekonne, near Pallickatta, on the coast of Choromandel. This chief wears no strings about his neck, like the other Brâmmans, nor has any wives; but when he marries he must quit his order. He commonly carries a Bambou stick in his hand^a.

- b THE second branch is termed Ramanowya Wistnouwa. These mark their forehead with a figure like the Greek Ipsilon; beginning at the nose, and carrying it upward. This is done with a kind of white chalk. They likewise make another mark with a hot iron, at the joining of the arms with the shoulders. They say, that when once they have devoted themselves sincerely to Wistnum, he will not punish them altho' they commit sin, which none can avoid; like a father, who does not put his child to death for committing a fault. They differ in many other points from the Tadwadi. They go bare-headed; and have their hair shaved-off, excepting a lock on the crown, which hangs behind. As the head of this sect is a person of consideration, he resides at Kanjewaram, a famous city of Karnâtika (or Karnâta). He has the privilege to wear a piece of linen on his head, when he speaks to any-body. The Ramanowya say, their sect is better than that of the Tadwadi, because they never trade, nor enter bawdy-houses; being withheld by rigorous punishments, which are not inflicted on the others.

- c THE second sect of Brâmmans is called Seivia, and also Aradbeya. They hold Eswara, or Isburen, to be the sovereign God, and all the rest, even Wistnum, to be inferior to him. Those of the family of Soudra, who are of the same opinion, are named Tangam. This sect mark their foreheads with two or three streaks of cow-dung ashes; and some wear a stone Lingam about their necks; others in their hair. They make their children wear it when eight years old, covered with wax, and tied to their arms. This badge is to shew their inviolable attachment to Isburen, and that they acknowledge no other god. The Soudras, who wear the Lingam, must abstain from fish, and all other animal food, like the Brâmmans.

- d THE third sect is termed Smarta. These affirm, that Wistnum and Isburen, although adored under different images, are yet the same being; and have an aversion to their competition for the sovereign godhead. Few of the Soudra, or common people, follow this sect, as the doctrine is above their capacity. Besides, the Brâmmans make a great mystery of it. One Sankra Acharia was the author of this sect; and the Brâmmans, from whom Abr. Roger had all his information, was a member of it.

e THE fourth sect of Brâmmans by profession is called Sbarwakka. These are of the Epi- euræan sentiments; denying the immortality of the soul, or any future state or life after this: and, when others argue with them on that point, they require positive and visible proof of their position. For all this they live very exemplary lives.

- f THE fifth sect is named Pasenda. These say, that the Hindû law is not true; and mind nothing but their belly. Like the former sect, they believe not in a future state; and ask how it is possible, that a man who is burnt to ashes should come to life again? Our author's Brâmmans accused them with acting like beasts, for that they made no distinction between father and mother, brother and sister; because likewise they will eat with any-body and lie with any-body; saying, that they lay with their own wife, when they lay with another woman. Those of the Smarta sect attribute this impiety to their expecting no other life but the present; and disregarding the good opinion of mankind: at the same time they suppose, that the desire of being applauded induces the Sbarwakka to lead virtuous lives, although they believe in a future state no more than the Pasenda. However this be, both sects are afraid publicly to declare their opinion, to avoid the furious zeal of the other sects; who, in times past, have made several massacres of those who held that opinion.

^a ROGER, ubi supr. p. 17, & seqq.

(A) In the original Dactferi.

6th sect, Chektea.

THE sixth sect is called Chektea. These maintain, that neither Wistnum nor Ishuren is the Supreme God; but one Chekti, from whom, they say, those gods and Brâmma had their origin: that they exist solely by his power; as does also this world, and every thing in it. This sect also resembles the two former, in that they will not submit to the Vedam; and expect that every thing which they are to believe should be made evident to their senses. These three last sects are held as heretics by the Hindûs, and have but very few followers ^b.

The Ishuren sects.

WITH regard to the sects acknowledging Ishuren and Wistnum for the Supreme Being, we have another account from the Malabarians; among whom, we are told, there are several sects of each kind; but principally three attached to the former, and four to the latter. The three sects devoted to Ishuren, and who all carry the Lingam about them, are, first, that of Chiwawedum, the followers of which are called Chayver and Chiwawedakkarer. This sect is subdivided into many others; who only worship Ishuren and his family. The second sect is named Wiruchaywam, and followed by the Wiruchaywer: these make a Lingam of stone, or chrystal, called Biran Lingam; which they wear about them, and to which they perform their devotions. It is buried with them; for the bodies of these sectaries are not burned. The third sect is called Cbilamadum; and its followers, Cbilamadakarrers. They also carry a crystal Lingam, and are buried in a sitting posture, with their hands lifted up, as if at prayers, called Chimadu. These likewise dig a well in their houses, where neither sun nor moon can penetrate; whose water only they make use of both in their ceremonial washings and dressing their victuals. These three sects are comprised under the general term of Cbiwamadum, or Cbiwakalam.

Four Wistnum
sects.

THE four sects devoted to Wistnu (or Wistnum) are, first, the Wistnuwedum, whose adherents are named Wistnuwedakkarer, or Wistnupaddikarer. These always carry on their foreheads, or arms, the name of Wistnum, and worship Perumal, which is one of that god's appellations. The second sect is Tadduwadimadum, and its followers Tadduwadikarer. These sprinkle themselves with sandal powder, and worship Wistnum under the name of Rishtnen (B). The third sect, Nama Perumalwedum, do also carry on their foreheads, or arms, the Dirunamum (C), and worship Rishtnen (or Kishtna). The fourth sect, Chainermadum, or that followed by the Chainer, observe the same way of worship with the former, and eat off a brass-plate ^c.

Sects, as to living.

WE come now to the Brâmmans sects of the second kind; that is, those distinguished by their course of living. These are denominated Jagbîs when Brâmmans: but when they are of the Soudra, or fourth tribe, they are called Joghîs; which the generality of travellers seem to have confounded together.

1. The Wana-prastas.

THESE Jagbîs and Joghîs, so separated from the rest by their manner of life, are of three sorts or sects; Wanaprastas, Sanjassî, and Avadoutas. The Wanaprastas retire into the woods with their wives and children; living on such herbs and fruits as they can find there, without working. Some of these are so scrupulous, that they will not pluck up the least root from the ground, for fear of dislodging some soul from its body; and they are reckoned very holy on account of this retired way of living.

2. The San-jassî.

THE Sanjassî (E) renounce all kinds of worldly pleasures, and are more austere than the former sect. These cannot marry, nor take food above once a day; nor must they eat or drink out of copper, but earthen, vessels. They are obliged to live on alms; and wear a red habit, carrying a Bambû wand or stick in their hand. They must not even touch money, or have any fixed abode. They must not so much as lodge more than one night in a place; but must continually shift their quarters; excepting for two months in the year, they are at liberty to abide in one place. On this occasion they chuse out a place which is reckoned holy, and on that account may remain there during life, if they think fit. These Sanjassî must conquer six enemies; concupiscence, anger, avarice, pride, love of the world, and revenge; in order to fit them for the contemplation of things divine. The term Sanjassî belongs only to those who are Brâmmans; when they are of the tribe either of the Kutterîs, or the Banîyans, they are named Perma amfa (F); if of the Soudra, or tribe of commonalty, they are called Joghîs: but these last take more liberty in their way of living than the true Sanjassî.

3. The Ava-doutas.

THE Avadoutas are still more rigid than the Sanjassî. They not only abandon their wives and children, but their earthen vessels for eating out of, the Bambû stick to rest on, and their cloaths; retaining nothing but a piece of cloth to cover their privities: nay some lay even that ^b ROGER, ubi supr. p. 21, & seqq.

^c PHILLIPS'S Account of Malabâr, p. 34, & seqq.

(B) A mistake, doubtless, of the press for Kishtnen, or Krishnen; by others called Kishtna, or Krishna; whose shape Wistnum had assumed in his eighth incarnation.

(C) Or ashes of cow dung, prepared by the Brâmmans and other priests.

(D) The name Jogbî comes from Yogam, or Jog, which signifies union. P. Pons, Lett. Edif. tom. xxvi. p. 245.

(E) Called by others Sannassî, and Sanias. P. Pons says these were certainly the ancient Gymnosophists. Lett. Edif. tom. xxvi. p. 221.

(F) These seem to be the same called Tirimimfi, by Baldæus, ap. Church. Coll. Trav. vol. iii. p. 756.

- a aside, and go stark-naked, besmearing their bodies with cow-dung. These, when hungry, go into houses, and, without speaking, hold out their hand. Whatever is given them they eat on the spot. Others will not take so much pains for their bread; but retire to the side of holy rivers, and there expect the peasants to bring them victuals; which they accordingly do in abundance, believing it to be a very meritorious act. The Avadutas are reckoned very holy by the Hindûs, especially those who go naked; being, for that reason, supposed to have attained the highest degree of perfection. However, there are but few who expose themselves in that beastly manner to public view; for natural shame restrains the major part of them^d. These Avadutas seem to be the same with those whom the Baniyans call Gogbi^e; that is, when they are of their tribe.
- b ALL these three sects must be considered as penitents, whom we meet with in East Mala- Avadutas bar under different names; such as Pantaren, Antigol^f, Guanigol, and the like. These last, rigid penitents, we are told, are more rigid than the Jogbigol (or Joghis). They are a kind of anchorites, living in mountains and caves. They have no possessions, and never speak to women. As they surpass all the other sects in austerity, so do they likewise in point of wisdom; renouncing the plurality of gods (G), and all the pagod ceremonies^g.
- To one of the three sects above-described may be referred those Vartias, or adopted Brâm- The Vartias:
mans, who are monastics. Mr. De Thevenot, speaking of a convent of these religious Hindûs at Labiir, in the Mogol's empire, gives the following account of them. They have their general, provincial, and other superiors. They vow obedience, chastity, and poverty; which c injunction they strictly observe; and say their order has been founded above 2000 years. They live on alms, and have lay-brothers appointed to beg for them. They eat but once a day, and change their house every three months. They have no fixed time for their noviciate, which some perform in two; while others are three or four years about it, if the superior thinks fit. The main point of their institution is to avoid doing to others what they would not have others do to themselves. This precept they observe so strictly, that, if any-body beats them, they do not return the blows; and if they be reviled, they take it patiently.
They are very obedient to their superiors. They are forbidden to look a woman, or maiden, in the face.
- THEY wear nothing on their bodies, but a cloth to cover their privities; which they bring habit and d up to their heads to make a kind of coif, like that of a woman. They can possess no diet:
money, nor must reserve any part of what they feed on to-day for to-morrow: they patiently wait till their purveyors bring them the alms given by those of their tribe. These lay-brothers, to avoid being troublesome, take but a little from every house; as about a handful of rice, or other eatables: which must be dressed to their hands; for they have no fire in the convent, for fear some insect might be destroyed by it. When the purveyors have gotten provisions enough, they return to the house; and there mingling the rice, lentils, milk, cheese, and the like, all together, an officer distributes the same equally among the Vartias; who eat their portions, cold or hot, as they are given them, drinking therewith nothing but water. They make their meal about noon, and must neither eat nor drink afterwards, till the e same time next day.
- THE rest of the day they spend in prayer and reading, till sun-set; and then go to sleep, strict chastity:
never lighting a candle. They all lie in the same chamber, and have no other bed but the bare ground. They cannot leave the order, after they have once taken the vows: but if they violate any of them, especially that of chastity, they are expelled not only the order, but also their tribe. The general, provincial, and all the other officers, change their convent every four months: but their respective offices are for life; and when any of them dies, he names to the religious him whom he thinks most fit to succeed, and they follow his choice. These their numerous Vartias have above 10,000 monasteries in the Indies; and some of them are more austere than monasteries, others: nay, there are some among them who think it enough to worship God in spirit; and f these do not make use of images, nor will have any pagods near them. There are also religious nuns in some places, who live with a great deal of strictness and regularity^h.

^d ROGER, ubi supr. p. 27, & seqq.
p. 19, 69, 105.

^e Ibid. p. 26.

^f Ibid. p. 29, note.

^g PHILL. Account of Malabâr,
^h THEVENOT's Trav. part iii. p. 61, & seqq.

(G) These Guanigol, according to Ziegenbalg, are the sages, or philosophers and saints, of the Indies. They hold the images and ceremonies of the temples in abhorrence; having, for the sole object of their adoration, the infinitely perfect Being; of whom they have the most sublime and just ideas. Instances whereof are produced by La Croz. Hist. Christ. Ind. p. 451, & seqq.

also p. 457.

BOOK XV.

Description of the countries contained in the farther peninsula of India.

CHAP. I.

General description and history of this peninsula.

Farther peninsula, its bounds.

THE farther peninsula of India, properly speaking, is bounded northward by a line, drawn from about the eastern mouth of Ganges, to the bay of Tong-king, in twenty degrees of latitude. But as some of the principal kingdoms belonging to it lie partly without those limits, and uniformity requires that we should give the description of each country intire, and in one place, without dividing it; we shall therefore consider this peninsula in a more extended sense, so as to comprise the whole of those dominions, with its limits. In this large acceptation it will be bounded on the north by part of Tibet, and China; on the east by Tong-king, and the gulf of Kochin-china; on the south by the gulf of Siam, and straits of the Sund; and on the west by the bay of Bengál, and the river called the Great Bramaputren; which, according to our ideas, rises in the mountain bounding Tibet, and, running southward, separates the countries included in this peninsula from Hindústán, and the territories of certain Râjabs.

Extent and situation.

THE bounds and dimensions of this peninsula are pretty well ascertained on all sides but this to the west: for, on the north, they are determined in consequence of the situation given those of Tibet and China, which have been, of late years, accurately surveyed by the Jesuit missionaries; and the sea-coasts by the draughts and observations of skilful navigators. Its situation likewise, with respect to the heavens, is no less accurately fixed, by the astronomical observations made at Siam and Malakka, as well as those in its neighbourhood, at Kanton in China, and in Bengál. So that although the interior parts of it are not so well known as those of the hither peninsula, yet its coasts and borders may be said to be more exactly settled than those of most countries of Asia, excepting China.

Soil in general.

THESE things being premised, we may, on good grounds, advance, that this peninsula lies between the first and twenty-seventh degrees of latitude, and the 107th and 127th degrees of longitude (†): so that it is about 1000 miles long, from south to north; and 900 in breadth from west to east, where broadest; but in some parts, especially the peninsula of Malakka, very narrow, not exceeding 150, 100, or even 50 miles, in one or two places. THIS vast region is, in general, a very plentiful country, for fruits, silks, elephants, metals, drugs, corn, rice, pepper, and oil. Besides this, it is rich in gold and precious stones, such as diamonds, rubies, topazes, amethysts, and other kinds, with which a great trade is driven there. Tong-king, it is true, has neither corn nor wine of its own: but, to make amends, it enjoys a very good and temperate air; while most of the other countries suffer under the excessive heats.

Countries contained in it,

THIS peninsula, according to some early travellers, was formerly divided into a great number of kingdoms, some of a vast extent, governed by mighty emperors. But either they were imposed on by the informations of the Indians; or, imagining the country extended northward from the coasts of Bengál and Pegu, as far as Tartary, they formed imaginary dominions there, to fill up the vacant space. The truth seems to be, as will appear in the course of our history, that this north part of the peninsula was divided among a great number a of petty kings, or Rājahs; who, at length, going to war, the weaker were subdued by the stronger. So that, at present, the dominions comprised within this third part of India may be reduced to the following nine; viz. those of Aſſam, Tipra, Arrakan, Pegu, Ava, Laos, Siam, Kamboja, and Kochin-china; to which we may add Tong king (by some included within the peninsula), in order to give it a place in our history.

(†) Reckoning alway. from the isle of Ferro, about 20° west of Paris, and 17° 35' west of London.

THE inland countries, which are Azem, Tipra, Ava, and the Laos, as well as the inland parts of the rest, are very little known to us at present. The best memoirs relating to them being those left us by the early travellers; who, invited by the flourishing state of them, particularly Pegu, went thither for sake of commerce, in the sixteenth century; of which number were Edoardo Barbosa, Cæſar Frederick, Gaspar Balbi, and our Ralf Fitch. We must, however, except Siam, whose interior parts the French, by their embassies and relations, brought us acquainted with, towards the end of the last century. However, all this information does not amount to much; nor are the maritime parts of those countries better known to us: for although they have been visited by merchants, as well as missionaries, yet their relations respect chiefly the inhabitants, and give very little light into either the geography or history of those countries. The truth is, that, after trying the dispositions of the people, both in a religious and mercantile way, there hath been found but little encouragement either for conversions or commerce; and therefore those coasts are not much frequented at present, by either merchants or divines. Hence it is, that, although revolutions happen very often in those countries, we are yet almost intire strangers to them: and that we find more materials for political history in the ancient voyagers than in the modern. The best, if not only good ones among the latter, relating to the parts in question, being those of Dampier, and Captain Hamilton, who, in his New account of the East Indies, has given us the present state of all the countries and islands lying between the Cape of Good Hope and Japan.

AFTER what has been said, our readers cannot reasonably expect any-thing like a complete history of the countries within this farther peninsula: but if they consider the great imperfections of our materials, and the difficulty of connecting the scattered and discordant scraps, when brought together, in order to form something of a consistent history, they will, we presume, be very well pleased to find it is no worse.

THE same may be alleged in behalf of the geography; which, however defective, may yet be said to be the only thing tolerable of the kind that hath hitherto appeared. The early geographers, not excepting the Sanſons, have exhibited the countries in question very erroneously, and in great confusion: they have extended them northward, vastly beyond their bounds; introduced imaginary kingdoms; and, relying on imposing authors, such as Mendez Pinto and Le Blanc, have derived all the great rivers from an imaginary lake, called Chiamay, Singapamor, and Kunehetee by the first of these authors. Mr. De l'isle, it is true, in his maps, published the beginning of the present century, corrected those errors, by the help of later informations; but fell into others, for want of farther assistances. In particular, by relying too much on Loubiere's map of Siam, he has placed the northern borders of that kingdom four degrees, as we conceive, too high: in consequence of which, by making it almost contiguous to China, he has left no room for exhibiting the spacious countries which lie between; and has likewise over-much contracted the dominions of Ava and the Laos, especially the latter. He has likewise been at a loss as to the parts where the great rivers rise, which pass through this peninsula, from north to south; and the places where they entered the several countries which they water. But these mistakes we have been able to rectify, chiefly by means of the above-mentioned surveys of the Jesuits; which not only exhibit the course of all the rivers of any note, which pass out of China and Tibet into this peninsula, according to their due situations and distances; but also mark the places where the frontiers of the countries contiguous to China, which are Tong-king, Laos, Pegu, and Ava, begin and end: so that we are able, with more certainty, to assign those kingdoms their proper limits, as well as judge to what southern rivers the northern belong.

THUS much we judged necessary, in our defence, to be premised to the following collections. But before we enter upon a particular description of the countries within this peninsula, it will be proper to mention something in general with regard to the inhabitants. According to the histories of China, this empire, among the other kingdoms and states included within its wide dominion, numbered those, at present found in the farther peninsula of India, as Tong-king, Kochin-china, Siam, &c. (A). Nor is this authority to be suspected, since travellers discover very evident proofs of the footing which the Chineſes have had in all those countries. Metbold observes, that the inhabitants of Arrakan, Pegu, Tenasserri, and

(A) The Chineſes say, that Shi wang ti, about the year 236 before Christ, sent out his fleets, which conquered the maritime countries, as far as Bengâl; and, at the same time, marched an army by land, which reduced all India, as far as Kamboja. See Martini, hist. Sinic. p. 223.

Siam, resemble the Chineses in features, as well as agree with them in customs and religion^a. a De Faria says the same, with regard to the people of Lao (B); Lanjang, Jangoma, Bimir, Ava, and Kamboja^b.

and their religion.

HOWEVER, this conformity does not extend so far as to exclude certain variations, which almost inevitably arise from accidents and other causes. Thus, with regard to religion, though at bottom the same through the whole peninsula, yet one nation differs from another in their ceremonies, in their images, their saints, and even the founders of their respective laws; which are to be considered as so many different sects of the same faith. Nor are our readers, on account of the great agreement which appears in the external form and objects of worship, used by the inhabitants of the farther peninsula of the Indies, compared with those found among the people of the hither peninsula, to suppose that the religion is the same in both regions: for the idolatry of the Malabars, &c. consists in tritheism, or the adoration of three inferior gods, directed by the Supreme Being to make and govern the universe. Whereas that of the Peguers, Siameses, &c. comes originally from Tibet; and has for its founder, as well as prime object of worship, a person, who, about one thousand years before the Christian æra, broached his false religion in that country.

Its origin, and design.

IN forming his plan, he seems to have had a view not only to establish a new religion, but also to contrive one fraught with such high characters, as should give it the superiority of all others, especially that of the Indians, which was then perhaps in highest reputation. Thus, whereas the Bramman theology proposed three gods for the prime objects of worship, subordinate to, and created by, the Supreme Being; this impostor declared himself to be the Supreme Being, who had assumed a human nature. Secondly, whereas the Indian deities were invisible to their worshippers, he proposed to reside corporally among his votaries, and receive their adorations in person. Lastly, to give his followers a more convincing proof of the transformations of their god, as well as the doctrine of the metempsychosis, than the Indians had, he gave out that he would, from time to time, ascend to heaven, and return again in a different body.

Its extent of it.

ACCORDINGLY, if you will believe the people of Tibet, he hath resided among them ever since, excepting in the intervals when he thought fit to disappear. This sect, for a long time, had gotten footing in the hither peninsula of the Indies; but the Brammans never rested till they had excited the Râjabs against them, who rooted them out with fire and sword. It may likewise be presumed, that, to take down the high pretensions of this Tibetian deity, and make him inferior to their own gods, in point of origin as well as antiquity, they have invented the ninth transformation, or incarnation, of Wishnú, in the form of Budda, or Luiha; which is the name given by the western Indians to this pretended deity; who, in other parts, has different appellations. In China he is called Fo and She kya; in Japan, Sbakka; in Tongking, Tikka; and in Tibet, La. We shall only add, that the idolatry of Tibet is six times more extended than that of the Brammans; being spread over Great Tartary, from west to east, China, Japan, and the oriental islands, besides the country contained in the farther peninsula of the Indies.

^a METU. ap. Purch. pilgr. vol. v. p. 1005.

^b DE Faria, Port. Asia, vol. ii. p. 12.

(B) Kampfer confirms this of the Laos, with respect to their persons. Hist. Japan, vol. i. p. 26.

C H A P. II.

Account of the kingdoms of Affam and Tipra.

S E C T. I.

The kingdom of Affam.

Affam region.

OF these two countries we have a knowledge but little more than their names. The first lies so much out of the way of travellers, that, if it had not been for the expedition of the famous Amír Jemla, made into that Indian state about the middle of the last century, in order to annex it to the crown of Hindústán, it is possible that we might never have heard of it. As an account has been already given of that expedition^a, and almost all the geo-

^a See before.

a geography, as well as history, we have relating to Assam, is comprised therein; we shall only here say a few things touching the situation, the country, and the two or three places whose names we meet with in that account.

ASSAM, called also Asbam, and Azem, has on the north the mountains of Tibet, in that part called Lassa, or Barantola; on the south Tipra and Arrakan. It is uncertain whether it be bounded on the east with the great Tjanpa, which passes through Arrakan, or a river more to the west; and its western limit seems to be the gr. at Bramaputren before-mentioned. This river is called Barremporter in a survey made of the mouths of the Ganges (A), by order of the English East-India company; and this, in all probability, is the river up which the Amír conveyed his army in boats: for it enters the Ganges by one of its branches, six leagues to the east of Dakka, capital of Bengál, agreeably to the above mentioned account of the expedition^b. But that account says nothing with respect either to its spring or course, farther than that the army shaped their course north-eastward, as far as the fortress of Azo, 100 leagues from Dakka. The above-mentioned survey exhibits its course for near 80 leagues above the place where it enters the Ganges, to be almost due north and south; and from thence, a few leagues farther, where the survey begins about north west and south-east. Which-ever of the two is right, it may be presumed, that it hath its source in the mountains of Tibet, to the north or north-east of Azo; but at what distance is uncertain, unless we knew more precisely the situation of that fortress.

Azo, or Azoo, we are told, belonged properly to Bengál, from which country it had been dismembered by the Rájab, or king, of Asbam. This is all Bernier says concerning it; excepting that it was retaken in fourteen days by Amír Jemla. But Tavernier relates something more remarkable about it. According to him, the tombs of the kings of Assem, or Asbam, and all the royal family, were in this city. He adds, that, for many ages past, the kings had built chapels in the great pagod for their sepulture; and laid up in vaults, made there for the purpose, great quantities of gold and silver, with other rich effects. It was customary also to bury, with the deceased prince, whatever thing of value he most esteemed in his life-time, that it might be of service to him in the other world; and this, he says, was the reason why Amír Jemla found so much wealth in Azoo^c. But if this was a city newly conquered from Bengál, how could the tombs of the ancient kings of Assem be found there?

d THE first place in the kingdom of Assem, according to Bernier, was Chamdara (B), twenty-six days journey from Azo; whence it may be inferred, that the country between the two cities was conquered lands. Four days journey (C) from Chamdara is Guerguon, the metropolis of Assem, which Jemla pillaged; the Rájab having abandoned it on that general's approach, and fled to the mountains, doubtless of Tibet: from whence he sent down people to carry away all the provisions in the country^d, which shews that city was not far distant.

TAVERNIER mentions neither Chamdara nor Guerguon; but says, Kenneroof, or Kemmeroof, is the capital city, where the king of Assem keeps his court. He adds, that it is twenty five or thirty days journey from the ancient capital (D), which bore the name of the kingdom^e.

e THIS imperfect, and in some measure contradictory, account is all we have from authors concerning the geography of Assem; which yet they represent to be of so great extent. But we must observe, that this extent is to be understood only with regard to its length, from west to east; for its breadth, from the mountains of Tibet southward, cannot be more than two or three days journey.

f WITH regard to the soil and inhabitants of Assem, Tavernier has communicated several particulars. According to this author, it is one of the best countries in Asia, producing all the necessities of life; and, instead of wanting a supply from other countries, is able to furnish them with several metals: for here are mines of gold, silver, steel, iron, and lead; besides great store of silk, but coarse. There is one kind spun by animals, like our silk-worms, but rounder, which live all the year under trees. The silks made of it have a fine gloss, but fret presently. They wash them in a lie, made of the ashes of the leaves of Adam's fig-tree, which makes them white as snow. Here is also store of gum lak, of two sorts. One sort grows under the trees, and is of a red colour, with whose expressed juice they paint their linen: the remaining substance serves to varnish cabine.s, and make wax; for which uses it is

^b BERNIER'S Hist. Mogol, part ii. p. 111. TAVERN. Trav. part ii. p. 187.

^c TAVERN. ubi supra.

^d BERNIER, ubi supra.

^e TAVERN. ubi supr.

(A) To be found in Thornton's English pilot; but the scale of latitude seems not to be well adjusted to it.

(B) So Bernier writes it: but whether according to the Portuguese or French idiom, that is, whether it is to be Chamdara in English, or Shamdara, we cannot determine.

(C) It is said, in the translation, to be only four hours distant: but as it is related that Jemla, pursuing the Rá-

jah closely from Chamdara, arrived before Guerguon in five days, we conclude the four hours is a mistake for four days.

(D) This we judge to be the city called Asferam, in Sheldon's account of Arrakan; where all that is said relating to it is, that it lay on the north part of that kingdom, and was the capital of another kingdom subject thereto. See Ovington's Voyage to Surát, p. 564.

the best in all the east. As for their gold, they neither send it abroad, nor coin it into money; but make it all into ingots, which pass in trade among the inhabitants. However, the silver is coined by the king into small pieces, to the value of ten sous each ^f.

THE king requires no taxes of his people; but reserves to himself all the mines in his kingdom; in which, to ease his subjects, none but slaves are employed to work.

The inhabitants.

THE inhabitants are generally well complexioned: only they who live southerly are more swarthy than the rest; neither are they so well featured: and the women are somewhat flat-nosed. However, to make amends, they are not so subject to wens, or swellings in their throats, as those who dwell more to the north, occasioned by the bad water. These southern people go quite naked, only they cover their privities, and wear on their heads a blue cap or bonnet, hung about with boars teeth. They pierce holes in their ears, which are an inch wide, and hang in them pieces of gold and silver. They are very fond of bracelets made of coral and amber for the rich; while the meaner sort take up with those of tortoise, and other large shells, sawed into rings.

Polygamy.

As the inhabitants of Assem pay no taxes, they live at their ease, with each his house, and commonly an elephant to carry his wives: for they marry four; and assign to every one her peculiar office or business in the family. Although provisions are so very plenty with them, yet they prefer dogs-flesh to all others. They have plenty of excellent vines, but dry the grapes to make brandy instead of wine. They have no salt but what is artificial, made from two sorts of ashes: the first are those of the green stuff that swims on stagnant waters, and is the food of ducks and frogs. This they dry and burn; and the ashes, being boiled in a cloth, become very good salt. The other kind of ashes are those of the leaves of Adam's fig-tree; but the salt of them is so extremely tart, that, to render it fit for the mouth, they take the following method: they put the ashes in water; and having stirred them for ten or twelve hours together, strain out the substance through linen: then they boil it till all the moisture evaporates; and what remains at the bottom of the vessel proves a very good white salt.

Burials.

WHEN any man is buried in this country, all his friends and relations must appear at his funeral; and, in laying the body in the ground, they all take off their bracelets and throw them into the grave: for they are taught to believe, that they who are bad livers here want all things in the other life, while the good have plenty; and that therefore it is necessary to bury with them wherewithal to supply their occasions.

Invention of cannon, and gunpowder.

IT is thought that the people of Assem were long ago the inventors of cannon and gunpowder; that from them the use of those instruments of destruction passed to the inhabitants of Pegu, and from thence to the Chinese; to whom that invention has been commonly ascribed. This however, we are told, is certain, that Amir Jemla brought from Assem several pieces of artillery, all of iron, and store of excellent powder; both made in the same country. The powder is round and small, like ours, and very strong ^g. The inhabitants being so well provided with arms, it may seem strange that they should have continued in peace, as it is said, for above 500 years, when the Amir invaded them ^h: for that advantage, at the same time it secured their own dominions, must, one would think, have prompted them to invade those of their neighbours.

^f TAVERN. ubi supr. p. 181, & seqq.

^g Ibid. p. 187, & seqq.

^h Vide ibid.

S E C T. II.

The kingdom of Tipra.

Its bounds.

THIS kingdom, whose name is written also Tppora and Tippera (A), lies on the north of Arrakan, and, as it should seem, on the south of Assem. Its eastern boundary may be the river passing through Arrakan, or one which falls into it; and its western, either that of Arrakan, or the river Bramaputren before-mentioned: for it has varied its bounds from time to time. Tavernier says, it had, in his time, Arrakan on the west and south, with part of Pegu to the south-west; and that, to travel from thence to Dakka, the merchants were obliged to pass through Arrakan ^a. About the year 1586, it extended as far as the Bramaputren and Ganges, since the city of Chatigan, we are told, belonged to it ^b: and, in the survey of the Ganges, often before quoted, it is placed to the east of the first of those two great rivers ^c. As ^a T. VERNIER, part 2. p. 186. pilot, p. 48.

^b FITCH ap. Purch. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1736.

^c See Engl.

(A) Fitch calls it Tippera, or Porto Grande; perhaps from Chatigan, which was then by the Portugueses called Porto Grande. See Purchas's pilgrim. vol. ii. p. 1736.

^a to its extent, we are told that it is fifteen days journey to cross it: but all the dimensions given by travellers of these countries seem to be greatly exaggerated.

This kingdom was formerly of no inconsiderable strength, when Chatigan aforesaid belonged Subject to to it. But, as it was inferior in forces to Arrakan, then growing in power, that city often Arrakan. changed masters with the latter, which at length subdued the whole country of Tipra, with its capital city of the same name. However, about the middle of the last century, it seems to have been independent, for Tavernier says nothing to the contrary^d; but not long after we find it in subjection to Arrakan^e, in which state it probably has continued ever since.

The country of Tipra has nothing fit to invite foreign merchants. There is indeed a gold Commodities. mine, but the metal is very coarse; likewise a sort of very coarse silk: both of these commodities are sent to China, from whence, in return, is brought silver.

The inhabitants of Tipra are no less subject to wens in their throats than those of Assam and Boutan, or Tibet: the women have them commonly so long that they hang down to the middle of their breasts. Tavernier saw two or three Tipra merchants in Bengál, who were men of very few words, but so fond of strong liquors, that they never refused any; and sighed for more when they had drank what was given them. They cast accounts with small stones like agate; and their scales for weighing were like a stilliard. The inhabi-

The common carriage of the country were horses and oxen; the king, and men of quality, Money. rode in pallekis, and on their elephants of war. His whole revenue arose out of the silk and gold found in his dominions; which, being exchanged in China for silver, this latter was coined into pieces, the value of ten sous each. There are likewise current thin pieces of gold, like the aspers of Turkey, of which there are two sorts; four of one sort make a crown, and twelve of the other^f. This, in effect, is all we know concerning Tipra.

^d TAVERN. p. 48.^e See OVING. p. 564.^f TAVERN. ubi supra.

C H A P. III.

Kingdom of Arrakan, or Rakan.

S E C T. I.

Geographical description.

^d THIS country is variously dénominated by authors; some call it Arakan, or Arrakan; The name. others, Orrakan; and some, as Bernier, Rakan. Some terminate it with an m instead of an n, according to the Portuguese orthography. Fitch calls it the kingdom of Rakam and Rame^a, as if two monarchies had been united in one. Bernier likewise styles it Rakan, or May^b; which last, probably, is an abbreviation of Rame. Tossi sometimes names it the empire of Mogo, or Mogbi, which was a title then newly assumed by the king, on account, as that author supposes, of his conquests over the emperor of Pegu, to whom he had before been tributary^c. But this must be a mistake; for Fitch, who was at Pegu in 1586, says, the people were named Mogores (A), or Mogben^d; so that this title was taken from his subjects, and not his conquest, or rather seizure, of Pegu; which did not happen till the year 1600.

^e ARRAKAN is situate to the south of Tipra, and has on the east the kingdoms of Ava and Pegu; Scite and on the west it is bounded by Bengál, from which it is separated by the river of Chatigan and extent: gulf of Bengál. It extends from 16 degrees 30 minutes to 24 degrees of latitude; that is, about 510 geographical, or 586 English miles, whereof 380 are sea-coast, reaching from cape Negrais in the south, to Chatigan in the north. Its breadth northwards is about 210 miles: but, from Chatigan southward, it decreases gradually to cape Negrais; where a very few miles measure it from west to east. Formerly the bounds of Arrakan were more extensive, as having com-

^a FITCH apud Purch. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1736. & 582.^d FITCH, ubi supra.^b Tom. i. p. 245.^c See OVING. voy. p. 553.

(A) Fitch seems to confound the Mogores, or Mogols, with the Mogben, from the similitude of names: for he places the Great Mogor in Hindustán.

prised not only the kingdoms of Affaram, (B), Tipra, and Cbakomas ^c (C), on the north; but also that of Pegu on the south.

The sea-coast.

THE sea-coast, though of great extent, is inhabited but in a few places, where they are able to defend the products of the ground from the ravages of wild elephants, or buffalos; and their cattle from the claws of numerous tigers, who would soon lay all waste, should the people attempt to settle in that part. However, the islands being out of their reach, some of them are inhabited by poor miserable fishers; who lead a wretched life, though with liberty. There are abundance of islands on the Arrakan coast, which all lie close to the shore, excepting the Buffalo isles: these lie about four leagues off, and have good navigable chanel between. There are two islands of the name of Negraïs, the greater and lesser; this last, which makes the point called the cape, is small and low, barren and rocky: it is often named Diamond Isle (D), because its shape is a rhombus. Both of them are environed with dangerous rocks; and three leagues to the south of Diamond Isle is a reef of sunk rocks, called the Legarti, or Lizards, a league long, but discoverable by the breaking of the sea. The tides along this coast are remarkably strong and high ^f. They rise twelve or fifteen feet in the rivers, and to eighteen or twenty during the spring-tides: at which time, by the rapidity of the currents in the ebb and flow, ships perform great voyages in a short time; and both go and return in the same day ^g.

Country and soil.

THE air of Arrakan is very good; the inhabitants are not troubled with pestilential diseases. The country abounds with meadows and pasture-lands, well watered with rivers and brooks: the plains are exceedingly fertile, and the mountains green. The number of orchards and pleasure-gardens is infinite: they are also green and pleasant all the year round; although, during the winter, which holds from August to October, you have almost continually moist and rainy weather, accompanied with storms. To make amends, the summer which succeeds is charming; and then they gather in their harvest. They have all the vegetable necessaries of life in abundance, excepting wheat and rye. Instead of bread they boil rice, till the water disappears, and it becomes a solid mass. As to the air; though the country lies in so warm a latitude, yet it sometimes freezes to such a degree when the north-east wind blows, as it did in January 1661, that they were forced to cut all sorts of oils with a knife ^h.

Animals.

ALTHOUGH there are variety of tame as well as wild beasts in Arrakan, yet horses are so scarce, that Schouten saw but one all the while he was in the country: instead of them they make use of buffalos for ploughing, and other services. These animals are very large and strong, with desperate horns, wherewith they presently gore to death those whom they attack: as they do strangers, who pass along the roads, near which they commonly feed; especially if they wear any thing which is red, a colour that enrages them. They are so subtle as to let a man pass them quietly, and then, running at him full-drive, toss him with their horns. For all this, they are tamely obedient to the blacks who keep them; and, at the sound of a horn, assemble about them; let them get on their backs; and, at their command, will carry them safely over the most rapid river, or rugged ways; the rest following one the other. Among other animals there are infinite numbers of goats, and a great quantity of game. There is likewise plenty of geese, ducks, and fowl, together with excellent fish ⁱ.

Provinces.

THE kingdom of Arrakan, or empire of Mogo, is said to comprise twelve lesser kingdoms, which are always governed by crowned heads (or those who have the title of kings), and twenty-four provinces (E): but of these we find not the names in authors ^k. This too must be understood of Arrakan, when in its most powerful state, under its conquering sovereigns. The cities, towns, and villages, of this country are very numerous and populous. But scarce any of them are known to Europeans, excepting such as lie near the coasts.

Arrakan city.

THE capital of Arrakan gives name to the kingdom. It is nearly of the same bigness with Amsterdam: but much more populous. It is surrounded with suburbs, which extend some leagues in length ^l. This is Schouten's account, who was there in 1661. By others we are farther informed, that it stands in a valley, and contains no less than fifteen miles in compass; being quite environed with a ridge of steep and craggy hills, which serve it instead of walls: and appear as such to one who is in the city, being artificially cut to resemble a strong fortification. The outlets, which serve for gates, are hewn through the rocks, and, being defended by bulwarks, render the place impregnable. Besides these out-works, it is defended by a castle, of such incredible strength, that the king of Brama, with an army of three hundred thousand men and forty thousand elephants, was forced to raise the siege with disgrace.

^c OVIINGT. p. 564.

ap. Recueil. voy. Holl. tom. vi. p. 242.

^k OVIING. voy. Surat, p. 560, 568.

^f HAMILTON, new acc. East Ind. vol. ii. p. 29, & seq.

^h Ibid. p. 223, 228, 230.

ⁱ SCHOUTEN, ubi supr. p. 229, & seq.

^g SCHOUTEN

^l Ibid. p. 240, & seqq.

(B) By Affaram, probably, is to be understood Affam, or Affem.

(C) By Chakomas, is, probably, to be understood Jangoma, which Floris calls Jagomay, or Jagoman.

(D) This seems to be a mistake: for Diamond Island is another, about seven leagues south of Little Negraïs.

(E) Edoardo Barbosa, who wrote about 1515, says, the king had twelve palaces, one in each province.

- a THROUGH the valley runs a large river (F), which, dividing into several rivulets or streams, The river. conveys merchandizes and provisions to all the streets of Arrakan. Having past through the city, which is forty-five or fifty miles distant from the sea, they unite again, above half-way down, in two chanel; one of which falls northward into the gulf of Bengál at Orietan, the other southward, at Dobazi, or Duabakam: both which places are much frequented by merchants; only the ebbings and flowings of the sea are so violent, especially about the time of the full moon, that ships can hardly ride safe in the ports^m. This is a noble spacious river, its mouth both wide and deep, having no less than six fathoms water at the entrance, and above twenty in some places farther in; where it makes an harbour large enough to hold all the ships in *Europe*ⁿ.
- b THIS river we take to be the river, which in the Jesuits map of Tibet, is named the Great Rise and course. Tsanpu. It rises in the west parts of that vast country, near the springs of the Ganges, and runs quite through it eastward, passing near Lassa, the residence of the Great Lâma: till, crawling near the frontiers of China, it takes a vast sweep to the southward, and turns south-west, along the borders of Assam and Tipra, into Arrakan; which it passes through on the eastern side of it, from north to south, and at length falls into the gulf of Bengál, as before set forth. As travellers have not communicated the name given to this river in the country, it is called by our geographers the river of Arrakan.
- c SCHOUTEN never saw a city where the buildings were so thick, or the streets so crouded The houses. with people (G): but most of the houses are so low that they look more like huts, and do not answer to the vanity of the nation; for the same author never observed them higher than four, five, or six feet at most. They stand at a distance from the ground on pillars; because, almost every night, there arises a fog which covers the surface of the earth, and continues till dissipated by the morning sun. The houses are built with the branches of palm-trees, bambû canes, and koko-leaves; they have many little windows, and are very airy. Those of the better and middling sort have handsome apartments, which communicate one with another, and are very well contrived. They have neither garrets, cellars, nor fire-places; and the kitchens are without-doors, commonly under little penthouses near the entrance, where the women dress their meat in earthen pots. They sleep on carpets and mats, covering themselves with pieces of linen or cotton to keep them warm^o. But although the buildings are for the
- d general mean, yet one meets with several spacious piazzas, where trade is carried on. The princes and nobility employ a different kind of timber in their houses, and are profuse in adorning their apartments with exquisite carvings and gildings; nor are the inferior sort destitute of embellishments. They reckon no fewer than six hundred pagods in this metropolis.
- e THE king's palace is vastly large; but not so beautiful for its structure: it is supported by The king's large and tall pillars, made of whole trees, and covered over with gold. The apartments above palace. are built with red and white sandal, a sort of eagle-wood, and other odoriferous timber. In the middle of the palace is a great hall, called the golden house, because the inside is entirely overlaid with gold; and over a raised place is fixed a canopy, hung round with above a hundred kombalengbe, or large wedges of the same metal, in the shape of sugar-loaves, each weighing
- f above forty pounds. He likewise are to be seen seven idols, each the height of a man, cast in Great metal. gold two inches thick; and adorned with rubies, emeralds, sapphires, and diamonds of an extraordinary size, on their foreheads, breasts, arms, and about their middles. In the center of this hall stands a square stool, of three hands-breadth, supporting a cabinet, both of pure gold, and studded with precious stones; wherein are kept the two kanekas, or famous pendants, made in the form of pyramids, of two rubies, each of the length of a man's little finger, and broad at the base as an hen's egg. These jewels have been the source of most bloody wars among the neighbouring potentates; not so much on account of their value, as that the prince who possesses them is supposed to have a right of dominion over the rest. This king, however, never wears them but on the day of his coronation^p.
- f IN another apartment of the palace stands the statue of the king of Barma (commonly called Fine statue. Brama), murdered by his subjects; which is made with so great skill as to rise admiration in the beholders, who are very numerous; because that prince was reckoned a great saint (H), and famed for curing diseases, especially the bloody-flux; on which account they resort to his statue.

^m OVIINGT. ubi supra, p. 554, & seqq.
map of India, for the company, 1752.
ubi supr. p. 556, & seqq.

ⁿ HAMILTON, ubi supra, p. 28, & seq. See also D'Anville's • SCHOUTEN, ubi supra, p. 229, & seqq. ^p OVIINGT.

(F) Called Khaboris, by Maginus.

(G) Yet the inhabitants were computed at but one hundred and sixty thousand, excepting the merchants, and (other) strangers. Ovington, p. 559.

(H) What king this was is hard to say; there were but three Barma kings of Pegu: the first and last were butchered; but far from being saints, unless their being cruel and tyrannical made them so.

Great lake.

Not far from the palace is a great lake, full of little isles, inhabited by their priests, with a boats plying on it. But it has no communication with the city, being hindered by a bank; so contrived, that, in case the place was forced by an enemy, they might be all drowned, by cutting a passage for the water through the bank.

Orietan.

THE most northern maritime city (I) is Orietan, to which, from the capital, there is a delightful passage by water: the banks of the river being set with tall trees, whose inclining heads make a continued shade to defend the traveller from the sun; who is diverted with the apes and peacocks which frequent them. The city is much resorted to by merchants from all parts of India, and even China and Japan. It is the capital of one of the twelve provinces, whose governor receives a crown from the king at his coronation, and always enjoys the same title. Not far from the city stands the mountain Mawm, with a lake of the same name at the foot of it. Hither are banished state offenders: and although the mountain is so craggy, and infested with wild beasts, that it is almost impassable; yet the king not only causes those exiles to be strictly guarded, but farther, to prevent their flight, cuts off their heels^a.

Peeroem city.

FROM the mountain Mawm, you cross the gulf to Peeroem, another city; which, being near the sea, with a good harbour, is a place of great trade. The governor exercises absolute authority within his jurisdiction, and keeps a court answerable to the majesty of a king.

Ramu city.

SOME days journey distant is Ramu, a considerable city like the preceding; but the way between them is very dangerous, whether you go by land or water, the sea being subject to sudden storms; and the road by land, lying across the mountain of Pre, which separates Arrakan from Pegu, is infested with wild beasts. There is in this part of the country a mountain called Pora, that is, God; from an idol on the top of it, sitting cross-legged, and much resorted to by the devout Indians. By this place (K) runs a large river, from which some engineers would have persuaded the king to cut a canal as far as Arrakan: but he rejected that project, for fear of exposing his capital to the incursions of the Mogols, who might easily convey their forces down such a passage.

Dianga city.

THE next place of note on this tempestuous coast is Dianga, or Diango, which some assign to Bengál; but in Schouten's time it was a frontier city of Arrakan. Indeed this city, as well as Chatigan (which was undoubtedly once an emporium of this kingdom, and commonly governed by the king's second son), has frequently shared the fate of frontier towns, in changing its masters. The greater part of its inhabitants are Portuguese fugitives (or the descendants of them); who enjoy great privileges by grant of the king (L), and have a church here belonging to the Augustin friars.

Sundiva island.

THERE are other places along this coast subject to the king of Arrakan, as Koromoria, Sedoa, Zara, and port of Magaeni: to which may be added the island of Sundiva, already mentioned, abounding with salt; about 100 miles in compass, and 20 from the coast of Bengál, to which it properly belongs. The Portuguese, looking on it as a fit place for a retreat, being naturally well fortified, in 1602 took it from the Mogols, who sometime before had forced it out of the hands of its own prince: this latter gave up to them likewise all his right and title thereto. But the king of Arrakan, fearing the growth of their power, compelled them (M) the next year to retire from thence to Bakala, and other places of Bengál.

Dobazi city.

DESCENDING the southern stream of the river from the city of Arrakan, you come to Dobazi (or Duabakem), a city and port of great traffick. From thence, following the coast, you arrive at Cbudabe; which, having a commodious port, is likewise much frequented by foreign merchants. Not far hence lies cape Negrais; and near it, according to Tossi, the island of Munay (N), famous for its many temples, and being the residence of the chief Raulin, or pope of Arrakan. At this cape Arrakan ends; although Tossi extends it along the south coast as far as Sirian, which properly belongs to Pegu; and others make cape Negrais, with all the coast northwards to beyond 18 degrees of latitude, to belong to Ava.

Cape Negrais.

^a OVINGT. ubi supra, p. 588, & seqq.^b Ibid. p. 561, & seqq.^c Ibid. p. 565, & seqq.(I) In the time of Edoardo Barbosa, about 1515: Arrakan had no sea-ports.(K) It is not said whether the mountain Pora, or city Ramu.

(L) There was a massacre of them here about the year 1607. See the following history.

(M) See the subsequent history.

(N) But Mendez Pinto, p. 252, places the island Munay, where the chief Raulin resides, one league and a half from the city of Martavan. There is a cape of the same name, turning into the river, or port, of Martavan, on the south side thereof.

S E C T. II.

Account of the inhabitants.

^a THE people of Arrakan esteem a broad flat forehead; which they give their children, Their persons. by binding hard on that part a plate of lead as soon as they are born, letting it lie on till the effect be produced. Their nostrils are large and open; their eyes small but quick; their ears reach down to their shoulders, like those of the Malabárs; and they are very fond of a dark purple colour¹.

THE Sikkés (O), counsellors of state, nobility, and all people of condition, wear a vest, or Dress of the shirt, of fine white calico, which fits close to the body and arms. Over it they have a long men. gown of the same kind, which buttons round the arms, and is tied close upon the breast with ribbands. Besides this they have an apron, which covers the belly and thighs before, with another piece of white calico like a bag, which, gathered in many folds, covers the parts ^b behind, and is tied round the waist, from whence it hangs; so that they look as if they carried a large bundle of cloth about them. They let their hair grow long, tying it in tresses behind the head, like the women in Holland, and adorn it with fine cloth, made up in knots. The women are tolerably fair.

THE women wear a kind of flowered gauze, which is transparent, and covering the bosom, Of the women. passes over the shoulders. They likewise fasten about their waist an apron of fine calico, which goes three or four times round them, and reaches to their feet. They who are rich wear a silk scarf over one of their arms. Their hair is not tied, but done into buckles, in an agreeable manner. They stretch their ears by boring them when very young, and putting in the holes rolls of parchment, or the like, which they enlarge from time to time: they wear in them ^c rings of glass, silver, or other materials, which make a jingling against the neck as they go along. Sometimes they have bracelets all the way up their arms to the elbows, and from the ankles to the calves of their legs. But the genteeler sort content themselves with a few japaned ones.

THE people, in general, are very ostentatious, and usually make an appearance beyond their ability; it being common for a person to be attended by several servants, who is not able to maintain above one or two².

IN their entertainments they have plenty of provisions: but then they are such as are neither Their diet pleasing to the eye nor taste. They mix with their choicest dishes the flesh of rats, mice, loathsome. serpents, and other loathsome animals. They never eat fish till it is in a state of corruption, ^d thinking it has the best relish when it stinks the most. They take of this putrid fish, after it has been dried in the sun, and, beating it into a consistency, make a kind of mustard of it, which they call sídol; and this they strew over all their victuals. The better sort make use of the flesh of crabs, mixt with other ingredients; which, not being so rotten as the other fish, is somewhat less intolerable. They serve up their meat in small dishes, one hundred or two at a time, that every body may meet with what he likes. Instead of bread they use rice, both parched and bruised, or otherwise ordered in the flour³. Their usual drink is water, or a liquor called auze, which is the juice of a tree much like the palm; and taken from it by incision, in the same manner as in the other peninsula of *India*⁴.

THE people of Arrakan have an aversion to getting a woman's maidenhead, which they look Their marri- on as a low kind of drudgery; and therefore hire the Dutch sailors, or any strangers, to ease them ages. of that trouble. The virgins who have been thus deflowered are in most reputation; and the men who are inclined to marry, that they may not be deceived, chuse to take those to wife who are big with child. The courtship begins by little presents and interviews; and when matters are concluded, the parties confirm their engagements before the idol, in presence of their parents; the Talipoin (or priest), of whose sect they are, performing certain ceremonies besides. On these occasions there are presents made of precious stones to the bride: fire-works are play'd off, and feasts prepared, accompanied with music and dancing. The men are allowed several wives; they may likewise keep concubines, and make use of the public dancers⁵.

WHEN any fall sick, the physician is sent for; but the Raulin, or priest, is the person on Sick how whom they most depend for a cure. They first blow their breath on them, repeating certain treat.d. prayers; and if this does not do, they tell the patient that he must offer a sacrifice to Chaor Baos, that is the god of the four winds, who, they say, is the author of all distempers. This sacrifice, called Kalouko, consists of fowls, hogs, and other animals; and must be repeated

¹ OVINGT. p. 569.

² SCHOUTEN, ubi supr. p. 233.

³ OVINGT. ubi supr. p. 569.

⁴ SCHOUTEN,

p. 231. ⁵ Ibid. p. 336, & seq.

(O) The Sikkés are the prime men of the kingdom, or chief ministers, who compose the king's council, according to Schouten, p. 156.

four times, to every wind distinctly, in case he does not recover time enough to prevent the expence. On these sacrifices the priests feast themselves. But if, after this, the distemper proves obstinate, then the wife, or nearest relation, must make a vow to perform another piece of priestcraft, called a Talagno. To this purpose a chamber must be hanged with rich tapestry, and an idol placed upon an altar raised at one end of it: when all things are made ready, on the day appointed, the priests, with the sick person's relations, repair thither, and are feasted for eight days together.

*Dancing
physick.*

To complete the farce, the person who makes the vow is obliged to dance as long as he is able to stand; and when his legs will support him no longer, he must take hold of a piece of cloth fastened to a beam, and continue dancing till he has quite exhausted his spirits, and drops down on the spot. Then the music is redoubled, and the spectators, who are as great fools as the vow-maker, envy his happiness; supposing him all the while he lies in this condition to converse with the idol. This exercise he is obliged to repeat every day as long as the feasting lasts; but if he has not strength to go through it, some near relation is to dance in his place. In case, after the Talagno is completed, the patient happens to recover, he is carried to the pagods, where he is anointed with perfumed oils from head to foot: but if, on the contrary, he dies, the priest tells his relations, that the sacrifices were well accepted by the gods; and that the reason why they did not grant him a longer life was, because they designed him a greater favour, by taking him to themselves.

Their funerals.

THEIR funerals are no less superstitious, and, consequently ridiculous: for the corpse being brought into the middle of the house, the Raulin walks round it, and says over it certain prayers, whilst others perfume the place with incense; and the family beat upon a broad piece of brass, keeping strict watch at the same time, lest a black cat should pass over him: for in that case he would be constrained to return to life again with ignominy, and be deprived of bliss. Before the body is carried out of the house, they invite to a banquet a sort of people called Graii, whose refusal causes dreadful lamentation among his relations; as taking it for an infallible sign that his soul is condemned to the house of smoke, so they call hell. The coffin is adorned according to the ability of the people: and, as they hold the metempsychosis, they paint on it the figures of horses, elephants, eagles, cows, lions, and the like noble animals, as it were to direct the departed soul to the best lodging; unless, out of humility, the deceased had ordered rats, frogs, and the most contemptible creatures, to be drawn in their stead, as more suitable receptacles for his polluted soul. After this, the body is carried into the field, and burnt to ashes. The Raulin kindles the fire, which the relations attend, clad in white; which is their mourning colour, only they wear a black band round their head^a.

The sick exposed.

AT their funerals they have always hired mourners, who attend sometimes all night as well as day, and pretend much sorrow. They who cannot afford wood to burn the corpse; for it is very dear in this country; carry it to the river at low water, and leave it for the next tide to carry it off: but as the dead carcases often remain in the river, either sunk or floating, it gives an ill taste, to the water. This also fills the country with ravens, kites, and other birds of prey, which not only feed on these corpses, but attack the buffaloes, and other horned cattle; fixing on their backs, and tearing off the flesh to the very bones, in spite of all their efforts to shake them off. The natives not only carry the dead bodies to the rivers, but also expose the living in the same manner, when afflicted with grievous diseases, which they judge to be incurable; so that if the water does not carry them away, they are sure to be drowned. This they call humanity, charity, and compassion for the sick person; who, by this means, they say, is delivered from a most miserable state here, and sent to enjoy great happiness in heaven^b.

No foreign commerce.

THE people of Arrakan trade very little by sea. All their navigation extends no farther than Bengál and Pegu; whither, upon occasion, they send their Jeliasses of war. For they neither covet subduing the possessions of other nations, nor of sending colonies into other parts; much less do they delight in foreign commerce. What trade they have is brought home to them by the merchants of distant countries^c. As the country produces timber for building, some lead, tin, stick-lack, and elephants teeth, there are some of the Great Mogol's subjects who trade hither: and sometimes they meet with bargains of diamonds, rubies, other precious stones, and gold rupis; which, says our author, are to be supposed some of Soltán Sujab's treasure, pilfered by the avaritious priests^d: of which more will be spoken hereafter.

Mohammedans.

WHATEVER foreign commerce there is in Arrakan, it is carried on by the Mohammedâns, who are settled here in great numbers; particularly at Bandel. Some trade in elephants, which they send to Orisha (or Orixa), the coast of Choromandel, Golkonda, and Persia: in return for which, and other goods, they carry back calicoes, silks, spiceries, and the like. Very few are natives of Arrakan; but come from other parts of India to settle there, and dress as they do elsewhere.

^a OVIINGT. ubi supr. p. 570, & seqq. ubi supr. p. 29.

^b SCHOUT. ubi supr. p. 337.

^c Ibid. p. 228.

^d HAMILT.

- a THE inhabitants of Arrakan are idolaters: on which account, says Schouten, they are called Moges (Q); worshipping devoutly their images, made of clay, baked in the sun^c. They are ^{Religion of Arrakan} very superstitious, and look on the barking of a dog, or the like, as the presage of some remarkable event. On every such frivolous occasion the priests are sent for; who know how to make their advantage of the people's folly. The idols in their temples are so numerous, that one of them is reported to contain no fewer than 20,000. They are built in the form of pyramids or spires. Besides the temple-idols, they have their domestic ones. To both sorts they offer victuals every day; and both are clothed by them in winter, that they might not catch cold. They wear the mark of their household god branded on their arms, sides or shoulders. On their anniversary festival, in commemoration of the dead, they carry in procession one of their idols, Quiay Poragray (R); which is carried in a heavy chariot, with ^{like the Indian.} ninety of the priests, clothed in yellow sattin. Many throw themselves under the wheels; others hang themselves on hooks, fastened for the purpose, and sprinkle them with their blood. These martyrs to folly are in such veneration with the people, that he thinks himself happy on whom one drop of their blood happens to light. Nay, the hooks are taken down by the priests, as sacred relicks, and carefully preserved in their temples. From these instances our readers may perceive, that the religion of Arrakan tallies with that of the Hindis, in the hither parts of India; and their priests impose upon them no less by subtil artifices.
- THEIR priests, called Raulin, or Raulini, are divided into three orders, distinguished by ^{Their hierarchy.} the names Pungrini, Panjani, and Sbosshom; something resembling the orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, in the Christian hierarchy. The chief of their priests is called Sbosshom Pungrin; which title imports as much among them as that of Pope does at Rome. On him depend all ecclesiastical causes; and he is had in so great veneration even by the king, that his majesty places him on his right hand, and never speaks to him without a profound reverence. The place of his residence, or see, is in the island of Munay, as hath been already mentioned. All the priesthood are clothed in yellow (S), and have their heads shaven. All go uncovered, excepting the Pungrini, or those of the first order, who wear a yellow mitre, with the point turned and falling backward. They are obliged by vow to live single; and, in case of disobedience, are degraded: by which means they are reduced to the condition of laics, and are taxed as such^f.
- d THEY live partly in houses of their own, and on their estates; partly in cloisters, which are ^{Monks and hermits.} founded by their king, or great men (T), and generally very sumptuous: but they are all subject to one spiritual head, as before-mentioned. By them the children, both of the nobility and gentry, are educated in the knowledge of their religion and laws; and they are said to be exceeding hospitable to strangers. They have among them many hermits, like the Joghis of the western part of India; who are distinguished into three kinds or orders, named Grepin, Manigrepin, and Taligrepin (U). These inflict on themselves very rigorous penances; for which they are held in great esteem among the people^g.
- THE government of Arrakan is chiefly in the hands of the twelve princes before-mentioned; ^{Government.} who are honoured with the title of kings, residing in the principal cities, in twelve royal palaces, with each a great seraglio, as well for their women, as those they educate for the king of all the rest, who keeps his court in the city of Arrakan.
- e THIS monarch affects as lofty titles as any of his neighbours; styling himself Emperor of Arrakan, possessor of the white elephant (X), with the two Kenekas, and, by virtue of them, rightful heir of Pegu and Brama. Lord of the twelve Boyoni of Bengâl; and of the twelve kings (meaning those in Arrakan), who lay the highest hair of their heads under the soles of his feet. His usual residence is in the city of Arrakan: but it is customary with him in summer to spend two months in a kind of progress by water to Orietan. In which he is attended by ^{and places of residence.} his nobility, in boats so artfully contrived and disposed, that they appear rather like a floating palace or city, than what they are. In this progress he does not omit to administer justice; f but hears causes as regularly as when at land. One pretence for this maritime journey is to

^c SCHOUT. p. 235, 239.^f OVINGTON. p. 575, & seqq.^g Ibid. p. 577, & seq.

(Q) Or Moghes. If this be so, we then learn what Ovington tell us, p. 582, he could never find, whence the king derives the appellation of Moghi, which he assumes.

(R) He is their supreme deity. See p. 580 of Ovington. Captain Hamilton says, the name of the titular god of the kingdom is Dagon. Vol. ii. p. 28.

(S) Schouten says, they wear black; which is the colour of modesty, as well as mourning, in Arrakan. Voy. vol. i. p. 335.

(T) Schouten, p. 335, says, their houses are either near the pagods, on rocks, or on little hills; where they live like hermits, sequestered from the world. Although their air and gate is modest, yet one may discover pride in it.

(U) These names seem to be taken from Mendez Pinto. Other authors call them in general Talipoi, or Talipains.

(X) This famous white elephant was wrested from the king of Siam, by him of Pegu, in 1567. It was taken by the king of Tangu, at the surrender of Pegu city, in 1599, and delivered to the king of Arrakan soon after.

visit the pagod of Quiay Poragray, their supreme deity; to whom he daily sends a sumptuous dinner. a

Superstition and cruelty.

THIS, among many instances, shews the kings of Arrakan to be very superstitious; and this superstition frequently leads them into acts of the greatest barbarity. Tosi relates of one of them, that, being told he could not long survive his coronation, which is performed with the greatest pomp, he put it off, although the high priest was already setting the crown on his head; nor would admit that ceremony for the space of twelve years: but, being pressed to it by his lords, and not able to defer it any longer, he consulted a Mohammedan, to know whether there was any way to avert the omen. The Musulman, with an intent, it is said, to destroy those whom he reckoned enemies of his religion, told the king, that an electuary made of hearts, wherein were to be 6000 belonging to his subjects, 4000 of white cows, and 2000 of white doves, would protect him from the threatened danger. The king, relying upon this false information, built a house; the foundations whereof, to render it still more auspicious, were laid upon women great with child: and, on that occasion, sacrificed no fewer than 18,000 innocent persons, with a view to preserve his own life^b.

Merry their sisters.

WE meet with no account of the descent of the kings of Arrakan; but we learn from authors, that, to preserve the blood unmixed, they are obliged to marry their eldest sisters^c. This monarch scarce ever goes out of his palace above once in five years (†), when he does it with great solemnity; but passes his life there with his queen, and a great number of concubines. Every year the Sikkes (Y), who are his favourites, cause twelve of the loveliest maidens to be sought for through the realm, and dressed in fine white linen. After this, they are exposed for six hours to the most violent heat of the sun, that they may sweat as much as possible. This done, other habits are brought them to put on, and their sweaty ones examined by persons appointed, who make their report; and the young ladies, whose sweat has no disagreeable smell, are presented to the king, and placed among his concubines. The rest are disposed of, with portions, to his courtiers. All the females are taught music and dancing, with whatever else may help to render them agreeable, in hopes of arriving to that dignity. It is said, that they who have obtained it, form themselves also to the exercise of arms; after which they are distributed into the principal apartments of the king, and serve him for guards^k.

Concubines how chosen.

The king's power.

THE kings of Arrakan were formerly almost continually at war with the great Mogol; but never came to a set battle; for they do not care to hazard their troops much^d. These monarchs, however, for the vastness of their treasure and military strength, are as considerable as most eastern princes. About 150 years ago they became famous by their wars, and much enlarged their dominions by the conquests they made both in Bengal and Pegu. However, it is observed, that they were generally unsuccessful in their wars against the Portugueses; who, in 1605, defeated the king's fleet, consisting of no fewer than 540 sail (or barks); and, not long after, he was forced three times to retire from before Siriam (now belonging to Pegu), though he attacked it with a fleet of 1200 sail, and an army of 30,000 men, accompanied with 3500 great and small cannon^m. However, the king of Rakan (or Arrakan) by degrees humbled them, as will be related hereafter.

^b Ovingt. p. 579, & seq.
^k Schout. ubi supr. p. 233.

^c Tosi ap. Ovingt. p. 582. Methold ap. Purch. Pilgr. vol. 5. p. 1005.
^d Ibid. p. 228. ^m Jarric. ap. Ovingt. p. 578.

(†) Except we suppose in his progress, as aforesaid.
(Y) According to Ovington, p. 579, the twelve governors, styled kings, are obliged to pick out twelve girls every year, within their provinces, and educate them, at the king's charge, in their seraglios, till they are twelve years old; at which age they are carried to court, and chosen by the smell of their sweaty garments. Escardo Parlysa relates to the same purpose.

S E C T. III.

The History of Arrakan.

Kingdom of Arrakan,

THE first account we meet with of the affairs of Arrakan is about the year 1569; at which time the king of Pegu (of the Barma or Brama race), growing very powerful, fought, by all manner of ways, to subdue that kingdom. But he was not able to compass his design: for, first, he had no fleet to transport an army by sea; whereas the king of Arrakan could arm 200 gallies in his defence: and, in case he should invade that country by land, the inhabitants were ready, by means of sluices, to lay the same all under water, and either drown their enemies, or impede their march. However, at that time, the Portugueses of Chatigan having slain the governor of that city, which belonged to Bengal; and it being made an article of the accommodation which soon after took effect, that the chief commander of the Portugueses, who had then eighteen ships in the port, should depart the place with his vessel; the king of Arrakan, to strengthen himself against his neighbours, invited the captain to come f a into his dominions^a. By this means the Portugueses first found an introduction into Arrakan; where, by degrees, they gained a considerable footing; which they lost again, at length, by their insolence and crimes.

THESE Portugueses, however, proved of great service to the king of Arrakan; for, in 1581, the king of Pegu, having at length procured a fleet of 1300 sail, resolved to conquer that country. With this view he sent that numerous armament, under the command of the prince his son, towards the Arrakan coast. The prince being informed, in his passage, that two Portuguese galliots had taken a ship of Pegu, richly laden, he detached sixteen of his best sailors to attack them. The galliots received them bravely, and disabled several of them: till seeing the whole fleet coming down upon them, they made the best of their way into the bay of Arrakan^b, which prevented the prince from making a descent.

AFTER this, Arrakan seems to have been freed from any attempts on the side of Pegu, Shilimi Shâh whole arms were turned against other neighbouring nations. Nor did the king of Arrakan take that opportunity to attack his most dangerous enemy, for fear of drawing back his resentment upon him. But at length the power of Pegu having been greatly exhausted by long wars, particularly with Siam, several of the bordering kings, taking advantage of Branjinoko's distress, entered into a league against him. Among the rest Shilimi Shâh (A), king of Arrakan, was one. This prince, in the year 1598, laid siege to the city of Pegu, and was joined soon after by the king of Tangu. But being called away for a while about some other affairs, he left the continuance of the siege to the king of Tangu: who made so good use of his time, that, before the king returned, he had gotten Branjinoko, with all the royal family, into his hands, and carried off almost the whole treasure of the captive prince, amounting to an immense value; leaving behind above three millions in silver, and other metals, which he thought not worth while to take with him.

SHILIMI SHAH, coming back to Pegu, took the kingdom into his possession, with the silver which the king of Tangu had left for him: but not brooking to be so tricked by his good ally, who had agreed to divide the spoil, he sent to demand a farther share, with the white elephant, and the captive king's daughter; he likewise required that the king himself should either be sent to him, or slain; threatening otherwise to invade Tangu. To avoid this visit, his demands were complied with; the king's brother, and two of his sons, sent also; and the dethroned tyrant was put to death.

How long the king of Arrakan kept possession thereof, or whether he abandoned it of his own accord, or was forced to quit it by the king of Ava, does not appear from travellers. We meet with no account of what he did in Pegu, excepting so far as relates to the affair of Sirian^c.

As the king of Arrakan was not acknowledged by the Peguers, who had hidden themselves, or abandoned the country, to avoid the miseries which the late king brought upon it; he delivered to Philip de Brito, and Nicote, the port of Sirian, in order to receive under his protection such fugitives as should be minded to return: he likewise designed thereby to reward the military services of De Brito, for whom he had a great esteem. But this upstart, who had acquired prodigious wealth, requited that prince's favours with the utmost ingratitude^d. He fortified Sirian against the donor; and, in the end, set up for emperor of Pegu himself, as will be set forth in the history of that country, to which we shall refer our readers, and return to matters which more immediately concern the kingdom of Arrakan: where we shall meet with another Portuguese, no less remarkable for his sudden rise and treachery to that prince, than De Brito himself.

THIS last, elated with his new dignity, aiming to extend his power, thought it would be for his advantage to be possessed of Dianga, a port of Arrakan; and although he knew how ill that potentate bore his retaining Sirian, though in another dominion, yet he had the presumption to think he would bestow Dianga upon him. With this hope, in the beginning of the year 1607, he fitted out some vessels, and sent in them his son, as ambassador, to beg that port of the king. But some Portugueses having persuaded his majesty of Arrakan that De Brito's design, by that request, was to deprive him of his kingdom; he ordered the son, with his officers, to be assassinated in his court, and the men to be served in the same manner on board the vessels. Not content with this, he, at the same time, sent a private mandate to slay all the Portugueses who were settled at Dianga. On which occasion, above 600 of them, living quietly as good subjects, under his protection, and suspecting no danger, lost their lives. Some few escaped into the woods; and nine or ten vessels got out to sea^e.

^a CÆSAR FREDERIC ap. Purch. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1720. & seq.

^c FERNANDEZ ap. Purch. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1744. supr. vol. iii. p. 154.

^b DE FARIA Portug. Asia, vol. ii. p. 369.

^d Ibid.

^e DE FARIA, ubi

(A) Called afterwards, Shilimika, which seems the more natural name of the two.

Rise of Tibao.

WHETHER the king who gave these sanguine orders was Shilimi Shâb, or his successor, we cannot determine; our author De Faria having neglected to inform us (B). However that be, much about this time we find a new king in Arrakan, and soon after a revolution in that country, as will appear from what we are going to relate. Among the few who escaped by sea from the above-mentioned massacre at Dianga, was one Sebastian Gonfales Tibao, who had just then entered the harbour, with a vessel laden with salt. He was a man of obscure extraction, born in the village of St. Anthony del Tojal, near Lisbon: in 1605 he embarked for India; and lifting himself a soldier in Bengâl, fell to dealing in salt, which is a great merchandize there. By this trade he soon gained as much as purchased a Jaleu, a sort of small vessel; and by this purchase was enabled to carry his salt to foreign markets. This man was one of the greatest prodigies of the Portuguese fortune that Asia had produced: three years she was big with this monster, from 1605 to 1608. The reader will see in him another Philip de Brito and Nicote (C), famous for their incredible rise and insolence.

Another.

EMANUEL DE MATTOS, commander of the Bandel (or port) of Dianga, who died not long before the massacre there, had been lord of Sundiva, an island seventy leagues in compass, belonging to Bengâl, and not far from the coast of Arrakan. Fateh Khân, a resolute Moor (D), whom he had trusted with that island in his absence; hearing of De Matto's death, usurped the command; and, the better to secure himself, murdered not only all the Portugueses who were settled there, with their wives and children, but likewise such of the natives as had embraced popery. This done, gathering Moors and Patans (E) to his assistance, he fitted out a fleet of forty sail, which charges he supported with the revenue of the island, which is very considerable. Sebastian Gonfales, and his companions, with the other vessels which had escaped from Dianga, being left without a head to govern them, lived by robbing in the country of Arrakan, and carried their plunder to the king of Bakkala's (F) ports, who was a friend to the Portugueses. Fateh Khân, understanding that these rovers plied thereabouts, went out to seek them, with such assurance of success, that he carried this inscription on his colours: Fateh Khân, by the grace of God, lord of Sundiva, shedder of Christian blood, and destroyer of the Portuguese nation.

Chosen commander.

ONE evening he thought to surprise them; and had certainly effected it: but quarrelling about the division of some spoil, in a river of the island Sbavaspur, Tibao left them; and happening to meet Fateh Khân's fleet, gave his companions notice of it. By this means they had time to put themselves in a posture of defence, before the arrival of the enemy, who immediately fell on them. The pirates fought so desperately all night, that the morning discovered eighty Portugueses victorious over 600 Moors, joined with Patans; and ten vessels over forty. Not one sail of them got away, nor a man escaped being taken or killed; among which latter was Fateh Khân. Had they been under a commander who knew how to improve a victory, the island must then have been their own. This obliged them to chuse a head; and they pitched on Stephen Palmyro, a man of years and experience. But as he absolutely refused to command such wicked people, they desired him to appoint one; and he named Sebastian Gonfales Tibao, whom they promised punctually to obey. As soon as this point was settled, they resolved to attack Sundiva; and having gathered a number of Portugueses from Bengâl and the neighbouring ports, Tibao applied to the king of Bakkala, agreeing by articles, "to give him half the revenue of the island when recovered, provided he assisted him to conquer it." The king, consenting, sent him some ships, and 200 horse: so that, in March 1609, Tibao had a fleet of forty ships, and 400 Portugueses, besides his auxiliaries. On the other hand, Sundiva, having had time to provide for its defence, was full of resolute men. A great number of Moors, commanded by Fateh Khân's brother, received them at landing, but were forced to retire into a fort, which the Portugueses immediately besieged.

Attacks and takes

^f DE FARIA, ibid. p. 154, & seq.

(B) The successor of Shilimi Shâb, according to De Faria's history, was Anaparam, who was dethroned by his brother, whose name is omitted; and, by a passage, p. 160, it must have been this usurper who then reigned: for it is there said, that Tibao's treachery was to revenge the Portugueses slain by him at Dianga. But this author is very incorrect, often confounding one prince with another. He likewise, by frequently omitting the names of the princes, and exact dates of actions, has rendered his history very confused and imperfect, as well as by dividing his relation of the same matters into so many parts, and mixing matters of so many different kinds together, in order to digest them by way of annals. It is still worse, when giving the history of a person together, contrary to his plan, he omits the date of actions, and so causes the reader to imagine that they all belong to the particular year or years under which they are related. This is the case with the affairs of Arrakan and Pegu.

(C) James Suarez de Melo was another of these monstrous births. See De Faria, Portug. Asia, vol. ii. p. 135, & seqq.

(D) By Moor is to be understood a M. hammedan.

(E) The Patans are those of the province of Latam, in Hindûstân, who had the dominion of that country before the Mogols conquered it. By some, the Afyâns.

(F) There are two or three large islands to the west of Sundiva, which bear the name of Bakkala. They are made by the streams into which the Ganges is divided, towards the sea or gulf of Bengâl. There is another island called Bokali, with a town of the same name in it, on the coast of Arrakan, mid-way between Sundiva and the river of Arrakan: but this is not so likely to be the Bakkala in question, as the former.

As

- a As the place was vigorously defended, they not only lay long before it, without making any great progress, but were at last in danger of perishing; not being able to come at either the ammunition or provision which were aboard their vessels. From this distress they were luckily delivered, by Gaspar de Pina, a Spaniard, who coming to that port, at their request landed fifty men, whom he commanded; and marching by night with many lights, and much noise, made the enemy believe that he brought a considerable succour. As soon as he arrived in the camp, the fort was assaulted; and, being taken, above 1000 Moors were put to the sword. The natives of the island, who before had been subject to the Portugueses, presently submitted; and were received to mercy, on condition that they should deliver up to him all the strangers who were in the island. On this occasion they brought him above 1000 Moors more; and, as they came, he cut off their heads. Thus Tibao became master of Sundiva, and was obeyed as an absolute lord, independent of any other prince.

To recompence the principal Portugueses, who had served him on this occasion, he gave them lands in the island: and then, repenting, took them away again. Instead of yielding to the king of Bakkala half the revenue of the island, as had been agreed by him, he made war upon that prince; growing insolent and ungrateful, as he grew in authority. He had now at his command 1000 Portugueses, 2000 natives, well armed, 200 horse, and above 80 sail of vessels, with good artillery. As many merchants traded thither, he erected a custom-house; and the neighbouring princes, surpris'd at his prodigious success, courted his friendship. From the king of Bakkala he wrested the islands of Shavapur (or Shavaspur), and Patelabanga; besides what he took from others: so that, of a sudden, he was possessed of vast riches, equal with many princes: but, like a meteor, he as suddenly disappeared.

SUCH was the fortune of Sebastian Gonfales in Sundiva, when there happened a difference between the prince of Arrakan and king Anaparam. The prince, finding that he could not prevail on his brother, either by intreaty or threats, to give him an elephant, to which all other elephants were said to allow a kind of superiority, raises a great army, and deprives him both of his kingdom, and that so much coveted animal. Anaparam flies for succour to Sebastian Gonfales, who demands his sister as an hostage; and, having received her, sets out along with him to fight the conqueror. But what could his small force do against an army of 80,000 men, and 700 elephants? The dethroned king returned with Tibao to Sundiva, carrying over his wife and family, with his treasure and elephants. Thus he remained as a subject to this upstart lord; who baptizing the king's sister, married her; and, though so vile a wretch, pretended he did that prince a signal honour. Soon after, Anaparam dies, not without strong suspicion of poison; for Gonfales seized on all his treasure, his elephants, and effects, without any consideration of his wife and son. To stop the mouths of the people, he would have married the queen to his brother Antony Tibao, admiral of his fleet, but could not compass it; for she never could be prevailed on to be of a religion professed by such monsters in wickedness.

AFTER this, Sebastian waged war against the king of Arrakan, and met with good success; Tibao for his brother Antony, with only five sail, took 100 of that monarch's ships. This moved him to conclude a peace; by which he recovered his sister-in-law and brother's widow, whom he married to the king of Chatigan (G). At this time the Great Mogol undertook to conquer the kingdom of Balua (H), which lying opposite to Sundiva, alarmed Tibao, who therefore entered into a league with the king of Arrakan for its defence. The king hereupon takes the field with 80,000 men, most of them musketeers, 10,000 natives of Pegu, who fought with sword and buckler, besides 700 elephants, loaded with castles, and armed men. He likewise put to sea above 200 sail, carrying 4000 soldiers, who were to join Sebastian Gonfales, and to be under his command. The agreement was, that Tibao should hinder the Mogols from passing to the kingdom of Balua, till the king of Arrakan could march thither with his forces; and that the enemy being repulsed, Tibao should have half the kingdom delivered to him. The king was likewise to have hostages for his fleet: on which occasion Sebastian sent to him a nephew of his own, and the sons of certain Portugueses inhabitants of Sundiva.

THE king of Arrakan, being arrived with his army, was surpris'd to find the Mogols already entered the kingdom of Balua: however, marching into it with his troops, he, in a short time, expelled the enemy. It was thought that Tibao, corrupted with bribes, had given them a free passage into that country; which, by agreement with the king of Arrakan, he was obliged to obstruct. Others say, he did it to revenge the death of the Portugueses, slain by that prince at Dianga. However that be, he was guilty of execrable treachery; for, leaving

^a DE FARIA, p. 155, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 157, & seq.

(G) The cities in these parts are kingdoms one day, and in subjection the next.

(H) Perhaps the great island in the mouth of the Ganges, directly north of Sundiva; or else a country on the continent, eastward, beyond the eastern stream of that great river, which seems most likely.

the mouth of the river (I) Dangatiar open, he gave them free entrance. His villainy did not stop there; for, running with his fleet into a creek of the island Desiarta, and calling all the king of Arrakan's captains aboard his ship, he murdered them; then falling on the vessels, deprived of their commanders, killed or made slaves of all the men. After he had committed this infamous action, and also taken possession of the injured king's fleet, he returned to Sundiva. Mean time the Mogols came down again, with a greater power; and entering the kingdom of Balua, made a great slaughter of the Arrakan army; and reduced that king to such distress, that, with much difficulty, he escaped upon an elephant, and came almost alone to the fort of *Chatigan*¹.

Ravages the coast.

TIBAO, being informed of all which had happened, sets out with his fleet, and ravages all the coast of Arrakan, plundering and destroying all the forts which lie along it; and which, confiding in the peace, were then unprovided. He had the impudence to advance up to the very city of Arrakan, where he burnt many merchant-ships of several nations: among the rest was one which the king kept in that port to take his pleasure in, and whose loss he resented most of all. It was a vessel of vast bigness, and surprising workmanship, with several apartments, like a palace, all covered with gold and ivory; and yet the art far surpassed the cost. The king, provoked at the insolence and treachery of Gonsales, who seemed to have forgotten that his nephew was in hostage, resolved to put him in mind; and causing a stake to be driven through his body, had it set up on an eminence, below the port of Arrakan, that his uncle, as he went out, might see him. But he, who had no honour, valued not at whose cost he advanced his own interest. Nevertheless, the guilt of so many villainies began to touch his conscience; and he returned to Sundiva, with an apprehension that some heavy punishment would soon fall upon him for his crimes^k.

His nephew impaled.

Sends for succours;

THIS base upstart, who, in his prosperity, never regarded the viceroy, now seeing the danger of falling, applies to him for succour; proposing, in that case, like an absolute prince, to become tributary to Portugal, with the acknowledgement of a galleon, laden with rice, to be delivered yearly, either at Goa, or Malakka. He pretended, that what he had done was solely to revenge the murder of the Portugueses at Dianga: and, to allure the viceroy, concluded with a hint, that it would be no difficult matter to seize the vast treasure of the Arrakan king. This bait had the desired effect; so that the viceroy, instead of abhorring, saith our author, the villainies of that wretch, resolved to assist him, contrary to all laws both human and divine. For this expedition were fitted out fourteen of the largest galliots, one fly-boat, and a pink, under the command of Don Francisco de Meneses Rexo, who had been governor of Seylán, or Ceylon. As his instructions were that he should enter the kingdom of Arrakan, without waiting for Tibao, he only sent him notice of his coming, when he arrived on that coast; and proceeded directly for the city of Arrakan, which is the chief port, as well as residence, of the king.

which are defeated;
A. D. 1615.

HE arrived thither the third of October; and, in the morning of the 15th, discovered a very numerous fleet coming down the river, with a Dutch pink at the head of them. Other vessels were likewise commanded, and reinforced with Hollanders. On the other hand, Don Francisco had now with him no more than twelve small ships: for the pink was sent in pursuit of a vessel which had fled; one galliot was gone to fetch back the pink, and another to Sundiva, to carry the advice. For all this, the Portugueses advanced, without any dread of that formidable armament. The Dutch pink fired the first gun, and then began a furious fight. Four galliots, which got before the rest, had their captains and many soldiers killed, before the remaining eight came up; which fell on so desperately, that the enemy overset many of their vessels, through haste to fly from them. In the evening they drew off, on sight of the galliot which went to seek the pink; supposing that some relief was coming to the Portugueses; who, among the slain, lost twenty-five men of note^l.

and himself reduced,

DON FRANCISCO, now resolving to wait for Tibao, fell down to the mouth of the river; whither, at length, the other arrived, with fifty sail, well manned and equipped. When he heard what had been done, he railed at the viceroy for giving such orders, and against Don Francis for obeying them. Then dividing the ships into two equal squadrons, they sailed up the river, and fell upon the enemy on both sides, firing upon the vessels in reach, none of which advanced. All the while the king, from the shore, encouraged his people; and caused the heads of some who fled to be cut off. Soon after, a great part of that vast fleet bore down upon the Portugueses, divided into three squadrons. Tibao put to flight those who attacked him; and the pink did as much with the Hollanders: while Don Francisco acted bravely also on his side. In short, the advantage was visibly in favour of the invaders till sunset, when that admiral was killed by two musket-balls, shot one in the forehead, the other in the left eye. Tibao, discouraged by the signal made of this misfortune, ceased to follow his good to his former condition.

A. D. 1616.

¹ DE FARIA, p. 159, & seq.

^k Ibid. p. 161.

^l Ibid. p. 225, & seqq.

(I) Possibly one of those, fifteen or twenty leagues to the north of Chatigan.

a fortune; and the tide beginning to ebb, the fleets parted. One galliot was taken by the enemy, and all the men slain; besides 200 more, whose bodies were buried in the sea, at the mouth of the river. When they returned to Sundiva, the vice-admiral, Don Lewis de Azevedo, who succeeded Don Francisco in the command, set sail for Goa; notwithstanding Tiboá, for his own security, laboured all he could to keep him there. In fine, being thus left in a defenceless state, the king of Arrakan, not long after, attacked the island, took it, and reduced him to his former miserable condition. Thus ended the sovereignty of that profligate upstart; which yet was too small a punishment for the crimes he had committed during his short reign.

b THE Portugueses, thus sufficiently humbled, applied to the king for grace, who, notwithstanding the many provocations received from them, was inclined to hearken to their petition; knowing that it would be in their power to do him more mischief than ever, in case they should go over to some of the neighbouring powers. To prevent this, therefore, and at the same time secure his frontiers against the Great Mogol, his most formidable enemy, who was now become his next neighbour, by the conquest of Bahia, he settled them in the port of Chatigan (then in his hands), giving them lands, and liberty to live as they pleased; which was on robbery and piracy^m. On this occasion, we are told, that the first time the king of Arrakan settled in went to the city of Chatigan, after the Portugueses were settled there, they presented him a bough, thick set with figs. This bough that prince offered to his white elephant to eat, which the animal refused, although his majesty intreated him to take it for sake of the king of Ava, the Great Mogol, and his own: but scarce was he desired to eat it for the king of Portugal, when he snatched it eagerly with his trunk. The king, hereupon, in a passion, caused the elephant to be stript of all his golden ornaments; which so grieved the beast, that he would not eat at all: so that the king, for fear his beloved animal should die (for this was the famous white elephant so much coveted by all the eastern princes), was obliged to restore its furniture. We relate this story, to shew that the Portugueses have their political, as well as religious, legends (K). But to proceed.

d THEY continued in the course of life above-mentioned, plundering and mal-treating all who came in their way, till about the year 1667; when, having murdered one of the king of Arrakan's chief officers, and fearing to be punished for that, as well as other crimes, they were struck one day with such a panic, that they shipped themselves all at once, in forty or fifty of their galleasses, and wafted over to Sháh Hest Khán; who was then in Bengál, and had invited them to join him against the king of Arrakan, whose dominions he had orders to attack. By their assistance he took Sundiva from that Indian potentate: and having thus rendered them irreconcilable to their former master, treated them with contemptⁿ, as will hereafter be related^o.

e THE design of Sháh Hest Khán's invading Arrakan was, to revenge the blood of Soltán Sujáb, and his family, who had been destroyed by the king, in order to seize his riches^p; which, in the end, proved the ruin of the kingdom of Arrakan. The king thought that all belonged to him: those who fought for it claimed a share; and the princes of the blood wanted some large diamonds for their wives: but the artful priests found a way to make up the difference, by persuading the king, and the other pretenders, to dedicate the whole treasure to the god Dagun. This measure being agreed to, the jewels were deposited in the temple of that deity (L), where they continued till the year 1690: at what time the king of Arrakan dying without issue, two princes of the blood quarrelled together about the succession. They both took arms, and both had an eye upon Soltán Sujáb's treasure; which so frightened the clergy, that they removed it to another place, known only to themselves. Mean time the two princes pursued their pretensions so furiously, that, in one year's space, both themselves and families were intirely cut off; and the kingdom has continued in anarchy ever since^q.

^m DE FARIA, p. 227, & seq. BERNIER, ubi supr. p. 120.
^p See Hist. Mogol. p. 296.
 East Indies, vol. ii. p. 28.

ⁿ BERNIER, p. 136. DE FARIA, vol. iii.
^q HAMILT. New Account of the (K) This fable seems to be coined, in imitation of another famous one of the ape, who, on an experiment made by the Great Mogol, pulled out the name of Christ several times, from among those of Mohammed, Bramma, and others. See hereafter, in the reign of Jshán Ghír.

(L) We hear of no temple of his but at the city Dagun, in Pegu; where it is not probable that the money was deposited, as it was not then in the king of Arrakan's possession.

C H A P. IV.

Kingdom of Pegu.

S E C T. I.

Geographical description.

Pegu proper. THE kingdom of Pegu is to be considered in three different capacities: 1. Pegu, properly so called: 2. Pegu, with its acquisitions: 3. Pegu, incorporated with the kingdom of Ava. a Bounds and extent. THE kingdom of Pegu, properly so called, is bounded on the north with those of Arrakan and Ava (A); on the east with the upper and lower Siam; on the south with part of Siam and the sea; and on the west with the sea and part of Arrakan; lying between the 110th and 116th degrees of longitude, and between the 14th and 19th degrees of north latitude: so that it is about 350 English miles in length, from south to north, and nearly the same in breadth, from west to east. If we may venture to quote Mendez Pinto, a writer whose relation is a mixture of truth and falsehood, Pegu, as it was in his time, about the year 1550, was not above 140 leagues in compass; and was surrounded with a great chain of mountains, named Pangasirau (B), which were inhabited by the Bramas (or rather Barmas), who are at present masters of that and the neighbouring countries. b

Pegu at large. PEGU, considered in a larger sense, as augmented by the conquests of its Barma kings, extended northward as far as the borders of the province of Yun-nan, in China (C), comprising the countries of Arrakan, Ava, Jangoma, the Laos, and even Siam: so that its bounds and extent were nearly equal with those of the farther peninsula of India in general. As to Pegu, in its third, that is, its present state, in which it stands incorporated with Ava, we shall refer the consideration of it till we come to treat of Ava; only observing here in general, that its bounds and extent are nearly the same with those which it had in conjunction with its acquisitions; or, what is all one, they are both the same dominion, only it has changed its name from Pegu to Ava, on account of the royal seat being removed from one city to the other. And here it must be observed, with regard to the name (D) of this country, that, we are told, it is not properly Pegu, but Bagou. c

Mountains and rivers. PEGU seems to be a flat country for the general, without any considerable mountains, excepting those before-mentioned, which surround it, and serve for a frontier towards the land: but it is liable to be invaded, not only by sea, but also by land, by means of the rivers which make their passage through those mountains. Among these, two are most remarkable; the first, the river of Pegu; the second, the river of Ava, so called from those capitals, which are situate on their banks. The river of Ava we shall speak of when we come to treat of Ava; and therefore shall only consider that of Pegu here. This river (E), which is very large, and carries a strong current to the sea, seems to have its rise in the mountains, which divide China, on the west side of Yun-nan, from the countries included by us in the farther peninsula of India. From thence it shapes its course south, inclining to the west, through countries whose names are unknown to us, but once included within the empire of Pegu, as they at present belong to that of Ava. At length, having washed the borders of Jangoma, which lies to the north of Siam, it enters the kingdom of Pegu; and, having passed to the west of the capital city, falls into the sea, with a very large mouth, about thirty miles (F) below it. d River of Pegu annually overflowing. THIS river, by its annual overflowings, brings such advantage to the country, that it is not unfitly termed, by Maffi^b, the Indian Nile. These inundations are almost incredible,

^a See DE FARIA, Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 117. 127.

^b MAFFI. Hist. l. xvi. c. 5.

(A) Sheldon's memoirs, in Ovington, written about the year 1688 gives Pegu, for its northern bounds, the empire of Siamon and Kalaminban: which shews that author had dealt with Mendez Pinto, who places these two imaginary empires to the north of Pegu.

(B) Those on the west side are called Pro by Pinto.

(C) This appears from the Jesuits map of that province, in which the places are marked where the frontiers of Pegu begin and end. This is likewise agreeable to the account of the Indians. But Tavernier pretends to have discovered the contrary, from the report of some merchants of Tipra, which country he supposed to cover the north borders of Arrakan and Pegu, and to take up all the space between them and China. See Tavernier. part ii. cap. 16. p. 186.

(D) The Chinfs, we are told, call it Mien: or Mien might be the name of the country bordering on China, which Chauzigem, the second Barma king, added to his empire. Louther speaks of Meens, in the king of Siam's army. Relat. Siam, part ii. c. 11. p. 97.

(E) Le Blanc names it Kaypona: and Pinto mentions a river of the same name, which some maps make to fall into the river of Ava, about twenty miles south-west of the city of that name.

(F) Bartol says, between twenty-five and thirty miles.

a extending above thirty leagues beyond its chanel. By the mud or slime which is left behind, the soil is so enriched, and their crops of rice increased to such a degree, that an hundred ship-loads thereof have been exported in one year, without being missed^c.

THERE are two ways by which goods may be conveyed from the port of Negraïs to the River of Ne- river of Pegu: one is by long sea; the other by the intervention of rivers from the bar of Negraïs.

Negraïs. The distance either way from that bar is fifty or fifty-five leagues: but, by reason of the shoalings along the coast, the first way is usually taken. This passage is formed by several large islands, which lie near one another, and leave a chanel between them and the main land, like that of a great river, into which several rivers out of Pegu discharge their waters; while the sea flowing in by the opening between the islands, a sufficient quantity of water is b always found in the aforesaid chanel, to carry large barks, for conveying passengers and goods from the bar of Negraïs to the city of Pegu.

ALONG this chanel are a considerable number of cities, towns, and villages, as well on Cities upon it.
the land-side, as that of the islands. Among the rest are the cities of Kosmi (or Kosmin), Koylan, Tavagnedun (or Medun), Leungon, Silvansedi, Mojja, Dala (or Dolla), China-Bakkar, Dogun (or Dagon), and Sirian^d. This chanel, which may be called the river of Negraïs (G), has three mouths or openings between the islands to the sea, viz. at Dolla, China Bakkar, and Sirian, which by that means are so many ports.

THE coast from Negraïs, running eastward to the true river of Pegu, and thence south-Surprising ward toward Tenasserin, forms a great bay, where the sea runs with incredible violence and tide.

c swiftnefs into the mouth of that river: for, on the return of the tide, a body of waters, whose front is above twelve feet high, comes rolling in, and bears down whatever stands in its way; so that no ship can withstand its force, but in a moment is overturned. This furious tide, which the natives call Makkrea (H), advances with so great a roaring, that the noise may be heard ten miles off^e. We are told, that the tide in the gulf of Kambaya is nothing, compared with this; and that the latter runs as swift as an arrow out of a bow^f.

THE air of Pegu is very healthy, and presently recovers sick strangers. The soil of Pegu Soil and pro- is very rich and fertile, in corn, fruit and roots. It likewise produces good timber of several duce.
kinds. The country abounds with elephants, buffaloes, goats, hogs, and other animals. There is abundance of wild game: and deer is so plenty in September and October, that our d author, captain Hamilton, has bought one for three or four pence: they are very fleshy, but have no fat. Poultry is good and plenty: the cocks are vastly large, and hens very beautiful. As for fish, there are many good sorts^g.

THERE are, in Pegu, mines not only of iron, tin, and gansa, or lead (I), which passes for money, but also of rubies, diamonds, and sapphires. The rubies are the best in the world: but the diamonds are small, and only found in the craws of poultry and pheasants. Besides, only one family has the privilege of felling them, and none dare open the ground to dig for them^h.

PEGU is doubtless divided into provinces like other countries; but travellers have men-Provinces.
tioned none. However, we may consider, as such, the several petty kingdoms or states
e which had been conquered by the kings of Pegu: such as those of Tava, Tangu, and Kablan (or Kapelan). This last, we are told, was one of the twelve conquered by the second Barma king, Chaumigrem, who began his reign about the year 1549ⁱ. It is reputed the most barren part of all Pegu. The chief city is of the same name. Here the true rubies, for which Pegu is famous, are found in a mountain not far from it, standing between the city of Pegu, and port of Sirian (K)^k.

THE kingdom of Tangu is frequently mentioned by the authors who have written about the Tangu king; affairs of Pegu: but none of them says any thing precisely concerning its situation, excepting dom, Mendez Pinto; who informs us, that it lies 160 leagues from the city of Pegu, in the heart of the country^l. With this agree the few hints we have from other writers (L), only the distance

^c OVI^{NGT.} p. 585. Barbofa.

^d See BALBI & FITCH.

^e HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 32.

^f CÆSAR FREDERIC ap. Hackluyt, vol. ii. p. 232.

^g TAVERN. trav. part ii. p. 144. HAMILT. p. 38,

40, 59. Balbi.

^h OVI^{NGT.} p. 585.

ⁱ See his history hereafter.

^k FITCH ap. Purch.

vol. ii. p. 1741. OVI^{NGT.} p. 583.

^l PINTO's trav. p. 288.

(G) It is indeed commonly called Pegu river: but we think improperly, as it is no part of the river of Pegu.

(H) Or Makkrea, as Balbi and Cæsar Frederic, our authors, call it; also the great Bore, and Boer; which is doubtless a corruption of the Arabic Bâhr, that is, the sea; the term used, we presume, by those whom the Europeans call Moors.

(I) Rather a kind of copper, or mixture of copper and lead.

(K) Fitch says, Koplan is six day journey from Ava. Pimenta, besides Kawelan (which must be this Kapelan), whence the sapphires and rubies come, places two kingdoms, by the name of Kablan, among the twelve conquered by the Brama king mentioned in the text; which he says are near Ava, towards China, and abound with gems. Perhaps, instead of one of these two places, so much alike in name, we should read Kamelan, whose king, Massingo, we are told, De Brito slew in battle.

(L) We are told that the kings of Jangoma and Siam joined, in 1599, to invade the king of Tangu; that he of Siam, in his way thither, entered and subdued the kingdom distance seems abundantly too great. Hence we conceive it to be situated on the east side of the river of Pegu, between the kingdoms of Jangoma on the north, and Siam on the south.

its history.

HOWEVER that be, Tangu was formerly a very remarkable place. It is said by some, that the first Barma king of Pegu was governor of it; and that the second was born there: his successors made kings, or viceroys of Tangu. As this country was upon the frontiers towards Siam and Jangoma, its dependent kings were always ready to revolt, or give disturbance to the Pegu monarch. At length we find one of them, in the year 1598, joined in confederacy with him of Arrakan, to conquer that country; which they effected. The king of Tangu, after putting to death his sovereign, who had surrendered to him, carried off all the treasure of Pegu, and left the ruined kingdom to the king of Arrakan: but his independency did not continue long, for he was overcome and rendered tributary about 1612, by the king of Ava; or perhaps, rather the king of Pegu, who had transferred the regal seat to Ava^m.

City of Pegu.

THE city of Pegu (M), before the completion of its ruin in the year 1600 above-mentioned, was one of the most splendid, large, and populous, in all Asia. According to Cæsar Frederic, Balbi, and Fitch, who saw this city in its greatest splendor (N), it was very spacious, fair, and strong, surrounded with stone walls, and very wide ditches. It was divided into two cities, the old and new: in the old, which was very big, and augmented by several suburbs, lived the merchants and strangers, for there trade was carried on; and as the houses were only built with wood, or bambû canes, covered with tiles, each had a warehouse of brick arched, to secure the goods from fires, which were very frequent there. The new city, which was inhabited by the king, the nobility, and people of fashion, was very great and populous: its figure square; and in each side of the wall were five gates of stone, with many gilded towers along it for posting centries. It was encompassed with broad ditches, in which were bred crocodiles, to deter people from wading over them. The streets the fairest that ever Fitch saw, running in a line from gate to gate; and so wide, that twelve men might go a-breast. Each house had a palm-tree growing at the door, which made an ornament as well as shade for passengers.

King's palace.

THE king's palace stood in the midst of this new city, built like a fortress with walls and ditches. The houses and garments within were of wood, all over gilded, and adorned with battlements covered with plates of gold. By the gate you entered into a spacious court, where were lodgings on the sides for the king's choicest elephants; among which were four white ones. This was a great rarity, those animals being very scarce; but that prince would suffer none to have any but himself. It was on this account only that he made war on the king of Siam in 1567, from whom he took the famous white elephant; and afterwards assumed the title of king of the white elephant (O). Near the palace was a large court surrounded with stone walls; and its two gates were always open, as if no account was made of the immense treasure within. This was lodged in four gilded houses, covered with lead: in the first was a vast gold statue of a man, with a crown of gold beset with rubies and sapphires, and about him four children of gold. In the second house was a silver statue, sitting on heaps of treasure: yet his head reached as high as any house; and his foot was as long as Frederic, who measured it, was tall. The third house had it in a statue of brass, of the same bigness; and the fourth contained another of the same size, made of ganfa, which is a mixture of copper and lead. These three statues had crowns on, like the first.

Huge statues.

Elephant hunting.

WITHIN a mile of the city was a beautiful palace all gilded, with a large court before it; containing an infinite number of places for people to stand and see the hunting of elephants in the neighbouring forest, of vast extent; which, being driven out of the wood by the hunters, were decoyed by tame elephants into the inclosure made for the purpose, where they were taken and tamedⁿ.

The city destroyed.

THE new city, with the palace, and all its ornaments, were the work of the second Barma king of Pegu, the greatest of all its monarchs. It was finished about the year 1567. Whether it received any improvements from his successor, does not appear; but this we know, that in his reign it was stripped of all its lustre, and reduced to a miserable condition. For the third and last king of that race in Pegu having, by his excessive tyranny and continual ⁿ CÆS. FRÉDER. apud HACKL. vol. ii. p. 231. BALBI, p. 100, & seq.

^m See the ensuing history of Pegu.

kingdom of Martavân; and that the king of Tangu, in 1598, was ordered by the king of Pegu, his sovereign prince, to bring the inhabitants of Tangu in ships to his capital city. Which shews Tangu must be washed by the river of Pegu. See Pimenta & Bowes, ap. Hais epist. Ind. p. 848.

(M) It has been observed before, that the true name of the city, as well as country, is Bagou; but Floris calls it Uncha, or Pegu. See his voyage. New collect. voy. and travels, 4to. vol. i. p. 539.

(N) The first, in 1566; and the two latter, in 1683.

(O) The white elephant is not esteemed in these parts on account of the scarcity of those animals, but because the mother of Schêya (as the Chineses call him), founder of the idolatry of Ti-ti, whence that throughout the Indies is derived, dreamed that a white elephant, entering her mouth, passed down her throat, and came out of her side. See Ma-tsi hist. de Tonquin and Lao; also New Collect. of voy. and travels in quarto, vol. iv. p. 207.

wars, exhausted his dominions of people, the neighbouring princes invaded his territories. In 1596 the king of Siam besieged him in his capital for three months; but for this time he was relieved by the assistance of certain Turks, in conjunction with some Portugueses. However, most of those whom war had spared, famine destroyed: for, out of 150,000 men numbered in the city before the siege, only 30,000 were left, with 3000 cannon (1000 of them brass) for its defence. The kings of Arrakan and Tangu, taking advantage of this distressed condition of Pegu, marched to besiege it anew; and the king, being at length obliged to submit for want of provisions, some time in the year 1599, yielded himself and the city into the hands of the king of Tangu; whose wife, though sister to the unfortunate prince, caused him and his family to be put to death^o.

b FROM that time Pegu ceased to be the royal seat, except at times, and fell to decay: so that, as we are informed by a late traveller, although six or seven leagues in compass, not one twentieth part is inhabited, and that only by the lower class of people^p. However, it is still the seat of the viceroy, who governs for the king residing now at Ava; and dwells in the palace standing in the new city, which is separated from the old by the river passing between them. Royal seat removed.

TRAVELLERS have given no account of the inland cities of Pegu; our readers therefore must be content with what they relate concerning some of its maritime towns.

THE first which occurs on the west side of the river of Pegu, towards its mouth, is Sirian. City of Sirian?
This is the only port now open for trade in all that country^q. It is situated near the mouth of the river of the same name, which communicates with the chanel coming from the bar of Negraïs: the ruins of its walls and bulwarks shew it to have been a very strong place (P). On the news of its reduction, the emperor poisoned himself; and the conqueror carried the rest of his family, with all his treasures, to Pegu^r. At present, it is inclosed with a stone wall, laid without mortar, built near the river side on a rising ground. The governor is generally of the blood royal; and the suburbs are four times larger than the city. The port is frequented by ships from several parts of India, the river being capable of receiving vessels of 600 tons: it is frequented by some English, Portugueses, and Armenians; which latter have monopolized the ruby trade.

d IF, by accident, a ship be driven a league or two to the eastward of Sirian bar, a strong tide carries her on hard sands; for anchors cannot stop her career. There she sits fast; but being left dry at low-water by the sea, which retires five or six leagues, the sailors have time to cross the sands to shore: for the makkrea, or tide, returns with such violence, as hath been mentioned before, that no vessel can withstand its force. Sirian stands about six leagues from the bar of Pegu river, and forty miles from the city of Pegu itself^s. But as the violent tides above-mentioned render the navigation thither dangerous, so goods are commonly landed at Sirian, and carried from thence, by the inland chanel before described, as far as a place called Makkao; where they are again put on shore, and conveyed by land to the city of Pegu, which is twelve miles distant. The makkrea, or tide.

e IN the neighbourhood of Sirian stand the two most remarkable pagods in all the dominions of the Peguan, or Avan, empire. One is about six miles to the southward, called Kiakkiak, or the temple of the god of gods; and, as it is built in a high champain country, it may be seen eight leagues off. Within it is an image twenty yards long, lying in a sleeping posture; and by the tradition of the natives has lain in that posture above 6000 years. His doors and windows are always open, every body having the liberty to see him; and when he awakes, this world is to be annihilated. The other temple stands in a low plain to the north of Sirian, about the same distance, and is called Dagun (Q). His doors and windows are always shut, nor do any enter but his priests; who will not tell what shape he is of, farther than that he is not of human shape. As soon as Kiakkiak has destroyed this world, Dagon, or Dagun, will gather up the fragments, and make a new one. There are yearly fairs held near these temples; and the offerings made at those fairs are for the use of those holy places^t. Temples of Kiakkiak, and of Dagun.

f THIS is the account given by a late author who saw both temples (R): but two earlier travellers have given a more particular account of that called Dagon, or Dagon. It stands in or near the city of Dagon, which lies on the north side of the chanel of Negraïs. It is about two days journey from the city of Pegu, and so near to Sirian, that the makkrea, or violent tide, rises there to a very great height, so as to cover the stairs at the landing-place consisting ^o PIMENTA apud PURCH. vol. ii. p. 1747. BOVES. p. 1748. FLORIS, vol. i. p. 322. P HAMILT.

New acc. East India, vol. ii. p. 33. ^q Ibid. p. 32. R BALBI, p. 97. DE FARIA, Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 127. S HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 32. T Ibid. p. 57, & seq.

(P) What Balbi says, of its having been the seat of an emperor, till taken by the king of Pegu in 1567, &c. seems to have been copied from Cæsar Frederic's account of the conquest of Silon, or Siam; which Balbi has mistaken for Sirian.

(Q) According to De Faria, the name of the idol (or god worshipped here) is Biay.

(R) According to the draught published by captain Hamilton, their figure is like a cone, or sugar-loaf, hollowing towards the middle.

of twenty steps. From the landing place they pass through a street above a mile long, where the priests live in gilded houses. At the end of the street stands the temple, to which one ascends by a large stair-case of ninety steps. At the foot of it were two tigers of stone, in a saliant attitude; on the top, two angels, with triple crowns on their heads. The temple itself is round, and of stone, gilt all over. On the left hand is a beautiful hall, carved and gilt both inside and out: this is a kind of chapel, where the people resort to hear the Tale-pouys preach. The king of Pegu, and all the royal family, used to attend the anniversary festival of this pagod, there to receive absolution of their sins. At this time a great fair is kept, for the convenience of the multitudes, who resort thither either for devotion, or sake of trade. In a hall, at the first landing-place (for there are three), coming down, was a vast bell, seven paces three palms in circumference, inscribed all over with curious characters. But the natives could neither give any account of them, nor how the bell came thither.

City of Kof-min.

To the westward of Sirian, on the same coast, above forty-five leagues distant, is Kosmî or Kosmîn, formerly a port of great resort for Indian shipping; which here landed their goods to be conveyed in paros, a kind of barges, or large boats, by the inland chanel, to Pegu. This is a very handsome town, delightfully situated, facing the north-east by east. But as the neighbouring country is full of woods, infested with tigers, wild boars, and monkies; the inhabitants raise their houses, built with bambûs, on piles, several feet above the ground, to avoid those animals; especially the tigers, who frequently in the night enter the town, and carry off both men and cattle^a. There is no other port betwixt Kosmîn and that called Negraïs, in the smaller island of this name: for there are two, one very large to the north and west; the other not above three leagues long, which lies at the mouth of the river of Negraïs, along which goods are conveyed to Sirian and Pegu.

Isles off the coast.

Off this southern coast of Pegu lie several islands; as 1. The Cocos; so called from its being full of cocoa-nut trees, about twenty leagues west south-west from cape Negraïs. 2. The Perperies, thirty-six leagues south of the same cape. They are high islands, overgrown with woods, and surrounded with sunk rocks. 3. Kommoda, a small island about ten leagues from the coast. All the above-mentioned isles are uninhabited.

Martavan city.

THE eastern coast of Pegu has several ports upon it. The first is Martabûn, or Martavân: it lies about 100 miles to the south of the city of Pegu, the way by land lying mostly through woods and plains. It was formerly capital of a rich and pretty powerful kingdom, before the Pegu monarchs began to extend their dominions under the Barma kings. But the first of this race, having conquered Pegu, fell next on Martavân in 1545, with a vast army; and, having compelled its king Chambayna to surrender himself, put him, his queen, and all her women, to most cruel deaths: after which he plundered and ruined the city. He likewise caused ships to be sunk in the river, to hinder the navigation of it; in which condition it still continues. Yet still a trade is carried on for fish and earthen-ware; especially those large jars for holding wine or water, in great request all over the Indies: some are so large as to hold the quantity of two hogheads^x.

AFTER the destruction of Pegu in 1600, the king of Siam took Martavân, and laid it waste; however, it soon recovered, and had a king of its own about 1604; to whose daughter the famous De Briton and Nicote, the Portuguese king of Pegu, married his eldest son: but after the king of Ava had taken Sirian, and impaled the mock king, he obliged the king of Martavân to put his son-in-law to death^y, in 1614.

Tavay, frontier town.

PEGU extends southward as far as Tavay, a town and island in the gulf of the same name. It was formerly capital of a petty kingdom, which was conquered by the king of Ava (or of Pegu, removed to Ava), in the year last above mentioned^z. Plenty of kalain, or kalaia woods grow there^a.

IN the history of those times we frequently meet with a city called Satan, or Zatna, but nothing which gives any light as to its situation; only it is said, that the king of Siam advanced so far in the year 1583^b. This however, we take to be the same with the port of Zayton, mentioned by Nicholas de Conti; who, having passed down the river from Ava, came thither, and put to sea about the year 1430^c.

^a BALBI, p. 95. vol. ii. p. 39, 62. ^b DE FARIA, ubi supra, p. 139, 193. ^c Ibid. p. 197. ^d BALBI, ubi supra, p. 120. ^e PIMENTA ap. PURCH. Pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1746.

FITCH, apud PURCH. vol. ii. p. 1739.

^x DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 348. HAMILT.

^z Ibid. p. 197.

^a BALBI, ubi supra, p. 120.

^c See PURCH. Pilgr. vol.

S E C T. II.

Inhabitants of Pegu; their customs, religion, and government.

^a THE inhabitants of Pegu are a mixture of natives, whom some authors term Peguers, Inhabitants, and Barmas (by many called Bramas), who conquered them, and are at present masters of the country: but although they dwell one among another, yet they are distinguished not only by their features but their drefs.

WITH regard to their persons, there is a great disagreement among authors. Some say Shape and features the men are very ugly ^a; others, that they are well-shaped and featured ^b; some, that they are monstrous fat ^c; others, that they are plump, but few of them fat: they are of an olive complexion ^d; or, as others express it, are rather tawny than black, like the people of Arrakan ^e. They wear no beards, but pull out the hairs with pincers; yet leave a few in one place or other of the face. They have naturally very white teeth, but make them black, that they may not appear white, like those of dogs ^f (A).

^b SOME give the people of Pegu a very good character, as being of a mild, humane, and Character, very charitable disposition; while others represent them to be the most corrupt in their manners of all the Indian nations. They particularly brand the women as having shook off all modesty, on account of their drefs, exposing some parts of their bodies, which ought to be concealed from sight ^g: but how far this charge may be just will appear presently. The females are much whither than the men; low of stature, but well-shaped; their faces pretty plump, their arms and legs well-proportioned; their hands and feet small ^h.

^c THE drefs of the men is a coat or frock of painted calico, girt with a lungee, or scarf, about the middle, and falling down as low as their feet, which are bare; for neither stockings nor men, shoes are worn in Pegu. The habit of the women is very singular. Their head-drefs is their own black hair tied up behind; and, when they go abroad, they wear a shawl folded up, or and women, a piece of white cotton cloth lying loose on the top of their heads. Their raiment is first a frock of silk, or calico, fitted to their bodies, and the sleeves made very tight to the arms. This frock reaches half-way down the thighs; and under it they have a scarf, or lungee, four-double, which is made fast round the waist, and descends almost to the ankle; so contrived, that at every step as they walk, it opens before and shews the right leg (B), with part of the thigh ⁱ. Some travellers go farther, and say the women go naked, with only a cloth before, which, as they walk, opens and shews their secret parts. This is the immodesty with which they are accused in the preceding paragraph: but this, we are told, is not a fashion brought in ^d by the female sex in this country through wantonness, but imposed on them many ages ago by a certain queen (C); in order, by that means, to draw the inclinations of the men, then strangely addicted to sodomy, towards the sex.

THEY tell you, that this neglect of women had so far put a stop to propagation, that Pegu, Odd customs by degrees, became very thin of inhabitants. The queen therefore, effectually to prevent that unnatural vice which occasioned it, introduced another still more extraordinary custom: for she made a law that the males, as soon as they arrived at a certain age (D), should have balls, or bells, inserted, one on each side of the virile member, between the skin and the of wearing flesh, which is opened for that purpose, and healed in seven or eight days! Authors differ bells about the size of these bells; some say, they are big as hazel nuts, others as walnuts. Linschoten affirms, they are the size of acorns; and Fitch, that some are as large as hens eggs; but the least, as big as a small walnut. These balls or bells are round, and of divers metals, as gold, silver, brass, or lead, according to the degree of the person who wears them; the costlier sort being for the king and his nobles; for all, it seems, are obliged to obey this law; which, in appearance, must be no less grievous than that of circumcision.

^e BOTH the men and women, we are told, are delighted with these bells, which have a sweet in these coun- sound. They are sold by old women, who seem to be the operators for furnishing the male sex tries, with these ornaments. Linschoten brought one of them with him from the Indies to Holland;

^a FARIA PORTUG. Asia, vol. i. p. 227.

^b HAMILT. ubi supra, p. 49.

^c BALBI, p. 106.

^d HAMILT. ibid.

^e SHELDON apud OVIINGT. voy. to Surat, p. 589.

^f FITCH apud PURCH.

ubi supr. vol. ii. p. 1741.

^g SHELDON, ubi supra.

^h HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 49.

ⁱ BALBI,

p. 107. FITCH apud PURCH. vol. ii. p. 1741. HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 29.

(A) They ought rather to covet to appear like them; if, as we are told, they give themselves out to be descended from a Chinese dog and a woman; who, being the only two creatures saved from shipwreck on the Pegu coast, ingendered there: and hence, they say, it is, that the men are very ugly, and not the women; the males taking after their sire, and the females after their mother. Portug. Asia, vol. i. p. 228.

(B) Balbi says, that the cotton gown which they wear is slit in four parts; because, in walking, they affect to shew both their legs.

(C) Called Canane. See Portug. Asia, vol. i. p. 228.

(D) Some say, at the age of twenty-five or thirty; others, when they are of an age capable of making use of women.

and relates a strange management practised on the females (E) when young; which though it may appear incredible to most readers, is yet confirmed by other earlier travellers, as well as solemnly attested by himself^k.

THIS custom, or law, of wearing bells, we are told, is in use among the people of Ava, Lanjang, or Laos, Siam, and the Barmas: Conti particularly mentions, that he found it practised at Ava, and the bells sold by old women^l. After so many credible testimonies relating to this matter, it might seem unreasonable to doubt the truth of it; and yet neither captain Hamilton, who was at Pegu the beginning of the present century; nor Mr. Sheldon, who wrote an account of Pegu about the year 1685; mention any thing of these bells, altho' they speak of the peculiarity of the womens dress. Possibly, the cause being at length removed, that painful custom has been abolished; although, to prevent a relapse, the loose dress of the women is still kept up as a provocative.

Barmas how dressed.

THE dress of the Barmas differs somewhat from that of the Peguers. Their coat is a thin Betella, so that their skin may be seen through it. About their loins they have a large lungee, which reaches to their ancles, and is gathered at the navel, in a round bundle as big as a child's head. They imprint several devices in their skins, which, for that purpose, they prick with bodkins; and, rubbing charcoal-dust over the punctures while fresh, the black marks remain ever after. This is an ornament appropriated to themselves, and which the Peguers dare not assume: so that the people of one nation may easily be distinguished from those of the other^m.

People's diet.

THE inhabitants of Pegu are accused by some authors with being slovenly in their houses and nasty in their diet; on account of seasoning their victuals with fidol, made of stinking fish, in the same manner as practised in Arrakan, so nauseous and offensive that none but themselves can endure the smell of itⁿ. Balbi says, he could sooner bear the scent of stinking carrion; and yet with this they season their rice and other soops, instead of butter or oil. He adds, that all the grandees, and even the king, eat of this fish, of which they are as fond as Europeans of sturgeon^o. But a late traveller only says, that the ingredients which the king puts into his boiled rice to give it a relish, are made of shrimps dried and powdered, mixed with some salt and cod-pepper^p; without ascribing to it any smell or taste which is offensive. Perhaps he had not examined it, or other authors censure it without reason; since they speak as reproachfully of the assa fætida, which is the seasoning used by the more western Indians, although it appears to have been the famous silphium of the Greeks and Romans; and is indeed a refinement of rocambole, as this latter is of garlick, which yet the Europeans are so fond of. However that be, the people of Pegu have plenty of excellent provisions, both of quadrupeds and fowls, wild, and tame, as well as of fish. As they have no wheat in the country, their bread is rice made into cakes. Their common drink is water, nor have they any wine: but, instead thereof, use the juice drawn by incision from a tree, which they call Annipa (F); a liquor very pleasant to the palate. By way of regale they chew betel, like all the rest of the Indians in both peninsulas.

A stinking sauce.

Their marriages:

THE men here, as in most other eastern countries, buy their wives, or pay their parents a dowry for them. If, after cohabiting with his wife for a time, the husband dislikes either her person or temper, he has liberty to divorce, and send her home again. On the other side, if either the woman, or her friends, dislike the man, they may take her away from him; but, in that case, must return the dowry which the husband gave for her^q.

Some, for a time,

THEY have an odd custom in Pegu, which is to offer their daughters to strangers, and hire them out for a time. Some say, they hire out their wives in the same manner. These marriages for a term are well-regulated, and often prove very beneficial to the occasional husband. The women are very courteous and kind to strangers in general, but very fond of marrying with Europeans; and most of the foreigners who trade thither marry a wife for the time of their stay. The ceremony is this: when the parties are agreed, the bride's parents, or nearest friends, invite the relations or friends of both parties to an entertainment; at the end of which the father, or bride-man, asks them, before the company, if they are willing to live together as man and wife? And on their answering in the affirmative, he declares them lawfully married: after which the bridegroom carries his wife home; or, if he hath no house of his own, consummates the marriage in that where it was performed^r.

^k BALBI, p. 126. FITCH. ubi supra, p. 1741. LINSCHOT. p. 29. p. 150.

^m HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 48, & seq.

ⁿ BALBI, p. 125.

^p HAMILT. ubi supr. p. 42.

OVIINGT. p. 590. HAMILT. p. 50.

^l CONTI, apud PURCH. vol. iii.

^o TOSSI, l. 2. p. 69. apud OVIINGT. p. 590.

^q BALBI, p. 127.

^r LINSCHOT. p. 29.

(E) Viz. That their parents sew up their private parts, leaving only a small orifice, which is enlarged by a surgeon at the time of marriage. Linschoten saw one of those women; and had the fact confirmed, by the surgeon who performed the operation.

(F) Some call it nipa, or niper wine: the best is made at Tanaherin, a port belonging to Siam, to the south of Martavan. It is distilled from cocoa nut water. See Cæsar Frederic ap. Hackluyt's voy. part 2. p. 231. and Linschot. p. 30.

- a THESE wives prove very obliging and obedient: they take the management of the house Commerce upon them, go to market, dress the victuals, and take care of their husbands clothes, as to mending and washing. In case the man has any commodities to sell, the wife sets up a shop, and disposes of them by retale, to much better account than they could be sold for by wholesale. Some of them carry goods into the inland towns, and barter for such as are proper for the foreign markets to which her husband is bound. If she be convicted of inconstancy, her husband may carry her to the rounday, or court-house, where, having her hair cut off, he may sell her for a slave. On the other hand, in case he goes astray, she will be apt to revenge herself by poison. In case of separation, the father is obliged to take care of the boys, and the mother of the girls: but the children cannot be carried out of the country
- b without the king's permission; which yet may be purchased for forty or fifty pounds. The marriage may be continued even in the husband's absence in other countries, provided he such temporary wives. leaves a fund to pay his wife about six shillings and eight pence a month; otherwise, at the year's end, she may marry again: but, if the said sum be paid her, she is obliged to stay the term of three years^a. Sheldon says, that in case, during such husband's absence, another should marry her, he would be obliged to restore her to the former, during his continuance in the place; nor is a woman looked on the worse, but rather the better, for having had several European husbands^b. Nay, we are told, that no person of fashion in Pegu, from the gentleman to the king, will marry a maiden, till some acquaintance, or stranger, has had the first night's lodging with her^c.

- c IN Pegu, the inheritance of all lands is in the king: he is likewise the heir of all his sub- Inheritances. jects who die without issue; but in case they have children, two thirds go to them, and the rest to his majesty^d.

THE people of this country have various sorts of music, among which the pipe and tabor Musical instruments. are most esteemed; although their stringed instruments pleased our author best. They have one kind in shape of a gale, about three feet in length, and eight or ten inches broad, and six deep; on the upper belly of it are fastened about twenty bells, of different sizes and tones, which are beaten with a stick of heavy wood, and make no contemptible harmony^e.

- d THE air of Pegu is so healthy, that it is not afflicted with many diseases, which other coun- Diseases. tries, wanting the same benefit, are subject to. However, the small-pox is dreaded through all the provinces; but chiefly in that of Kirian (F), where it makes great ravages, and is considered as pestiferous: so that when any one is found to have caught this cruel distemper, the whole neighbourhood fly, as from the plague, and build new houses to dwell in two or three miles distant. At their departure, they leave with the sick person a jar of water, a basket of raw rice, with some earthen pots to boil it in; and then bid him farewell for one-and-twenty days. If the patient recovers, which can only happen in case he has strength enough to rise and boil his food, at the expiration of that term they carry him to their new plantation^f.

- e AMONG the Peguers, the priests are their principal physicians: however, we are told, Physicians. that, for the general, when any person falls sick, he makes a vow to the devil, from whom they believe all evil comes. Then a scaffold is built, and victuals spread on the top of it, to solace old Nick, and render him propitious. This feast is accompanied with lighted candles and music. The whole is managed by an undertaker called the devil's father: and although their priests forbid such practices, yet the people are too fond of this ancient custom to obey their commands^g.

- f WE have already given a general view of the trade of Pegu, in treating of Sirian, which Commerce. is its only port at present. The commodities exported from thence are gold, silver, rubies, musk, benjamin, long-pepper, tin, lead, copper, lakka (or gum lak, whereof they make hard wax), rice, rice-wine, and some sugar-canes, of which they would have plenty, but that the elephants eat them^h. It may be observed, that, under the name of rubies, the Peguers comprise topazes, sapphires, amethysts, and other stones, which they distinguish, by saying the blue, the violet, and the yellow rubies. The true ruby is red, transparent, and sparkling; inclined, near the surface, to the violet of the amethyst. They are found in the mountains of Kapelan, or Kablan; and in those which stretch from Pegu to *Kamboja*ⁱ.

COTTON cloths, from Bengál and Choromandel, with some striped silks, are best for the Pegu market: and silver of any sort will go off there; for the king, in return for his eight and an half per cent. duty on it, allows the merchants to melt it down, and put what copper alloy they please in it: so that rupi silver, which has no alloy, will bear twenty-eight per Commodities.

^a BALBI, p. 127. HAMILT. p. 51.

p. 29.

^b BALBI, p. 127.

^c HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 57.

^d OVIINGT. p. 591. HAMILT. p. 51.

^e LINSCHOT,

^f Ibid. p. 59, & 61.

^g BALBI,

p. 124.

^h FREDER. apud Hakl. vol. ii. p. 237.

BALBI, p. 108.

FITCH apud Purch. vol. ii. p. 1739.

ⁱ OVIINGT. p. 585.

(F) A mistake, doubtless, for Sirian.

cent. of copper, and keep the Pegu touch, which they call flowered silver; for if it flowers, ^a it passes current. Their way to make flowered silver is this: they cast the silver and copper into shallow moulds; and, while the metal is in fusion, blow on the surface through a wooden pipe, which produces the figures of flowers or stars. But, if there is too great a mixture of alloy, no figures will appear: nor did our author ever know of any foreigner who had the art of making this kind of silver.

THEY wear none of our European commodities in Pegu, but hats and ribbons. The gentry will give extravagant prices for fine beaver hats, which they wear without any cocks. They are no less fond of ribbons, flowered with gold and silver, which they wear round their hats at full breadth, be they ever so broad ^d.

Way of buying goods. ALL commodities are sold by certain Tarreka, or Taregha, that is, brokers (G), with ^b whom the merchants bargain; and the buyer may return them, in case he finds himself imposed on, after having had them in his possession three or four days: which is looked on as a great disgrace to the broker. One ignorant in jewels shall be as well served as he who has skill. Their way of bargaining is very singular and convenient: for as many merchants come to buy at the same time, and their knowing what one another paid for their parcels might occasion disputes or murmurings; therefore, that none may know how the rubies are sold, excepting the buyer, the broker and merchant put their hands under a cloth, and, by touching each other's fingers, and nipping their joints, each of which has its signification, know what is bidden, and what is asked.

No risks in dealing. ALL other goods are likewise sold by the brokers, who are allowed two per cent. for their ^c trouble; and are obliged to see you paid the sums agreed for by the purchaser. He is properly your pay-master; and if he does not satisfy you punctually on the fixed day for payment, you may carry him home with you, and confine him in your house. After this, in case he does not discharge the debt immediately, you may seize his wife, children, and slaves; who you may bind at your door, exposed to the scorching sun, according to the law of the country. Thus the merchant scarce ever runs the risk of losing his money; only he is often delayed longer than he would choose, by being obliged to give two or three months credit. Current coin. Payments are made in Gauza, or Gansa (H), a kind of brass coin, and the only one; for gold and silver commodities, and bought like rubies. Payments, it is true, are often made in silver; but as the receiver is apt to be imposed on, by reason of the great difference of alloy, and difficulty of knowing the real value, it is therefore safer to agree to be ^d paid in Ganza; which goes by a weight called Biza, whose value is about half-a-crown English, or somewhat less ^e.

^d HAMILT. ubi. supra, p. 41. ^e FREDER. ubi supra, p. 239. BALBI, p. 107. FITCH ubi supra, p. 1739.

(G) Cæsar Frederic says there are four: Fitch says eight. Their number may have varied at different times. (A) Called Kiak, by Fitch; and Baw, by Hamil- ton. Two famous ones near Sirian, described before.

(H) Or a mixture of copper and lead.

S E C T. III.

Religion of Pegu.

One supreme being. THE religion of Pegu is the same, at bottom, with that which prevails over the rest ^e of India and Tibet, only varies its dress somewhat in different countries; according to the humour or interest of the priests, who every-where like to have a religion of their own. They hold the existence of one supreme God, the Creator of all things, of whom they make no image; and the worship of him is monopolized by the priests, the people not being thought worthy of paying their homage to so exalted a being. For this reason other inferior and created gods are set apart for them; the chief of whom are Somma, Kuddom, Samsay, and Prawpout, whose images are set up in their Baws, or temples, for the laity to worship^a. Not content ^f with these, and many more subaltern, gods, we are told they worship the devil also. In sickness they make feasts to appease him, as hath been already observed. Many are seen to run about the streets every morning, with rice in one hand, and a torch in the other, crying aloud, that they go to give the devil his breakfast, that he might not hurt them all the day. Others, before they eat, throw part of their meat over their shoulder to feed him. At Tavay they fill their houses with provisions, and then leave them for three months, for the devils to come and revel there; in expectation that they will be propitious to them all the rest of the year. For all this care to sooth the evil spirit, they are so afraid of him, that they will run, as if really possessed, from a man in a mask, lest he should prove a devil come out of hell to torment them ^b.

^a HAMILT. p. 53.

^b BALBI, p. 126. CUNYNGT. p. 591.

^a THE Portugueses knowing the Peguers to be a very superstitious people, though not more Ape's tooth so than themselves; when the famous ape's tooth was taken by them in the island of Seylan, ^{see Fitch} or Ceylon, about the year 1559, some were for having it sent to Pegu to be sold, concluding, that it would yield an extraordinary price^c: but although the viceroy chose to burn it, two or three counterfeits soon appeared, and one of them was imposed on the king of Pegu for genuine.

BESIDES the Manichean doctrine of two principles, one the author of good, the other of evil, from whence their worshipping the devil has its rise, they believe an eternal succession of ^{Succession of} worlds, without creation; and a multiplicity of gods to govern them. For instance, they say that, for the government of the present world, five different gods were appointed by the supreme being, of whom four have been removed, their time of ruling being expired. They add, that above 2200 years have elapsed, since the death (or disappearance) of the fourth; so that they suddenly expect the coming of the fifth; after whose departure the world itself shall be destroyed with fire, that a new one, phœnix-like, may spring out of its ashes.

^b THE Peguers hold the doctrine of the metempsychosis, or transmigration of the human soul, ^{Transmigra-} which after passing through the bodies of various animals, shall attain to the perfections and ^{tion of gods.} felicity of their gods; which, in effect, is no other than a state of annihilation: for having made its progress through the beasts, birds, and other creatures, it is received into Naxak, that is, the place of torments. After a long confinement there, they are released, and admitted into Sevum, a second receptacle for departed souls, replete with all sorts of sensual pleasures. From hence, after a certain period of time, they arrive at their last state, called Nibam, which imports as much as a privation of the essence both of soul and body. However, this is to be said for the Pegu priests, that they are not so wedded to any of the above opinions, as not to be willing enough to hearken to, and even embrace, other doctrines, when they are made known to them.

THEY have a strong opinion of the sanctity of apes and crocodiles; insomuch that they believe the persons to be perfectly happy, who chance to be devoured by them^d.

THE temples, or places set apart for religious worship (A), are generally built of earth ^{Their temples,} within, and cased on the outside with stone. They are of various sizes, but all of a conic form. Some are as high as one of our churches, and no less than a quarter of a mile round; ^d all gilded towards the top, and many all over, both within and without: which great consumption of gold has made that metal scarce in Pegu^e.

THE images of the inferior gods, which are found in their temples, are placed in domes, ^{and images.} in a sitting posture, with their legs across, and toes of equal length. Their arms and hands very small, in proportion to their bodies; their faces longer than human; their ears long, and the lappets very thick. The congregation bow to them when they go in, and when they go out; and that is all the worship which they pay to them^f. Fitch could perceive no kind of divine service performed in their churches, but that of preaching^g.

THE Peguers never repair an old temple; nor is there any occasion for that piety or expence: ^{Feast of sky-} for every September there is an old custom for men of fortune to play off sky-rockets; and if ^{rockets.} any of them fall to the ground, and spends its fire without mounting, the owner becomes much dejected; believing the deities are angry with him. On the contrary, if it flies a considerable height, he takes it for an infallible sign of his being in favour with the gods, and never fails to build a new church, which he dedicates to the divinity he adores: and when it is finished, certain priests, whose temples are gone to decay, remove their images thither, and have the benefice for their pains.

OUR author, captain Hamilton, had seen some of those rockets so large, that one of them ^{Monstrous} would contain above 500 weight of powder and coal-dust, which is their usual composition. ^{large ones.} Their carcase is the trunk of a great tree, made hollow, leaving about two inches of solid wood on the outside. When the ingredients are put in, and well rammed down, they gird ^f the carcase very tight, with thongs made of raw buffaloes hides, which, when dry, bind it as close as so many hoops. Then, having secured the ends, that the composition might consume gradually, they suspend it on a branch of a certain great tree, to which they lash it, to keep it from falling; and fix a tail to balance it. Some are 120 feet long. After this, the day of solemnity being proclaimed, which never fails to bring great numbers of people, of all ranks; when every thing is ready, the owner sets fire to the rocket; and the lashings, which fastened it to the tree, being at the same time cut with a hatchet, it takes its flight, either upward or downward, as hath been before-mentioned.

A LITTLE while after this they have another feast called Kollok, at which time women are ^{Hermaphro-} picked out of the people assembled, to perform a dance to the gods of the earth. ^{dites.} Herma-

^c DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 208.

^d CIVINGT. p. 594. & seq.

^e FREDER. ubi supra, p. 239.

^f FITCH ubi supra, p. 1739.

^g HAMILT. p. 54.

^h FITCH apud Purchas, ubi supra, p. 1740.

(A) Called Kiol, by Fitch; and Baw, by Hamilton. Two famous ones near Sirian, described before.

phrodites, who are numerous in Pegu, are commonly chosen, in case there happens to be a number sufficient to make up a set. Our author saw nine dance like mad folks, for above half an hour; and then some of them fell in fits, foaming at the mouth for half an hour more. When they come to themselves, they pretend to foretell what will happen that year: as, whether there will be plenty or scarcity of grain; whether it will be a healthy or sickly season; and other things of moment; which they learned in their conversation with the gods, while they were in the trance ^h.

Other festivals.

BESIDES the festivals above-mentioned, the Peguers observe several others, which they call Sapan. Of these are in most esteem, first, Sapan Jakia: this is held about twelve miles from the city of Pegu, where the king, queen, and whole court, were obliged to be present, with great pomp and splendor; their majesties riding in a triumphal car, drawn by eight white horses, and decked with jewels of inestimable value.

2. THAT of Katena, or the temple so called, is held in the city itself. On this occasion the chief men erect pillars and pyramids of different fashions, erected in cars, each drawn by 300 persons. At night the streets are illuminated, that the people may see their way to the temple.

3. THE Sapan called Jaymo Se'enon, in honour of another inferior deity, at which appeared the king and queen, in their triumphal car, richly dressed, as at the first festival.

Feast of water.

4. THE Saypan Dayka, that is, the feast of water, is kept in the old city. The king and queen attending, as at other times, first entered a gilt palace, and bathed in rose water. Then the officers and great men, being assembled in a neighbouring field, threw cups of water on one another, to such a degree, that they looked as if ducked in the river. At this time there was no passing in the streets, without being soundly wetted with water, thrown from the windows.

Rowing for prizes.

THE fifth Sapan, called Donon, is held at the city of Makkaao, whither the king and queen used to repair in their gilt bark, and land at a beautiful palace, richly gilt also. From hence the king went to another palace without the city, to see the courtiers row in their paros, or barks, two in each, upon the river, for prizes. The first which arrived at the palace gained a little image of gold; the second, one of silver; the rest had nothing, except the last, whose rowers, by way of jest, were presented with a widow's weeds. This feast lasts a whole moon, or Peguan month ^l.

Talepoy, or priests.

THE priests of Pegu, who are called Talepoy, are a kind of mixture of the popish monks and friars: they observe celibacy, and eat but once a day. Their dress is a long frock, girt with a leathern thong, four inches broad, at which hangs a bag for receiving alms, for they have no stipends; and in case the few acres, which every one who builds a temple bestows for their maintenance, be not sufficient, they send some novices abroad, to beg alms. These mendicants are clad with a large orange-coloured mantle, and have a little basket hanging at their left arm. In the left hand they carry a little drum, and a little stick in the right, with which, when they come to people's doors, they beat three strokes. If no-body answers, they beat a second and a third time; but then, if the house continues silent, they go on to the next, without speaking one word. Yet they are seldom sent away without an alms of rice, pulse, fruits, or roots, which are their only food ^k; for the people have them in great veneration, on account of their exemplary lives: insomuch that they drink the water in which the bodies of the Talepoy are washed, according to custom, once every year.

Dwell in woods.

THEY dwell in the woods, in a sort of nests or cages, built on the tops of trees, for fear of the tigers. Their lives are innocent, and they are very humane. They were the best observers of the rules of morality and charity that captain Hamilton met with in all his travels. The people too were generally pious and hospitable. They preach frequently; assembling the people every new moon, or, as others say, every Monday, by the sound of a bell or balon. Their subject or text is some precept of the law of nature, which they think sufficient to salvation, without regard to speculative doctrines, and is attended with very good effects on their auditors. They teach charity, as the most sublime of all virtues, and have no religious controversies. Persecution is a stranger to them: nor are they offended if any of their people embrace a different faith: they say the mind is a free agent, and must not be forced. They even go so far as to hold all religions to be good, and say that the deity is pleased with variety ^m.

Several orders.

THE Talepoy have a kind of hierarchy among them, and a high-priest, who is stiled Ratou. All the clergy have sumptuous funerals, made at the expence of the people: their bodies are burnt on a pile of costly wood, and the ashes cast into the river. When a high-priest dies, his corps is kept embalmed for three or four months. At the time appointed for his funeral, they erect four masts in the ground about 100 yards one from the other, with a very tall one in the middle, round which they build three scaffolds, railed about; the lowermost largest,

^h HAMILT. p. 55, & seq. ^l BALBI, p. 119, 121. FITCH ubi supra, p. 1740. OVIINGT. p. 596.
^k BALBI, p. 123. FITCH ubi supra. OVIINGT. p. 593. HAMILT. p. 51. ^m BALBI ubi supra,
p. 123. ⁿ OVIINGT. p. 593. HAMILT. p. 52.

a and the highest least. These they fill with combustibles; and, on ropes drawn tight from the middle mast to the corner ones, place rockets. Then, the corpse being laid along on the upper scaffold, a trumpet is blown; at the sound whereof the rockets are fired, which in an instant set all in a flame: so that, in an hour, the whole is consumed^a.

^a OVINGT. p. 594. HAMILT. p. 60.

S E C T. IV.

Government of Pegu.

Of the king and nobility.

b THE kingdom of Pegu, being at present annexed to that of Ava, and consequently sub-Orders of ject to the same laws, we shall postpone what we have to say in relation to affairs of nobility.
government, till we come to treat of Ava; and proceed to speak of such matters as concern the king and nobility of Pegu, before the dissolution of that monarchy, in the year 1600.

THE nobility of Pegu are distinguished into several orders, of which we find mention of two. The first Baja, who are the same with our dukes; and Semini, or Shemini (A), who are the commanders, great officers of state, and the barons^a. Besides these, we meet with two other titles of honour and dignity; one Najiran, which signifies lord; the other Banna, or Bayna, which we find tacked to the names of great men; as Chau-bayna, king of Marta-vân; Banna Dola, from whom Sirian was taken by Nicote.

c THESE nobles are in a kind of slavish subjection to the king, who takes care to keep up that Their slavish servile obedience among his chiefs and great men, by employing them in acts of labour, very subjection.
unbecoming the dignity of noblemen. While Balbi was in Pegu, about 1536, they were commanded to go and help in building a gallery and aqueduct; which order they put in execution:
nor were they excused from going on with the work, although it rained heavily; but, with spades in their hands, were seen to dig the ground like other labourers; the king being present, to see that they were not idle^b.

THIS prince appears in great pomp, and is treated with the highest reverence by all his sub- Reverence paid jects. In his public audiences, which he gives twice every day, all his Shemines, or nobles, the king.
sit on each side of him, at a good distance; and without them is a numerous guard. The d court-yard, facing the hall of audience, is very large; and when any person has a mind to apply himself to his majesty, he makes his prostrations in this manner: he first kneels down; and then lifting his hands to his head, bows it to the ground three times. This he does three times, viz. when he enters the court, when he is advanced half-way, and when he draws near the king. After this he sits down, and talks with his majesty, at a greater or lesser distance, according as the king likes him.

WHEN he rides abroad, he is attended with a great guard, and many noblemen. He often Pomp in going appears upon an elephant, in a little castle or pavilion, richly gilded. Sometimes he shews abroad.
himself in a kind of coach, called Serrion: it consists of a great frame, like a horse-litter, on which is placed a sort of small house, covered at top, but open on the side, all over gilded, e and set with rubies and sapphires. This machine is carried on the shoulders of sixteen or eighteen men, and generally accompanied with the acclamations and feastings of the people^c.
The triumphal car or waggon, which he rides in when he attends the feasts above-mentioned, is drawn by sixteen horses: 'tis all over gilded, and raised very high, with a sumptuous canopy over it. The car is followed by twenty lords, each holding a rope, which is fastened to it, in order to keep it from falling. Upon the car stand four of the king's favourites, attending him: and round it are all the nobility of this kingdom, the army marching before. It is surprising to see so much splendor and good order among such multitudes of people, who are, by Europeans, reckoned Barbarians.

THE king in hearing the complaints of his subjects, never speaks to, or is spoken to by, Public audienf them: but supplications are made to him in the following manner. His majesty sits aloft ces.
in a great hall, on a tribunal seat; and below him sit all his lords, round about: then the persons who demand audience enter a spacious court, facing the hall, and sit down promifcuously, at the distance of about forty paces from the king, with their petitions in one hand, and a present or gift in the other, according to the importance of the matters contained in them.
Then the secretary advances; and taking the petitions from the suitors, reads them aloud; and if his majesty thinks fit to grant their request, he orders the presents to be taken from them. But in case he thinks their demand not to be just or reasonable, he dismisses them without receiving their gifts. It may be proper to take notice, that the petitions are written with an iron style on the leaves of trees, about twenty-seven inches long, and two broad. In the same manner are all writings ingrossed ^a.

^a BALBI. p. 103.

^b Ibid. p. 119.

^c FITCH apud Purch. vol. ii. p. 1738.

Revenues and wealth.

THE king of Pegu's revenues arise chiefly from the rent of lands, of which he is the sole proprietor. Another branch of it are the duties paid for commodities imported and exported. The treasure of the kingdom has been vastly increased, in former times, by the spoil of conquered countries; and what contributed much to prevent their dissipation, was the king's being at no expence to maintain his standing forces, excepting when in the field. In a word, he was judged to be the richest monarch in the world, next to the emperor of China ^c.

Power and forces.

THE forces of the kingdom, during the dominion of the Barma race, were exceeding numerous. Those monarchs, by the report of most authors, have brought into the field armies amounting to the number of a million, and a million and a half of men; for maintenance of whom he assigned lands and towns to his nobles, who were obliged to keep them in time of peace, and in time of war bring them into the field. The king then had the charge of providing for them, and found them in pay, clothes, and arms: but, when the war was over, they were all returned into his magazines. It may seem hard to conceive where victuals could be had for such numerous forces: but, besides the great plenty of all necessities of life, it must be considered, not only that the Peguers are very abstemious in their diet, but also that nothing, either of animals or vegetables, comes amiss to them. They eat the flesh of all kinds of creatures, even cats, rats, serpents, and other vermin: and when that is wanting, provided they have but water and salt, they will support themselves a long time under a bush, with roots, flowers, and the leaves of trees. ^b

Their arms.

THE arms of the soldiers are lances, muskets, swords, and targets. Their muskets are beautiful, and good as the European: but their pikes are bad, and swords worse, being no better than long knives with one edge, and without a point. The king had plenty of all sorts of artillery; but had not skilful gunners. He likewise wanted ship-carpenters and sailors; and this is the reason why he had no naval force, which otherwise he might be well provided with. Instead of shipping, therefore, he contented himself with certain pleasure barges, than which nothing could be more rich and beautiful, being all over gilded, and otherwise adorned. Among them there was one, built by the father of the king, who reigned in the year 1586, and kept at Mekkao, an inland place; which, for the security of this vessel, was surrounded with guards. According to Balbi, none ever was equal to it in beauty; for it was finished in great perfection, and adorned with great variety of figures, exquisitely carved, and the whole gilded, amazing to behold. The vessel was of a vast length, but narrow, out of all proportion. It had 150 rowers on each side, who, sitting with each a short oar in his hand, all gilded except the pale, plunged it at once into the water, and drawing it towards them, made the vessel run forward, as swift as an arrow out of a bow. It had two gilded rudders: and, in an apartment which possessed the middle part of the bark, with windows on every side, the king used to take his pleasure in the neighbouring rivers. ^c

Elephants of war.

THIS monarch had no fewer than 800 elephants trained to war, furnished with castles on their backs, each holding four soldiers: and it was thought formerly, that the chief strength of his armies consisted in these elephants, whose number he was able to increase at pleasure from the forests. His great power might also be judged of from hence, that he had no fewer than 26 crowned heads at his command. ^d

Wife and con-cubines.

THE kings of Pegu had only one wife; but they maintained, besides, 300 concubines, by whom they had commonly many children: he who reigned in the time of Cæsar Frederic, about 1563, was reputed to have had no fewer than ninety ^e.

King's funeral.

THE funeral of a king of Pegu used to be performed in the following manner. Upon his decease, two barks were ordered to be made, with a beautiful covering, all gilded, which served both vessels. Under the covering was raised a lofty pile or scaffolding, gilded likewise, on which was laid the royal corpse: then a good quantity of lignum aloes, sandal wood, benjamin, musk, and other odoriferous combustibles, being placed about it, they were set on fire; and the barks at the same time, put a sailing down the river of Pegu, under the direction of some Talepoi, who went singing and rejoicing. When the body was burnt, the priests took the ashes, and made them into a paste with milk. This done, they carried the ashes, thus amalgamated, to the mouth of the port of Sirian, where runs the Makkrea, or violent tide, often mentioned before, and threw them into the water when it began to ebb: from hence they repaired to the city Dagon (B), and near the famous temple in that city, built another, where they deposited the bones of the deceased prince. After this they returned to the palace of Pegu, and placed the heir upon the throne, with the usual ceremonies ^f.

^d FREDERIC ibid. p. 1716.

^e Ibid. apud Hakl. vol. ii. p. 235. BALBI, p. 110.

ibid. p. 236. BALBI, p. 111. HAMILT. p. 46.

^f BALBI, p. 123.

^f FREDER.

(B) The bones of the king, who died in 1583, while Balbi was at Pegu, were buried at Dagon, or Dagon: but the bones of the former kings were deposited in such places as they chose themselves.

S E C T. V.

The history of Pegu.

^a P E G U was always a kingdom of considerable power ; and made itself so famous through Curious, but the world, by its great conquests over the neighbouring countries, in the sixteenth cen- imperfect. tury, that a complete account of its affairs, from the beginning of the monarchy, would, no doubt, make one of the most shining figures in a Universal History. But although we have large relations, written by travellers and others, drawn thither during its flourishing state, for sake either of trade or curiosity ; yet those materials are too imperfect, from thence to form any thing like a series, even of all the remarkable transactions which have happened since the Portuguese first discovered India by sea.

THE chief authors who have furnished materials for the Pegu history, from that period, The chief au- down to the destruction of the monarchy in the year 1600, which contains the space of little thors, more than a hundred years, are Mendez Pinto, Cesar Frederic, Gasparo Balbi, and Ralph Fitch. The first of these, Mendez Pinto, though one of the most fabulous among the travellers of these latter times, has yet preserved many important facts, relating to the wars and revolutions which about his time happened in several Indian countries : and it must be acknowledged, that to him the public is obliged for what they meet with here, concerning the kings of Pegu, down to the year 1550 ; which comprises the great revolution brought about by the Barmas (commonly called Bramas), and the first increasings of their power. It is true, this author has blended the truth with so many fictions of his own invention, to fill up chasms, that it is often very difficult to separate one from the other ; and many writers who have depended too much on his veracity, have fallen into very grievous errors. For all this, Pinto ^c hath had his advocates : and a late collector (A) has published his most palpable forgeries (B), with which his relation abounds, believing them to be genuine ; and, at the same time, has omitted the revolutions of Pegu (C), which are perhaps, for the general, the most genuine, as well as valuable, part of his book.

FREDERIC, Balbi, and Fitch, went to Pegu after Pinto ; the first in 1563, and the two treating of it. latter about 1583. These have continued, in some sort, the account of affairs where Pinto left off, down to the year 1587. Thenceforward, to the destruction of the monarchy in 1600, we find a supply from the letters of the Jesuits, Pimenta, Fernandez, and Boues : after which the Portuguese Asia of De Faria y Sousa affords a few particulars, as low as 1640. From this year, to the present time, we meet with scarce any thing relating to the history ^d of Pegu, excepting what is found in Skeldon's memoir (D), inserted in Ovington's voyage to Surat ; and Capt. Hamilton's new account of the East Indies, which gives us a view of the state of Pegu, as part of the dominion of the king of Ava, whose history is, in great measure, connected with it.

THE kingdom of Pegu was founded about 1100 years ago, and had a seaman for its first Bressagukan. monarch. This prince was succeeded by his son, who, we are told, lived eighty years, and had for his successor his son, named Tam. These three, as well as all who came after them, as Kael Vea, Talanna Inda, Dazar, Mampla, and six or seven others, of whom the last was Shemin Doo (E), added to their name the title of Banna (or Bainba)^a. These princes had, by degrees, so enlarged their dominions, that Bressagukan (F), who ascended the throne in ^e the year 1518, had under his subjection nine kingdoms, which were governed by his lieutenants, whose revenues amounted to three millions of gold^b.

It was doubtless to this prince that Antony Correa was sent in 1519, to conclude a peace ; Portuguese at the swearing of which assisted the king's ministers, with the priests of both nations, Romish embassy. and Peguan. The Gentile pontiff was the great Rauli, or Raulin, who after the capitulations made in the golden mine were publicly read, according to the custom of those people,

^a DE FARIA, Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 117. p. 198, 206.

^b MARTINIERE dict. geogr. art. Pegou. PINTO's travels,

(A) The Abbe Prewost, in his continuation of Histoire generale des voyages, &c. tome ix. p. 353.

(B) Particularly his pretended travels through China and Tartary, with his journey to the court of Calaminhan, of which scarce the name of one place or person is true.

(C) See the same collection, p. 483, note (30). Purchas, that mangler of voyages and travels, has done the like. See his Pilgrims, vol. iii. p. 252, & seq.

(D) Which memoir seems to be nothing else but a collection from Tosi, Jarric, and other authors.

(E) This we may take to be the sense of the original Portuguese (tom. iii. part 2. ch. 4. p. 237) ; which, being obscurely worded, the translator has rendered quite unintelligible, by omitting the words, and six or seven successively, of whom the last, named ; which ought to come between the names of Mompla and Xemindoo, who was slain in the year 1549, not 1540, as it is by mistake in the original, as well as the translation.

(F) In the English version of Mendez Pinto it is written Presaguean.

began to read in a book. He then took some yellow paper (a colour dedicated to their holy uses), with the odoriferous leaves of certain trees, inscribed with characters, and set fire to them. This done, he took the hands of the king's minister, and holding them over the ashes, spoke some words, which rendered the oath inviolable. Antony Correa, to answer the solemnity of this ceremony, ordered his priest to put on a surplice, and bring with him his breviary: but when the book came, it appeared so tattered and torn, that Correa, to avoid the scandal which such a sight might give those heathens, had a book of church music substituted in its place. As this made a more creditable figure, being both larger and better bound, it passed on those people as well, says De Faria, as if it had been the gospel ^c.

The king murdered.

WE meet with nothing farther relating to Bressagukan, till the year 1539, when he was slain on the following occasion. Among other princes who were his tributaries was Parà Mandorà, king of the Barmas (G). This prince, by one condition of his vassalage, was obliged to furnish the Pegu monarch with 30,000 of his subjects, to labour in his mines, and other public works. As the king used frequently to go see how his works went forward, and took along with him none but his women, who delighted to see foreigners, and the progress which they made; the Barma labourers formed a design to rob the queen and all the concubines of their jewels, the first opportunity which offered. Pursuant to this resolution, the next time the king went to visit the works, the Barmas murdered him; and having stripped the ladies, fled to their own country ^d.

The Barmas.

THE Barmas (H), by Pinto, and most other authors, called Bramas, inhabited the highlands of Pangavirau, which encompasses the kingdom of Pegu. Their country, which was 200 leagues in length, and 80 in breadth, made one of the thirteen kingdoms, which, according to their histories, were formerly united under one monarch; whole yoke they threw off, by poisoning him at a banquet, prepared for him in the city of Chaleu (I), and thus became independent, along with Pegu and the rest ^e.

Their dominions.

THE country of the Barmas is that, doubtless, called by Edoardo Barbosa, Verma; to which, in 1515, belonged all the coast extending from Bengál to Pegu: so that what goes now by the name of Arrakan, was then called Verma, or Barma; and Arrakan, according to the same author, lay within land, to the north of it ^f. We find likewise from De Faria, that they were formerly masters of Ava (K) whose dominions extended as far as Cbina ^g. Hence it appears, that the Barmas had once most of the northern part of the peninsula beyond Ganges under their power; and possibly it was their empire which became divided into thirteen kingdoms, on the death of the sole monarch above-mentioned. However that be, a little before the time of Pinto, their dominions were reduced to very narrow bounds, and their king was tributary to him of Pegu: but by degrees they recovered their ancient empire; which at present, according to a late author, extends from Maruvi, near Tanaserin, to the province of Yun-nan, in Cbina, about 800 miles from south to north, and 250 broad from west to east ^h. As to the name of Bramas, or rather Barmas, we are told by Balbi, that it signifies soldiers; and the same author calls the general of their army the Great Brama ⁱ. To return to our history:

They invade Pegu.

THIS enormous action of the Barma slaves threw all the dominions of Pegu into confusion; but the people every-where, instead of rising to revenge the death of the murdered king, divided into factions, and began rebellions in several parts of the empire: so that Dacha Rupi, who was heir to the deceased, found himself in no condition to maintain his authority. Parà Mandarà, then king of the Barmas, taking advantage of these commotions, which weakened the strength of Pegu, not only threw off the yoke, but even formed the design of conquering that country; which he invaded with an army of more than a million of men and 5000 elephants; besides a great fleet which he sent down the river of Ava towards Bagou, corruptly called Pegu, the capital of that empire, while he marched with his forces thither by land.

JUST at this juncture, Ferdinand de Morales arrived in the port of Pegu, with a great galleon, laden on account of the king of Portugal, and sent thither to trade by order of the viceroy of Goa. As soon as Dacha Rupi heard of his coming, he sent to desire his assistance against the enemy; and, having won him with favours and promises, gave him the com-

^c CASTANHEDA, hist. del l'Indie orient. part ii. cap. 12. p. 59. & DE FARIA, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 226.
^d DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 10. ^e PINTO'S voy. p. 241. ^f EDOAR. BARBOSA, MS. p. 187.
^g DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 11. ^h HAMILT. new acc. of E. Ind. vol. ii. p. 39. ⁱ BALBI voy. p. 101, 108.

(G) Pinto does not name this prince; but, p. 212, intimates, that he had been Shemín, or lord, of Tangu, before he was king of Brama, or rather the Barmas.

(H) So named by Duchatz and Hamilton. By Barbosa, Verma.

(I) In a kingdom of the same name; of which, according to Mendez Pinto, the city of Ava was the capital; and that of Chaleu lay between Ava and Prom. The inhabitants of this kingdom were called Chaleus. See Pinto's voyages, p. 214, & alibi.

(K) Pinto, and, after him, De Faria, says it extended the space of two months travels, at ordinary journeys, and contained sixty-two cities.

a mand of his whole fleet. Morales hereupon set out in a galliot; and, having joined the king's ships, put himself in a posture to oppose the adversary. Mean time the king of the Barmas came on by land like a torrent, carrying all before him; and his fleet covered the river, though as great as the Ganges: with this power he easily gained both the city and kingdom of Pegu, which he quickly over-ran. Morales, although the ships under his command were scarce visible in respect of the enemy's, yet met them at the point of Finamarreka, and conquer it, where was a furious, bloody, and desperate fight; in which the Peguers, under the conduct of the Portuguese commander, made great havock among the ships of the Barmas: but finding themselves overpowered by numbers, they at length deserted Morales, who alone in his galliot withstood the whole fleet of the enemy: and, performing wonders, made a vast b slaughter among them, till, oppressed by the multitudes, who assailed him on all sides, he was at last slain^k. This happened in the year 1539 or 40.

AFTER the conquest of Pegu, Parà Mandarà turned his arms against the neighbouring Parà Mandarà kingdoms which had been tributary to that empire (L). In the year 1544 he marched against Martavân, capital of a kingdom of the same name, then very great and flourishing, its revenue being no less than three millions of gold. He laid siege to the city by land, with 700,000 men; and by sea with a fleet of 1700 sail, 100 of which were large gallees: in them were 700 Portugueses, commanded by John Cayero, reputed a man of valour and conduct.

At the end of seven months, in which five assaults had been given to the city, and the Barmas had lost 120,000 men; the king Chaubayna, finding it impossible to withstand any besieges Martavân, c longer so great a power, especially as provisions were become already so scarce that they had eaten 3000 elephants, offered to capitulate: but no conditions were allowed by the besiegers. The king, in this distress, resolved to apply to the Portugueses, to whom he had always been very kind and serviceable. With this view he sent one Seixas to intreat Cayero to receive him, his family, and treasure (M), into the four ships under his command; offering to give half of his riches to the king of Portugal, to become his vassal, and pay such tribute as should be agreed on: for he did not doubt but that, with the assistance of 2000 Portugueses, maintained at his own expence, he should be able to repulse the enemy, and retrieve his affairs. Cayero consulted the principal officers; and, in their presence, asked Seixas what the treasure of Martavân might amount to? Seixas answered, that out of what he had seen, for he had not
d seen all, two ships might be loaded with gold and jewels, and four or five more with silver. This was a proposal too advantageous to be slighted: but the Portugueses, envious of the great fortune which Cayero might have made, by accepting that offer, threatened to discover the matter to the Barma king, in case he did not reject it^l.

THE king of Martavân was no less surpris'd than overwhelmed with anguish at this refusal: The king capitulates:
however, seeing Seixas take his leave, to fly the danger which threatened the city, he gave him a pair of bracelets, which were afterwards sold to the governor of Narsinga for 80,000 ducats. After this, having lost all hopes of relief, he resolved to set fire to the city, and, sallying with those few men whom he had left, die honourably in the midst of his enemies: but the same night one of his officers, with 4000 men, deserted to the besiegers, and discovered his design.
e The king, thus betrayed, capitulated with the Barma king for his own life, and the lives of goes to the camp, his wife and children, with leave to end his days in retirement: this, and more, was easily granted, because the conqueror intended to perform no part of what he promised. The way from the city to the king of the Barmas tent, above a league distant, was lined with musqueteers of sundry nations; and next the gate were posted the Portugueses. The first who came forth was the queen Nbay Kanatoo in a chair, with her two daughters and two sons in two others. They were surrounded by forty beautiful young ladies, led by as many ancient ones, accompanied by priests, who prayed and comforted them. Then the king appeared amidst a guard of Barmas. He was seated on a small she elephant, clothed in black velvet; his head, beard, and eye-brows were shaved; and about his neck there hung a rope, which f moved even the enemy to compassion.

^k DE FARIA, ubi supr. vol. ii. p. 9. & seqq.

^l PINTO, p. 196, & seqq. DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 384, & seqq.

(L) De Faria says, he conquered the Jangomas, Lanjangs, and the Loos, with others, which, like his own, were tributaries to Pegu; and thus recovered his ancient kingdom of Ava, whose great extent, and number of cities, have been specified in a preceding note. He likewise subdued a kingdom of Turks (perhaps that of Trukor, mentioned hereafter), which contained as many cities as that of Ava, viz. sixty two; and was taken by the king of Pegu from him of Katbay (or Kitay): also the kingdom of Bimir, west of Ava, of the same extent, with twenty-seven populous cities: that of Lanjam (or Lanjan), to the north of Bimir, and of equal dimensions, with thirty-eight cities, and store of gold and silver: also Mamprum, as large as the former, to the east of which it lies, and west of Kochinchina, yet containing no more than eight cities.—But De Faria ascribes to Parà Mandarà what should rather belong to his third successor Chaumigrem; for it appears from Pinto, that he did not conquer Ava; and from Pimenta, that Jangoma was conquered by the father of the last Barma king of Pegu, who was Chaumigrem; nor was the reign of Parà Mandarà long enough to make such conquests as are ascribed to him.

(M) Among which was that of Presaguean, or Bresaguean, the late king of Pegu, in twenty-six chests, amounting to sixty millions of gold, if Pinto may be credited,

THE unfortunate king, as soon as he saw the Portugueses, stopped, and would not proceed one step till they were removed from that post. When Chaubayna came before his conqueror, he cast himself at his feet; but not being able to speak for grief, the Raulin of Mounay, chief-priest of these gentiles, and esteemed a saint, made a moving speech in the king's behalf: but it not having the designed effect, the miserable prince, his queen, children, and ladies, were all secured. The two following days were spent in removing the treasure, amounting to one hundred millions of gold, which required the labour of one thousand men. Liberty was then given the army to plunder the city, whose riches were valued at twelve millions; after which the city was burnt, wherein there perished by fire and sword above 60,000 souls, besides 60,000 more who were made slaves of; 1700 temples and 140,000 houses were reduced to ashes. There were found in the town 6000 pieces of cannon, 100,000 quintals of pepper, and the same quantity of other spices ^m.

The city plundered.
King put to death.

ON the morrow which followed this destruction, there appeared on an adjacent hill, called Beydao, twenty-one gibbets, with a strong guard of horse. Thither was led the queen, with her children and ladies, in all one hundred and forty, and there hanged up by the feet (N). Chaubayna, and fifty men of great quality, were cast into the sea with stones about their necks; which gave so great displeasure to the Barma army, that they mutinied, and the cruel king was in no small danger of suffering for his tyranny. However, the storm blowing over, he left people to rebuild the ruined city, and returned to Pegu with the rest of his army, among whom was Cayero, and his 700 Portugueses.

Prom besieged,
by Parà Mandarà, and betrayed.

ABOUT this time the king received some intimation, that the emperor of Pandalu, styled the Siammon (O), intended to invade his dominions; and that the king of Ava had confederated with those of Sevâdi and Châleus (P), to give that monarch a passage through their territories. On this advice, Parà Mandarà fortified all his frontier places; and then, having increased his forces to 900,000 men, in March 1545 set out from Pegu to besiege Prom. He embarked this numerous army in 12,000 rowing vessels, whereof 2000 were seroos, laulers, katurros, and foists; and went up the river Ansedaa as high as Danaplun. Then, passing out of it in that called Pichu Malakou, in April came before the city of Prom. The king hereof was dead, and had left a son to inherit, who was no more than thirteen years of age. As he had married the king of Ava's daughter, he had sent to him for succour on this occasion, and expected a supply of 30,000 men. This moved the enemy to press the siege, in hopes to gain the city before that aid should arrive. After six days leaguer, the queen offered to hold the crown of Parà Mandarà, and pay what tribute he thought fit to impose, provided he would withdraw his forces. On the other hand, he insisted that she should put herself, with all her treasure, into his power: but she, knowing how perfidious he was, resolved not to trust him. He therefore renewed his assaults, in which, and by the plague that raged in his camp, he lost 80,000 men, among whom were 500 Portugueses ⁿ.

THIS way of attack proving so pernicious, he raised a mount which overlooked the city; and from thence, plying it with his artillery, left no place of safety to the besieged. But 5000 of them, making a successful sally, not only destroyed the mount, and killed 15,000 of the enemy, but also carried off eighty cannon, and wounded the king himself; who, in a rage, slew 2000 Portugueses, then on guard, as being negligent of their duty. Parà Mandarà began to despair of succeeding in his enterprise, when he accomplished by bribery what he could not obtain by force. For, towards the end of August, Shemîn Malatay, one of the four principal men who commanded in Prom, treacherously gave the enemy entrance into the city; which was utterly destroyed with fire and sword: the bodies of 2000 slain children, cut to pieces, were served as food for the elephants. The queen, stripped naked, was publicly whipped, and then tortured till she died (Q); the young king was tied to her dead body, ⁿ PINTO, p. 205, & seqq. DE FARIA, p. 351.

^m PINTO, p. 199, & seqq. DE FARIA, p. 349, & seqq.

(N) All alive, excepting the queen; who, overcome with anguish, expired in the lap of one of the ladies.

(O) This name, as well as that of the Mons, mentioned hereafter, seems to be made out of Sions Maons; which Gaspar de Cruz says is the name given by some to the Laos. De Faria, in his extract from Pinto, mistakes Siamon for Siam. Pandalu is either a fictitious empire of Pinto's, like Kalaminham; or he speaks of a power as in being, which had been long before destroyed: for we read of a people called the great Siams, to the north of the present kingdom of Siam, inhabiting a country now a great wilderness, called by the Chineses, and perhaps other neighbouring nations, Pabima Pan (r), which name has some affinity with Pandalu. However that be, according to Pinto, the empire of Pandalu lies to the west and north-west of that of Kalaminham; another fictitious empire, situate to the north or north-east of Pegu; for that author speaks very obscurely of the site thereof, although he pretends he travelled through the country.

(P) Chalen kingdom lies between Prom and Ava, according to Pinto, p. 214.

(Q) De Faria says. she was given up to the lust of the soldiers till she expired. She was fair and handsome, but much older than the king, being thirty-six years of age; she was also his maternal aunt. It is thought his cruelty to her was in revenge for having been denied him in marriage, by the king of Ava her father.

(r) See Du Halde's China, vol. i. p. 61, 62.

a and both together cast into the river. The like fate 300 gentlemen underwent, after stakes had been driven through their bodies.

THE tyrant was employed in fortifying the city, of which he had been proclaimed king, Meleytay <sup>fortress being at</sup> when advice was brought him by his spies, that the prince of Ava had sailed from thence down the river Queytor with 30,000 Siammon soldiers on board 400 rowing vessels: and, hearing of his sister's disaster, had stopped at Meleytay, a fortress some twelve leagues north of Prom, where he waited to be joined by his father the king of Ava; who, with 80,000 Mons (R) was marching by land. On this news the Barma king sent his foster-brother Chaumigrem along the river-side with 200,000 men, and went by water with 100,000 more, in 2000 feros. On the approach of Chaumigrem, the prince of Ava burnt his barks; and, forming a van-guard of the mariners, drew up his 30,000 Mons to encounter the enemy. Bloody was the fight; all the van-guard were cut to pieces in a trice, and of the 30,000 Mons only 800 remained: but the Barmas paid dear for the victory, with the loss of 115,000 out of 200,000.

THE king coming up, and seeing the havock that had been made of his men, attacked ^{and taken} the fortress furiously for seven days: at the end of which the 800 Mons, despairing of holding out long against so great a power, and resolving to sell their lives at the dearest rate, sallied out in a dark rainy night; and, breaking through the enemy's troops in several places, pressed so hard upon the king himself, that he was forced to jump into the river and swim for his life. In short, the Mons were all cut off, but not till they had slain 12,000 of their enemies; among whom were about 2000 Barmas, as many foreigners, and the rest Peguers. After this, the victor entered Meleytay, and put to death the Sbemin thereof, who had betrayed Prom to him; saying, That he who had been a traitor to his natural prince could not be faithful to him °.

THE king immediately ordered the fort to be repaired; which being finished, he embarked ^{thence to} 70,000 men in 1000 rowing feros, and went up the Queytor (S), in order to observe the country. Ava Having passed by many considerable places belonging to the kingdom of Chaleu (T) and Jaeupalaon, he, in October 1545, after a voyage of twenty-eight days, arrived at the port of Ava, about a league from the city, where he burnt between two and 3000 vessels, and also several villages; with the loss however of 8000 men, including sixty-two Portugueses. As ^{without at-} for the city of Ava, he did not think fit to attack it, for it had been newly fortified, and was ^{tacking it} defended by 20,000 Mons (U), from the mountains of Pandaleu; where he was informed 80,000 more were raising for the service of the king of Ava. For as soon as this prince received advice of the loss of Prom, not being strong enough to revenge the injury, he went in person to implore the Siamon's protection, and become his tributary, on condition that he should assist him with his forces, and enable him to recover that city; which the emperor promised to accomplish within one year from the time of this treaty.

THIS intelligence startled the Barma king, who therefore, after thirteen days stay, returned to Prom; having first dispatched an ambassador to the Kalaminbam, in order to engage him by a treaty of alliance to divert the Siamon, by a war the next spring, from aiding the king of Ava, whom he designed to conquer.

THE Kalaminbam, which signifies lord of the world (X), was a prince of mighty power, ^{The Kalamin-} whose dominions were situated in the midst of this region, and contained a large extent of ham, country. His capital city was named Timplam; where he resided in vast state and magnificence. It stood on the great river Pitay, had a strong wall, defended with towers and a wide ditch. It contained no fewer than 400,000 houses, most of one or two stories; and 2600 ^{his great em-} temples full of images, which were served by twenty-seven sorts or orders of priests. The ^{pire.} palace was splendid beyond imagination; and in it were the statues of thirteen Kalaminbams in silver, with each a golden mitre on his head ^P.

THE empire (which our author Pinto does not name) was 300 leagues long, and as many ^f broad, containing twenty-seven kingdoms; each divided into twenty-six provinces, 700 in all. They are full of noble cities; the soil exceeding fertile, and abounding with commodities, which, with the manufactures, produce a wealthy commerce. The inhabitants are extremely civilized and mild-tempered; the women very fair, yet modest. The emperor has always 60,000 horse and 10,000 elephants about his person. His forces, throughout the 700 pro-

° PINTO, p. 210, & seqq. DE FARIA, p. 352, & seqq.

^P PINTO, p. 214, & seqq.

(R) Or Maons perhaps; they were, probably, a tribe of the Laos.

(S) By this circumstance of sailing up the river to Ava, and then up the same afterward, from Ava, with the ambassador sent to the Kalaminbam by the Queytor, must be understood the river Ava; but no other author, besides Pinto, gives it that name. It is called by the Chingé, Lu Kyang; and by others, perhaps the Peguers themselves, Menan Kietu.

(T) See its situation in a former note.

(U) They seem to be Laos; and the name derived from Siam Maons, as the Laos are by some called. See a former note.

(X) According to Pinto, Kala is lord, and Minbam, the world.

vinces, are 1,700,000 men, of whom 350,000 are horse : there are also 55,000 elephants ; a on account of whose number in this country, the Kalaminbam styles himself in his titles, lord of the invincible force of elephants. In a word, the revenue of this mighty prince amounted to twenty millions of gold ; and he worshipped Kiay Frigau, or Firgau, that is, the god of notes in the sun, who is also adored at Dagun in Pegu^a.

The Chau-
migrem

THIS is, in brief, the account, true or false (Y), which Mendez Pinto has given of the empire of Kalaminbam, and its sovereign. Upon the ambassador's return to Pegu, the king sent the Chaumigrem, his foster-brother, whom he honoured with the title of Koutalanba, that is, the king's brother, to meet him, accompanied with all the grandees of the kingdom, and four battalions of strangers : among whom were 1000 Portugueses, commanded by António Ferreira of Braganza, a man of great understanding ; to whom the king gave a pension of 12,000 ducats a year, besides presents, which came to little less (Z). Although it appeared by the Kalaminbam's letter that the treaty had taken effect, yet as the season was not yet come for invading Ava, the king sent the Chaumigrem, with 150,000 men in 13,000 boats, against the city Sebâdi, or Savâdi, the capital of a small kingdom 130 leagues distant from Pegu towards the north-east. The general, after having lost many men in several assaults which he made, raised two mounts, from whence he did much damage to the city : but the besieged falling killed at one time 8000 men, and 5000 at another ; which so discouraged Chaumigrem that he drew off his army, in order to revenge his disgrace on a town called Valentay, which had furnished the city with provisions ; but a body of Savâdis falling on his troops by surprise put them to the rout^c.

Defeated before Savâdi.

Distractions in Siam.

A. D. 1546.

WHILE these things were doing on the side of Pegu, the empire of the Sornau, commonly called Siam, fell into great distractions. The king, coming from the war of Chiamay, was poisoned by his queen ; who, in his absence, had been gotten with child by an officer of the court. She made away, after the same manner, with the young king, in order to advance her paramour, whom she married, to the crown. This she effected in November 1545 : but in January following they were both slain at a feast, by the contrivance of Oya Passiloko, and the king of Kamboja ; who conferred the crown of a religious man named Pretiem, natural brother to the late monarch, the line being extinct, but on a cowardly disposition, and a tyrant. As soon as the news of this revolution came to the ears of the king of Pegu, who at that time kept his court in the city of Anapleu, he assembled his lords to consult them on the occasion. Their advice was, that he ought not to neglect so favourable an opportunity of conquering that country : that, in case he succeeded, he would be honoured with the title of lord of the white elephant (A) ; and likewise open himself a way into China ; against which empire the Great Khan of Tartary, the Siamon, and the Kalaminbam, had led such formidable armies^d.

The Barma
army

THE Barma monarch, pleased with their approbation of what he had himself designed, immediately repaired to Martavân ; where, in less than three months, he gathered an army of 800,000 men ; of these 100,000 were foreigners, among whom were 1000 Portugueses, 40,000 horse, 60,000 musketeers, 20,000 elephants, and 1000 cannon (B). The Portugueses were commanded by James Suarez (C), called the Gallego, or Galician, who left Portugal in 1538 ; but had now a pension from the king of Pegu of 200,000 ducats a year, with the title of his brother, and governor of the kingdom. e

^a PINTO, p. 227, 243.
p. 137. and vol. iii. p. 357.

^b Ibid. p. 245, 249.

^c Ibid. p. 278, & seq. DE FARIA, vol. ii.

(Y) In our opinion, this relation, especially as it stands at large in the book itself, has all the marks of forgery ; nor did either the emperor or the empire ever exist but in the author's brain. At least we are certain, that the account which Pinto has given of his journey, with the ambassador, to that prince's court, is all a forgery : it being quite inconsistent with the ideas which the relations of later travellers of credit give us, both as to the geography and history of the countries lying between Siam and China, where this great empire is pretended to have existed ; and of which there does not appear to be the least trace at present. As our author says, he is called the holy Kalaminbam, and represents him both as a spiritual and temporal prince, some have imagined that he is the same with the great Lama of Tibet. It is true, Pinto does not tell us the name of the empire ; but, by the situation he gives it, and course of his pretended travels, it cannot be Tibet.

(Z) We are thus particular with relation to this person, because De Pinto says no more of him ; and yet De Faria represents him as the person to whom the king of Barma owed all his conquests : although he does not mention one action of his, or speak of him twice, more than Pinto ; whereas he is tedious in relating the exploits of James Suarez de Melo, whom, by the way, Captain Hamilton seems to confound with Ferreira. See Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 117. and New account of the East Indies, vol. ii. p. 36, & seq.

(A) De Faria makes this war to have been undertaken merely on account of the white elephant. But he seems to have mistaken this expedition for that which happened twenty years after, in another king's reign.

(B) There is a strange contrariety between the two accounts given by De Faria of this expedition, in his Asia Portuguesa, vol. ii. p. 135. and vol. iii. p. 357. In the first place, he makes the army one million and 500,000 men, with only 4000 elephants, and 180 Portugueses.

(C) Of Braganza, according to Pinto ; but, according to De Faria, of Melo ; who adds, that he was pirating about Mozambik in Africa in 1542 and in 1547 ; was at the siege of Malakka. Next year, being in the Barma king's service : he was worth four millions, in jewels and other effects.

a THE king set out from Mértaván in April 1548, and having at length entered into the kingdom of Siam, five days after arrived before the fortress of Tapuran (D), commanded by a Mogor, containing 2000 houses. The Barmas having been repulsed in three assaults, Suarez, who was general of the camp, and governed the king by his advice, made a breach with forty cannon; and then, giving a fierce attack, in half an hour all the besieged, in number 6000 Siamites, were slain, with the loss of 3000 of his men; in revenge of whom, the king put all the women to the sword. This done, he advanced to the city of Sokotay (E), nine leagues beyond, and encamped along the river Lebrau (F), designing to reduce it: but, as he was counselled not to lose time, or waste his forces, he departed next day, and marched through woods, cut down by his pioneers, till he came to Tilau, a place on the coast towards Junkalau, near the kingdom of Quédab (G); from whence, in nine days (H), he got in sight of Odiaa (or Judia), the capital of Siam.

b THE besieged seeming to make no account of this great power, Suarez made an attack on the south side with 72,000 men, in two bodies, scaling the walls with above 1000 ladders; but, in half an hour, he was repulsed with the loss of 10,000 men. The king, enraged, renewed the attack with 5000 elephants; which, advancing up to the walls (I), tore away their target fences; while the musqueteers from the castles on their backs made such execution, that none durst appear on the ramparts. The walls thus deserted, the besiegers mounted with their ladders; and 1200 Turks, sliding down by the wall, attempted to break open a gate with two battering rams, in order to obtain the reward of 500,000 ducats, which the king had promised to those who should let him into the city: but before they could compass their design, they were attacked and cut to pieces by 3000 Jaos; who then, mounting the wall, drove off the Barmas with great slaughter.

c THE king of Pegu, not discouraged with this new repulse, renewed the assault with the elephants. At the noise of their approach, Oya Passiliko, who commanded in the city, caused a gate to be opened; and sent the king word, that his majesty might bring the promised reward, for he was ready to receive it. The king answered by a furious assault; during which, the Barmas twice forced the gate and entered the city; but the king of Siam, alarmed at the danger, coming on with 30,000 choice troops, a dreadful slaughter ensued, and the enemy were driven out of the city. Hereupon the king, by the advice of Suarez, founded a retreat; and then found that he had been wounded with an arrow. The hurt was seventeen days healing; at the end whereof he made several new assaults, but with no better success than before. The siege had now lasted near five months, and eight assaults had been given in vain: he was resolved, however, to make one vigorous effort more, with twenty-six strong timber castles, filled with combustibles; each sixty-five feet long, fifty broad, and twenty-five high, mounted on twenty-six wheels of iron. These set forward in a dark and tempestuous night, under three discharges of all the artillery in the camp; and being brought close to the walls, fire was put to them. They burnt four hours with a dreadful blaze, during which time the fight was renewed on both sides with double fury and equal advantage, so that at length a retreat was founded.

d AFTER this it was resolved in a council of war to continue the siege; and a large mount of earth was raised, overlooking the city, mounted with forty pieces of cannon ready to batter it, when in October advice came, that Shoripam Shay had rebelled in Pegu.

e SHORIPAM SHAY was near a-kin to the preceding monarch, slain twelve years before, and about forty-five years of age. He was a religious person, of great understanding, and esteemed a saint. As he was a famous preacher, he made a sermon, in which he set forth the tyranny of the Barmas, and the evils which the kingdom suffered by them, in so moving a manner, that he was taken out of the pulpit, and proclaimed king by the people; who, as a token of sovereignty, gave him the title of Shemíndoo. As soon as this person found himself invested with the regal authority, he cut in pieces 15000 Barmas; and seized on the

^a PINTO, p. 279, & seqq.

^b Ibid. p. 282, & seqq.

(D) In De Faria written Tapuram. See that author's account, vol. ii. p. 135. and vol. iii. p. 357.

(E) This is no forged name; for we meet with it in Louberé's map of Siam, drawn in the country by an European; where it is placed between two branches of the Menam, above four degrees north north-west of the city of Siam, and one degree south-west of Pitsanouluk, called by the Portugueses, Porfelouk.

(F) Although the name of the city be not forged, that of the river may; which he says, is one of the three descending from the lake of Chiammay; a lake which Louberé could never hear of from those who had been at the city of that name.

(G) This was an extravagant route, going above 200 miles beyond Siam to the south-west, instead of taking the direct way thither. but such blunders frequently happen to forgers. Junkalau is doubtless a mistake of the press for Junçalon, as some write it, an island near the coast.

(H) It must rather have been a march of nineteen, or more.

(I) Odia, or Siam, is seated in an island encompassed with walls. How then could the elephants approach them? This discovers that Pinto was not at this siege, as he pretends he was.

treasure. This change was so agreeable to the wishes of the people all over the kingdom, a who thought now the time of their deliverance was come, that, in twenty-three days time, all the strong holds in Pegu fell into Shemíndoo's hands.

The king returns,

On this news, the king immediately broke up the siege of Odia, and in seventeen days got to Martavân. There he was farther informed, that the new king had posted 500,000 men in different places, in order to intercept his passage; and, what foreboded worse, 50,000 of his Pegu troops, in aversion to the Barma yoke, had deserted to his rival. To prevent a greater desertion, after fourteen days stay, he departed from Martavân; and, being arrived in the kingdom, found Shemíndoo waiting for him with 600,000 men, in a great plain two leagues from the city of Pegu^x. According to some authors, the king sent Suarez de Melo before him from Siam, with 200 Portugueses, to suppress the rebellion. Shemíndoo b fled on the approach of this commander, who followed him to the city of Sevádi; but the other, slipping by, got into the city of Pegu, which sided with him. The queen on this fled to the castle, where she was defended by twenty Portugueses, till the king himself arrived with his forces^y. Next day the two armies came to an engagement: in which, after a desperate battle that lasted three hours, Shemíndoo was defeated, with the loss of 300,000 of his forces: so that he escaped with only six horse to the fortress of Battelor, from whence he fled in the night up the river to Sedaa. Of the Barma troops were slain 60,000; among whom were 280 Portugueses.

and defeats
Shemíndoo.

Martavân revolts.

THE next morning after this victory, the king marched to the city, whose inhabitants surrendered, on condition to have their lives and effects. The kingdom being thus brought c again under his subjection, his next movement was to punish the principal persons concerned in the rebellion, whose heads he cut off, and estates confiscated; amounting to ten millions of gold, besides plate and jewels^z. Others say, that, contrary to agreement, he put all to the sword, excepting 12,000 who were within the liberty of Suarez de Melo's house, which was exempted from the slaughter. The plunder was unaccountable; De Melo alone got three millions^a. But these severities did not quench the spirit of rebellion; for in less than three months news was brought that the city of Martavân had revolted; and that the Cbalagomin, or governor, having slain 2000 Barmas, declared for Shemíndoo.

A Shemín
rebels,

THE king, on this advice, gave orders for all the lords of the kingdom to repair to him with their force within fifteen days; and went from his capital at Pegu, with 3000 men, to d a town called Mouchau, there to wait for them. Being informed in this place, that the Shemín, who was governor of Satán, or Zatán, a delightful city, had submitted to Shemíndoo, and also lent him a large sum of gold; he sent for him, with an intention to put him to death. The Shemín, who suspected the king's design, feigned himself sick; and immediately advising with his relations, it was agreed among them, that he had no way to escape the Barma's anger but by killing him. Accordingly they drew together about 600 men; and, assailing a temple, where he was lodged, slew him in his apartment, with the few who happened to be about him. The guards in the court being alarmed with the noise, a fierce combat ensued, in which 800 were slain, most of them Barmas. The Shemín then retreated to a place called Portel; whither those of the country, hearing of the king's death, e whom they mortally hated, resorted to him. When he had assembled about 5000 men, he returned to seek the soldiers whom the king had brought with him to Mouchau; and falling on them, dispersed in several places, slew them all. With the Barmas were slain fourscore out of three hundred Portugueses; who, with their commander Suarez (K), surrendered, and were spared, on condition that, for the future, they should serve the Shemín^b.

and murders
the king.

Usurps the throne.

NINE days after, seeing his forces increase, by the resort of people, to 30,000 men, he caused himself to be proclaimed king. Then retiring to the fortress of Tagálua, for fear of the forces which were on the road to join the murdered king, he endeavoured, with great promises, to raise troops; and, to spirit up the people, declared he would not leave a Barma in all the kingdom. It happened that one of the Barmas, who had been with the late king, f escaped the slaughter; and, swimming over the river, went and informed the Cbaumigrem, who was encamped at Koutasarem with 180,000 men, all Peguers, excepting 30,000 Barmas. The general, though greatly afflicted at this news, yet knowing his safety depended on concealing it, immediately assembled all his commanders; and told them that he had received a letter from the king, with orders to put forces into Kosmín and Dalaa (L): for that he was informed the Shemíndoo intended to possess himself of the province of Danaplu, along the ^x PINTO, p. 284, 286.

^y DE FARIA, Portug. Asia, vol. ii. p. 136.

^z PINTO, p. 285.

^a DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 137. vol. iii. p. 359.

^b PINTO, p. 286, & seqq.

(K) According to others, Suarez, after this disaster, retired to the city of Awa; but returning, in some time, to that of Pegu, was reconciled to this new king. Portug. Asia, vol. ii. p. 137. vol. iii. p. 359.

(L) Cities and ports on the south coast of Pegu, on the river of Negraís.

a rivers Digon and Meydoo (M); as far as Ansedaa. Accordingly he sent detachments to those places, as also to Sbara and Malakou; and thus got rid of the 150,000 Peguers, who, he knew, had they stayed to hear of the king's death, would have put him and his 30,000 Barmas to the sword.

As soon as they were marched, he turned back to the city of Pegu, but three miles distant, and secured the king's treasure, amounting to above thirty millions of gold, besides infinite jewels. He likewise seized all the arms and ammunition. After this he set fire to the magazines, the arsenals, the palace, some of whose apartments were cieled with gold, and 2000 rowing vessels which were on the river. Then destroying all the artillery, he retired, with the wives and children of the Barmas, towards Tangu, his native country, about 160 leagues distant within land, where he arrived in fifteen days. By this expedition he escaped the hands of 120,000 Peguers, who, two days after they had left his camp, hearing that the king had been slain, halted back to seek the 30,000 Barmas; whom they pursued as far as Guaynakoutel, about forty leagues beyond the capital, and then desisted, finding they had passed through that place five days before. On their return, they resolved to join the Shemin of Zatan; who having received them with mighty promises of future favour, repaired forthwith to Pegu, and was there magnificently crowned in Kom-kiay, the principal temple in that city^c.

The Shemin now was in peaceable possession of the kingdom: but, by his acts of tyranny, and squandering the public treasure, he so disobliged his lords, and bred such feuds among them; that many retired to foreign countries, and others went over to Shemin; who, by his preaching and authority, began to make head again in the province of Ansedaa, whither he had fled. The power of this latter increasing, as that of his competitor declined, his army, by degrees, augmented to 60,000 men. With these forces he marched to Meydoo, where he was well received by the people of the country; among whom he stayed four months, to strengthen his forces. Mean time the great James Suarez, who had been governor of the kingdom during the late king's reign, fell a sacrifice on the following occasion.

In the height of his former greatness, passing with a numerous equipage by the door of a rich merchant's house, on the day of his daughter's marriage, the father, to do honour, went out to pay his respects to him, and brought his daughter to do the same. On the bride's presenting him a ring, Suarez, who was lascivious and brutish, rudely pulled the young lady to him, in order to carry her away by force; and killed the bridegroom, with others who came to her rescue. However, he did not enjoy the fruits of his villainy: for the young lady, to prevent falling into such a monster's hands, strangled herself. The father, expecting no justice against the criminal, whilst that prince was upon the throne, shut himself up, and never stirred abroad, till the Shemin of Zatan came to the crown: then appearing among the people, he so lamented his case through the city of Pegu, that above 50,000 of the inhabitants gathered about him, crying out for justice. The Shemin, fearing some worse consequence, caused De Melo to be apprehended, and delivered up to that rabble; who falling upon him with stones, he was in an instant buried under a heap of rubbish. Then withdrawing the body, they tore it in pieces, and delivered them to the boys to drag about the streets. His house was plundered; and as the treasure found therein amounted to not so much by a great deal as was expected, it was believed that he had buried the rest^d.

This was the end of James Suarez de Melo, one of fortune's prodigies, who lost, by one crime, what he had gained by many. Nor did the new king, who gave him up to popular fury, long survive him: for he grew intolerable in his cruelties and oppressions, killing and robbing, indifferently, all who were thought to have had money: so that, in seven months time, he put to death 6000 rich merchants, besides many of the ancient lords of the country, who held their estates by right of inheritance under the crown. These tyrannies rendered him so odious, that most of his followers abandoned him, to join with Shemin; who, by this time, was master of the cities of Digon, Meydoo, Dalaa, and Kowlam (N, with all the country, as far as the borders of Sbarau^e.

Shemin, having now an army of 200,000 men, and 5000 elephants, resolved to go and attack the usurper in the capital. He set forward; and, coming before the city of Pegu, hemmed it in with trenches, fenced with strong palisades. After this he gave several assaults: but finding a much greater resistance than he expected, he proposed a truce, by which he agreed to quit his right to the crown, and raise the siege in twenty days; in case in that time his competitor should send him 1000 bisses of gold, which amount to 500,000 ducats. This was a politic contrivance, in order to gain the capital with less difficulty: for an inter-

^c PINTO, p. 287, & seq. DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 137.

^d PINTO, p. 289, & seq. DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 260.

^e PINTO,

(M) These fall into, or make part of, the river of Negrais. Digon seems to be the same with Dagon; and Meydoo may be what Fitch calls Medun.

(N) Perhaps Koylan, on the river of Negrais, mentioned by Balbi.

course ensuing, in consequence of the truce between the besiegers and the besieged, some a priests, set on by Shemíndoo, exhorted them to relinquish the Shemín of Zatan, and take part with their master; at the same time threatening them with judgments from Kiay Nivánde, the god of battles, in the field of Vitán, in case they offered to lift a hand against the holy Shemíndoo; a submission to whom, they said, was a sure way to health and happiness.

and slain in a jally.

THESE exhortations, joined to the harmonious music which accompanied them, so wrought on the hearts of the besieged, that 60,000 having deserted in a few days, the tyrant thought fit to break off the truce; and, by advice of his officers, to fight Shemíndoo, before he increased more in strength. Pursuant to this advice, he sallied out of the city, with fourscore thousand men, and charged the enemy with great fury. The battle was so fierce, that in half an hour above 40,000 fell on both sides; when Gonzalo Neto, by a fortunate shot with a musket-ball, killed the Shemín. Immediately his forces submitted, and the inhabitants opened the city-gates to the victor, on promise of having their lives and effects. Shemíndoo entered the capital, and was forthwith crowned king. This event happened in February 1551. Gonzalo had 10,000 crowns for that lucky hit; and the eighty Portugueses, his companions, five thousand^f.

Shemíndoo
enthroned.

SHEMÍNDOO was the reverse of his late rival; for he governed with a just but easy rein. He was loved by the people, and admired by strangers, for his virtue. Things continued above a year in this peaceable and happy state, when a new war broke out, which once more overturned the government. The Chaumigrem, who watched at Tángu for an opportunity to reduce the kingdom under the power of the Barmas, understanding by his spies that the strength of the nation was greatly exhausted by the wars; that the principal lords were either slain, or had left the realm; and that, in short, the new king was greatly unprovided of the necessaries proper for his defence, he, with an army of 300,000 men, all strangers (O), excepting 50,000 Barmas, whom he had raised for the purpose, set out from Tangú the ninth of March 1552, and bent his march towards the city of Pegu. The new king, informed of his proceedings, made preparations for his defence, and assembled no fewer than 900,000 troops: but as they were all Peguers, who are of a weakly constitution, this great power was inferior to the enemy in strength. However, Shemíndoo, understanding that the Chaumigrem was arrived at the river Meleytay, about twelve leagues from his capital, he advanced with great diligence, and encamped two leagues from thence, on the river Potareu.^d

Is defeated and flies.

NEXT morning the Chaumigrem forded the river, in spite of the enemy; and the day following the Shemíndoo presented him battle. The van-guards began the fight, and the shock was very fierce. In half an hour the field was covered with dead bodies, and the Peguers began to lose courage. The prince, seeing them give ground, advanced to succour them with 3000 elephants, and drove the Barmas back in their turn. The Chaumigrem, upon this, feigned a retreat; and the king mistaking it for a flight, pursued eagerly, as sure of the victory: but the Barmas, after they had retired about a mile, suddenly faced about, and rushed on their enemies, with horrible cries. Presently both armies engaged afresh, with such fury, that, towards sun-set, 400,000 Peguers being slain, and most of the rest wounded, the king fled. Thus the victory remaining to the Chaumigrem (P), he caused himself to be crowned king of Pegu in the field of battle, in April 1553.^e

A. D. 1553.
5. Chaumigrem crowned.

His army mutiny.

NEXT morning the victors rifled the dead, and got very rich spoil: for it is the custom with these Gentiles to carry with them all their riches when they go to war. After this the new king marched towards the capital, three leagues distant; and encamped in view of it, half a league off, in the plain of Sunday Patir. From thence he sent a Barma commander, with 5000 horse as a guard, to each of the twenty-four gates; and continued five days in the field, without entering the city. This he did, lest the strangers should demand the pillage of it, pursuant to his promise at Tangú. Hereupon the foreign troops mutinied, by the instigation of Christonano Surnento, a brave, but turbulent, Portuguese commander. The king, for more security, retired to a temple, and there fortified himself. Next day assembling the commanders, he told them from the wall, that he had promised them what he could not in conscience grant, as it would be to make the innocent suffer with the guilty: that, however, as it was not fit they should go unrecompensed, he was willing to make them any reasonable satisfaction, and would contribute part out of his own effects. With this the commanders declared themselves content; and it was proposed to leave the matter to arbitrators, three to ^f PINTO, p. 294, & seq.

^e Ibid. p. 296, & seq.

(O) Viz. Mons, Chaleus, Kalaminhams, Sauanis, Pamkrus, and Awaas.

(P) De Faria, who frequently varies from himself, vol. iii. p. 361, following Pinto, calls this prince Chaumigrem: but vol. ii. p. 137, he, from other authors, names him Mandaragri, who, he says, was the king's brother-in-law, and claimed the kingdom in right of his wife. Perhaps the same person is intended by both appellations, that of Mandaragri being the proper name. Pinto, p. 297, mentions a brother of the Chaumigrem, whom he calls the Panonfaray; but, though so full of his explanations on other accounts, does not give the meaning of either of those two denominations.

a be chosen on each side. Of these six, three were to be religious men of Pegu, and three strangers. The first three being agreed upon, the king and mutineers cast lots, to see who should choose two of the three strangers; and the lot falling in favour of his majesty, he chose two Portugueses: one Gonzalo Pacheco, factor for the Lakka; and the other Nuno Fernandez Texeira, a worthy merchant, known formerly to the Chaumigrem.

On this occasion the king wrote to Pacheco; who, on receipt of the letter, immediately repaired to the camp, accompanied with Texeira, and ten other Portugueses. They were received with great honour by the king, who, in his instructions, ordered them to favour the commanders rather than him. The arbitrators met in a tent, with the high-treasurer and two secretaries. After debating near the whole day, it was at length concluded, that the king should pay the foreign troops, over and above their arrears, 1000 bisses, or crowns, out of his own treasury; and that, on receiving the same, they should forthwith cross the river, and retire into their respective countries, furnished with victuals for twenty days. Both parties were satisfied with this award; and the king, out of his bounty, gave the officers in general a farther gratuity. In this manner the king got rid of the three mutinous nations, the Chaleus, Meleytes, and Savâdis, whom he would employ no longer. Likewise, to prevent their doing mischief to the open towns in the road, he caused them to march in parties of a thousand men each, one after the other. To his two arbitrators, for their trouble, the king gave ten bisses of gold, with a passport written by himself; whereby the Portugueses were permitted to retire into the Indies, without paying any duty for their merchandizes. This was more acceptable to them than the money: because the preceding king had, for three years before, detained them in the country: where they were treated with much rigour, and often in danger of their lives^b.

Next day the king moved towards the city. He was received at the gate by 6000 priests, of all the twelve sects, who intreated that he would forgive the inhabitants; who, on promising pardon, fell prostrate before him. Then one of the priests set on the king's head a crown of gold, like a mitre, adorned with precious stones. After this the Chaumigrem entered the city, in a kind of triumph, mounted on a large elephant, preceded by all the spoil of elephants and chariots, with the effigies of Shemîndoo, bound with an iron chain, and forty colours trailed on the ground. He was guarded by forty mace-men; the lords and commanders marching on foot, with their swords covered with plates of gold, carried on their shoulders. The train was closed by 3000 war elephants, with their castles in various forms, and followed by multitudes of people.

The first thing which the new king did was to get possession of the principal cities and strong-holds, which still held out for Shemîndoo, as not knowing yet of his defeat. To this purpose he wrote very kind letters to the inhabitants, promising favours, as well as forgiveness, and an exemption from taxes. This method having had the desired effect, he dispatched horsemen in quest of Shemîndoo, who was discovered at Faulau, a place near the city of Potem, on the frontiers of Arrakan. He was carried to court by a man, to whom the king gave a pension of 30,000 ducats. He was brought into the presence chain'd; and, falling prostrate, received several taunting expressions from the conqueror, without speaking: at last he spoke, lamenting his condition, and then desired some water to drink. The king, to afflict him more, ordered it to be given to him by his daughter. The miserable Shemîndoo, seeing his beloved child now a slave, who, but a little before, was to have been married to the prince of Nautir, the king of Ava's son, fell into a swoon; while the princess, by her words and behaviour, shewed the utmost distress. This moving scene having drawn tears from some of the Pegu lords, who were formerly of Shemîndoo's party, the king ordered their heads to be cut off; saying, "that, since they had such great affection for him, they might go before," and prepare him a lodging." Not content with this cruelty, he ordered the princess to be killed, in the arms of her father; who was then carried to a close prison^c.

Next morning the Shemîndoo was led, amidst a numerous guard, through all the principal streets of Pegu, mounted on a wretched horse; with the executioner on the crupper behind, holding him up under both arms. He was very poorly drest; and on his head they had placed a crown of straw, garnished with mussel-shells, fastened with blue ribbons; and, to the iron collar which he had about his neck, were tied a parcel of onions. For all he looked like the picture of death, he discovered majesty in his face, accompanied with much sweetness. When he came to the place where Pacheco was on guard, with 100 other Portugueses, one of them reviled him; saying, he intended to sup on a piece of his flesh, and invite two dogs to partake with him. The prince, moved at this insult, reproved him with a severe countenance: on which Pacheco commanded the fellow to be silent. The Shemîndoo was so well pleased with this action, that he wished to live only one hour longer, that he might embrace so excellent a faill as the Portugueses professed (Q). The executioner was so offended hereat, that he hit the unfortunate patient in the face, and made his nose bleed. Being come to the fatal place, and mounted, scarce alive, on a high scaffold, the Cbirka of justice read his sentence: and then and executed. making a sign with his hand, the executioner severed his head from the body at one stroke. The head being held up for the people to view it, the corpse was cut into eight parts, and the bowels set apart. They were all covered with a yellow cloth, which is the mourning colour, and left till evening, in order to be view'd; for the king had caused this public execution to be done, that all doubt might be taken away of the Shemindoo's death.

^b PINTO, p. 297, & seq.^c Ibid. p. 300, & seq.

Farce acted, MULTITUDES flocked to the place, both to see the sight, and receive the Asbiperan, or plenary indulgence, given by the priests on that occasion. At three o'clock a bell was heard to toll five times. On this signal, twelve men in black robes, spotted with blood, having b their faces covered, and silver maces on their shoulders, came out of a house near the scaffold, followed by twelve priests; after whom came the Shemin Pokasser, the king's uncle, who at his funeral. seemed near 100 years of age, and, in the name of his nephew (R), with much ceremony, "asked forgiveness of the divided members for what had been done; offered to yield up the kingdom to him, to do him homage for it, and govern it as his deputy." To this one of the priests, speaking in the person of the deceased, answered, "that since the king confessed his fault, he forgave him; and also granted him power to govern in his stead, according to the rules of justice." This farce being over, the priests removed the carcase to a place below, and burnt it in a fire made of odoriferous wood, offering sacrifices of sheep and other creatures. The ashes of Shemindoo were put into a silver urn, and buried in a sumptuous c tomb, within a chapel gilt all over^k.

ACCORDING to some authors, Shemindoo, after his defeat, fled to the mountains; where wandering about, he married the daughter of an ordinary peasant: the husband discovered himself to his wife, and the wife revealed the secret to her father; who, for lucre of the great rewards which were promised to such as should deliver him up, betrayed his son-in-law to the king^l.

Chaumi-grem's history, HOWEVER that be, it is certain that the Chaumigrem, or, if our readers will, Mandaragri, the second Barma king, by the death of the Shemindoo, became master of all (S) Pegu, without a competitor. But although he lived a long time, and was the mightiest of all the princes who reigned in that country, yet we meet with scarce any thing in travellers relating to his exploits. d Cæsar Frederic, who was at his court in the year 1567, describes his power and magnificence; yet takes little notice of the transactions of his reign, nor mentions so much as his name. No more do Gaspar Balbi and Ralph Fitch, who were at Pegu the year in which he died. So that our readers must be content with a bare enumeration of his conquests, instead of a history of them, which we should have been greatly pleased to present them with.

WE are told that Chaumigrem, not satisfied with the people of his capital Pegu, built, not far from it, another great and strong city (T). After this, he raised an army of 1,600,000 men; with which power he over-ran many neighbouring kingdoms. But his conquests were interrupted by another rebellion, which broke out at Pegu, and called him home to suppress e it. On this occasion the queen was forced to fly to the castle, chiefly relying on thirty-nine Portugueses, who defended her till his majesty returned, and vanquished the rebels^m.

Many kingdoms ACCORDING to De Faria y Sousa, this prince so far enlarged his dominions by conquests, that they extended to China and Tartary; and was sovereign of twenty-four great kingdoms, besides eighty princes, not inferior to kings; whereby Pegu became the most powerful monarchy in Asia, excepting that of *China*ⁿ. But of all those mighty conquests, this author mentions no more than that of Siam (U). Another author reduces the number of the conquered kingdoms to twelve, which were as follow: first, Kavelam, from whence came the rubies and sapphires. Second, the kingdom of Ava^o, containing mines of Cyprian brass, lead, f and silver; the conquest of which the late murdered king his father-in-law had resolved on, but did not live to achieve; and which, we are told, was the ancient dominion of the Barma

^k PINTO, p. 302, & seq.
^l DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 137.

^o PIMENTA, ap. Purch. vol. ii. p. 1745.

^m Ibid. p. 137.

ⁿ Ibid. vol. iii.

(Q) If Pinto had told no lies but such as these, he might be excused; since very grave lay-travellers, as well as missionaries, never scruple such pious falsehoods, which they think do service to their religion.

(R) Who is called Oretana Chaumigrem, prince of Savâdi and Tangau.

(S) This, perhaps, was the new city of Pegu, where the king and nobility afterwards resided.

(T) This, doubtless, is to be understood of the new city of Pegu, on the other side of the river, opposite to the old. But it is probable that it was built, not before this king began his conquests, but rather in the midst of them: for it was finished while Cæsar Frederic was at Pegu, in 1567, about the time when the king returned from the war of Siam.

(U) 'Tis true he also mentions that of Martawân; but then it is the same conquest described by Pinto, and made in 1544 from Chau-baicha; whereby it appears, that De Faria has ascribed to the third Barma king of Pegu, the act, both of the first and second kings of the same race.

a monarchs^p. Thirdly, the kingdom of Bakkan (X), where there are many gold mines. Fourth, the kingdom of Tangram, which abounds with lead and lak. Fifth, the kingdom of Prom (Y), whose commodities are the same with those of the former. Sixth, Jangoma: this kingdom is stored with copper, musk, pepper, silk, gold, and silver^q. It lies to the north of Siam, and the capital of it is Jamabay, which seems to be the same with Chiamay, situated on the Menam, the river which runs through the country of Siam^r. Seventh, the kingdom of Lawran, which produces benjamin enough to load ships with it. The eighth and ninth are the kingdoms of Trukon (Z), from whence come the China wares. The tenth and eleventh are the kingdoms of Kablan, which, we are told, lie near Ava, towards China (A), and abound with precious stones. The twelfth and last kingdom, conquered by Chamigrem was Siam^s? We are sensible that this is not a complete enumeration of the countries conquered by this prince; for that of Laos, one of the most considerable of all, is omitted. The conquest of this great kingdom was made by the Bermas, in the year 1555 (B). We have this information from Gaspar de Cruz; by which it appears, that he had finished his expeditions to the north-east and east, if not all his northern conquests, at that juncture. This is all the account we meet with of his wars, excepting that of Siam, which De Faria speaks of, but ascribes to Pranjinoko, this king's successor, and the last of the Brama race in Pegu^t.

Authors disagree with regard to some particulars relating to this expedition: but we happen to have a traveller who was in Pegu at the very time, from whom we shall give our readers the account, and from whom, for the general, the rest have copied theirs. According to Cæsar Frederic, the king of Pegu, for the reduction of the empire of Siam, raised an army of 1,400,000 men. With this prodigious force he began his march by land, and was four months in his way to the capital city of the same name. He lay one-and-twenty months before the place, in which time he lost a great number of men: for, six months after his departure, a reinforcement was sent him of 500,000 men, to supply the place of those who were killed in the first attacks. Neither, after all, had the city been taken, but for treachery; one of the gates having been set open in the night, through which the king, with great difficulty, forced his way. This happened in the year 1567. When the emperor found he was betrayed, and that his enemy was master of his capital, he poisoned himself. His wives and children, friends and noblemen, who were not slain in the first heat, were all carried captives to Pegu, in triumph, by the conqueror. It was an agreeable sight, saith our author, to behold the elephants marching home in a square, laden some with gold, silver, and jewels; others with noblemen and women, who were taken with the spoil^u. Balbi has borrowed his account^x of this from Frederic; Fitch, Mandelslo, and others, from Balbi.

DE FARIA relates this transaction from other authors, with some variation. According to him, the king of Pegu, after obtaining a single victory over the Siameses, reduced the country under his dominion. He likewise took the king and his two sons prisoners; called, by reason of their different colours, one the black (C), the other the white. However, the two kings coming afterwards to an accommodation, the Chamigrem left him of Siam in possession of his kingdom, on condition that he should pay him a yearly tribute; and carried with him to Pegu his two sons, as hostages, for performance of the treaty. On his return to the capital he entered the city in triumph, preceded by a great number of waggons, loaded with images, and inestimable booty. These were followed by two thousand elephants, richly adorned; and, after them, the conqueror marched in a chariot drawn by the captive princes and lords, having with him the queens of Siam, loaded with jewels, lying at his feet. Last of all came his victorious troops^y.

NEITHER Cæsar Frederic nor De Faria tell us the occasion of this war: but Linschoten informs us, that it was undertaken on account of a white elephant, which the king of that country had in his possession. The Pegu monarch, who held that animal to be in its nature holy, and even made his supplications to it, sent an ambassador to intreat it of the Siamese, offering to pay for it whatever price he should demand (D). As the king of Siam refused, on ubi supr.

^p DE FARIA.

voyag. p. 110.

^q PIMENTA, ubi supr.

^r DA CRUZ, ap. Purch. vol. iii. p. 168.

^s DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 118.

^t See our account of Jangoma hereafter.

^u FREDERIC, ap. Hakl. vol. ii. p. 229.

^x PIMENTA,

^y BALBI

(X) The city of Bakan, seventy or eighty miles to the south of Ava, on the east side of the river Ava, seems to have been the capital of this kingdom.

(Y) The capital seems to have been the city Prom, on the river of Ava, about eighty miles south of Bakan.

(Z) This, perhaps, is the kingdom of Turks, bordering on China, mentioned by De Faria, Portug. Asia, vol. ii. p. 11.

(A) This is a very crude way of expressing the situation of Kallan, or K. plan, which seems to be the same with the first kingdom Kawelam. If this latter be not rather a mistake for Kamulau, whose king Nofinga, we are told, was defeated and killed by De Brito, about 1604. Kaplan, famous for rubies, lies between the province of Sirian, and the city of Pegu, as hath been mentioned in the geography.

(B) So it is expressed in words, in the text of Purchas: but in the margin we find the year 1559 in figures; and this last seems the more likely date of the two.

(C) He is called Rajah apri, which signifies not the black, but the fery king.

(D) Mandelslo, who places this war in the same year with Linschoten, says the king of Siam had two white elephants, and that he of Pegu sent to purchase one of them only. Mandelslo, travels, ap. Olear. p. 127.

any terms, to part with the elephant, which he no less esteemed than he of Pegu; the latter thereupon resolving to obtain by force what he could not procure either through intreaties or money, entered Siam with a most numerous army, and reduced it to a state of dependance, as hath been before-mentioned; carrying off the white elephant, as a trophy of his victory^a. That this was the cause of the war, is, in effect, confirmed by Frederic, as well as others; who agree, that, from the time of this expedition, the king of Pegu assumed the title of king of the white elephant, and would suffer none of his neighbours to keep any of that kind.

for a white elephant.

MENDEZ PINTO, after setting forth the manner in which the Chaumigrem obtained the crown of Pegu, in taking leave of him, just mentions an invasion which he made in Siam; without telling us either the success of it, farther than that it cost his nation 280 Portugueses, or the year in which it was performed. He speaks, indeed, of this war, as the renewal of that undertaken by the first Barma king of Pegu, and as if commenced presently after this second Barma ascended the throne: but from the number of forces, which he says were the greatest ever brought into the field by an Indian prince, we take it to be the same war with that spoken of by Frederic: for his army consisted of 1,700,000 men, and 10,000 elephants, whereof 9000 were for carriage, and the rest for battle^a. Add to this, that Balbi relates many Portugueses were brought prisoners to Pegu, who were not set at liberty till the reign of this king's successor. 'Tis true, Pinto returned to Lisbon in 1558, and therefore may be thought to speak of a war undertaken while he was in the Indies: but as that author did not print his voyages till several years after, it is probable what he has inserted, relating to this expedition, was done from information received in Portugal.

Expedition against Arra-kan.

WHETHER the conquest of Siam was the last this monarch effected, we know not: but, in 1581, we find he attempted that of Arrakan, the only kingdom bordering on Pegu which remained unsubdued. For this expedition he fitted out 1300 sail of barks, and sent them under the conduct of the prince his son. In their way they met with two Portuguese galleons, commanded by Gonsalo vax de Camoens; and the prince of Pegu, being desirous to take them, sent sixteen of his best sailors to attack them. After a sharp engagement, wherein three ships were disabled, and eighteen cannon taken, with some prisoners, the Portugueses, seeing all that multitude bear down upon them, retreated into the port of Arrakan; and thus frustrated the intended invasion, as hath been already mentioned in the history of Arrakan^b.

This is all of moment which we meet with in authors, relating to the conquests of this great prince, whom hitherto we have beheld in a state of glory. Let us now view him in a contemptible light, a slave and dupe to the most abject superstition.

Ape's tooth worshipped,

In the year 1560, Don Constantine de Braganza, viceroy of Goa, having taken from its king the city of Jafana-patan, in the island of Seylan, commonly called Ceylon, and Zeylon, found there an idol, which was adored through all the neighbouring coasts of Asia, whose inhabitants flocked thither daily in pilgrimage: and so highly esteemed by the princes of those parts, particularly the king of Pegu, that he every year sent ambassadors with rich presents, to procure a print of it. This so much worshipped relick was nothing (E), says our author, but the tooth of a white monkey^c. That, doubtless, was the fact: however, it was supposed, by its adorers, to have belonged to one of their subaltern deities, the famous Anamonte, or Hanimant; who, in the form of an ape, did so much service in Seylan for the god Wishnu, and is his Wabannam, or war-horse^d.

taken and burnt.

HOWEVER that be, the king of Pegu, as soon as he heard that the viceroy had the tooth in his possession, sent to offer him 300,000 ducats for it; and it was not doubted but his zeal would have extended as far as a million, in case the bargain had been well driven. Most of the Portugueses were for taking the money: but it being resolved, in a meeting of the chief clergy and laity, that it should not be sold; Don Constantine, in the presence of them all, ordered it to be beaten to dust in a mortar, and then thrown into the fire. But this act, which at that time seemed to be applauded by all men, was, not long after, condemned and railed at, as being the occasion of propagating, instead of suppressing, this tooth idolatry^e.

A counterfeit tooth.
A. D. 1564.

FOR in the year 1564, the king of Pegu being told by astrologers that he was to marry a daughter of the king of Kolumbo, in the island of Seylan, or Ceylon, sent to demand her. Those astrologers, it seems, were no conjurers; for the king of Kolumbo had no daughter. But as his chamberlain had one, whom the king esteemed as his own, they agreed to impose her on the Pegu monarch, as if she was really the king of Kolumbo's. The chamberlain, in order farther to oblige the Barma king, with a view by his assistance to shake off the Portuguese yoke, gave an ape's tooth in dowry with the bride, imposed on him; pretending that it was the same which the Portuguese had taken at Jafana-patan, and burnt at Goa. The ambassadors easily

^a LINSCHOT, voy. Ind. p. 30.
^c Ibid. p. 207, & seq.

^d PINTO, voy. p. 305, & seq.
^e See the history of India.

^b DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 370.
^e DE FARIA, vol. ii. p. 208.

(E) Why is not a white monkey's tooth as rational an object to worship as a saint's bone, the hair of a beard, a bit of rotten wood, or a white wafer, adored by our author and those of his communion? But prople, blinded with prejudice, are apt to ridicule the superstitions of others, altho' they commit much greater themselves.

a giving credit to what they desired, took the bride and tooth away, keeping it as a great secret from the Portugueses. On their arrival in Pegu, the king received the lady first, and then the spurious relick, with the greatest pomp imaginable. The galley which carried the queen was covered with plates of gold, and rowed by beautiful young women, richly drest, and brought up for this exercise. They were of that kind who live there in separate quarters, by two and two, without the conversation of men.

THE king of Kandia, in the same island, who was informed of this trick put upon the Peguan monarch, through envy, acquainted him therewith; and, at the same time, offered him a true daughter of his own, and the genuine tooth of the ape; affirming that the Kolumbo tooth, and that destroyed by Don Constantine, were both counterfeits. The Barma king, considering that it was as bad for a prince to own himself cheated, as really to be cheated, seemed not to credit the information; and thus the king of Kandia missed his aim. On this occasion our author De Faria makes two reflexions. One, that the Portuguese commanders, through their avarice, exposed that important place, Kolumbo, to be lost, had not the king of Pegu grown cool, upon his discovery of the cheat: the other, that had Don Constantine sold the tooth, as he was advised to do, we should not have heard of two set up to be adored by such numbers of people^f.

BUT to return to actions more worthy of a great prince. This monarch was not only the greatest hero, but the most magnificent among the Pegu kings. With the spoils of other countries he enriched his own, and employed a great part of his acquired wealth in erecting monuments to his future glory. The chief of these was the new city of Pegu, as mentioned before, in which he built a splendid palace, the least part of whose beauty consisted in its paintings and gildings: for the ceilings of some apartments were covered with gold; and others contained statues of gold and silver, some of a monstrous size, of which we have already given a description^g. Some rooms were set round with statues of kings and queens, as big as the life, all of massy gold, and adorned with precious stones of great value^h. He likewise caused 365 Kombalengas to be cast in goldⁱ. These are wedges, in the form of sugar-loaves, each weighing about forty pounds, as hath been already observed in our description of Arrakan^k. Some gold and silver statues were also cast, as large as the life, on occasion of the conquest of Siam; from whence he brought several very fine ones, especially of cows, in copper, which were erected before the chapels or halls which contained the other statues^l. He had several magnificent chariots, or triumphal cars, on which no ornaments were wanting, which painting, carving, and plating with gold, could bestow upon them^m. The like may be said of his pleasure-barges; among which one excelled, for beauty and costliness, any thing of the kind which ever had been made beforeⁿ. In short, this monarch raised the power and wealth of Pegu to a surprising pitch: but those advantages, which continued during his whole reign, did not long survive him.

CHAUMIGREM, or Mandaragri, died in the year 1583, a little before Balbi landed in Pegu, which was about the middle of September^o; after he had reigned thirty years, reckoning from the death of Shemindoo, in 1553. He reigned thirty-seven years, according to Pimenta, who places the beginning of his reign in 1546^p. This remark, though perhaps a little faulty, proves, however, that the king, whose reign we have been treating of, and who was the father of him who possessed the throne in the times of Balbi and Pimenta, was the same who succeeded Shemindoo.

THIS prince, according to Cæsar Frederic, had only one wife, but above 200 concubines, by whom he was reported to have had ninety children. However, we meet with no account of any of them, either from him or other authors, excepting the son who succeeded to the crown^q.

THE king being dead, he was succeeded, about the middle of the year 1583, by his son, who was then fifty years of age^r. De Faria calls him Pranjinoko; but makes him the successor of Shemindoo; thus confounding the son with the father: and accordingly ascribes to him several actions, which do not belong to his reign. Pegu was in the most flourishing condition imaginable, famous for its wealth, and dreaded for its power, when this prince ascended the throne: but by his tyranny and obstinacy, he, by degrees, lost all which his father had gained, and at length brought both himself and the empire to destruction^s.

HE had been scarce two months in possession of the crown, when he set out from his capital with all his forces, against his uncle the king of Ava, who was his tributary. This prince, being the oldest among those of the blood, imagined that he only had a right to the empire;

^f DE FARIA, p. 68 & 251.

^g See before, p. 240. & seq. also CÆS. FREDERIC ap. HAKL. vol. ii. p. 236.

^h DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 119.

ⁱ PIMENT. ap. Purch. trav. vol. ii. p. 1746.

^k See before, p. 227.

^l See BALBI viagg. p. 110.

^m FREDERIC ap. HAKL. vol. ii. p. 236.

ⁿ BALBI, p. 120, & seq.

^o BALBI, p. 118. See also before, p. 250.

^p BALBI, p. 100.

^q PIMENT. ap. Purch. vol.

ii. p. 1746.

^r FREDERIC ap. eund. ibid. p. 1716.

^s BALBI viagg. p. 109.

^t DE FARIA, vol. iii.

p. 361.

and therefore, when Pranjinoko ascended the throne, he neither came to pay him homage, as the other kings and dukes had done, nor sent the usual present of jewels. He went so far as to prohibit his merchants from carrying precious stones into Pegu, so that a stop was put to the jewel trade : and, in short, secretly endeavoured to engage the Peguan nobility in a conspiracy to dethrone their sovereign, and set himself on the throne. The king of Pegu dissimulated his resentment for a time ; and as his father had, at his death, enjoined him to preserve a good understanding with his uncle, he resolved to try what could be done by gentle methods.

corrupts the nobles.

WITH this view he sent an officer of his court to the king of Ava, to know the reason why, for three years before, he had not come to pay him homage ; and also why he suffered no jewels to be carried to Pegu. The king of Ava, relying on the assistance of the Peguan grandees, instead of returning his nephew an answer, put to death his envoy ; and the king of Pegu, thinking all obligations of affinity were cancelled by so atrocious an affront, immediately declared war against him. But as he knew that he was not well beloved by his subjects, and that the greater part of his nobles, who were in his uncle's interest, ought not to be trusted by him, he resolved to get rid of them, before he took the field ^c.

Four thousand burnt at once.

To compass this design with least suspicion, he sent for the chief of them, under pretence of consulting them about affairs of state ; and as they arrived, had them handcuffed and imprisoned. When they had been all secured, he ordered their wives and children to be seized, not excepting women with child, and sucking infants. Next morning he caused a large scaffold to be built, a great height from the ground, on which the prisoners, to the number of 4000 (A) great and small, being mounted, were all burnt alive. To strike the greater terror by this dreadful execution, the inhabitants, both of the old and new city of Pegu, were, by proclamation, commanded to attend ; among whom was our author Balbi, who beheld this tragedy with the greatest horror. Of all those who had been seized, none but a scrivener was pardoned ; but the reprieve came so late, that the flames had already caught his legs, and disabled them ^d.

The king
marches

As soon as the execution was over, the king sent for all the other commanders into his presence, and warned them, from the example which they had seen made of traitors, to be loyal ; and also to assemble, without delay, such a body of forces as might assure him of the victory. This speech had so good an effect, that in a few days they collected from the two cities upwards of 300,000 men, and encamped without the walls. It was thought, as soon as the king's army had taken the field, that his uncle of Ava would come and submit himself, in case the soldiers did not mutiny in his favour. Nothing of this kind happened : and ten days after, the king appeared on a white elephant, all covered with gold and jewels. He took the field with great resolution ; girt with a sword sent him by Don Lewis de Taide, viceroy of Goa, the guard whereof was richly gilt ^e.

against Ava.

HE left, as regent in the capital during his absence, prince Maupa Rajah, his eldest son, with the great Barma (B), and then set forward, the beginning of April, at the head of his troops. As all believed he would have but bad success, and most people wish'd it him, every day brought some ill news from the army. At length the king fell ill of the small-pox, which is looked on as pestilential in Pegu. However he had the good luck to escape that danger : and as soon as he recovered, attacked his competitor. While the armies were fiercely engaged, the two kings met, and fought hand to hand (C), first with muskets, then with darts, and at last with their swords. The combat had continued doubtful a considerable time, when the Pegu elephant happened to break his right tooth in attacking that of Ava. This beast, enraged with pain, rushed on his antagonists a second time with such advantage to the king of Pegu, as gave him an opportunity to kill his uncle ; who did not fall altogether unrevenged : for he wounded his nephew, though but slightly, in the arm ; and at the same time the elephant of the latter dropped down dead under him ; but he immediately got on the back of his uncle's : and as soon as the forces of Ava perceived their king was slain, they instantly left off fighting, and submitted to the king of Pegu ; who, praising their courage, pardoned their fault. It was reckoned that 200,000 of his forces were slain, and not many less of the Avan army.

Kills his uncle.

Ava city
razed.

AFTER this victory, he sent a body of troops to the city of Ava, with orders to raze it to the ground, and make the inhabitants prisoners. This was done accordingly : and because he ^c BALBI viagg. p. 105 & 112.

PIMENTA ap. Purch. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 746.

^d Ibid.

^e Ibid. p. 108, 112.

^f Ibid. p. 112, 114.

(A) Pimenta writes, that only forty noblemen were put to death on this occasion, however, with their wives, children, friends and families. He adds, that all who fled out of the fire were cut to pieces : but there could be no flying from a scaffold. See Purchas's pilgrims, vol. ii. p. 1746.

(B) By the great Barma is to be understood the chief general of his army.

(C) Pimenta says, that the king of Pegu chose this way of single combat to decide the controversy, because he found his cruelty to the suspected lords lost him the affections of his subjects.

^a was not able to discover the great treasure belonging to the deceased king, he banished them to the woods. The queen, as the king of Pegu's sister, was allowed a palace to live in, with a numerous attendance; but was obliged to confine herself to its limits, without ever stirring abroad. Six days after the battle, which was fought the fourteenth of July (D), the king returned unexpectedly to his capital, and found the city without the guards which he had ordered to be kept there: but, at the request of the prince his son, the fault was pardoned, and a stop put to farther executions.

WHILE he was on the above-mentioned expedition, the son (E) of the emperor of Silon (or Invaser Siam), under pretence of coming to his assistance (F), arrived at the old city of Pegu, with thirty war elephants and 800 horsemen. The great Barma directed him to follow the king ^b towards Ava; but instead of taking that route, he returned home. The king of Siam pretending to take offence that the Barma general, whom he called a slave, should presume to give an answer to the prince his son, sent Pranjinoko word, that he would no longer acknowledge him as his superior. Hereupon the Pegu monarch sent a powerful army to invade Siam, under the command of the great Barma (G): but after losing a great number of men before the capital, that general was forced to retire, with this answer from the king of Siam; that, if Pranjinoko had come in person, he would have paid him his compliments; but would not demean himself to submit to his inferior. This being reported to the king of Pegu, he said, it was his will and pleasure, that the least of his slaves should have authority over the prince who was his subject ^g.

^c HOWEVER, nothing farther was done against Siam while our author Balbi stayed in the country, which he left in February 1586. But the next year, when Fitch was there, the king himself made an expedition into Siam, with an army of 300,000 men, and 3000 elephants, besides his guards, which were 30,000 ^h. The success of this enterprise is not mentioned by that author, who seems to have left Pegu before his majesty returned: but we learn the circumstances of it from Pimenta. According to this author, the king arrived with his army before the city of Siam towards the beginning of the year (H); and was amused with offers of submission, in order to protract the time till March; when the river of Siam overflowing its banks, like the Nile, soon laid the enemy's camp under water: so that, out of all that multitude, scarce 70,000 returned to Martavân, and that without either horses or elephants.

^d THE king of Pegu, having made another expedition into Siam, no more successful than the former, sent thither his brother the king of Jangama, to try what he could do ⁱ. But he was defeated by the black prince, the king of Siam's eldest son, and 200,000 of his forces cut to pieces, with a great number of elephants and horse, besides what were taken ^k. It hath been already mentioned, that when Chaumigrem conquered Siam, in 1567, he carried with him to Pegu the king's two sons, who were educated at his court. Some years after he gave them leave to return to Siam, to visit their father, where they stayed, whether with or without the king of Pegu's consent, does not appear from history. The eldest, called Râjab Api, or the fiery prince, and by the Portugueses, the black prince, did great service against the enemy in their repeated invasions. The second was named the white prince, and was king of Siam after ^e the death of his brother.

PRANJINOKO, rather provoked than discouraged by these defeats, sends his son Maupa ^l Râjab, who was king of Martavân, with a formidable army, which committed great devastations in the country of Siam, through which it marched; but the prince, after losing half his forces, was obliged to return, without reducing the king to obedience. The Pegu monarch, resolved to make a last effort, raises an army of 1,700,000 men, and once more gives the command of them to his son Maupa Râjab, with the title of king of Siam. At the report of this mighty power all Siam trembled, excepting the black prince, now king, who met the enemy and gave them battle. At length the two kings, encountering on their elephants, fought, and Maupa Râjab was cast dead to the ground. At this sight his men fled, and the Siamites pursued them for a month, in which time they destroyed the greater part of that vast army ^m. This happened about the year 1590. Balbi, who saw and spoke to this prince, says, he was large of stature, and brown, like the king his father; but very courteous and obliging. He often dissuaded him from acts of cruelty; and, while our author was there, saved the old city from ⁿ destruction:

^g BALBI, ibid. & PIMENTA, ibid.

^h DE FARIA Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 119.

ⁱ FITCH ap. Purch. ibid. p. 1738.

^j Id. ibid. & PIMENTA ubi sup.

^k PIMENTA, ubi sup.

(D) It is said that the war began in a place called Mekkao: but it could not be the fortress twelve miles from Pegu.

(E) This possibly was Râjab Api, mentioned hereafter.

(F) Pimenta says, that the king of Siam, with an army, marched into Pegu, as far as a town called Satan, giving out that he came to assist his lord the king.

(G) This is the same, perhaps, whom De Faria calls Banna, the king's chief favourite. Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 119.

(H) Whether 1587 or 88, we cannot determine. Pimenta says, his army amounted to 900,000 men: whence it may be judged, that all the accounts of these great armies are exaggerated.

destruction : an astrologer having told the king, that, if he was desirous to reduce Siam, he should burn another city, as his father had done before.

The king's tyranny.

PRANJINOKO, enraged at the death of this prince (I), made great preparations for three years together ; designing to carry with him to the wars all the inhabitants of Pegu, who were able to bear arms. The people, terrified to be thus dragged to the slaughter, after suffering so much already by former expeditions, abandoned themselves to despair ; and to avoid this oppression, some became Talapoys, or friars, others fled to woods and deserts, and many sold themselves for slaves. Hereupon the king caused his uncle Shimibogo to search the public records, and press one half of the people for his armies. He likewise ordained, by proclamation, that all who had made themselves Talapoys, should quit that profession, and return to a secular state ; that the young men should be compelled to serve in the wars, and the old banished into the country of Barmas : but he afterwards exchanged them away for horses. He commanded likewise, that all the Peguers should be branded in the right hand, that so every man's name, country, and condition, might be known.

The Peguers
rebel.

in several provinces.

A. D. 1594.

The prince rebels.

Pegu besieged.

A. D. 1596.

Tangu rebels.

Dratful famine.

THE Peguers, provoked to see themselves thus opprobriously treated, began to rebel. The citizens of Kofmi, or Kofmin, first set up a king to oppose this tyranny. Against them Pranjinoko sent an army, which destroyed all the country, and brought away many prisoners, whom he caused to be burned. Then, continuing the war upon them, they who had fled to the woods were forced by famine to yield to his mercy ; which was such, that he put them all to death with exquisite torments. The next act of his fury was against the kingdom of Ava : for he commanded his son (K), who was governor thereof, to bring all the inhabitants of that province into the kingdom of Pegu, which was then so destitute of people. The son obeyed, and transplanted the Avans : but, the air not agreeing with their constitutions, they became afflicted with boils, and several other diseases ; which also caught the natives, many of whom, to avoid the pain, threw themselves into the river. Mean time some of the Peguers had, by the help of the Siamites, gotten the castle of Murmulan (L) into their possession. The king, on this advice, sent thither forces, which besieged that fortress for a whole year together : but the Siamese troops, coming on them unexpectedly, defeated his army, with great slaughter of men, horses, and elephants ; many were drowned, and not a few taken prisoners. That part of the country being thus reduced under the enemies power, many Peguan lords fled to them, whose wives, children, and families, Pranjinoko, with his usual cruelty, utterly destroyed with fire and sword (M). So that the whole tract, from the city of Pegu to Martaván and Murmulan, became a wilderness.

WHILST the siege of that place was going on, he sent for his son (N), the viceroy of Prom ; who imagined it was to be declared his successor, in prejudice to his elder brother, the prince of Ava : but when he found it was to go to the siege of Murmulan, he would fain have avoided it ; whereat his father, being angry, ordered him to salute his brother, and be gone. The prince of Prom, instead of obeying the king's command, returned in his ships to Prom, and there rebelled. The king of Siam, taking advantage of these distractions, invades Pegu, and lays siege to the capital, in which were then numbered 150,000 Peguers, Barmas, and others, with three thousand pieces of cannon, one thousand of them brads. The siege continued from January to April 1596, when by the assistance of sixty Portugueses and twenty Turks, joined to a report that more of the former were advancing thither through Kamboja, the king of Siam raised the siege^m, with the loss of 100,000 menⁿ. But famine succeeded, with a worse calamity ; which made not only the Lanjangs and Siamese soldiers leave the city, but also the Peguers, Barmas, and even the king of Tangu : in effect, all withdrew, excepting a few from this last country.

PRANJINOKO, thus deserted, sent his commands to the king, or viceroy, of Tangu, to gather in the harvest, then ripe, and embark it, with all the inhabitants, for Pegu. The viceroy of Tangu answers, that he would ship one half of each ; and that either he, or his son, would set out along with them. The king, enraged to have his orders disputed, dispatches four principal lords to fetch him, and the provisions, by force : but the viceroy, instead of submitting to his sovereign's authority, puts to death these commissioners ; and, having seized the ships, with the soldiers on board, by proclamation prohibits all intercourse with Pegu, or any aid to be sent thither. By this means the famine increased to such a degree in the city, that the people killed and ate each other. Man's flesh was sold in the public shambles : parents ⁿ DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 120.

^m PIMENTA, ubi supra, p. 1747.

(I) De Faria says, the king, on this occasion, turned his fury against his people, and some days burned above ten thousand ; throwing so many into the river, as stopp'd the passage even of boats.

(K) His name was Naylu, according to Balbi, p. 120.

(L) A frontier place towards Siam, to the south or south-east of Martaván.

(M) The date in the margin is given by conjecture here, and in some other places.

(N) Called Naymor by Balbi, p. 120.

a abstained not from their children, and children devoured their parents. The stronger preyed on the weaker; neither could their being nothing but skin and bones protect them from the teeth of others, who opened their bellies to feast on their bowels, and sucked out their brains. Nor were they men only who did these cruel butcheries to satisfy their hunger; but the very women went about the streets with knives, looking out for such as were not able to resist them. At length the king caused the people in the city to be numbered; and finding that there were amongst them 7000 Siameses, he caused them all to be slain, and the provision divided among the rest, who did not amount to above 30,000 in all, reckoning women and children.

b AFTER the king of Prom had stood out in rebellion for three years, he sent to submit himself to his father, and promised to bring the inhabitants of that city to the capital of Pegu. The prince joined. A. D. 1597. Upon this, the king pardoned and sent him presents: but the chief minister of the prince, who had been the cause of his disobedience, apprehending that his head would atone for the crime; poisoned him, and assumed the government. Seven days after he was killed by the grandees; and they, aspiring to the same dignity one after another, so wasted the people by civil war, that in two months time, out of 50,000 men, scarce fifty remained; who, repairing by water to Pegu, left Prom for an habitation to wild beasts. The kingdom was thus almost exhausted of people; all destroyed by the wars and famine, excepting such as fled to the neighbouring countries, amounting to the number of about 240,000 people; viz. in the kingdom of Jangoma, 120,000, partly Peguers, partly Barmas; in Orakan (or Arrakan), 20,000; in Siam, and the countries beyond, 100,000.

c WHILE the kingdom was in these confusions, the Talipoys, who hated Pranjinoko for his tyranny, counselled his brother, the king, or viceroy, of Jangoma, to usurp the throne; which he refused, pretending his oath of allegiance. They replied, that, the king being deposed, no oath withheld him from taking the sceptre, provided he placed his brother in the vahat, or golden throne, there to be adored as a god. The Regulo's scruples being effectually removed by this argument; he afterwards found out two others himself, no less cogent, which convinced him that he was the lawful heir to the crown, and had a better right than his brother. The first, because his brother was born before his father was king; but he, afterwards: the second, for that his mother was daughter of the old king of Pegu (O), who was then living, and named Naykbimo; whereas his brother's mother was not a king's daughter. d The king of Jangoma was at this time so powerful, that he could bring 350,000 men into the field; and, if occasion required, no fewer than a million.

THE treasures of the Pegu monarch at this time, though so much weakened in his power, were thought to be immense. Among which were the sixty-six kombalengas, and sixty-seven statues of gods, adorned with jewels, made by his father's order: these, however, were hidden in the city, but in what place nobody could tell; and it is said, that he put to death 200 eunuchs, to prevent their making-a discovery. The king's treasures.

THIS was the state of the kingdom of Pegu, reduced to one city, and that almost wholly destroyed, when the Mogo (P) king of Arrakan, in the beginning of the year 1598, came and besieged it: and was soon after joined by the Regulo of Tangu, who had before thrown off his dependance. The king of Pegu, being well provided with artillery, and all kinds of military stores, made, for a while, a brave defence against his enemies. The king of Tangu, finding it would be difficult to reduce the place, so long as Pranjinoko's forces continued firm, endeavoured to corrupt them by rewards; promising life, liberty, and estates, to all who would come over to him. This policy had the desired effect. The first who deserted were the Portugueses and Moors: after them followed a natural son (Q) of the king's, whose head was cut off by order of the besieged monarch's sister, wife to the king of Tangu; saying, that he who was false to his father, could not be true to her. He is besieged. A. D. 1598.

f At length, the distressed king, finding himself no longer able to hold out, took the opportunity, while the king of Arrakan was absent, and delivered up (R) himself and his city into the hands of the king of Tangu: from whom, as his brother-in-law, he expected good quarter; which was promised him: but this promise was not kept. As soon as the king of Tangu was and surrenders. A. D. 1599.

* PIMENTA, ubi supr. & ap. HAIES de reb. Japan. & Indic. p. 747, & seqq.

(O) The relative who, in the original Latin, is in the masculine gender; but we cannot tell how to reconcile it with the foregoing history, unless it be a mistake for the feminine, and is to be referred to mother. For since the king of Pegu, whom, after De Faria, we call Pranjinoko, was the son of Chaumigrem, or Mandaragri, who died in 1583, and reigned at least thirty years; who can this old king be? Possibly he was king of some other country, not of Pegu.

(P) Our author Boucs calls him Mogo, or the Mogo king of Arrakan; but De Faria, Shilimi Shâb. We know that the people of Arrakan are called Mogo, or Moghen; and that the king is styled king of the Mogo.

(Q) It was his eldest son, according to Jarric. Thesaur. Indic. part i. l. 6. c. 31.

(R) In December 1599, according to Jarric; who writes, that the king yielded himself, his wife, and thirteen children, to the king of Tangu, his brother in-law.

possessed of the city and palace, he hastened to the castle of Makao (S), where the treasure was lodged; of which he found so vast a quantity, that six hundred elephants, and as many horses, were scarce sufficient to carry away the gold and jewels only (T): for he made no account of silver and other metals. The king of Arrakan, being informed that he of Tangu had, contrary to his agreement, taken all this treasure for himself, and dismissed the army, without his knowledge, set out with his forces, among whom were the Portugueses, commanded by Philip de Brito (then the richest in India, and in great favour with that prince), in order to invade the country of Tangu.

Miseries of Pegu.
A. D. 1600

OUR author Boues, who in February 1600, accompanied De Brito to Sirian, the chief port in Pegu, was witness, in his passage, of the dreadful devastations caused by the tyranny of that execrable king. It would have affected the hardest heart to behold infinite fruit-trees, with the ruins of gilded temples and stately edifices, lying along the banks of rivers; the roads and fields full of the skulls and bones of wretched Peguers, killed or famished; and their bodies thrown into the streams in such multitudes as to hinder the passage of vessels.

THE king of Arrakan found in the castle of Makao above three millions in silver, besides many excellent pieces of brass ordnance, which the king of Tangu had left behind him; either as being in haste to be gone before the other arrived, or not thinking it worth his while to carry such inconsiderable booty away.

The king slain

WHILE the king of Arrakan, become thus possessed of the crown of Pegu, was employed in conveying the treasure from Makao, the kings of Siam and Jangoma, joining their forces, suddenly invaded the king of Tangu, with design to strip him of the immense spoils which he had so lately brought from Pegu. This advice perplexed the king of Arrakan, who, on so critical an occasion, knew not what course to take^p. He was in this irresolution when Boues wrote; nor does that author (or any other come to our hands) acquaint us what was the issue of their expedition of the two kings into Tangu. In all probability, they did not succeed in their attempt. As to the king of Arrakan, we are told from another quarter, that, after he had become master of Pegu, without any difficulty, he sent ambassadors to the king of Tangu; demanding part of the treasures which he had carried off, with the white elephant, and the king of Pegu's daughter (U). He likewise required, that the said king should either be delivered up to him, or put to death. These demands were complied with by the king of Tangu: who soon after caused the captive monarch to be slain with a pestle, such as they pound their rice with; it not being lawful to shed the blood of those Asiatic princes^q.

By his sister's order.

THIS is the account given of his death by Floris; but De Faria relates the occasion of it somewhat differently. According to this author, the king of Tangu, on his return from the war, presented the captive prince to his sister, the queen of Tangu; and it was imagined that she, who had killed his son for betraying him, would have treated him with the regards due to a brother. On the contrary, she used him in a contemptuous manner; and afterwards, perceiving that her husband was inclined to spare him, caused him to be beaten or pounded to death with a wooden pestle. Indeed, how great soever his crimes were, the king of Tangu was under the most indispensable obligations to be kind to him, if what we are told be true; namely, that he was no more than the son of a carter, and owed all his greatness to the favour of the murdered prince. In this manner, saith Floris, came this mighty empire to ruin; so that, at this day (X), there is no remembrance of it^r.

Age and reign.

PRANJINOKO, or Branjinoko, dying in 1599, must have been sixty-six years of age: for Balbi tells us he was fifty when he ascended the throne; and he reigned sixteen years. The same author informs us, that he was very fond of shewing himself to the people, contrary to the humour of his father: for that reason he almost every day appeared in public: and, when he passed through the city, suffered none to be turned out of the way, taking great pleasure to see and be seen by his subjects. For the same reason he caused two pillars to be erected at the gate of his court to distinguish it; and on it was written, in large characters, that every person might enter without asking leave.

How he appeared

BALBI was at a public audience, to which he was sent for by the king, about some jewels which he had brought to Pegu. The entrance of the palace was by two gates, one within the other; and between them were porticos, or open halls, one on each side, where the nobles waited for the king's appearance, whose approach was proclaimed by twelve silver ^p BOUES ap. Haies, ubi supr. p. 850, & PURCH. p. 1748. DE FARIA, ubi supr. ap. Purch. vol. i. p. 322.

^r Ibid. ubi supr. & DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 121.

^q FLORIS voy.

(S) It is twelve miles from Pegu; and the landing-place for those who come from Sirian (sixteen or eighteen miles distant) and the river of Negrals.

(T) So Boues writes. Jarric says 700 elephants, and 700 horses. De Faria enlarges the number twelve-fold.

(U) Floris saw both at Arrakan in the year 1608. According to Jarric, the uncle of the king, and two sons of the latter, were also delivered up as hostages; and that he returned with them all in triumph to Arrakan. Jarric Thesaur. Indic. part. i. l. 2. c. 24.

(X) He wrote in 1614.

a trumpets. At this sound they all stood up; and, as soon as they saw the king, entered the second or inner gate, which led to the hall of audience; a very beautiful fabric, being all gilded over and enamelled with blue. The king was seated on golden cushions, with his wives beside him. Behind him stood four little boys, or pages, to attend him. The lords in waiting, called Najirans, stood before him to report matters to the king, and return his answers, as occasion required. His treasurers, with other principal lords, were on the left hand; and near to him on the right, was the prince Maupa Rôjab, his eldest son, seated on a kind of scaffold. At the lower end of the hall were the nobility and great officers, ranged in order according to their several degrees.

b THE king had in his hand a fan, which he kept in constant motion. High over his head were four gilded umbrellas, borne on the top of spears, which were also gilded and adorned with gold fringes of a good length. During the audience, his elephants passed before him in review: four white elephants, preceding the rest, when they came right before the king, each of them, by way of doing him honour, raising his trunk, opened his mouth and neighed three times: after this they kneeled down; then, rising, walked to their stables.

c As Balbi, with his interpreter, approached the king, they fell on their knees, with their hands lifted up in a suppliant manner, and made as if they kissed the ground three times before they rose again. This reverence, called rombi, they performed four times before they came to the steps of the place where his majesty was seated; so near him that he could distinctly hear his words, though he understood not what was spoken. Then, giving the emeralds to the interpreter, this latter held them over his head, and made the rombi. Immediately a Najiran, making the same reverence, took the jewels, and having delivered them to the king, retired a few steps back. Afterwards, the same lord being ordered to ask our traveller some questions concerning his country and voyages, he took the answers down in writing, and read them to his majesty: who, hearing that Venice was in the kingdom of Italy, and yet not governed by a king, seemed greatly surprised; and then fell a laughing so heartily, that it brought a cough upon him, which for some time hindered him to speak. In the end, he ordered a present to be given Balbi, of a gold cup and five pieces of China damask, over-and-above the payment for his emeralds; with an exemption likewise of duty for his goods, by which he saved 800 ducats. A generosity which all present admired at, it not having d been customary with that king to make presents to strangers*.

e PRANJINOKO, according to Balbi, had four sons. The first, called Maupa Rôjab (or Maupatalia, as he is named in one place). He was king of Martavân; and killed in the war of Siam 1590, as before related. The second, called Naydu, was king of Ava; and, after his brother's death, became heir to the crown. According to Jarric, he deserted his father, during the siege, as above related, and was put to death by his aunt, the queen of Tangu. The third son was named Naymor; the same, we conjecture, who was Regulo of Prom, and slain about 1597¹. The fourth is not named by Balbi, any more than the king himself. This, we should have concluded, was the young prince, who, on the surrender of Pegu in 1599, was, according to Boues, put to death, along with his father and mother, by the king or queen of Tangu. But we find that there were thirteen children given up to the king of *Tangu*²; and that they were all slain, excepting two sons, who were delivered to the king of Arrakan. These were named Sbimi Kolia and Markettam; and three or four years after, went with the prince of Arrakan to the siege of *Sirian*³.

f AFTER the death of this Barma king, Pegu, by the retreat of the king of Tangu, was left in the hands of the Arrakan monarch, as before-mentioned, and annexed to that crown. Authors do not take notice how long it continued so, but it seems to have ceased about the year 1606 or 1607; at which time it probably fell into the hands of the king of Ava: at least, in 1613, we find that monarch leading an army through it, as if it was his own dominion, to the siege of Sirian; which he took from the Portugueses, as will hereafter be related.

f IN 1619 or 1620, we read of a king of Pegu, who was also king of Ava, residing in the city of Pegu, at which time the affairs of that country began to be re-established. This king, we are told, was nephew to his predecessor, and succeeded in prejudice to his children; likewise, that he recovered the kingdom and city of Zangomay (or Jangomay) from the king of Siam, who had taken them from the former king. This recovery was made in the year 1615 or 1616; and the strangers found there carried with the conqueror into *Pegu*⁴. From this imperfect account we conjecture, that the prince who took Sirian, and he who recovered Jangomay, were the same: and that he removed the royal seat from Ava back to Pegu between the two expeditions. However that be, the English, by his encouragement, began a trade at Pegu in 1619; but, by ill management of those employed, they were forced to abandon it almost as soon as they had commenced it⁵.

* BALBIVIAG. p. 102. 109.

¹ See DE FERIA, vol. iii. p. 132.

² Idem ibid.

³ Ibid. p. 116, 120.

⁴ See JARRIC, ubi supr. l. iv. c. 31.

⁵ See METHOLD Ind. obs. ap. Purch. Pilgr. vol. v. p. 1005, & seqq.

and so continues.

As to the predecessor of this king above-mentioned, whether he was one of the sons of Pranjinoko, carried to Arrakán by Shelimi Shâb, and set up by his assistance, or some other person of the Barma race, we cannot pretend to determine: neither does it appear when the royal seat was transferred from the city of Pegu to that of Ava, where it at present is, and seems to have been fixed for above a century past.

S E C T. VI.

Proceedings of the Portugueses in Pegu.

THIS is all we have been able to collect from good authors concerning the history of Pegu, and its surprising revolutions (Y), within the compass of less than a century. However, we meet with one reign more, which may be added to the rest, as, in effect, it is subsequent to them: and that is the reign of a Portuguese king, or emperor, of Pegu. As the subject promises something very curious and uncommon, it would be unpardonable in us not to lay it before our readers.

Sirian given

SHILIMI SHAH, king of Arrakan, to express his gratitude to the Portugueses who served him in his armies, bestowed on them the port of Sirian, at the request of Philip De Brito and Nicote, before-mentioned; who, being raised from the station of a collier to the favour of that prince, soon after requited him with the basest ingratitude^a. This is De Faria's account of the matter: but we are told by Boues the Jesuit, who went to Sirian with De Brito in February 1598; that the king, not being yet acknowledged by the Peguers who lay concealed, or were fled, delivered the port of Sirian to De Brito, that the fugitives might there find refuge under Portuguese protection^b. He likewise honoured him with the title of Chenga, or Shenga, which signifies honest (Z); but which his ingrateful returns shewed he no ways deserved.

to the Portugueses.

SHILIMI SHAH, confiding in De Brito, was by him persuaded to erect a custom-house at the mouth of Sirian river, under pretence of increasing the king's revenue; but, in reality, with design to seize on, and convert it into a fort (A); in order to secure the Portugueses a footing in Pegu, and facilitate the conquest of that kingdom, which he had formed in his mind. The work being finished, the king put it into the hands of one Banna-dala, who began to fortify it; and, being more jealous of the Portugueses than was his master, would suffer none of that nation to enter the place, except a Dominican friar. De Brito, finding his design frustrated, resolved to seize the fort by force, before the works were too far advanced; and accordingly sent three officers with fifty men, to put his project in execution; presuming that he had credit enough with Shilimi Shâb to get the possession of it confirmed to him.

De Brito's ingratitude.

THE three captains so well performed Nicote's orders, that they gained the name of founders of the Portuguese dominions in Pegu. Banna-dala, apprised of their intention, attacked the enemy's factory first, and obliged them to quit it; but at the same time they fled from thence, they assaulted the other's fort with such fury, that he was glad to retire to an island not far off; where he fortified himself with 1000 men, securing the treasure of the pagod of Digan (or Dagun), to maintain them. The king, being informed of this proceeding, was much offended, and resolved to support Banna-dala: but De Brito had the art to dissuade him; representing the other as a sacrilegious robber, and offered to compose matters with the Portugueses. The king consented, and he went to Sirian; but, instead of putting a stop to the work, it still advanced under his direction. When the fort was in a good posture of defence, Nicote set sail for Goa, in order to deliver it up to the viceroy, and solicit succours, wherewith he might become emperor of Bengál. He likewise persuaded each of the neighbouring princes, that if he would join the Portuguese viceroy, he might easily arrive to be king of Pegu; and, on this encouragement, some of them sent ambassadors along with him.

SCARCE was Nicote gone, when Shilimi Shâb became sensible of his oversight, and sent down the river a fleet with 6000 men, under the command of Banna-dala. When near the fort, they were met by three vessels, with only thirty Portugueses on board, commanded by Salvador Ribeyro, chief of the three officers who had taken that place; yet in a little time he destroyed many of the enemy, took forty ships, and put the rest to flight, without losing one man^c.

^a DE FARIA, ubi supra, p. 127. FARIA, ubi. supr. p. 127, & seqq.

^b BOUES ap. Haies, ubi supr. & PURCH. p. 1748.

^c DE

(Y) The account given by Captain Hamilton, from the report of the natives and Portugueses, confounds the actions of different times and persons together, as will appear by comparing it with the preceding history.

(Z) De Faria, p. 131. says, Chenga signifies good man. Be which it will, De Brito deserved neither character.

(A) Boues the Jesuit says, that so early as March 1600, when he wrote his letter, De Brito was actually preparing to build a fort at Sirian; which was as soon as the place was delivered to him.

- a THE king of Arrakan, finding this to become a serious affair, in conjunction with the king of Pram (B) (or Prom), beset the place with 1200 sail by water, and 40,000 men by land. Ribeyro, perceiving that they observed no order, fell on them with his handful of men; and, killing the general, put the whole army to flight. Banna-dala, gathering 8000 foot of this scattered army, sat down the third time before the fort, lodging his men in good order; and having furiously battered the place for some time, in the dead of night ventured to give a fierce assault, but was repulsed with the loss of above 1000 men, whose bodies filled up the ditch. The enemy continued the siege eight months; and although some Portugueses deserted Ribeyro, yet, far from being dismayed, he burnt the vessels which were in the port, to take from the rest all hopes of escaping. At length considerable succours came from the viceroy Ayres de Saldanna; and many, covetous of honour or profit, resorted thither: so that the commander, finding himself 800 strong, resolved to attack the enemy in his works.

- RIBEYRO put his design in execution, with much conduct as well as bravery, and was received with no less; but at last Banna-dala was forced to fly; and had the mortification to see all the works, which he had raised in a year, burnt to the ground. The Portugueses, thinking this success had secured their affairs in Pegu, dispersed, in order to reap the benefit of it by plundering; so that there remained with the captains no more than 200, who had been sent by the viceroy. The enemy, taking advantage of this opportunity, return the fourth time, provided with several moving castles and kinds of fireworks: in short, the fort was reduced to great distress, when a fiery meteor so affrighted the besiegers that they fled, leaving their castles a prey to the flames. After this the Portugueses took the field; and marching against king Maffinga (C), met his forces in the province of Kamelan, where they obtained a victory; killing him on the spot, and doing great mischief both by sea and land.

- THESE signal advantages procured the Portugueses that security they so much sought after: for the natives, finding them not only victorious, but also obliging, flocked to them in great numbers; so that, in a few days, they found above 20,000 ready to join them. These men, reflecting on the extraordinary success of Philip de Brito and Nicote, joined to his natural good-temper, which had procured him among them the name of Chenga, resolved to proclaim him king of Pegu: but, being at that time absent, Ribeyro accepted of the crown in his name; and this might be the reason how it came to be thought in Spain, that it was the captain who had been raised to that dignity. Nicote afterwards arriving in person, received the kingdom in the name of his prince; and was the first Portuguese who rose to that pitch of fortune in Asia. He was succeeded in the command of the fort by Roderick Alvarez de Sequeyra, who bravely defended it till it accidentally took fire, and only the bare walls were left standing.

- MEAN while Nicote solicited at Goa for succours, and received six ships with men: for the viceroy, esteeming him for his great wealth and growing power, married him to a niece he had there, born of a Javan woman, and for her sake could deny him nothing; he likewise conferred on him the title of commander of Sirian, and general of the Pegu conquest. At his return to Sirian, the king of Arrakan himself sent to compliment him on his arrival, and had a rich present from Nicote on that occasion; after this he repaired the fort, and built a church, at Sirian. As to the custom-house; he, according to the viceroy's instructions, obliged all vessels, which traded on the coast of Pegu, to make their entries there; and compelled some ships of Choromandel to comply with his orders. These proceedings revived in the king of Arrakan a resolution to possess himself of that custom-house; and, with that view, he sent an ambassador to the king of Tangu (D), with twenty jalias, or small ships, to join him in the expedition; but Nicote, being informed of this, sent his small craft, which defeated and obliged them to fly to the king of Jangoma's country (E).

- f THE enemy, thus exasperated, gathered 700 small vessels, with 4000 men, under the command of the king of Arrakan's son, who was accompanied by Sbimi Kolia and Markettam, Prince of Arrakan, A. D. 1604.

^d DE FARIA, p. 129, & seqq.

(B) A city standing on the west side of the river which passes through Ava. By this it appears, that Prom, so lately desolated, had recovered again.

(C) Whether this prince was king of Kamelan, or Prom, does not appear from De Faria; who often leaves his readers at a loss on such occasions, which yet require explanation.

(D) Tangu seems to be a maritime province; or, at least, to lie not far from the particular province of which Pegu city is the capital, on the east of the river which passes by or near that last city. For we find, that the king of Tangu was ordered to transport the inhabitants of that city to the capital in ships: and the king of Siam, in his way to invade Tangu, entered the kingdom of Martawan. See before p. 239, note (L).

(E) The kingdom of Jangoma seems to have lain to the north of Siam: its capital was Jamahay (the same, we apprehend, with Chiamay); to which Fitch travelled from Pegu city in twenty-five days, going to the north-east. And it is probable that the river of Pegu passes through that country, or near the borders of it, since the Arrakan fleet, in flying to the kingdom of Jangoma, must have passed up that river.

sons of the late emperor of Pegu (F). To meet them, Paul del Rego Pinnero set out with a the boats and seven ships; with which, having taken ten advanced boats, he went in to secure them; and then, putting out again with more force, meets the prince, routs him, and takes several vessels. The prince, running up a river, got into a small creek; where Pinnero seized all the rest of his fleet, and obliged him to escape by land, after having lost one thousand men. Then he took the fort of Chinim, and in it many prisoners, among whom was the wife of Banna dala. At this time Nicote was abroad with fourteen small vessels, in which were sixty Portugueses and 200 Pegu men: he happened to run up the aforementioned river; and hearing the prince was on the shore with 4000 men, 900 of them musketeers, ventures to attack him. In the encounter, Sbimi Toto, a valiant native, attempting to seize the prince, was wounded; but happened, at the same time, to wound the prince in the face; which occasioned his being b made prisoner, and gained the Portugueses the victory. They likewise defeated 2000 men, sent by the king of Pram (or Prom), who arrived too late to join the other troops^c.

taken and ransomed.

THE Pegu soldiers, almost distracted to see their prince carried into captivity, would all have gone with him, striving to get into the Portuguese ships. Nor was De Brito behind them in point of duty: for not forgetting that he had been a slave to the prince, now his prisoner, he served him with the same respect as he had done before. He watched him asleep, holding his buskins with arms a-cross, according to the custom of those countries; and attended him on all occasions. This generous behaviour might well have equalled him with men truly great, and merited the title of Cbenga, which was given him, had he not sullied it by his covetousness. For Sbilimi Shih, to redeem his son, thought c proper to treat with Nicote: who, contrary to the viceroy's orders, which were to return the prince without ransom, sold him for 50,000 crowns; pretending it was to defray the expences of the fleet, which the king had obliged him to fit out^f.

Portugueses hotly attacked, A. D. 1605.

THE king of Arrakan, farther provoked hereat, sent a small fleet against Sirian; which, though easily defeated, gave him an opportunity of enslaving above 100,000 converts to the Romish religion, whom he had treated with great rigour. After this, the king of Tangu, being prevailed on to join him a second time, besieges the city by land, while Sbilimi Shih shut it up by sea with 800 sail, in which were 10,000 men. Paul de Rego met this fleet with eighty vessels; and, failing of the success which he had formerly, set fire to the powder, and blew up himself, with all the men on board his ship, rather than fall into the hands of d the enemy. The siege continued so long that the place was ready to surrender; when, on a sudden, the king of Tangu, upon some jealousy conceived, quits the field by night; and he of Arrakan found it to no purpose to lie longer upon the sea.

Spoils Tangu;

SOME of the neighbouring princes, startled at this success of De Brito, sought his friendship, and an alliance with the king of Portugal. The first who entered into these engagements was his late enemy the king of Tangu; who, some time after, having been attacked by the king of Ava, was defeated, and became his tributary. The king of Martaván was another of Nicote's confederates; who to strengthen himself, marries his son Simon to that prince's daughter. Thinking himself now in a condition to execute a long premeditated design, of robbing the king of Tangu of the great wealth he had a few years before carried out of Pegu, e he resolves, in conjunction with the king of Martaván, to attack his territories; alleging in his defence, that, since the treaty made with that king, he had been overcome by him of Ava: as if the most idle pretence was sufficient to justify the breach of faith. In short, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of the king of Tangu, and his protestations of continuing a faithful vassal to the crown of Portugal, De Brito fell upon, and took him prisoner; returning with him and above a million of gold to Sirian. But he did not long enjoy the fruits of his crimes^g.

and is besieged

THIS act of violence and injustice, committed on the king of Tangu, highly provoked the king of Ava, under whose protection he enjoyed his dominion. Scarce had he heard the news, when casting on the ground his gown and veil, he vowed to the idol Biay, worshipped f at Degun (or Dagun), that he would not enter within his gates till this injury was revenged.

A. D. 1613.

Resolving to attack Sirian effectually, both by sea and land, he equipped a fleet of 400 stout vessels, on board of which there were above 6000 of those Moors, of noted valour, called De Caparuca, or who wear caps. At the same time he marched at the head of 120,000 men; and, the moment he arrived before the place, set fire to every thing which he found without the walls. Although Nicote was, at this time, wholly unprovided, having suffered most of his men to go for India, yet he made a vigorous defence. What concerned him most was the want of powder: for he had been so imprudent as to set fire to a vast quantity of it, which he found at Tangu. In this distress he sent a soldier to Bengal to buy powder; but that trusty servant ran away with the money. He likewise sent for some to the city of St. Thomas, on the coast of Choromandel; but his friends there were so kind as to refuse him.

by the king of Ava.

^c DE FARIA, p. 131, & seqq.

^f Ibid. p. 133, & seqq.

^g Ibid. p. 138, & seqq.

(F) These princes, as hath been mentioned before, were delivered by the king of Tangu to him of Arrakan. Besides, a Besides, those few Portugueses who were with him, committed such outrages, robberies, and murders, as seemed to call down vengeance upon them, and hasten his ruin.

It is true, his number of soldiers might have sufficed to defend the place against the enemy, He is taken, though so much superior in numbers; having had with him 3000 Peguers, besides 100 Portugueses: but as there was no firing of cannon without powder, they could not keep the besiegers at a distance from the walls. All the resistance they were able to make, was to annoy them by pouring down boiling pitch and oil from the battlements. De Brito, to try what could be done at sea, sent out three ships against the fleet: but this enterprise was attended with very ill success: for, in one of them, all the men were slain; and the two others returned with all theirs wounded. The enemy now began to undermine the works; and b the besieged bestirred themselves much, but to very small purpose. At length, after the siege had lasted thirty-four days, Nicote sent to beg mercy, but was not heard. He imagined he could prevail by means of the king of Tangu, whom he had robbed of his crown, his riches, and liberty. But the king of Ava being resolved to punish him, rejected all manner of applications in his favour.

MEAN time the king of Arrakan, more through jealousy of that monarch's power, than and impaled. in kindness to De Brito, who had so grievously offended him, sent fifty sail to his assistance; but they proved of no use to him, having all been taken by the besiegers. At length the king of Ava gives an assault, and both parties fought for three days without intermission. The issue of it was, that 700 of the besieged having been slain, Nicote was betrayed by one c Banna, whom he had always treated with distinction, and carried to the king of Ava, who immediately ordered him to be impaled (G); and the stake fixed upright upon an eminence above the fort, that, as the victor expressed it, he might the better look to it. He lived two days in that dreadful misery, and then expired.

His wife, De Luisa de Saldanna, was kept three days in the river to be cleansed, because His wife enslaved; the king designed her for himself; but as she exclaimed against him, when brought into his presence, he ordered her leg to be bored; and that she should be sent to Ava among the other slaves. Francis Mendez, and a nephew of his, were treated in the same manner as Nicote had been. The traitor Banna, demanding a reward, was torn in pieces; the king saying, that he could never be true to him, since he had betrayed the man who had done him so his son slain, d much honour. Sebastian Rodriguez was cooped up with a yoke about his neck. At first the king designed not to spare any of the inhabitants of Sirian; but growing calm, he sent many of them slaves to Ava. Then passing on to Martaván, he obliged that king to kill his own daughter's husband, that none of De Brito's race might remain. This was the end of that man's avarice; who, being naked but a few years before, was raised to be worth three millions. He had one when he went to Goa; he brought another from Tangu; and had gotten at least another since then, by prizes and merchandizing. The enemy confessed, that they lost at the siege no fewer than 30,000 men^b.

How little soever the reader may be concerned for the fate of the husband, he will be apt, all owing to her, no doubt, to pity that of the wife; imagining that she drew on herself the punishment which e was inflicted on her, through conjugal affection. But indeed her sufferings are so little to be ascribed to the love she had for her husband, that she was actually one of the principal causes of his ruin: for she entertained one of his captains as her gallant; and perceiving that the Portugueses censured their familiarity, they persuaded De Brito that he had no farther need of them. This was the reason why they were dismissed; and that dismissal was the cause of his destruction, and loss of the place¹.

As soon as the viceroy heard of the danger that Sirian was in, he sent thither James de and late succours. Mendez Fustado, with five gallies. This officer had orders to strengthen himself by the way, with some ships and men: but he was not able to do any thing of the kind, till he arrived at Martaván; where, in the river, he found a fleet of twenty sail. These, after a sharp engagement, fled, excepting four, which were taken, with some soldiers; by whom being informed of what had happened at Sirian, he saw it would be to no purpose to proceed farther, and therefore returned to Goa.

^b DE FARIA, p. 191, & seqq.

¹ Ibid ubi supr.

(G) According to Floris, this happened in March 1613. See Purchas's pilgrims, vol. i. p. 325.

C H A P. V.

The empire of Ava.

S E C T. I.

Description of the country.

Little known in Europe.

OUR informations, with regard to this great monarchy, are, in general, so scanty and imperfect, that it is proper to take notice thereof, before we enter upon either the description or history of the country; lest our readers should otherwise think that the fault is owing to us, and not to the defect of our materials.

Disfigured in maps.

WE have already observed, in our general remarks concerning the farther peninsula of India, that no part of Asia has been less frequented, especially the inland countries towards China. Hence it is, that Pegu, Ava, and others, were so disfigured in the maps of European geographers, that Du Chatz, a Jesuit missionary, could not know them. He particularly remarks, that the Sansons have introduced much confusion, by deriving the great rivers, which pass through the kingdoms and capitals of Siam, Pegu, and Ava, from a lake called Chiamay, although they have all different sources^a. In these enormous errors the Sansons have been followed by all other geographers, till Messieurs De Lisle reformed them in 1700. However, the Sansons are not to blame on that account; but rather Mendez Pinto, who, though guilty of many forgeries, yet possibly in this respect was guided by reports of the Indians, which have misled others.

*No travellers
there.*

IF Ava be so little known, it is not that it has never been visited by Europeans: for the Portugueses, Dutch, and other nations, have been often in that country, led thither on account of war, or trade. But these are a sort of people who have seldom either the curiosity or capacity to observe and write. We have, in short, no professed travellers into the inland: at least we meet with only two journals of persons who have travelled into Ava, towards the end of the last century; and that not from the coast upwards, but through the continent downwards, from China. The first performed by four Chineses, down the river which passes by Ava: the other by the Jesuit Du Chatz before-mentioned, who travelled the same way, and has given a map of the course of that river from Ava to the sea, in which are contained almost all his remarks; for he says very little concerning either the country or inhabitants. To these may be added some observations of Mr. Roger Alison, who had been twice ambassador from the governor of Fort St. George, or his agents at Sirian, to the court of Ava, about thirty years ago.

Materials scanty.

THESE three pieces, joined to some scattered remarks found in Cæsar Frederic, Gaspar Balbi, Gaspar de Cruz, and some other early voyagers, are the principal funds from whence we draw our materials; which, therefore, our readers must not expect to be either very copious or satisfactory.

Ava kingdom.

A^A, or Awa, which some write with a strong aspirate Hava (A), may be considered either in a restrained sense, as a single kingdom; or in a more extended sense, as enlarged by the conquest of several other dominions. But in which-ever sense it be taken, we are not able to speak with any certainty concerning its just bounds and dimensions, especially as to Ava as a particular kingdom: we only know, in general, that it lies inclosed with Jangoma or Siam on the east; Pegu on the south; and Arrakan on the west: what country lies to the north of it, we are not informed by travellers. Mendez Pinto, in place of Ava, puts the kingdom of Chaleu, whose capital he makes the city of Ava. He mentions also a city of the same name, which he sets on the river Queytor (so he calls the river of Ava), between Prom and Ava. He likewise gives to the inhabitants the name of Chaleus^b. This is all we can say touching the kingdom of Ava, properly so called.

Empire of Ava.

WITH regard to the extent of the empire of Ava, including the kingdom of Ava with its conquests, we are able to say something more precise. A late missionary tells us, that it is twice as big as France^c. What we know, in general, is, that it is bounded on the west partly by the gulf of Bengâl, and partly by the kingdoms of Arrakan and Assam, from which last it seems to be separated by the great river of Arrakan: on the north by mountains

^a DU CHATZ ap. mem. acad. scien. ann. 1692, p. 399.
^c DU CHATZ, ubi supra.

^b PINTO'S Voyage, p. 136, 208, 214.

(A) Some authors write Auwa, as Balbi: others Awaa and Owa, as we find in De Faria, vol. iii. p. 139. 353. & passim. The Chin se pronounce Yauwa. It is called Pamabang, in the Chin se journey from Siam.

a dividing it from Tibet and China; on the east by the country of the Laos; and on the south by the kingdom of Siam, and the gulf of Bengál. It is situated between the 15th and 26th degrees of latitude, and between the 109th and 118th degrees of longitude: so that its length, from south to north, is about 66 geometrical, or 765 English miles; and its breadth, from west to east, 494 miles of the first kind, and 575 of the second (B).

THE country of Ava, properly so called, is, for the general, flat, especially near the great Soil and pro- river. It is all fertile; producing rice, fruits, and variety of animals wild and tame, like duce.

Pegu. It has also mines of Cyprian brass, lead, and silver^d. Musk and rubies likewise come from thence to Pegu. As to the conquered countries lying to the north and east, excepting that of Jangoma, we know but little concerning them in any respect, not so much as their b names (C). The best information we can give our readers is from the travels of four Chineses, in company with others, from the province of Yun-nan to Siva and Pegu, towards the middle of the last century. Departing from the city of Yun-nan (or Yun-nan), capital of the province of the same name, in the south-west of China, they went to Yun-cham (D), in the same province, in eighteen days; from thence to Tien nio-theou (E) in four; and in five more to the last village on the borders of Yun-nan and China: a fatiguing way, through woods, full of tigers, but no elephants.

AT this village, where there is a custom-house and garrison, they embarked on a river more River Lu large and rapid than that of Siam, and in twenty days sailed down it to the city of Ava. kyang.

The first four or five days were through a desert country: afterwards they daily met with one c or two plantations on the river, whose inhabitants, dwelling in houses made of bambú canes, fled into the neighbouring woods at their approach. The journey may be performed by land, but not conveniently^e. The name of the river, down which our Chineses passed, is not mentioned by them: but it is doubtless that which, in the Jesuits map, is called Lu-kyang, because of its largeness; there being no other in Yun-nan, on that side, so big as the river Siam, to which it is compared; nor perhaps capable of bearing large passage-boats. This river rises a great way to the north of Yun-nan, in the country of Tibet; so that it may well be considerable, not only at the city of Ava, as Du Chatz says it is, but even in China itself, from whence its course seems to be first south-west, and then south.

FROM the city of Ava this great river, which is there called Menan Kiow (F), runs south-or Menan d west to the city of Prom, about 140 leagues distant; from whence to Mero, another consi-Kiow.
derable city, its course is almost north and south. From Mero it turns off almost due eastward; and, in that direction, passes on to Sirian, the port of Ava and Pegu, eighty leagues distant from Mero, and near three hundred from Ava. Above Sirian it receives the river of Pegu; and below it, at ten leagues distance, falls into the sea. Along the river, from Ava downwards, the banks are set with villages, often better than the country towns in France, and not above a mile and a half asunder. They sail in vessels as large as our biggest ships, though not a nail or peg is used in building them. They have only one sail, but it is much higher and broader than any which the greatest European ships do carry. The Chineses above-mentioned were one month in their passage down it from Ava to Pegu;
e and, from the first of those cities to Siam, it was fifteen easy days journey by land^f.

THE capital of Ava, which bears the same name with the kingdom, is about as large as City of Ava, Rheims in France. The houses are high, and built of wood; and the streets are as strait as a line, with trees planted on each side^g. The reason why the houses are built of no better materials than bambú canes, thatched with straw or reeds, we are told, is; that criminals, if they do not appear when summoned, may be easily forced out by fire. But then that sort of structure diminishes much from the beauty of the city, which is both great and populous.

THE king's palace is very large, and built of stone; yet the buildings of it are but mean. The palace
It has four gates: the eastern is called the golden gate, because all ambassadors, who enter by it, approach him with presents: the south gate is called the gate of justice, for those to f go-in at who bring petitions, accusations, or complaints, to the king: the west is the gate of grace, through which all who have received favours, or been acquitted of crimes, do pass-out in state; and all condemned persons are carried to execution in fetters: the north gate, fronting the river, is the gate of state, reserved for his majesty when he goes abroad; and by it all his provisions and water are carried into the palace^h.

^d PIMENTA ap. Purch pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1746.

^e GOUYE, ubi supra.

^f Ibid. vol. ii. p. 45, & seq.

^g GOUYE obs. math. &c. ap. mem. acad. ann. 1699,

^h HAMILTON's New account of the East Indies,

(B) Captain Hamilton, who sometimes calls this the kingdom of Barma, and says it lies about 500 miles up the river of Pegu, gives it different dimensions. According to him, it reaches from Murazi, near Tanasirin, to the province of Yun-nan, in China, and is about 800 miles long, from north to south, and 250 broad, from west to east. New account of the East-Indies, vol. ii. p. 38, & seq.

(C) De Faria tells us, from Pinto, that the dominions of the king of Ava, about the year 1539, were two months travel in extent, and contained sixty-two cities; but names none of them.

(D) In the Jesuits late map Yong-chang.

(E) In the same map Teng-ye-chew.

(F) Mendez Pinto calls it every-where Queytor.

Its splendor.

THIS is the account given by Mr. Alison: but Du Chatz describes it to more advantage. ^a He says it is gilded both within and without; and situated in a square inclosure of brick, each side no fewer than 800 paces long. The same author tells us, that he found the latitude to be twenty-one degrees; but says not with what instrument he observed it ⁱ. It is remarkable that this city is mentioned by Antony Zeni, so early as the year 1430. This author informs us, that passing up the river Ganges to Chernowem and Maarazia (G), he from thence crossed over land, in seventeen days, to the city of Ava, which he affirms to be fifteen miles in compass. He adds, that the inhabitants of both sexes indulge themselves much in eating and drinking. But what is most curious in this traveller, he is the first who speaks of bells being worn by the inhabitants of these countries in their privities: he says they were of gold, silver, and brass; that they were as large as nuts; and that certain old women lived by selling them ^k. ^b

Jewel trade.

THE city of Ava is remarkable for having a great trade in musk and jewels; that is, principally rubies and sapphires, so long ago as the time of Edoardo Barbosa, in 1516: who also observes that the inhabitants were excellent jewellers; and Metbold says, the most esteemed rubies and sapphires were brought from thence ^l. This city has, no doubt, suffered many changes, by the wars and revolutions which have happened from time to time; particularly in 1583, when it was rased by order of the king of Pegu, after the rebellion of his uncle, and all the inhabitants banished to the woods ^m.

Other cities.

THERE are other cities of Ava mentioned by authors, such as Bakan, Chaleu, and Prom, of which some account has been already given in the history of Pegu, and of which we find the names in Du Chatz's map of the course of the river Menan Kiow. Bakan was the capital of a kingdom conquered by Chaumigrem, second Barma king of Pegu: Prom was the metropolis of another small kingdom, which suffered greatly in the Barma wars: and Chaleu, we are told by Pinto, was both a city and a kingdom; of which last he makes Ava itself the capital. ^c ⁱ See GOUYE, ubi supr. p. 1017.

^k NIC. DE CONTI ap. Purchas, vol. iii. p. 158.

^l PURCHAS, vol. v.

^m BALBI, p. 114.

(G) We meet with no such place in modern travellers as Chernowem. Zeni writes Cernowem. As for Maarazia, it ought doubtless to be Máha Rájah, which signifies the Great Rájah, that is, chief of the Rájahs or kings of India.

S E C T. II.

Account of the inhabitants of Ava.

The Barmas; of what kinds.

WHETHER the inhabitants of Ava were originally Barmas, or a different nation, ^d authors do not afford us light enough to determine. Mendez Pinto, indeed, mentions a people in these parts called Chaleus, inhabitants of a kingdom called Chaleu, of which he makes Ava the capital city. But as that author is not clear in this particular, and is besides not much to be depended on, we can venture to affirm nothing in this point upon his authority. In short, as the Barmas have been, for above two centuries at least, the proprietors of this country, not only of the kingdom of Ava in particular, but also of several other kingdoms or states which are annexed to that crown; and are the only nation within their dominions which have as yet come to our knowledge, we must here content ourselves with giving an account of them.

The Barmas;

THE Barmas, called by some Baramas and Vermas, but mostly Bramas, as to their persons and dress have been already described in our account of Pegu. We shall only add from Da Cruz, that they have a great resemblance of the *Chinese*s in their faces ^a; and some judge, from the great likeness which appears in their persons, and even their customs, that the inhabitants of all the farther peninsula of India are descended from the *Chinese*s. ^e their country,

THESE Barmas, or Bramas, according to Mendez Pinto, originally inhabited the hills or highlands which surround Pegu; containing a country about 200 leagues in length, and 80 in breadth. From these quarters they, by degrees, extended themselves over the neighbouring countries, sometimes gaining, at other times losing what they had conquered. About the year 1516, when Barbosa was in the Indies, the kingdom of Verma, as he terms it, extended along the coast from Bengál southward, as far as Pegu; and Arrakan lay within land ^f to the north of it. But, not long after, they were driven out of the maritime parts, where they had no trade, nor ports fit for it, by the inhabitants of Arrakan, who took possession of them. In 1539 their power was so much reduced, that, though they seem to have been masters of Ava not long before, they were, at this time, tributary to the king of Pegu. However, an accident soon after gave them an opportunity not only of recovering their freedom, and conquests.

^a DA CRUZ ap. Purch. vol. iii. p. 167, & seq.

- a but also of subjecting Pegu in their turn ; which they lost again for a short space of time : when recovering it about the middle of the sixteenth century, they, under the conduct of a valiant prince, over-ran almost the whole farther peninsula of India. In the reign of his son they lost Pegu, and other countries ; but recovered them again in a few years space, and have continued in possession of them ever since ^b.

^b MENDEZ PINTO'S Voy. p. 241.

S E C T. III.

The government of Ava.

- b THE government in Ava is arbitrary : for the commands of the king are laws : but ^{How the king} then the reins are kept steady in his own hands, and managed with gentleness and attention. He severely punishes the governors of provinces or towns, if guilty of oppression, or other illegal practices : and, to inform himself how affairs go every-where, each has a deputy residing at court, which is generally kept in the present capital Ava. These attend ^{knows all af-} every morning, in an apartment of the palace ; to which adjoins another, whither the king ^{fairs.} repairs, who from thence can see the whole assembly, without being seen himself. A page stands without, to call whom his majesty appoints to make report of what had been transacted in his city or province ; all which is performed by the deputy, with profound reverence towards the room where the king is. If any thing be concealed, and that prince comes to know it, severe punishments are inflicted on the offender. Thus he passes his mornings, from breakfast-time, in hearing the necessary cases of his own affairs, as well as those of his subjects.

- In matters of treason, murder, or the like, the king appoints judges to try the accused ; ^{Capital pun-} and, on conviction, signs the dead warrant ; wherein he orders, that the wretch convicted ^{ishments.} shall tread no more on his ground ; and execution presently follows, either by beheading, or being thrown to his elephants, cruelly to be mashed to pieces under their feet. Sometimes criminals are banished for a term to the woods (A) ; and, when that is expired, if they are not devoured by tigers, or killed by wild elephants, they may return, and spend the remainder of their days in serving a tame elephant : and, for smaller crimes, they are only condemned d to cleanse his elephants stables for life ^a.

In civil cases the laws are very strict. With regard, particularly, to debts, there is no ^{Law of} losing any : for, one way or other, they must be paid ; and at last the debtor sold, with his ^{debtors.} family, as hath been already noted. Sometimes the Peguers, when they want money, will pledge not only themselves, but their wives and children, to obtain it. If payment is not made at the time limited, the creditor may then seize them all, and lock them up in his warehouse. They are so much at his disposal, that he may even lie with the insolvent's wife, if he has a mind : but then, by that action, the debt is understood to be quite discharged ^b.

- ALL cities and towns in this king's dominions are like aristocratical commonwealths. ^{Police in} The prince, or governor, seldom sits in council himself, but appoints his deputy, and twelve ^{cities.} counsellors or judges, who sit once in ten days, or oftener, if business requires it. They assemble in a large hall, mounted about three feet high, with double benches round the floor, for the people to sit or kneel on, to hear the free debates of council. The hall is raised on wooden pillars, and open on all sides. The judges are placed in the middle, on mats ; and, sitting in a ring, have no precedency one of another. There are no lawyers or ^{No lawyers,} attornies to harangue at the bar : but every body has the privilege to plead his own cause, or ^{nor fees.} send his case in writing, to be read publicly ; and he is sure to have it determined within three sittings of council at most. Neither are there any fees due to the officers of the court, which they call rounday ; but the charge, which is very small, is defrayed by the people of the town.

- f At the backs of the judges there are placed clerks, who write down whatever the plaintiff ^{Excellent reg-} and defendant have to say ; and the cause is determined by the judgment of the governor and ^{ulations.} council. If in the sentence there happens to be the least partiality to either party, and the king is made acquainted with it by the deputies at court, the whole is reversed, and the judges corrected for it. This good regulation is a strong check upon the council, and makes appeals very rare. On the other hand, if an appeal is not well grounded, the appellant is chastised ; which just rigour prevents vexatious suits, common in countries where are no penalties annexed to such litigious proceedings ^c.

^a HAMILT. New acc. of East Indies, vol. ii. p. 42, & seqq.

^b BALBI viag. del l'Ind. orient. p. 127.

^c HAMILT. ubi sup. p. 47, & seq.

(A) This, according to Balbi, is the punishment inflicted on robbers.

Ordeal trials. FOR discovering murder, theft, or perjury, also to find the truth, where the evidence is doubtful or contradictory, the ordeal is much used in Pegu. Of this there are several kinds: one way is to make the parties chew some raw rice, and swallow it: but they say the guilty cannot get it down, and thus he stands convicted. Another method is to oblige the accused, and the accuser, to lay hold of a stake driven into a river; and he who stays longest under water is judged fit to be credited. The guilty person (that is, he who was so unlucky as to have the shortest breath) must lie on his back for three days and nights, with his neck in the stocks or pillory, without meat or drink, and is fined to boot. Scandal, and malicious slander, is punished in this manner. They have also the custom, in case of atrocious crimes, of dipping the naked hand in boiling oil, or melted lead; and if the accuser is scalded or burnt in the trial, he must undergo the punishment due to the crime: which makes people very cautious how they calumniate one another. In short, whoever calls a woman a whore, and cannot prove the aspersions to be true, is fined severely ^d.

Differences how composed. WITH regard to little differences and disputes, which arise among neighbours, the making of them up is generally undertaken by the clergy, who never cease mediating between the parties, till there be a reconciliation; in token of which they eat champok (B) from one another's hand, and that seals the friendship. Nor must we omit giving the Pegu ecclesiastics the praises due to them on another occasion. If a stranger happens to be shipwrecked on their coast, by the laws of the country the men are the king's slaves: but, by the mediations of the church, the governors overlook that law: and when the unfortunate people repair to their temples, they are relieved both with food and raiment. If sick or wounded, they keep them till they are cured, and then give them letters of recommendation to the next convent, passing them thus from one to another, till they meet with barks to transport them to Sirian ^e.

^d HAMILT. p. 58.

^e Ibid. p. 61.

(B) Champok is a kind of tea, of a very unfavourable taste, growing, as other tea does, on bushes.

S E C T. IV.

Of the king or emperor.

Emperor's state. Reverence paid him. THE king or emperor of Ava gives great attention to public affairs. Soon after he has risen in the morning, he dresses himself, and then takes his breakfast. This usually consists of rice boiled in water, and relished with prok, of which we have already given an account in treating of Pegu. The prok used by the king is a mixture of shrimps, dried and powdered, with salt and cod-pepper, which makes a very pungent sauce, in great esteem. When his breakfast is over, he retires to hear what passes in the assembly of deputies before-mentioned, and hear the petitions of his subjects; by whom, if they may be so called, he is approached with the most abject reverence (A). The highest title which any of them assumes is to call himself his majesty's first slave. When pots of water or baskets of fruit are carried through the streets for the king's use, an officer attends them, and the people who happen to be near must fall on their knees, and let them pass by; as a good catholic does, says our ^d author, when he sees the host.

Pain titles, THAT their language may be conformable to their actions, they treat him with the most fulsome adulation. When they speak or write to him, they call him their kiak, or god: and the king himself, in his letter to foreign princes, assumes the title of "king of kings, to whom all other kings ought to be subject, as being near kinsman and friend to all the gods in heaven and on earth: that, by their friendship to him, all animals are fed and preserved, as well as all the seasons of the year have their constant returns: that the sun is his brother, the moon and stars his near relations: that he is lord over the ebbing and flowing of the sea: lastly, that he is king of the white elephant, and twenty-four umbrellas (B)." These are only common China umbrellas, covered over with thin Chormandeel Battelaes, with their canes lacquered and gilded. Yet because his own subjects dare not wear such umbrellas, he lays his commands on all other kings to forbear making use of them, when they go abroad, with the same air of vanity.

and assumed authority. AFTER his majesty has dined, there is a trumpet blown, to signify to all his slaves (meaning all other kings), that they may go to dinner, because their lord has already dined. And as

(A) The same with that paid to the king of Pegu, of whom this prince is properly no more than the successor, only residing in a different part of his dominions: so that what is related here of the king, is no more than an addition to what has been said before: but having been applied to him, as reigning in Ava, we have inserted it here.

(B) These being used as ensigns of dignity by the princes of this peninsula, seem to denote the number of kingdoms and states conquered by the Barma monarchs, and added to their dominions.

- a he terms all other kings (though ever so powerful and out of his reach), his slaves, so their subjects are considered as such, when they come into his ports to trade, or on any other occasion. When a foreign ambassador is admitted to audience in the palace, he is attended with a large troop of guards, with trumpets sounding, and heralds proclaiming the honour which he is about to receive, in being permitted to see this king of kings, the glory of the whole earth. When the ambassador is come between the gate and the head of the stairs which lead to the chamber of audience, he is attended by the master of the ceremonies, who instructs him to kneel three times in his way thither; in which posture he must continue, with his hands lifted over his head, not daring to rise, till a proclamation is read for that purpose. And because the very brutes ought to pay obedience to this universal monarch, some of his elephants are taught to fall on their bellies when his majesty passes by them^a.

b NEITHER his soldiers nor military officers have any pay: but there is a province, or city, For as how with lands, given to some lord or commander, who is to maintain out of it such a number paid of men, ready to attend the wars on all occasions; and to find the palace at Ava with such provisions as the providore thinks fit to demand. In time of war, however, they are all allowed pay, provisions, clothes, and arms, which are returned into the magazines as soon as the war is over. Hence it is that discipline is but little known among this king's troops; and a man of a tolerable stock of courage may pass in those parts for a hero. This is the account of our latest travellers. But some of those who went first to Pegu admired their discipline^b. The quality of an officer is known by his tobacco-pipe. This utensil consists of three parts, c a head or bowl, a shape or shank, and a mouth-piece. The head is either of metal or clay, with a socket to let in the shaft, which is made of a jointed reed or cane: the mouth-piece is of gold, fixed on the upper end of the shaft, and, like the reed, has joints, whose number ascertains the degree of the officer, and he is respected according to that token^c.

WHAT has been said with regard to the religion, temples, and clergy, of Pegu, may serve for those of Ava; and indeed the laws, customs, and every thing else, are nearly the same in both countries, as hath been already mentioned. It remains therefore only to add a few things concerning ^a ALLISON ap. Hamilt. ubi supr. p. 42.

^b See before, p. 275, & seqq.

^c HAMILT. p. 46, & seqq.

S E C T. V.

The history of Ava.

d WHAT we have to lay before our readers on this subject is but very inconsiderable, Earliest no- and little more than what hath already occurred to him in the history of Pegu. Intices. the time of Nicolo di Conti, about 1430, it seems to have been an independent monarchy, and in a flourishing condition^a. In 1505, when Vertoman or Barthema was there, the kings of Ava and Pegu had been at war together for two years; but coming at length to a pitch'd battle, the latter obtained the victory. However, that advantage did not oblige the king of Ava to submit to him: for presently after we find the lately defeated monarch moving against his enemy, with a very numerous army, although we know not whether there ensued a second engagement, or how the war terminated; our author having left Pegu before any action happened^b.

e WE meet with nothing after this relating to the affairs of Ava, till the year 1545; when Bramas in- Parà Mandarà, the Barma king, having conquered Pegu, upon advice that the king of Ava vade intended to give a passage to the emperor of Pandalu's troops, ready to invade his dominions, marched with a numerous army to attack Prom, a city belonging to Ava, and governed by a king or regulo, who was married to him of Ava's daughter. The Barmas, by treachery, became masters of the city, which they demolished, after exercising unheard-of cruelty against the king and queen. From thence the victor proceeded to Meleytay, a fortress twelve leagues distant, which he took, after defeating the prince of Ava; and then went up the river with his forces in barks, with design to attack the city of Ava; but finding it in a very good posture of defence, and hearing that a powerful assistance was coming to it from the mountains of Pandalu, he returned to Prom, and put off his enterprise against Ava till he had strengthened himself by an alliance with some other powers^c.

f PARA MANDARA, after this, being engaged in other wars, no farther attempts were made and conquer against Ava during his reign. But as soon as his successor Cbaumigrem was settled in the Ava throne, which was in the year 1553, he formed in his mind the conquest of all the neigh- A. D. 1553. bouring kingdoms: of which, no doubt, that of Ava was one of the first, although the

^a See PURCH. pilgr. vol. iii. p. 158, & seq. before, p. 255.

^b VERTOMAN ap. Willes's collect. p. 402.

^c See precise date of this event is not marked by authors. However, it must have been precedent ^a to his expedition against Jangoma and the Laos, which latter was performed in 1585, or at farthest ^d.

Pegu empire destroyed.

UPON the death of Chaunigrem, in 1583, the king of Ava, who was his brother, and uncle to his successor Pranjinoko, refused obedience to his nephew; who thereupon invaded and slew him in single combat. After this, Ava remained in subjection to the crown of Pegu during the life of this monarch: but, at his death, the kingdom of Pegu being quite ruined, and the monarchy dissolved, the king of Arrakan took possession of Pegu; and it is not to be doubted but that, at the same time, Ava became independent, under a sovereign of its own. Who this new king was, does not appear from any of the authors before us. Naydu, eldest son of Pranjinoko, and king of Ava, we are told, deserting his father during the siege of Pegu, in 1599, was slain by order of his aunt, the queen of Tangu. There were, indeed, two other sons, named Shimi Kolia and Markettâm, prisoners at the court of Arrakan; one of whom might have been advanced to the throne of Ava by the king of Arrakan. But if so, it was not till after the expedition against Sirian in 1603 or 4, in which those princes accompanied the prince of Arrakan: and it is not likely that the throne of Ava should have been vacant so long. Besides, if that had been the case, it may be presumed that the king of Arrakan would have obliged his captive to have relinquished his title to Pegu, as a condition of his advancement: whereas we find him no more acting as lord of Pegu after the year 1607. ^b

Recovers
again.

HOWEVER that be, the king of Ava was a Barma, and, in all probability, of the Pegu line. ^c He was likewise a prince of courage, and had begun already to extend his dominions. It is probable that the king of Arrakan, seeing him grown powerful, yielded up the kingdom of Pegu to him, without disputing his title: after which he turned his arms against the king of Tangu, and obliged him to become tributary. The next, and indeed only farther transaction of this prince, which occurs in our authors, is his expedition against Sirian, which yielded to his arms, after it had more than once baffled the united forces of the king of Arrakan and his confederates. The taking of Sirian happened in 1613: and, two or three years after, viz. in 1615 or 16, we find the kingdom and city of Jangomay or Jangoma recovered by the king of Ava, from him of Siam, who reduced it about 1604.

Royal seat removed

THIS, from his martial spirit, we take to be the same king with him who had before subjugated Tangu, and reduced Sirian. We are told that he was nephew to the former king, whom he succeeded, in prejudice to that prince's children. From whence it appears that Ava had two kings, since the great revolution of Pegu in the year 1600, unless we suppose this victorious prince to have been a nephew of Pranjinoko, last king of Pegu. However that be, it is certain that he removed the imperial seat from the city of Ava to that of Pegu, which began to flourish again after its late destruction: for in 1619 the English found him there with his court ^e. Since that time it is probable, that the kings or emperors of both those dominions have resided sometimes at one capital, sometimes at another; but it is uncertain when they transferred it last to Ava, where it at present is, and seems to have been fixed for above a century past: possibly because, being more towards the centre of the empire, the king ^e is nearer at hand to keep the conquered countries in obedience.

to Ava city.

HOWEVER that be, the court seems to have been at Ava about that time: for we are told that the Lanjans, or Laos, who had been carried into Pegu by the Barma conqueror, in process of time took arms, and forced their way home, with the destruction of all the Peguers who opposed them. Hereupon the king of Ava, perceiving it difficult to reduce them again by force, designed to surprise them under colour of amity; but died in 1647, before he could execute his intentions: and, to prevent his successor, they invaded his dominions, committing great spoil on the frontiers of Pegu, which they carried away without any opposition from the king of Ava; who, being hated by his subjects, feared they might take that opportunity to revolt. Notwithstanding this, they must have been obliged to submit shortly after: for in 1652 we find them tributary to Ava, as will appear in our account of those people ^f.

^a See PURCH. pilgr. vol. iii. p. 168. also before, p. 262.
deser. Tonquin, &c. p. 368.

^c See before, p. 271, & seq.

^f MARINI

C H A P. VI.

The country or kingdom of Jangoma.

- a IT hath been already observed, that Europeans know little or nothing of the dominions of the Avan empire, from its capital northwards, to the borders of China, either as to the different kingdoms and states it contains, or even the country and inhabitants. We only find, in general, from the journal of the four Chineses above-mentioned, that after they passed out of the provinces of Yun-nan they met with nothing but deserts for five days together: but from thenceforward the country put on another aspect; and they found plantations along the river every day. Whether this be the condition of the country along the frontiers of the two empires of China and Ava, as far as the territories of the Laos, which bounds the latter step eastward, we cannot determine, for want of sufficient information. We only know, in general, from the observations of the latitudes made at the capital of Ava, and along the borders of China, joined to the surveys of Tibet and Yun-nan, communicated by the Jesuits, that there must be a large space of country within the above-mentioned limits; and that, according to the tradition of the Siamites, the Laos and the other neighbouring empires, it was formerly inhabited by a very powerful people, who had formed a dominion of vast extent.

- THESE people were named Tay yay, that is, the great freemen, or Franks; so they are called at present, both by the Chineses and Siameses. They were situated to the north of these latter; who acknowledging themselves to be descended from them, take the name of Tay me, or the little freemen. Their country is called by the Chineses, Ko-sang-pye, and was, according to them, three months journey in length, and governed by priests^a. These people were probably called by the Peguers, Sions or Siams; which, in their language, we are told signifies tree: and from them, doubtless, the Portugueses took the name of Siam, for it is not known in the country itself. It is probable, likewise, that the Laos are descended from the same people; and hence they might have gotten the name of Sions, or Siams Maons; and the rather, as the Siamites are alleged to be derived from the Laos^b.

- HOWEVER that be, we think we may here find the original of Mendez Pinto's two mighty empires of the Siamon and Kalaminbam, which he places in the region in question. He had heard some reports concerning the Sions Maons, or the great Siams; and of a country governed by priests: and, from these slender notices, has formed two mighty empires out of his own fertile imagination, as existing at the time when he was in Pegu^c. But not knowing the just distance of China, and other bordering countries, has made them larger than is consistent with the at present tolerably well known limits of this part of the Avan empire.

PERE DU HALDE, from the circumstance of this country being governed by priests, takes Tay-yay for Lassa, and Ko-sang-pyi for Barantola, where the Grand Lama of Tibet resides^d. But there is no manner of occasion for removing Tibet out of its place, in order to account for this singularity; since it is enough to suppose that one of the Khûtuktûs, or deputies of the Great Lama, resided formerly in these parts: and indeed the religion professed all over the farther peninsula of the Indies is evidently derived from that of Tibet.

- THE Chinese memoir places Ko-sang-pyi, or the country of the Tay-yay, to the west of Leng, one of the northern provinces of the Laos; and says that it is, at present, no more than a vast forest, contiguous to that of Pabima Pan, which lies to the west of the other^e. Whether this be fact, or only agreeable to the imperfect ideas which those strangers may have conceived of these parts, we know not: but this is certain, that Jangoma is the only country, in all the large region in question, which travellers have brought us acquainted with.

THE kingdom of Jangoma, or Jangomay (A), lies in the most south part of the above-mentioned region, directly north of Siam; having the territories of the Laos on the east, and the kingdom of Ava proper on the west. As to its extent we are quite at a loss, no traveller having mentioned it. However, we may conclude it not to be very inconsiderable, from the number of forces which we are told its king could raise; namely, ordinarily 350,000, and, upon occasion, one million^f.

- MENDEZ PINTO pretends, that, in the year 1545, he passed thro' the kingdom of Janguma, in his fictitious journey to the court of the Kalaminban: but we have more reason to believe our Fitch was there, who, in 1587, travelled from the city of Pegu, shaping his

^a LOUPIERE relat. Siam, p. 7. DU HALDE's descr. China, vol. i. p. 62.

^b LOUPIERE, ubi sup.

^c See before, p. 247 & 255.

^d DU HALDE, ubi sup. p. 62.

^e Ibid.

^f HAYLS de reb. Japon.

&c. p. 748.

(A) Pinto writes, Janguma; Meth. Li, Zangomay; some Jagoman, and Jang-m-m.

course north-east, through many fruitful countries; and, at the end of twenty-five days, with the Karawân, arrived at the city of Jamabey. He found the country very flat, and full of rivers. Wild buffaloes and elephants were numerous: and the houses in the villages very ordinary, being made of canes, and covered with straw.

Jamabey, or Chiamay, city.

THE city of Jamabey is very populous, fair, and large: the houses built with stone, and the streets very wide^a. This is all the account Fitch gives us of this city, which we conceive to be the same called by Mendez Pinto and others Chiamay. According to the Siameses, this last is situated on the river Menin, which crosses Jangoma, as well as Siam, from north to south, about sixteen days journey more north than the frontiers of that kingdom: but, as the journies are by water, and against the stream, Loubiere computes the distance to be between sixty and seventy leagues at most^b. However, we reckon the distance to be much exaggerated by these foreigners; and, deducting for the windings of the river, judge Chiamay to lie north from Siam, in a direct line, not above ninety miles; nor to exceed the latitude of twenty degrees thirty minutes (B).

MENDEZ PINTO, and Le Blanc after him, makes a lake of the same name, called also by him Kunabetee and Singapamor; from whence he derives the Menan, which he terms Ventrau, and other great rivers^c: but the Siameses, who had been at the taking of Chiamay about 1657, knew nothing of the aforesaid lake.

The inhabitants.

FITCH says that Jamabey is in the country of the Lanjoyannes (or Lenjeyans), whom Europeans call Jangomas; by which he would intimate that these are different names for the same people, which may possibly be the case: but we may rather suppose them two different nations: for Jangoma lying between two great powers, those of Ava and the Lanjans, who are a branch of the Laos, has sometimes been subject to one, sometimes to the other. Before it was conquered by Chaumigrem, king of Pegu, about 1551, it had probably been, for a long series of years, in the hands of the Lanjans, who might have become more numerous than the old possessors, or even extirpated them. But whether Jangomas be the name of the old inhabitants, or only an appellation given to the Lanjans by the Peguers, Siamites, or some other of their neighbours, this is certain, that Jangoma is a different country from that of Lanjang; and the city of Jamabey, or Chiamay, 200 miles, perhaps, distant from its capital, which bears the same name^d.

Dress and diet.

THE inhabitants of Jamabey, or Chiamay, are well-set and strong. Their dress is very simple, consisting only in a cloth wrapped about them: and they wear bells in their privy members, like the people of Pegu and Ava. They go both with their head and feet bare; for, in all these countries, they wear no shoes. The women are fairer than those of Pegu. Provisions are exceeding plenty: but they make use of rice-cakes instead of bread; there being no wheat in all those parts.

Their funerals.

WHEN any are sick in these countries, they make a vow to offer meat to the devil in case they recover. On which occasion they then prepare a banquet, and invite their friends, who bring presents of fruit: and while they are dancing to the sound of drums, pipes, and other instruments, they offer meat to the devil, accompanied with much shouting, in order to drive him away. During their illness, a Talepoy or two sit by them every night, and sing, with a view to sooth the devil, that he may not do them hurt. When a person dies, his corpse is carried on a sort of frame-work, made of canes, with a covering at top, which is gilt all over. This machine, carried by fourteen or sixteen men, is preceded by several sorts of music, and accompanied by the male friends of the deceased; in which order being conveyed to a place out of town, it is there burnt. On this occasion the priests have a present of mats and linen. After the funeral is over, a feast is made, which is kept for two days; and then the wife of the deceased, attended with all her she-friends and neighbours, go to the place where the body was burned, and there lamenting, while they pick up the pieces of bones which remain unburned, bury them. This is all their mourning, excepting that both men and women shave their heads, in case the defunct be some very dear friend; otherwise not, for they are very fond of their hair^e.

Trade and commodities.

PIMENTA says the country of Jangoma (of which we suppose Jamabey or Chiamay to be the capital) abounds with musk, pepper, silk, silver, gold, and copper^f. But Fitch confines its native commodities to copper and benjamin: however making the rest to be brought in by the Chineses, who trade thither^g. In 1613 Floris sent goods from Siam to Jangomay, to try the trade there; and, in 1615 or 16, one Thomas Samuel was sent thither from the same country, upon the same account: at which time the king of Pegu and Ava invading Jangomay, con-

^a FITCH ap. Purch. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1740. & 165.

^b FITCH, ubi sup. p. 1740.

^c LOUBIERE, ubi sup. p. 3.

^d Ibid. ubi sup.

^e Ibid. p. 1746.

^f PINTO's Voy. p. 40.

^g Ibid. ubi sup.

(B) This is as much, we think, as can be allowed for its latitude; since then it will lie mid-way between the frontiers of Siam and Yun-nan in China. Whereas Loubiere's map puts it in twenty-five degrees; which is three degrees more north than the borders of Yun-nan, under the same meridian with Chiamay, really are.

a quered it from the king of Siam, and carried Samuel, with all other strangers, prisoners to Pegu °.

JANGOMA, or Jangomay, was formerly an independent kingdom; but when it first became subject to some of the neighbouring powers, does not appear from history. It seems to have been under a prince of its own in 1556, when Cbaumigrem, the great Barma king of Pegu, reduced it under his dominion, before he subdued the Laos ^p. It continued in this state during the reign of that monarch and his successor, whose brother was made governor of it, with the title of king, probably in the reign of their father, as we find another of his sons was, at his death, king or regulo of Ava. In the midst of the distractions which afflicted Pegu in 1598, the king of Jangoma was persuaded by the priests to dethrone his brother Pranjinoko: this he might easily have done, if, as it is said, he was able to bring into the field 350,000 men; and even a million in case of necessity^q. But while he delayed putting his design in execution (if, in reality, he had formed it), the kings of Tangu and Arrakan joining their forces, took the work out of his hands, and destroyed the kingdom of Pegu. However, to be revenged for the disappointment, as well as get share of the spoil, he, in the year 1600, joined with the Rajah Api, called the black king of Siam, against him of Tangu, whom they invaded together^r. But it does not appear what was the issue of that war. Possibly the king of Tangu bought his peace, by giving them part of the plunder, as he did the king of Arrakan.

c Not long after this, the king of Siam falling out with him of Jangoma, who, on the destruction of Pegu, was become independent, conquered his country, and also that of Lan-jang. This must happened between the years 1600 and 1605, in which last Rajah Api died. Jangoma continued as a province of Siam during the reign of his successor, who died in 1610; but, in 1612, we find the king of Ava and Pegu attempting the recovery of those countries^s; and about three years after got Jangoma into his possession^t. What changes have happened afterwards in this country we are not sufficiently acquainted with: we only know that, about the year 1657, the king of Siam took Chiamay, and carried away the inhabitants; with whom it was soon after repeopled by the king of Ava ^u. But, in 1690, we find it in the hands of its old masters the Laos; since we are told that Lanjang and Chiamay were then two principal cities^x.

° New collect. voy. vol. i. p. 441.
ap. Hayes, de reb. Japan. &c. p. 748.
ap. Purch. vol. v. p. 1006.

^p DA CRUZ ap. Purch. vol. iii. p. 168, & seq.
^r Ibid. ^s FLORIS, ubi supr. p. 439.
^u KEMP. ibid. ^x LOUBIERE, p. 3. KEMP. p. 26.

^q PIMENTA
^t METHOLD.

C H A P. VII.

The kingdom of Lawhos, or Laos

S E C T. I.

The bounds, name, mountains, rivers, provinces, and cities. Errors of geographers.

a THE country of Lawhos, Lao, or of the Laos; of which Jangoma was originally, or by conquest, a part; taken in its largest sense, is bounded on the west by the dominions of Ava and Siam; on the north, with the province of Yun-nan, or Jun-nan, in China (A); on the east, with Tong-king; and on the south, with Kamboja. It is situated between the 15th or 16th and the 22d degrees (B) of latitude, and between the 119th and 122d degrees of longitude; so that the territories of the Laos, taken all together, may extend in length from south to north about 420 geographic miles, and in breadth from west to east about 180 (C), although most geographers make it scarce half so much. It is surrounded on all sides by mountains covered with forests (D), which serve as ramparts to secure it, and break the force of a rapid torrents which descend from thence into the plains^a.

(A) Marini places on the west Pegu, on the north Ava, with the province named U and Lu; extending it still more north, to the borders of the people called Gnay.

(B) Marini makes it extend from 14° to 22° 30', the space of 500 geographic miles from south to north. Marini hist. de Tunq. et de Lao, p. 329.

(C) That is, 483 English miles one way, and 203 the other; its extent northward, along the borders of China, is marked in the Jesuits map at above one degree and a half.

Name.

THE name generally given by travellers to this region is Lao, or the country of the Laos; by some, as Pinto, written Laubos, or Lawbos (E). Da Cruz says^b, the Laos are by some (but whom he nameth not) called Siones Maons (F); and Marini says, that this country is more properly called the kingdom of the Lanjens, than of Lao^c. But we apprehend that this is giving to the whole, what belongs only to a part, which has for its capital Lanjan, or Lan-jang; as the northern part, or perhaps the whole, has for its metropolis Leng. With regard to the name of Siones Maons, it seems to be given to the Laos on account of the great Siams, called Tay-yay^d, who possessed the country to the west of Lao, and of whom the Laos probably are the remains.

Mountains and rivers.

THE country of Lao, or of the Laos, seems to be for the general flat, and to have scarce any hills or mountains but those which encompass it on all sides, and serve as barriers against the potent kingdoms with which it is inclosed. From these mountains descend infinite rivulets, which drain into one large river, that crosses the whole region from north to south (G). The source of this river has been but little known to former geographers; but the Jesuits, of late, have fixed it with great precision. According to their map of China, it rises in the north-west borders of the province of Yun-nan (H). Near its source it is called Lan-tsan Kyang; and where it enters the kingdom of Lao, within ten miles of the east border (I), it bears the name of Ku-long Kyang. The Laos calls it Menan Kong; in its passage southwards it washes the cities of Lê, Kyong-kong, Kyang-seng, and Lan-chang (K) (or Lang-jang); afterwards it enters the kingdom of Kamboja, which it crosses, and falls into the sea at Bonsak.

The Menan Kong.

FROM Kyang-kong, downwards to its mouth, it carries large barks: but from Lê, upwards, it bears none: so that one is obliged to travel from thence to Yun-nan by land^e. Although such a number of streams fall into this river, yet, we are told, that it never overflows, by reason of a causey, fifteen or sixteen feet high, which runs along its banks, and prevents inundations, even in those years when the rains have fallen in the greatest abundance. As soon as this river enters Kamboja, its waters seem to change their qualities; so that the fish, which pass the frontiers, die immediately: in like manner, such as ascend the stream from Kamboja into Lao, feel the same effect; which surprising circumstance has given occasion to the proverb, Strange effect.

Each in his own kingdom. The rivers usually swell with the heavy rains, which begin to fall in May; and sometimes with the quantity of snow, when it melts on the mountains of Tibet, which are seen from Lao. This great increase of water continues commonly from September to January, yet without interrupting commerce, or the transportation of merchandizes. It is true, that they who are obliged to ascend the stream are extremely incommoded, not only on account of haling the bark along, but also from the rays of the sun, which cast a heat like that of a furnace.

Navigation dangerous.

FOR all this, it is much safer to sail against the stream than with it; for the current is so rapid, that the bark seems to fly as swift as an arrow out of a bow; and, by the violence of the motion, is often overset, or sunk downright, and all the goods lost. For this reason, when they arrive at the place which separates the two kingdoms, it is necessary to unload the bark, destroy one part of it, and make use of waggons to convey the commodities for the space of three miles over land; while the barge-men employ ten days in haling up the residue of the vessel through the falls by force of arms. A missionary proposed to remedy this inconvenience by means of sluices; but the king would not consent to destroy what he deemed a strong barrier.

Errors about it.

TRAVELLERS have fallen into errors, with regard to the course of this river, misled, doubtless, by the reports of the people in these parts. Marini says, that a few leagues beyond Lao it begins to carry boats, and divides into two great branches (L): one, running west, passes through Pegu into the gulf of Bengâl; the other, forcing through rocks, spreads in several

^a MARINI hist. Tunq. & Lao, p. 331. p. 329.

^d See before, p. 283.

^b Ap. PURCH. vol. iii. p. 168.

^c DU HALDE descript. China, vol. i. p. 63.

^e MARINI, ubi supr.

(D) Kämpfer says, it is separated from the neighbouring states by forests and defarts. Voy. to Japan, p. 26.

(E) The Chineses call them Lau, and their country Lau Chwa, or kingdom of Lau. Lao is the Portuguese pronunciation.

(F) From this name, possibly, Pinto has made his Siamon and Mons, as before has been observed. Sion, is the Portuguese way of pronouncing Siam.

(G) Much after the same manner that the Nile does Egypt, to which this country bears some resemblance, excepting that the Menan Kong does not overflow the neighbouring lands. Hence it is perhaps, that, as Kämpfer observes, the soil, being a fat clay, is so hard in summer that they thresh their rice on it.

(H) Latitude 27° 30' Long. from Paris 96° 40' and 27° 20' west of Peking.

(I) Lat 21° 40' Long. 99° 5'

(K) Afterwards, p. 64. a different river is said to pass by Kyang Kong and Lanjang. But the memoir, whence our account is taken, is not very exact.

(L) Mention is made of other rivers in Lao, as the Menan Tay, or Lay, which is full of rocks; it rises in a mountain near the city Kemarat, and falls into the Menan Kong near Bankiop. 2. The river of Siam, rises in mount Kyang-Daw. 3. The Kyanghay, or Lay, falls into the principal river of Siam, called Menan. Du Halde China, vol. i. p. 62.

a chanel through the kingdom of Lao, and divides it from north to south¹. On the other hand, Kämpfer tells us, that a branch of the Ganges runs through this country, and falling into the river of Kamboja renders it navigable². But the map of the Jesuits, above-mentioned, discovers these informations to be false, no less than that of Mendez Pinto, who derives all the great rivers of this peninsula from a fictitious lake.

We meet with very little in authors touching either the cities or provinces of this kingdom. Marini indeed tells us, that it contains seven provinces³; but mentions not the name of one. cities. As to cities, besides Jamabay, or Chiamay, the capital of Jangoma, we find the names of several others; with an account of some of them, and their distances one from another, in a journal of some Chinese merchants, of the road they took from Siam to China in the year 1652.

b Whether all the names of places are those used in the country, or by the Chinese only, we cannot resolve: but, as that journal contains nearly all which we have relating to the geography of this region, we shall give our readers some extracts from it.

THESE merchants set out on horieback from Kyang-hay (M), or Kyau, on the borders of Siam, and in seven days got to Kyang-seng; in seven others they came to Kemerat; and in eight more to Leng, capital of Laos. The way hitherto was full of woods, rivers, and settlements, for the most part impassable for waggons (N); but free from either wild beasts or robbers. From Leng they were seven days going to Lé, and eleven more on the road to Meng; in all forty stages: here they turned northward to get into Tun-nan (O), from whence, in a short time, they arrived in *China*⁴. Here then we have an account of a road almost through the whole extent of Lao; from south to north. It is true, that this itinerary is defective, inasmuch as the situation neither of Kyang hay nor Meng (the two terms of the journey) is fixed, by their distance being marked from some known place. For all that, it is of considerable use, as the positions of the intermediate places are in good measure ascertained; the rather as we find two of them, Lé and Kyang-seng, are seated on the Menan Kong. To these may be added Kyang-kong, lying between those two cities, and Lan-chang (or Lan-jang), standing lower down than Kyang-seng, upon the same river. More than this, we have the latitude of Lan-jang (if it may be depended on) to regulate the position of the whole. So that, by means of these materials, joined to the description which is given of the above-mentioned places, we may be said to know more of the inland parts of Lao, than of any other country in the farther peninsula of India, Siam and Pegu excepted.

BUT, before we proceed farther, it will be necessary to say something more with respect to the situation and dimensions of Lao, which the geographers seem to have been much mistaken in. Mr. De L'Isle, it is true, has given this country its due extent from south to north; but has reduced its bounds from east to west to a narrow gut of land. He has likewise placed Lanchang in twenty degrees of latitude (P); in consequence of which situation Kyang-seng, Leng, and other cities, are placed too much northward; and the distance between Kyang-hay and Meng, which is forty days journey, is reduced to less than half that measure. This was owing to his relying too much on Loubiere's map of Siam, which places the northern borders of that country in twenty-three degrees of latitude; and consequently near one degree and a half more northward than the southern bounds of China. Mr. Bellin, in his late map (Q), has given Siam the same extent; but, that the frontiers of the two kingdoms might not appear to break-in upon each other, he has taken care to make those of China give way, by removing them two or three degrees more eastward than they ought.

THIS procedure in Mr. Bellin is the more surprising, as he could not but know the bounds of China had been determined both by measures and astronomical observations (R); whereas it does not appear that those of Siam towards the north were at all regulated mathematically, or that the map, published by Loubiere, was drawn with any accuracy; on the contrary, that author declares himself, that he does not think it correct. Methinks therefore Mr. Bellin ought to have taken the contrary course; and, instead of altering the bounds of China, as laid down in the Jesuits map, have placed those of Siam three or four degrees more to the south. By this way only room can be made for inserting the places mentioned in the Chinese journal: and, in this case, Lan-chang must be removed lower. Which shews that the latitude

¹ MARINI, ubi supr. p. 333, & seq.

² DU HALDE, ubi supr. p. 61.

³ KÄMPFER hist. Japan. p. 27.

⁴ MARINI, p. 359.

(M) In the journal, the word Meang is prefixed to the name of each place; but as it signifies no more than city, or colony, we have omitted it. This word is variously written by authors, Moang, Muang, Mong, Meuang, Mehang, Moan, and the like.

(N) Kämpfer observes, p. 26. that the road from Siam to Lao is troublesome by land, on account of the high mountains; and by water, on account of the rocks and cataracts in the river Menan, which runs through Siam.

(O) In the original Vi-nan, which, with the Vi reversed, makes Yun-nan.

(P) Mr. Bellin, in his map of Siam, Tonquin, &c. inserted in Mr. Prevost's hist. gen. des voy. tom. ix. puts Lan-chang near half a degree higher.

(Q) Mentioned in the foregoing note.

(R) As the map of the Jesuits was not published till after the time of Mr. De L'Isle, he is the more excusable.

of eighteen degrees, giving to it by Marini, must be much nearer the truth than that assigned either by him or Mr. De L'Isle.

Account of travellers

THE country of Lao considered at large, is commonly represented as subject to a single monarch; and Marini expressly affirms as much, informing us farther, that Lao contains seven provinces; that the royal seat was at Lanjan; and that the proper name of Lao is Lanjans^k. On the other hand, we find by the journal of the Chinese merchants, who travelled through the country much about the same time when the missionary was there; that there were two kingdoms within the region of Labos, or Laos, namely, Kemerat and Leng: which latter, they tell us, is more properly called Labos; and that its chief city is the capital of Labos: and a third author names a fourth kingdom, named Tbiem, with a certain wild people called Ke-moy, who have neither king nor religion; both bordering on Kochinchina to the north-west^l. To reconcile these different accounts, we must suppose the following things, viz. that Marini ascribes to the whole what only belongs to a part of the country: that the whole is divided into several distinct kingdoms or parts: that it is inhabited by several nations; different, at least, in name and interest: that the Lanjans are, in this sense, a distinct people from the Labos; although originally they might have been all the same people, going under the name of Labos, or Laos, till they came to be divided under different princes.

very defective.

MARINI is not the only traveller who has applied to the whole what only belongs to a part. Kæmpfer, speaking of the Laos, informs us, that their two chief cities are Lanjang and Cbiamay^m. But if Lao was here to be understood in its full extent, we should imagine Leng would have been joined with Lanjang; and not Cbiamay, which is a city of Jangomay, a province or part belonging to the jurisdiction of Lanjang. It is evident from hence, that Kæmpfer knew nothing of the provinces of Lao, to the north of Lanjan; and although Marini extends the country of Lao as far as China, yet he supposes the whole to be under the jurisdiction of the king of Lanjan; and to be inhabited by Lanjans. At the same time both these authors acknowledge Lanjan to be inhabited by the Laos; only the latter says, that the name of Lanjans more properly belongs to them.

Division of Lao.

THE defects of European travellers is in good measure supplied by the Chinese memoirs: but although Lanchang, or Lanjang, is therein occasionally spoken of, it is not said to be the capital of a kingdom; nor is any mention made of the kingdom of Lanjang, because the author of it does not enter into the description of any place which he was not at; and therefore, there may have been other kingdoms or states in Labos, besides those two specified in the journal: for this reason we shall not pretend to divide this country into its particular kingdoms or provinces, but content ourselves with dividing it into two great parts only; one called the northern, or proper Lao; the other, the southern Lao, or kingdom of Lanjang.

^k MARINI hist. Tunq. & Lao, p. 329, 359.

^l CHOISY voy. de Siam, p. 563.

^m KÆMPFER, p. 27.

S E C T. II.

The southern Lao, or kingdom of Lanjang.

The name.

THE kingdom of Lanjan, Lanjang, or Lanchang, as others pronounce it, would seem to most persons to derive its name from that of its capital city: but we are told, it takes that denomination from the great numbers of elephants with which the country abounds; the word Lanjens, or Lanjans, signifying properly, *thousands of elephants*ⁿ.

Its dimensions.

WE cannot precisely determine the extent of this southern Lao, or Lau, from south to north, authors not having so much as mentioned any city subordinate to that of its capital; or indeed in the whole country, excepting Cbiamay may be considered as one. However, upon a supposition that Kyang-seng, which is situated on the Menan Kong, to the north of Lanjang, belongs to the northern province, and is not far from the frontiers of the southern; this latter will extend to near the nineteenth degree of latitude, and consequently, containing almost four degrees in extent from north to south, will have the larger half of Lao to its share; as its breadth from west to east will be equal to that of the other; but, in case we comprise Jangoma within its limits, the breadth will be augmented perhaps a hundred miles, or more. Upon this footing, the province or kingdom of Lanjang will be near twice as large as the northern Lao.

Climate very healthy.

THE climate of this country is somewhat more temperate than that of Tongking, but exceedingly more healthful: so that one meets with old men, of a hundred and a hundred-and-twenty years of age, who are as robust and vigorous as if they were but fifty.

ⁿ MARINI, p. 337.

(S) The Chinese in about 1652, and Marini in 1657 or 1658.

a^r THE soil is generally very good, being rendered fruitful by a great number of canals cut from the great river (Menan Kong); which serve both to water the lands on each side, and drain-off the streams, made either by the torrents descending from the hills, or the great rains which fall at stated times, so that they never make any marshes or stagnant pools in the country. It is remarkable, that the lands on the eastern side of the river are vastly better and more fertile than those on the western side: the very animals, such as elephants and unicorns (A), are larger. The rice too is incomparable, and of a particular scent as well as flavour. The forest and other trees are high, strait, and, for the general, incorruptible; qualities wanting in those on the western side, where they are ill-shaped, and the rice so hard that it is scarce fit for boiling. As soon as the rains begin to cease, certain southerly winds blow, and the lands, which had been sow with rice immediately after the harvest, produce a kind of scum, which, covering this champain like snow for several miles, is hardened with the sun, and becomes solid salt. There is so great a quantity of it produced in this manner, that not only the whole kingdom is supplied with it, at a very trifling expence, but enough is left to serve strangers, who come every year and carry away as much as they think fit. Then the new rains, which succeed this second gathering, cleanse and meliorate the soil in such a manner as gives the rice that delicious taste above-mentioned, which the rice of other countries hath not.

THE principal drugs found in this kingdom are benjamin and lakka ^b.

THE benjamin is reckoned the best in the east, and is found in great abundance. The tree, Benjamin, from which it distils, grows mostly in the mountains. The leaves are like those of the chestnut-tree, and the flower very beautiful, being white and odoriferous like those of orange-trees. The fruit likewise is sweet scented, of the shape and bigness of an acorn, but very ill-tasted, and degenerates when planted in foreign soils; yet, as the gum produces a great revenue to the king, the Lanjans are forbidden to sell the fruit to strangers.

THE lakka, or lakre, which is used in making Spanish wax, is nothing but a certain kind of earth, found in forests round about the ant-hills, and with which those insects cover the surface of their little territories for the use of their magazines.

THERE is not better ivory, nor greater plenty of it, in any country than this; and no wonder, since it has its name from the number of elephants found in it, as hath been already mentioned. But the unicorn's (or rather rhinoceros's) horn, is the thing most prized by the Lanjans; from a belief, that whoever is possessed of one may command fortune. And as some have more virtue than others, when a person is advanced to a new post, he sells the horn which he had before, and buys another, of a better kind, at the expence of several hundred crowns. His next care is to hide it so effectually that he shall be in no danger of having it stolen, and so deprived of all the good-luck which they think inseparable from it ^c.

As the forests are of great extent, and the plains enamelled with variety of flowers, they make abundance of honey, wax, and cotton. One meets also with several mines of iron, lead, and tin, in which they are at work. Gold and silver also are found here; but the inhabitants gather those metals out of certain places of the river, by means of iron nets. The utensils which are made with what they thus fish up, bring great advantages to the kingdom, but not so much as the king could wish. From the neighbouring countries they have red amber and musk, with which they drive a great trade. The amber comes from the kingdom of Ava, and is found in the forests at the roots of certain very old trees, which grow among the rocks and inaccessible places. The musk is brought from the kingdom of Gnay (B), and taken from a bag joined to the navel of an animal, which the Chineses call ye hyang, or the musk stag. The Lanjans make likewise a counterfeit musk, with ambergris, and the juice drawn from the body of a cat, which they call algalia. This mixture yields a more agreeable and mild smell than the pure musk; and this kind of musk is what first appeared in Europe ^d.

THE Lanjans make great advantage of several other animals, particularly buffaloes and oxen; whose number is almost infinite, and which are employed in the service of the plains. Their garden fruit is likewise very profitable to them, as well as their excellent rice. Their rivers abound with fish of several kinds; some so large and heavy, that two men can hardly carry one of them. The smaller sorts are caught in such plenty, that a hundred-weight of them may be had for the value of five-pence. They pickle them, as we do herrings, and the poor eat them with their rice; which is their ordinary food ^e. According to Kæmpfer, Lao produces precious stones, especially rubies; also pearls, called by the Siamites, muk; which that author esteems

^a MARINI, p. 337.

^b Ibid. hist. Tunq. & Lao, p. 332, 335, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 337, & seq.

^d Ibid. p. 337, & seq.

^e Ibid. p. 341.

(A) By unicorns, probably, are to be understood rhinoceroses.

(B) The Gnay are a nation bordering on China, with which they have much commerce. Marini, p. 331. They seem to lie on the north-west part of the upper Lao.

the more strange, as the country does not lie near any salt sea^f: but probably his surprize a would have ceased, had he known of the above-mentioned saline quality of the land, which must needs be communicated to the flooding waters.

Provinces.

THE kingdom of Lanjans contains seven provinces, and several considerable cities; for what Marini ascribes to Lao in general^g, we apply, for the reason already taken notice of, to Lanjan in particular. But this correction, if it be one, is of no great advantage to us, since that author neither describes, nor so much as mentions the name of any one of them all, excepting the capital Lanjan. On this occasion, we cannot forbear censuring the negligence of travellers, especially the missionaries, who have frequented this, and the neighbouring countries (C); yet in their relations treat of them so superficially, that the reader is no way benefited by what they publish. Thus geography receives little or no improvement from the b persons from whom only it can expect any; and is more obliged to the small journal of some Chinese merchants, so often mentioned, than the united informations of all the European missionaries, who have spent several years in travelling over the country. It is this silence of Marini, the almost sole author who treats expressly of Lao (D), which supports our division of that region into upper and lower, as well as our opinion, that his relation is to be confined to the latter only, although he would make it extend to the whole. For we impute his silence to his want of knowing the country; and, on his want of knowledge, we found our dissent from him. However, if Marini has mentioned but one city, amongst a great number (for one author says, there are no fewer than thirty-eight cities^h in the kingdom of Lanjang); other travellers have not done more; and what gives him the preference to all the rest, he is c the only one we meet with who describes it.

City of Lanjan.

LANJAN, written also Lanjang, and Lan-chang, according to the Chinese pronunciation, is by Marini, Choisy, and Kæmpfer, reckoned the capital of the kingdom of Lao; which words we restrain however to the territories of the Lanjans, for the reasons already mentioned. It is the city where the king usually resides, in the latitude of eighteen degrees. It is defended on one side by good ditches, and walls exceeding high; on the other by the great river (E).

King's palace.

The king's palace is of so vast extent that it may well pass for a city, both with respect to its magnitude, and the number of people who inhabit it. It appears to the view at a great distance; and is admirable, as well for its structure, as the symmetry of the buildings which compose it. The royal apartment is adorned with a magnificent portal, and a great number d of beautiful chambers, accompanied with a grand salon or hall: the whole, built with incorruptible wood, is adorned both on the inside and outside with excellent bas-reliefs, all so delicately gilded, that they seem to be covered rather with plates, than leaves of gold.

FROM the king's apartment you enter into very spacious courts, where you behold a long series of houses, all of bricks, and covered with tiles, in which usually dwell his wives of the second class; and beyond them another range of buildings, equally neat and uniform, for the officers belonging to the court. It would require a volume, says Marini, to give an exact account of the riches, gardens, and other quarters, of this sumptuous mansion.

The houses.

THE houses of the grandees, and persons of condition, are very high and fair, well contrived and ornamented: but those of the inferior people are no better than huts. The priests e alone have the privilege of building their houses and convents with brick or stone. People of fashion, instead of carpets and other furniture, make use of certain mats made of reeds, so very finely wrought, and adorned with figures of various kinds, that, in our author's opinion, nothing looks more beautiful or agreeable to the sight. With them they commonly hang the walls of their houses and their chambers, both within and without. Their apartments are exceeding neat; and they take more than ordinary care to keep them soⁱ.

^f KÆMPFER, ubi supr. p. 26.

^g MARINI, p. 348, & 359.

^h DE FARIA, Asia Portug. vol. ii. p. 11.

ⁱ MARINI, p. 341, & seq.

(C) The like may be said with regard to his account of Tong-king; also Borri's of Kochin-china; in short, the voyages of Alexander de Rhodes, and other missionaries, into those countries.

(D) Gio. Philip. Marini, a Jesuit, published several relations in Italian, in five books: among which those of Tonquin and Lao have been translated into French, and published in 1666. From a note of Mr. La Croze, hist. du Christ. p. 51. the account of Lao seems to have been written by Leria, a Jesuit; for we have not seen the Italian of Marini.

(E) Or the Menan Kong; which, according to the Chinese journal, afterwards enters Kamboja, as if at no great distance.

S E C T. III.

The Northern Lao, or Laho.

a WE consider the territories within these limits as the proper country of the people called Extant. Lao, Lau, or Labo (A), distinct from that of the Lan-jans, which bounds it on the south. Its extent, from south to north, is about three degrees, or 21⁰ English miles; and its breadth the same with the whole country in general, already mentioned.

THE country, soil, and produce, are much of the same nature with those of Lan-jiang. However, every province seems to have something peculiar to it in those respects. But the number of provinces is not mentioned by authors, unless we suppose Marini's seven to be comprehended in both the northern and southern Lao. All the account we have, relating to them, is contained in the Chinese memoir or journal, so often before cited; and that only mentions two or three large provinces at most, each of which has under it several lesser provinces or districts, whereof we find the names, with some light concerning their situations: the whole subject to Ava.

b 'The most southern of the provinces or districts mentioned in the Chinese journal, is Kyang-seng, seven days journey from Kyang-bay, or Kyay, on the frontiers of Siam. This is all we meet with relating to this province, excepting that, as to its situation, it lies north of the province, excepting that, as to its situation, it lies north of the province or district of Kyang-bay, and south of that of Kemerat. The chief city of that name also stands on the river Menân Kong, which from thence flows southward, into the kingdom of Lan-chang or Lanjan. The denomination of Mohang is prefixed to all the local names inserted in the journal, and signifies, as it is applied, either province, district, colony, or city (B): but we have omitted c it, to avoid a needless repetition^a.

THE province of Kemerat next occurs. It is bounded on the east by that of Lé, on the north by Lang (C), on the south by Kyang-seng and Kyang-bay. After this account of its bounds there is subjoined another; for, we are told, Vay, Rong, Ngong, Labi, Maa, and Laa, lie to the east; Hang, Kroa, Loey, Jang, and Pen, to the north. Possibly the first bounds respect the province of Kemerat in general, and the latter relate to the district of Kemerat in particular; for it is added, that these eleven cities or colonies are in the jurisdiction of Kemerat. We are farther informed, that it is one day's journey from the city of Hang to Kroa; and the same from Loey to Jang. This province of Kemerat is said to be 400 senes (D) in compass, and eight days journey in length: its capital city, of the same name, seven days d journey from Kyang-sang, is situate on the river Menân-tay, or Menân-lay, which falls into the Menân-kong towards the town of Bankiop; lying, as we judge, to the south-east from Kemerat, and between the cities of Kyang-kong and Kyang-seng. When the Chinese passed through it, a king resided there, named Prachyau Otang, who was tributary to Hawa or Ava, and sent ambassadors thither every year with his acknowledgements, consisting of two small shrubs, one having its leaves and flowers of gold, and the other of silver.

In this country they have the use of fire-arms, great and small cannon, muskets, zagays (or darts), and cross-bows^b. While the Tartars were subduing China, in the last century, a great number of Chinese fugitives out of Yun-nan (E) fell upon, and reduced, the neighbouring territories, among which was Kemerat, whose inhabitants abandoned the city. Before e the Chinese drove those people out, they went every year to trade with them, carrying velvets, and other silks, camblets, carpets, hair, blue and black callico, musk, quicksilver, kori shells, and bonnets (or hats); kettles, and other utensils of copper; precious stones of a green colour, emeralds, gold, silver, and china-ware. In exchange for these commodities they returned with cotton-thread, ivory, an earth or medicinal paste called zhadam; a sort of medicinal wood named ingo by the Portugueses, and maha ing by the Siameses; likewise opium; kotso, a kind of medicinal root so called; and white linen cloth. All these commodities were brought from Ava; and the Chinese repaired to Kemerat in the three first months, in order to carry them home in April^c.

^a DU HALDE, ubi sup. p. 61.^b MARINI, p. 52, & seq.^c Ibid. p. 64, & seq.(A) Or terminating with an s, Laos, Laus, Labos, to denote more precisely the plural in our language. The country itself is also called Laos.(B) Moang, Mohang, Mubang, or Merg, signifies also kingdom sometimes, in the language of these countries.(C) By Lang, perhaps, is to be understood Leng.(D) This must be but a small circumference, and no way consistent with the length of eight stages; since we are told these senes, or cords, are but of eight fathoms each.(E) If this be not an interpolation of the missionaries, Pi-nan must be a different province or district from that of Yun nan.

Leng kingdom.

THE kingdom of Leng, or more properly Labos (F), has on the south Kemerat; on the east Luan and Rong-faa; on the north Put, Pling, Ken, Kaam, Paa, Saa, Boonoy, Ningneha, Kaan, and Gbin-tay, cities all depending on it; on the west it is bounded by Ko-fang-pyi, the country formerly possessed by the Tay-yay, or great Siams; and farther west is the great forest of Pabima pan. They reckon eight cities or places in this kingdom, each containing a garrison of 1000 men.

Soil and produce.

THE country of Leng produces rice in abundance; buffaloes, stags, and other animals, are common, and their flesh cheap; but fish is scarce. Five days journey north from Mobang Leng, there are mines of gold, silver, and copper; also a kind of red sulphur, which has a very stinking smell. Two hundred senes or cords from the city, on the same side, is a pit or mine of precious stones, full 100 senes deep, out of which they get rubies, some of them as big as a walnut; also emeralds, or green stones, of which the king of Labos has one as large as an orange. There are stones likewise of other colours: and a brook, which runs through the mine, carries several down its stream, which sometimes weigh two or three mas, that is, a quarter or third part of an ounce. The king draws from the silver mine above 360 katis annually. They are *Chinese*s who work in, and direct it. The merchants of Kemerat, Lê, May, Teng, Maa, Meng, Daa, and Pan, repair to this mine, which is inclosed by mountains, 300 senes in height, covered with grass, preserved continually fresh and green by the dew.

Mines of gold, silver, rubies.

THERE is found here a medicinal root, called tong-quey by the *Chinese*s, and by the *Siamese*s kot-wba-bwa. Also a tree named vendez-bang, which bears flowers about the thickness of one's finger, of a very agreeable smell, and of various colours, as red, yellow, white, and black. The fruit, when come to perfection, has the shape of a duck; and the dew falls in greatest quantity in the parts where the trees most abound.

Trade and commodities.

THE inhabitants of Leng traffick with these neighbours, who come to fetch their commodities, consisting in precious stones, gold, silver, tin, lead, sulphur, both red and common; cotton spun and unspun, tea, lak, japan, or brazil-wood, and the medicinal root above-mentioned. The merchants of Mobang (G) bring them elephants; the *Chinese*s raw and manufactured silk, with white hair, as fine as silk, and civet. Of this hair, taken from a certain animal (H), the great tufts are made which adorn the elephant's ears, on which the king of Siam rides, and hang down to the ground; also the tufts worn by the *Chinese*s on their bonnets. The western merchants from Tay-yay and Pama-bang (or Ava) bring iron, yellow and red sanders, linen, chints, or painted calicoes, venison, a kind of red medicinal paste, opium, and other commodities of Hindûstân; which they exchange for gold, silver, precious stones, &c. Lastly, those of Kemerat and Kyang-hay bring cows and buffaloes, to barter for silver, tin, and sulphur^d.

City of Leng.

THE city of Leng, capital of the Labos, is eight days journey from Kemerat, and situated on both sides of the river Menân Tay, or Menân Lay, which runs thence to Kemerat. It has neither walls nor fortrefs; being inclosed only with palisades; and in circuit about 400 senes or cords, each twenty Chinese fathoms. Rice is so plenty in this city, that one may have fifty or sixty pounds of it for a few halfpence. Fish, indeed, is scarce; but, to make amends, the markets abound with the flesh of buffaloes, stags, and other animals. The months of May, June, and July, are the season for fruit, of which all sorts may be had there, found in the kingdom of Siam, excepting the Tbûrian, or Dûrian, and the Mangûstan. The king of Leng, or Laos, is tributary to Hawa, or Pama-bang; and an ambassador is sent annually from this capital to pay the tribute. This does not hinder the Labos (I) from appointing a successor, when their king dies; but they are obliged to notify it to the king of Hawa, or Ava. The king of Labos employs but one minister of state; and, for his revenue, besides 360 katis, which he receives yearly from the mine, to the north of Leng, he raised 860 more out of the rest of his territories.

Tributary to Ava.

Lê province.

THE Chinese memoir gives no account of Lê, and its province or district, farther than that the city is seven days journey distant from Leng, towards China, and situate on the Menân Kong^e. According to our estimation it seems to lie north-eastward from Leng.

Meng province.

THE next place mentioned in the journal is Meng, eleven days journey from Lê. This, we are told, is the capital of a particular province (K), which has on the west Pan and Kaa, on the south Tse, and on the east Chiong and Kûi, both dependent on Vinan, or Tun-nan. It is ^d MARINI, p. 62, & seqq.

^e Ibid.

(F) According to this explanation, the name of Labos, or Laos, is peculiar to this province; and from thence extended to the whole country.

(G) The name of the city or province is here omitted; but what it should be we cannot determine, excepting perhaps Lan-chang, the country of elephants.

(H) Perhaps the oxen; which, of the country of Koko Nor, between China and Tibet, are famous for their fine hair.

(I) It is observable, that the Labos are no-where called Lanjans through all this journal.

(K) There seems to be some mistake here; for there is not room for so large a country in these quarters.

a seventeen days journey in length, from north to south, and about seven from east to west. The whole country is without the tropic; for the inhabitants never see the sun directly over their heads. A river crosses this province, which rises from a mountain in the north, and falls into the Men-in Kong. They reckon in it eighteen cities, which depend on the capital.

THE soil of Meng produces all sorts of fruits which are found in Siam, excepting the Durian Scil and pro- and Mangist.in. There are mines of kalin, or tin, on the west side; of silver, copper, and ducc. iron, towards the north; and on the south side there is one of salt. The musk animal is found in this province, but chiefly about Pang, Chay-daw, and Kong, all three depending on Vinan. Many also are caught in the district of Tay-yay. It is as big as a young goat, with a purse under his belly, three or four inches thick; which, when cut, seems to be a piece Musk animal of fat, or bacon. They dry it till it may be reduced to powder; and then sell it in the country for its weight in silver. The natives being prohibited from selling the true bags to strangers, they make counterfeit ones, which they fill with its blood, rotten wood, and other ingredients. The peasants bring great quantities of them to Meng, which they exchange for things of small value: but the buyers sell them again to foreigners at a pretty dear rate.

THIS is all which is contained in the Chinese memoir or journal relating to Lahos or Laos, except a few particulars touching Moang Chay, or Vinan, a district belonging to a province of China, and probably to Yun-nan; if it be not, according to the missionaries, Yun-nan itself^f.

^f MARINI, p. 63, & seqq.

S E C T. IV.

Inhabitants of Lahos, particularly the Lanjans, their manners and customs.

c THE Lanjans are well-shaped and robust, rather fat than lean, and of an olive-colour. Their persons. They are good-natured, affable, courteous, and obliging^a (A). The Laos resemble the Chineses in shape and mien, but are more tawny and slender, consequently of a much handsomer appearance (B) than the Siameses. They have long ear-laps, like the Peguers, and inhabitants of the sea-coast^b. They are of a very sprightly genius, and sound understanding. They are fond of strangers, and value themselves on being sincere. They are free from deceit, and of great integrity; never breaking their promise or their trust. This character they are zealous to acquire; and the rather, as they are subject to covet what belongs to another. When they see any thing which pleases their fancy, they never cease importuning the owner till they get the whole, or some part of it. However, in case of refusal, they never offer to d take it by force.

THE Lanjans are extremely honest; so that there are no thieves to be met with throughout Their virtues: the whole kingdom. In case there is any report of a robbery or murder being committed on the highway, all the inquiry imaginable is made after the criminal: because, if he be not found, the neighbouring towns or villages are obliged to indemnify the parties injured; and thus both the lives and goods of people are secured throughout the kingdom of Lao. But the cities are not altogether so free from these inconveniences, which our author wisely ascribes to the power of forcerers; who, by their art, can throw the people of any house into a dead sleep, and keep them in that condition till they have robbed it^c.

e As the kingdom of Lanjan enjoys a very wholesome air, and abounds with the necessaries Very numerous. of life, it is very populous, and the inhabitants live to a very great age. In a numberment which was made of them about the middle of the last century, there were reckoned above 500,000 able to bear arms, without taking in the old men; who are so numerous and robust, that even out of those aged 100 years, a very considerable army might be formed, for the defence of the king. For all this the Lanjans are not of a warlike disposition, nor expert in the use of arms: which may be owing to the advantageous situation of their country, inclosed with mountains and steep precipices; serving as so many natural fortifications, sufficient to defend them against the insults of their enemies: and should any such break through those ramparts, they have a way to get rid of them, by poisoning their rivers. It was thus that the king of Tong-king was obliged to retreat, after having lost a great number of his army, with f which, about the year 1650, he proposed to annex this monarchy to his own. Before this, several petty kings joining their forces with the same design, against the inhabitants of Lao, lost so many of their men and beasts, by drinking the water of a river along which they encamped;

^a MARINI, p. 345—350.

^b KÆMPFER, p. 26.

^c MARINI, p. 345, & seqq.

(A) In one place, De Faria says the Laos are very good-natured; but, in another, that they are very brutal and uncivilized: he allows however that they are honest, and have no thieves among them. See Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 178. and vol. ii. p. 12.

(B) De Faria says, their colour is white, and the women very beautiful. Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 178.

that they were at last compelled to retreat, without daring to cross the stream and fight their enemies, who insulted them on the other side of it^a.

Their vices.

IN effect, the Lanjans are very slothful, and averse to business. They apply themselves to nothing but agriculture and fishing. They quite neglect all arts and sciences: so that they lead an indolent life, without troubling themselves about matters which require any great attention of the mind. They are much addicted to women (C), which is the bane of many. But their belief in witchcraft and magic is still more pernicious, especially as it prevails among people of rank. Some great men have a notion, that if the head of their elephant be rubbed with wine, in which a drop or two of human gall be put, the beast will become more robust, and themselves more courageous; so that ever after they may assure themselves of victory, either in war or on any other occasion. In this ridiculous conceit the governors sometimes, though but rarely, employ desperate fellows, who, for 25 or 30 crowns, will go into the forests to hunt their own species; and the first they meet with, of either sex, whether young or old, priest or layman, open his belly and stomach while alive; and, taking out the gall-bladder, cut off his head, to convince the more savage purchaser that he has not deceived him. In case the assassin does not perform his engagement in the limited time, he is obliged to kill either himself, his wife or a child, that his employer may take out the gall of the unhappy victim. The Lanjans would be an almost faultless people, and free from reproach, could this most horrid and cruel practice be once rooted out of the country: but although the king had used all means imaginable to effect it, he had not been able to succeed when our author wrote, because the most considerable people of his kingdom, and even the magistrates themselves, were addicted to that stupid, as well as execrable, superstition.

Their diet.

THE diet of the Lanjans consists in rice, fish, divers kinds of legumes, and the flesh of buffaloes. This is their usual meat; for they seldom eat any other sort, not even veal or poultry. They kill animals designed for food by knocking them on the head with sticks or clubs, and not by cutting their throats: for they hold it very barbarous and criminal to shed the blood of living creatures, and take away their lives in that manner. They make four meals a day; and roast their fowls, which they have in plenty, with all their feathers on; notwithstanding the insufferable stink arising from that kind of cookery (D). They have, indeed, excellent stomachs; but much cannot be said in praise of their cleanliness: for the vessels they keep their water in, and even those they drink out of, are commonly hung up in their smoaky chimnies^e.

Their dress.

THE Laos wear gowns close to their bodies. They go with their feet bare, and the head commonly uncovered. Their hair is clipped round and short, like a lay-brother's; excepting one lock on the temples, which is left to grow, and run through holes made in the ears for that purpose^f. One author says, their bodies are adorned with blue figures, made with hot irons, down to the knees^g: another, that they paint their legs from the ankle to the knee with flowers, and branches of trees, like the Siameses, as a badge of their religion and manhood. The women wear pieces of gold in the holes of their ears, until they are married; after which they lay them aside: but the men wear none at all^h.

Monogamy.

THE Lanjans approve of having only one wife; and say, that a man ought not to marry any more: but this they do rather from a principle of covetousness, to avoid charges, than of virtue. Accordingly in their songs, they rally the magistrates, and officers of state, who are content with only one wife. Nor is this so great a piece of self-denial, since they make their she-slaves subservient to their pleasures, maintaining great numbers of them, according to their quality, as well for sake of indulging their passions as for grandeur. The king who reigned in 1658 had two hundred women; but there is only one of the number who is named the principal, as being the first with whom the man is contracted; and the rest are considered only as second wives. Their marriages are for life, and performed in this manner. They choose out the oldest married couple they can find, who have lived in perfect agreement together, and promise, before them, to do the same till death. But often these fair promises are not long binding; and the parties have recourse to very frivolous reasons to separate, and marry with others. This conduct is, in good measure, owing to the loose education given their children, whom they abandon to their own inclinations; permitting even the boys and girls to live together, and frequently visit one another, without considering the consequences which may arise from such familiarities. The most dangerous opportunities are the rendezvous's,

Their marriages.

^a MARINI, p. 343, & seq.
^g Ibid. vol. ii. p. 12.

• Ibid. p. 347, & seqq.
^h KÆMPFER Japan. vol. i. p. 27.

^f DE FARIA, vol. iii. p. 178.

(C) We are told by our author, p. 451, that sodomy, the great vice of Asia, is quite unknown to them; and yet some authors, as Fitch, who was among the Lanjans, assure us otherwise; and that they wore bells inserted in their privities, like the Peguers, and other neighbouring nations, in order to prevent that crime. But this story of the bells is suspicious.

(D) De Faria tells us, that they eat vermin; and that the people of Tong-king despise them on that account. Portug. Asia, ubi sup.

a which continue for a month in the house of a new lain-in woman, where all the family and relations meet, to divert themselves with dancing, and other kinds of merriment; in order to drive away the forcerers, and prevent them from making the mother lose her milk, and the child from being bewitched by them, as they often are, says the sagacious Jesuit, to such a degree, that they die^l. These revels are the more dangerous, as fornication is tolerated among the laity. But a woman convicted of adultery becomes a slave to her husband, who treats her in what manner he thinks fit; and may even oblige her to pay a sum of money^k.

WHEN any of their relations die, they make a feast also, which holds for a month; and Their Lurais. celebrate their funeral with great magnificence. The corpse is put in a coffin, daubed over with a kind of bitumen, to hinder any offensive smell from getting out. None are invited to wake the dead, but the Talepoy, or priests, who attend less to weep over the corpse, than for the sake of good cheer. However, they employ a great part of their time in repeating certain hymns, adapted to the occasion; by means of which the soul, as they say, is taught the way to heaven, to the end it might not stray in those unknown regions. When the month is expired, they raise a curious pyramid, according to the quality of the defunct, set-off with a number of ornaments, and elegant bas-reliefs. Then, after they have deposited the corpse therein, they set fire to, and reduce it to ashes. These ashes, being carefully gathered up, are carried into one of their temples, which is filled with very sumptuous monuments; in erecting which, wealthy persons spend several thousand of crowns.

AFTER this ceremony is over, the relations think no more of the defunct, nor ever name State of the him: because, according to the doctrine of transmigration, which is received in the coun-soul. try, they believe the soul is gone to the place destined for it, and consequently belongs no longer to them. It is certain that they would willingly avoid those great expences, if they were not obliged to conform themselves to an ancient custom, and afraid to offend their Talepoy; who, to secure the gain arising from thence, have inserted it in their ceremonial, as an indispensable law, to be observed by all. And the people are the rather inclined to comply with this usage, as they are told that, by neglecting to render the last duties to their predecessors, their survivors may be induced to refuse paying the same honour to them^l.

WE have already taken notice of the trade and commodities, both exported and imported, Their com- of the particular kingdoms or provinces into which the upper and lower Labos or Laos are merce. divided. It remains only to observe, in general, that the commerce of these countries has passed into different chanel, according to the vicissitudes of affairs. We are told by Da Cruz, that musk and gold were carried to Sion (or Siam), before the Bramas (or rather Barmas,) conquered Pegu^m: after which it was removed thither. The trade with Siam, in process of time, was restored: but the king of Siam having invaded the Laos, and taken a province from them, which he kept not long (E), ruined the good understanding, which had subsisted between the two nations, and caused the trade to be removed to Kamboja; whither the Laos carried their benjamin and lak, which meets with a good vent there, because better than the kinds which grow in the countryⁿ.

THE language of the Laos, or Lanjans, as well as their characters, are much the same with Language and those of the Siameses; who, they say, have had the art of writing, and their sacred language, characters. from them: but they cannot pronounce the letters l and r. They write on the leaves of trees, like the Peguers and Malabars; and in the manner which the Siameses write their religious books. But matters relating to civil affairs are inscribed on a sort of coarse paper, with earthen pins^o.

^l MARINI, p. 351, & seqq.
ap. Purch. vol. iii. p. 161.

^k Ibid. p. 351.

^l Ibid. p. 354, & seq.
ⁿ KÆMPF. Japan. vol. i. p. 26.

^m DA CRUZ,

^o Ibid.

(E) This perhaps was Jangoma; which was taken about the year 1672, by the Siameses from the Lanjans, to whom this remark more particularly relates.

S E C T. V.

Religion of the Lanjans.

§ 1. Primitive religion, providence, origin of things, &c.

f THE religion of the Lanjans, and probably of all the Labos or Laos, is the same at Their primi- bottom with that which prevails in all the countries comprised in the farther peninsula of tive religion. the Ganges. They lived a long time in form of a republic, and observed the laws of nature, rather than those of the Chineses their neighbours, which they, in part, followed, before they had kings, and were subject to their empire. The worship of images was, in those times, unknown to them; uncorrupted as they were with the superstitions of other nations. The open open sky was their temple; and they adored one being, whom they esteemed above all things, under the name of commander. They had some imperfect notions touching the origin of things: but held that this inferior world would be renewed; and that there were sixteen other worlds or kingdoms under heaven, one subordinate to the other.

corrupted by Shaka.

In this simple and corrupted state the Lanjans continued, till such time as the disciples of Shaka began to spread their doctrines over the east. Some will have it that they received this polluted religion from the Chineses; but our author rather follows those who think they had it from Siam. However that be, the Jesuit speaks of it as a most impious and idolatrous religion; not considering, at the same time, that it is the very counter part of his own. Presently after the disciples of Shaka arrived in this kingdom, the Lanjans saw themselves surrounded with temples consecrated to idols, and priests named Talapoy, destined to their service. These priests, soon getting the ascendant over the minds of the people, prescribed laws to them; and introduced books written in Indian characters, which the Lanjans did not understand; in order to render their doctrines the more mysterious and sacred, for appearing in their original dress, as coming from the hands of Shaka ^a.

Notion of providence.

HOWEVER, this new religion could not so thoroughly root out the old, but that the Lanjans still preserved the first impressions which they had received, concerning the immortality of the soul; and a particular providence which continually directs affairs in this life: for they hold that the commanders, or intellectual beings, who are above all the sixteen worlds, direct and governs this lower world which we inhabit, as a part dependent on them. Yet these tenets, being mixed with opinions of the different sects, are much corrupted, and far from appearing in their original simplicity. ^b

Their schools.

THE schools of those who pass for doctors, and heads of their religion, consist in three principal classes, which are filled with laymen, as well as clergy. The doctrines taught in the first class concern the origin of the world, of men, and the gods; mixed with a thousand fabulous and ridiculous circumstances, which extravagances are substituted in place of the antient law. In the second class they treat of the religion of Shaka, which passes for the new law. In the third they are employed to reconcile the opposite principles, to solve doubtful passages, with the opinions of those who have written about them; and to square the antient doctrine with the new. ^c

THE authors of this third class assume the titled of illuminated, and their authority is revered by the name of concord, although nothing is farther from it than their writings: in which the sense of words is so strained and distorted, to make contradictory doctrines and opinions agree, that this third decretal is full of obscurity, confusion, and unintelligible explanation ^d.

Origin of the world

ACCORDING to this new theology, the Lanjans believe that the heavens are from all eternity; and that, perpendicularly under them, lie sixteen terrestrial worlds, containing all the pleasures of life, which, in the highest, are in greatest perfection. They hold likewise that this earth, which we inhabit, is eternal; but that, after a certain revolution of years, fire will descend from heaven, and reduce the whole mass to water. Yet things are not to continue in this state: for they who dwell in the first heaven, and of whose care this earth is the peculiar object, will re-unite the scattered parts together, and establish it in the condition it was before. In effect, they hold that it hath already undergone a great many such revolutions. ^e and present earth.

WITH regard to the original of the present world or earth, which had its beginning 18,000 years before the age of Shaka, they say, that, having been reduced to water after the manner above related, a commander, or divinity (F), descended from the first of the sixteen worlds, armed with a simitar; and perceiving a flower floating on the water, cut it in two. Immediately there springs out a beautiful maiden, with whom being enamoured, he longed to marry her, in order to get a brood of children, to people the earth: but the innocent maid preferring her chastity to the quality of a mother, rejected his courtship. Although he burnt with amorous flames; yet, judging it to be unbecoming a man of his condition, descended from the gods, to use force, he gave over the pursuit, and took another method to obtain children by her, to answer his design. To effect this, he placed himself at a certain distance from her, that they might reciprocally look at each other; insomuch that, by the intense glances from his eyes, she at length conceived, and became a mother, without losing her virginity ^f.

How peopled.

By this contrivance they had soon a numerous issue: but as cares and uneasiness are the usual consequences of a great many children, the commander, though a god, found himself violently attacked by them. To free himself, therefore, from these disquietudes, he resolved to make use of his power, and supply his family with all the conveniencies of life. In order to this, he furnished the earth with mountains and vallies, spacious plains, and agreeable hills. He like-

^a MARINI, p. 376, & seqq.

^b Ibid, p. 378, & seqq.

^c Ibid. p. 380, & seqq.

(F) Named Pon, Ta, Bo, Bá, Mi, Swan.

a wife created trees, bearing various kinds of fruits ; and rivers, abounding with all sorts of fish. Nor were mines of precious stones and metals forgotten. In short, nothing was omitted, which might contribute to the benefit and delights of life. Yet for all he approved of what he had newly created, and made the earth a most delicious mansion, of which he was the lord, he could not resolve to continue here : but panting after the etherial abodes which he had quitted, and were vastly preferable to this inferior world, he determined to return to heaven : without having foreseen, that he could not get thither with the same facility which he came from thence. In a word, he was obliged to remain without : where he suffered so severe a penance, that the other commanders, or sovereign divinities of heaven, were at length moved with compassion, and admitted him into their society, to enjoy with them the highest kind of beatitude.

b THE Lanjans have another opinion concerning the peopling of the earth. They say that the inhabitants of heaven, having divided themselves into two parties, on account of the women, ^{thence the blacks.} began a furious war, and fought several bloody battles. At length one party becoming victorious, to punish their enemies, they banished them into the great desert island, which was the earth : and as it was, at that juncture, reduced to water, they dried it, so that it became firm land again. The worst of it was, there were no women to be found. To supply this want, they got upon the highest mountain in the island, and from a tree of prodigious height, called out to their wives : who, to testify the affection which they bore to their husbands, came down from heaven to them. But as the number of women exceeded that of the males, each of these latter took several of the former ; by which means their offspring, in a short space of time, c multiplied to such a degree, that, taking up arms, they went about to extirpate certain black men, who were demons, and had by force lain with several of those white women, whose children were as black as their fathers. Nay, those whom afterwards they had by their white husbands, were as sooty as those begotten by the demons. And thus the blackmoors became so numerous in several parts of the earth ^d.

SOME account for the origin of black people another way. They say that the commanders ^{Another opi-} (or divinities) of heaven, having shut themselves up in a great stone which was upon this ^{nion.} isle, the angels and demons, who heard that there were men within it, were resolved to know if it was fact. Accordingly the demons made a great fire round the stone ; that being softened by the heat, the angels might enter it with greater facility. On the first impressions of the d fire, some of the commanders rushed out, but as black as charcoal : whilst others, who were not in such a hurry, escaped, without being incommoded by either the fire or the smoke. After this, falling in love with women, whom they had never conversed with before, the black commanders associated with black women, who were the wives of demons ; and the whites with white women, whom the angels loved. To compass their design, after levying troops, they made war on the angels and demons, whom they drove out of the island ; and obliged the women, who remained behind, to surrender at discretion.

e THE Lanjans have a third tradition for the origin of the white and black people, not more ^{A third tradi-} romantic than either of the two former. They tell us, that formerly a buffalo, one of the most ^{nion.} deformed creatures which ever was seen, lame, ill-shaped, extremely fearful, weak, and apt to start, fell from heaven into the sea ; where, by the mere strength of imagination, he conceived a monster, and soon after brought forth a gourd full of white and black men.

§ 2. Government of the world. Reign of Shaka.

f THIS is the substance of the Lanjan belief concerning the origin of the world. With regard to the government of it they relate, that, 18,000 years before the renewal thereof, ^{Government of the world.} there were four gods ; three of whom, after they had governed the space of fifty years, being weary of so great a trouble, retired into a very high and spacious pillar, situated towards the north, where they enjoy all the sweetness of life, which a man who loves his ease can desire. At present, they say, the god Shaka governs the world, and is to reign 5000 years, of which ^{Reign of Shaka.} 3000 are yet to come. That, after he had raised himself to a degree of perfection, greater than any person ever can attain, he resolved to pass to a still higher degree, never heard of before, which was to annihilate himself. But for fear this perfect state of nothingness, to which he was arrived, should be attended with any bad consequences, and the world suffer inconveniences by being deprived of his protection ; he, before his annihilation, commanded temples to be erected in several kingdoms, and an infinite number of statues to be made (A) in brass and marble, with a design to honour them with his presence on solemn festivals, where-ever great numbers of people should be assembled ; and, by blowing on them before all the congregation, communicate to them his divinity, which might supply his place, by assisting them

^d MARINI, p. 382, & seqq.

(A) Almost the same thing is said of Sammna Kodom by the Siameses. See hereafter the history of that law-giver.

who should pray to him in their necessities. For all this, says Marini, it is certain that the breath of Shaka has never animated those images; and that they are at present dumb, unless some demon makes them speak^a: which is, in effect, to confess the fact which he denies.

His successor.

AFTER the 5000 years of Shaka's government are expired, the Lanjans expect another god, whom they name Fa-mit-Tay. This deity, says our author, like an Antichrist against Shaka, will demolish all the temples which he finds standing, throw down and break in pieces the images, burn the books, persecute and prohibit the exercise of all religions, particularly that of Shaka: he will also prescribe new laws, opposite to those of his predecessor; promulgate other sacred books; choose other Talapoy; in one word, change and reform every thing a-new.

God of Christians

IN a conference held with the Romish missionaries, some Talapoy advanced an odd kind of theology, possibly invented to mortify the Jesuits. They said that, 5000 years before the birth of Shaka, the world had been governed by the god of the missionaries; who finding himself very old, when his successor appeared, and no longer able to discharge so many cares, began to think seriously of the course he had best to take for his interest. As he could not dispense with obeying the orders of this new god, from whom he apprehended some violent treatment; and was desirous to avoid the reproaches due to his ill conduct, for having used some with too much lenity, and others with too much severity, he assumed the form of a very poor and despicable person, in order to move Shaka to compassion. In this abject condition he presented a petition, by which he begged leave to continue one year longer in discharging the functions of his office. Shaka, who was very benevolent and generous, signed the petition in a very obliging manner; but under this condition, that the missionaries god should quit the rich and pompous kingdoms of the east, to retire into those of the west, which are miserable and barren. By this division of the empire and sovereign power, the jurisdiction of each god was much weakened, but that of Shaka infinitely surpassed the other in beauty and wealth^b.

quits the east, removes to the west.

ACCORDING to this agreement, the god of the missionaries left the east, in a very poor habit, accompanied with only a small number of people, his followers being very few. He was so confounded on this occasion, that, from thenceforth, he began to perform some extraordinary things, as manifested his greatness: so that he entered his kingdom of the west with an equipage suitable to his merit; and appeared as rich as if he had found immense treasures, or opened mines of gold and silver. This great and sudden change in his condition made the inhabitants of the east conclude him to be some notorious robber, who had acquired so much wealth by unjust means. To discover the truth of this, they hired some about him, as spies, to observe all his motions; till such time as having detected him in some theft, they should put him to death for his crimes. He was accordingly watched, and often caught in the very fact; but the moment they were about to arrest him, he vanished out of their sight. However, in revenge for this disappointment, they seized his only son, and put him to death on a cross, in stead of his father, who had merited the same punishment, for withdrawing into heaven. Notwithstanding all these disgraces, the occidentals cease not to render him worship, and acknowledge him for a god: because that, in voluntarily delivering himself up to death, although innocent, to expiate the transgressions of his father, he, by such great submission, shewed himself to be more than man, and that his father, as well as he, deserved to be adored as deities.

His son crucified.

His law defective.

IT is thus the Lanjan priests treat the god of the Christians, as represented to them by the Romish missionaries; and turn into ridicule the history of the birth and crucifixion of Christ. They add, that, after the coming of Shaka, the Christian law, which had prevailed over the east for 5000 years before, ceased to be practised: and that it is defective, because those who profess it can expect from it neither gold nor silver, nor prosperity, nor the enjoyment of pleasure, nor several women (B). On the contrary, it seems to draw advantage from confusion and affronts; to consider poverty as real wealth, and death as the greatest of all goods. But because Shaka is an enemy to such rigours, and the course which he prescribes is very commodious, broad, and accompanied with all the delights of life; therefore his sectaries have him in infinite esteem, and consider him as a more indulgent deity^c.

^a MARINI, p. 385, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 388, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 389, & seqq.

(B) If they cannot have these things by the indulgence of their religion, they find ways to obtain them; and by their licentious way of living become odious to the orientals, as hath been often remarked from the writings of the missionaries themselves: so that our author may be suspected, as to what he says here, and in other places, upon the same subject.

§ 3. State of the soul, hell, and paradise.

- a ALTHOUGH the Talapoy have some knowledge of hell, yet they do not care to speak of it, for fear of disturbing the thoughts of their followers, immersed in sensuality, with the consideration of those dreadful and eternal pains. They who still adhere to the doctrines of the antient law, and deny the transmigration of souls, say, that those of the wicked are annihilated at their death : but that the souls of good persons assume a body of air, as pure and simple as the light of the sun. After this, passing through the sixteen heavens, where they enjoy all the pleasures with which they abound, they return at length, very happy, to re-unite themselves with their bodies, and become men, in the same condition which they enjoyed before ; but so replenished with goods of every kind, as, by their means, to obtain the rank of kings. Ancient doctrine of souls.
- b ON the contrary, the followers of the doctrine of Shaka, and the fabulous histories of the priests, hold that the souls of bad men have no retreat after this life but hell, where they must expiate their crimes by suffering inconceivable torments. Their hell is divided into six wards, where there are so many degrees of punishments ; and is situated under that vast column of the sixteen worlds, which are the paradises of the blessed. They, who are condemned to go thither, languish in torments for the space of some ages ; after which they return to this world. But before they re-animate a human body, they are obliged to enter those of animals, beginning with the most contemptible, and gradually transmigrating into the more noble, till at length they assume a human shape, as before, but yet in the most deplorable circumstances ; in hopes, however, of being raised to a more prosperous state, provided they give liberally to the Talapoy. In this case, when they come to die a second time, they shall obtain a pass to be admitted into one of the sixteen paradises, without being obliged to do any farther penance. From thence likewise, when tired with delights, they may return to this world ; not indeed in the form of deified men, but infirm and imperfect like those who are here at present : however with these advantageous circumstances, that they had carested and honoured on account of the riches they shall be possessed of both in this world and in heaven, which will shower down gold upon them in profusion, to answer the several occasions of life^a. The present doctrine.
- c IN this case, when they come to die a second time, they shall obtain a pass to be admitted into one of the sixteen paradises, without being obliged to do any farther penance. From thence likewise, when tired with delights, they may return to this world ; not indeed in the form of deified men, but infirm and imperfect like those who are here at present : however with these advantageous circumstances, that they had carested and honoured on account of the riches they shall be possessed of both in this world and in heaven, which will shower down gold upon them in profusion, to answer the several occasions of life^a. Hell and paradise.

- BUT whereas losses, disgraces, and other misfortunes, attend their most zealous devotees and benefactors, no less than others ; to solve this difficulty, they pretend that such afflictions are the punishment of the crimes committed by them in a former life, although they have no remembrance thereof (C). These impostors likewise promise a mansion in the sixteenth heaven to those who shall be charitable to them : on the other hand, they declare that the evils which happen to those, who either cannot or will not bestow alms on them, as well as to infidels, are a just punishment for their avarice : and because they have preferred riches to the joys of heaven, therefore the idol begins to chastise them in this life : but let a man be ever so vicious, dishonest, or wicked, all is well, provided he is but charitable, and gives alms to the priests. Talapoy impostors.

- WE must not omit another superstitious conceit of the Lanjans, which is, that the souls, after their separation from the body, retire into a corner of the house ; and that the heirs are severely punished, in case they fail to render them the honours due to their quality, such as making a pompous feast, and performing other ceremonies, established by the antient customs. Souls retire into a corner.
- e ON the contrary, they who acquit themselves punctually, with regard to these duties, shall receive great temporal rewards. As the Lanjans are very fond of life, and afraid to die, when they find themselves in the least out of order, they immediately implore the assistance of these souls, making them presents ; and setting victuals of several kinds before them, they invite them to eat with them, and talk to them, as if they understood and saw every thing which is said or done. The entertainment is accompanied with music and singing, which continues day and night, till the sick person either recovers or dies. They do all this, in a belief that, by such means, the souls lodged in the house are appeased ; and that, if they do them no good, they will at least do them no harm. The people of this persuasion believe nothing, says our author, either of hell or paradise, angels or devils ; but live in the most dissolute manner imaginable^c.

ON a certain day several of the most understanding Talapoy, or priests, of different sects, meet in presence of one of the missionaries, in order to reconcile so many various opinions, and bring people to one way of thinking. After a long conference, they came to this decision : that there was, for certain, another life ; that the reward to be expected in it was a plurality of wives, and the punishment to be feared consisted in not having any. The Jesuit hereupon asked them, if a charitable man was to be rewarded with several wives, how many husbands

^a MARINI, p. 391, & seqq.^c Ibid. p. 394, & seqq.

(C) Is this worse than the evasion of Papi/b priests ; who, when the diseased people, after praying to their saints, find no relief, to solve the objection, pretend it is because they had not faith.

was the woman to have, who gave considerable alms? These learned doctors of the law, a it seems, were so nonplus'd with this unforeseen question, that they went back to their convents, and turned over their books: but not meeting with any thing to the purpose, came to this resolution among themselves; that such a woman, for her reward, would be changed into a man; and they who were covetous, would become the wives of devils, or of some Talapoy, black, filthy, old, and deformed; in short, more horrible than the devil himself.

Gain to the priests.

THESE imposing priests promise those who are kind, and assist them in their necessities, that they shall have as many wives as all the alms which they had bestowed on them during their lives, were able to purchase: and that the particulars of their good actions, recorded in the book of life, should be made known, when it came to be opened. The Lanjans, b charmed with doctrines so agreeable to their sensual inclinations, think they can never give their priests too much: and this infatuation so universally prevails, that the good missionaries, who took a great deal of pains to open their eyes, could never dissuade any of them from squandering their money in such ill bestowed charities.

A shameful doctrine.

FOR all the Talapoy have no conversation with women, from whom, by the rules of their profession, they are obliged to abstain; yet they affirm, that such of their order as observe continence in his life, will have the power to create, and produce from nothing, as many women as they have a mind, and dispose of them at pleasure: while they, who in this life are addicted to the sex, shall, after their death, be doomed to hell torments, and not have the disposal of any women. As if what is a vice on earth, could be a virtue in heaven; or c that men could be rewarded there, for what they are punished here. When these things are objected to the priests, and they are asked how they can condemn, as a shameful practice in this world, that which is tolerated as a commendable action in the other, their answer is: that although the incontinence of a Talapoy be a crime in his life, and a sin against the divine precept, yet God dispenses with it in heaven; and that chastity, which is a meritorious action in this world, is, in the next, the punishment of the damned. A theology and doctrines which Epicurus himself would have been ashamed to publish^z.

§ 4. The priests, orders, habits, exercises.

Priests their name.

ALTHOUGH the priests of Lao are called Talapoy, a name borrowed from Pegu, d yet, in the language of the country, they are named Fé. This class of men are reckoned the most perfidious in all the kingdom, as well as the very dregs of the people; alazy, slothful race, and the sworn enemies of industry. Their convents, says our author (but it is a priest of another religion, though not much different from theirs, who speaks), are so many seminaries of very profligate men, retreats of vagabonds and drones; in a word, schools of all sorts of wickedness and abominations. The baser their extractoin, the more proud and insolent they become, when raised to that dignity. They are hard-hearted and inhuman beyond expression; more merciless and cruel than the wild beasts. But what can be expected from men, who sacrifice every-thing to their interests, and devote all their wit and vigour to debauchery^a. This is the picture of the priests of Lao, painted by the Jesuits, exactly like e that which the protestants draw for the priests of Rome.

The novices

THE Talapoy begin to embrace a religious life in their most tender age, and inure themselves to the rigours of the profession, during their noviciate, which continues till they are twenty-three. After this they are examined on the subjects of their theology, and ceremonies, by persons appointed by the community, who, on their report, receive the novice into their body, by majority of voices. The first thing the new Talapoy does, is to seek out some magistrate, who is rich, and well related, to assist him in quality of godfather. Although this office is expensive, yet as it is reckoned an honour to be applied to on that account, nobody refuses it. On the contrary, the invitation is received with great complaisance; and the person who accepts it, always acquits himself with the greatest pomp, in order to gain the f applause of the people, as well as the approbation of the Talapoy.

Lao become professed;

IN the first place, the magistrate, chosen godfather, presents the novice, who is going to be professed, with rich habits. Then, on the day appointed, he orders his best trained elephant to be pompously harnessed, and, with a little house on his back, led to the convent: where the novice, bloated with vanity, mounts the animal, and issues forth, at the head of the principal lords of the city, richly drest, followed by several regiments of foot, and a multitude of people. In this order they march through the principal streets, to the temple, where the novice is to make his profession; the ceremony often lasting till night. After this, a feast is made in the temple, whose altars serve for tables, on which are served the costliest viands; and, for three days, nothing passes there but revelling. During this time, all a distinction of persons is laid aside, and a man of quality makes no difficulty to eat off the same plate with a mechanic. This expence, though exceeding great, does not come up to that which the present costs, made by the magistrate to the new-professed.

^z MARINI, p. 395—399.

^a Ibid. p. 341.

WHAT is very singular on this occasion, the person, after making so solemn a profession, may, may quit the if he has a mind, return to, a secular state; as many do, who marry, and live with their wives, convent, so long as the substance lasts which they gathered while *Talapoy*s; and, when their stock is out, quit them, and retire again to their convents, where they are admitted without any opposition by the elders, who perhaps had experienced the same indulgence themselves. and return. And this they do as often as they please.

THE Talapoy wear a short cassock of yellow linen, which reaches to their knees, and is Their habit. b girt about them with a red cloth. They go with their feet and the right arm bare, carrying in their hand a fan, with some device, to denote their rank. They shave their heads, even to their eye-brows, twice a month, on the first days of the new and full moon ^b.

THEIR convents, where they live in community, are like those of the Chartreusians, and Their convents, St. Romuald, among the Romish orders. All the cells are separate, in which they have several little apartments, made with boards: whereas the superior's cell is built with bricks, and the chambers very magnificently furnished, as well as decorated with curious ornaments, finely gilded. His throne stands very high, and is set off on the sides with curtains of very a d superiors. costly silk. This officer is always chosen from among those Talapoy who are of an established reputation, and have devotees of both sexes; who cram them with necessaries, and never c let them want for any-thing.

THESE religious rise at a certain hour; and, before the sun is high, walk out by two and Their employ- two, very modestly, and with profound silence: then separate to beg alms in different parts ments, of the city. This they do by signs; and, at their return, laying up the daintiest morsels for themselves, give the rest to their servants, or send it to the prisoners, after throwing a part to feed the poultry. When this distribution is over, they break silence, and each repairs to his cell, where he breakfasts. After this, they go to sleep for three hours; and then repair to the common refectory, where they find a table covered with all sorts of provisions, which are generally well dressed. As they live at the expence of others, they usually dine on small birds, fowl, and game. If the victuals which their friends send them do not please them, and meals. d they break the plates; and have the insolence to threaten them, in very injurious language.

AFTER dinner they sleep for an hour; then rise, and go to their respective exercises. The novices fall to study their ceremonies; the scholars to read and write. This they do in two languages: one the vulgar or common language of the country; the other peculiar to the Talapoy, and may be called the learned language, as Latin is in Europe. The rest apply themselves to other amusements. Some learn to sing; others pass their time in conversation, at the door of the convent, where they receive visits, and learn the news of the town. Towards evening they make a light supper, without candles; and, having said grace, repair all to the temple, none daring to be absent. There they sing certain prayers, which sometimes they contract, or hurry over, that they may go take the air after sun-set: because then e they are at liberty to do what they please ^c.

THEY exert as much authority over the people, as if they were their subjects. They Pride and ar- always appear very serious; and affect a proud disdainful air, with a great deal of gravity. rogance. They behave very haughtily to those who are not liberal to them, scarce deigning to look at them. They are extremely ambitious of honour; and very desirous of having much respect paid them, without returning any. Their eyes are in perpetual motion; and their brows being shaved (A), adds to the severity of their looks. When they want any-thing, they do not civilly ask, but imperiously demand, it: for with them the virtue of humility is reckoned meanness, and civility subjection. They pretend to lord it over others, and expect a blind submission to their opinions; considering the least objection as want of the respect due to f them.

IN a word, they surpass other people in nothing but pride and wickedness. A young man Instance of being in great haste to finish some affair of importance to him, happened to pass unawares cruelty; before a Talapoy, without alighting, as is the custom; which so enraged the priest, that he sent persons to seize him, and had him so cruelly bastinado'd in his presence, that he died of his wounds next day. What is more shocking, when this outrage was complained of, many had the insolence to take the part of the Talapoy, and engage the judge to determine the matter in their favour; praising the murder as a generous action, done by the priest in defence of his religion and order. Thus the more mischief they do to others, the more they are feared and respected.

^b MARINI, p. 401, & seqq.

^c Ibid. p. 405, & seqq.

(A) This was customary among the Roman priests, according to the sarcasm of Cicero: Capite et superciliis semper est rasus, ne unum pilum boni viri habere dicas.

how punished.

THE Talapoy who are in their convents are not suffered to commit any debauchery : but if any of them is convicted thereof, especially of having solicited and attempted to force a woman, a strict enquiry is made into the affair, and the aggressor punished according to the nature of the offence. As all matters relating to this insolent rabble are brought before the king, the accused appears at his tribunal : and however positively the crime may be proved upon him, yet if he has any thing at all to say in his defence, the king readily acquits him, in order to engage those religious in his interests, as having so great an influence over the people. But in case the crime be so flagrant and notorious, as not to admit of any palliation, the offender is condemned for life to serve the elephants, which is the most infamous of all employments. Was his majesty to punish with equal severity all those who are caught in the fact, there would not, in a little time, be left one Talapoy among the Lanjans : but as he calls himself their protector, and bears the title of general of their order, he is not willing to destroy the jurisdiction which he has over their sanctuary : besides, he is afraid, in case he should not be favourable to them, that they would raise a rebellion against him^a.

for crimes,

Confession.

AMONG other rules of the Talapoy, they are obliged to go to confession fourteen days in every month. Their manner is like that observed in the Romish convents. They assemble in a great hall, where being seated, according to their rank, the oldest leave their places one after another, and going into the midst of the company, on their knees, declare aloud the faults which they have committed in the preceding month, with regard to eating, drinking, diversions, anger, doing injury to others, speaking untruths, or the like. Absolution immediately follows the confession, each of them having power to give it : but where the satisfaction is so easy (B), they never scruple repeating the crimes.

Holy water.

THEY likewise make a kind of holy water : but our author is at a loss to know how that usage came among them ; unless from Ethiopia or India, by means of the disciples of St. Thomas (C). They send it to the sick, as a sovereign remedy, and keep good store for the purpose ; because in return, they get so many bottles of good wine. But although the people receive no benefit from it, they have great faith in its virtue (D).

Offerings to images,

THE honour which they give to the idols or images, does not consist in sacrifices : they only offer flowers to them, accompanied with perfumes, and a little rice, which they lay upon the altars ; where solely on such occasions they light up tapers. They carry in their hands certain bracelets, consisting of an hundred beads strung together like rosaries : these they connect over, standing before the image, and continually repeating their hymns.

Beads.

Talapoy of the woods.

WHAT has been said relates to the Talapoy who reside in the towns : but there are others who lead a more solitary life, in caves made in the woods and forests ; the horrors of which, according to our author, are proper to conceal the enormity of their crimes (E). They retire to such places to pursue their debauched inclinations with more freedom : and, by degrees, the resort of women has become so great, that the solitude of these hermits is at present become a populous colony, and the deserts may be said to vie with the cities ; with this difference, that, in the latter, the children know their parents, which is not the case of those who are born in these solitudes. These hermits receive more alms than the Talapoy of cities. They admit a fast of three months, to dispose them to celebrate their Easter. I would say, says our author, that they have three months of Easter, with two feasts a day : one of flesh, which is eaten in private, and cooked in the house ; the other of fish, which is sent by their friends, and eaten publicly^e.

Lao an university.

OUR author passes over several other particularities, because they are either the same, or very little different from those mentioned in several relations, and in the history of the Bonzas of Japan ; who according to some authors, say they are the disciples of the Talapoy who were the followers of Shaka, and passed thither from Lao or Siam. However that be, at present they of Siam go to Lao, as into an university, there to learn the maxims of Shaka ; which are at least more in reputation than the ancient doctrine, if they are not intirely conformable to it.

Talapoy knavery.

To conclude, the number of these Talapoy is so greatly increased, that, fearing they shall in time fall short of necessaries, they learn all sorts of trades, and work at them in their convents, which seem to be changed at present into so many shops of mechanics and merchants, whom they even circumvent in their business. For if an artisan in the city has contrived any extraordinary piece of work, or invented some new fashion, they labour secretly to get the model and draught ; and, having effected it, give themselves out for the inventors : so that

^a MARINI, p. 408, & seqq.^e Ibid. p. 412, & seqq.(B) May not the same be applied to the Romanists ?(C) This is not probable, since the religion of Shaka was in the world 1000 years before Christ : more probably therefore, that the church of Rome borrowed this, and many other ceremonies, from thence.

(D) One would think our author is reflecting on those of his own religion ; since this is as much the case with them as the Lanjans.(E) This Jesuit draws a frightful picture of them ; as it were to exceed what is reported to the Romish monks and hermits, in these parts of the world.

a when the author thinks to surprize the town with something new in its kind, they produce the model, to shew they were beforehand with him; and in case the true proprietor disputes the invention with them, the king is sure to ascribe it to the Talapoy.

THE great credit which the Talapoy have acquired in Lao, is owing chiefly to two causes, The king's supremacy. their skill in magic, and the king's protection. His majesty, who is, as it were, the general or grand-master of their religion, loads them with honours, and, at the same time, takes care to govern them. He continually admonishes them to observe their rules, and sets before them the obligation of monthly confessions. He appoints the days for fasts and festivals; the ceremonies of which are regulated by him. He resolves all doubts, and reconciles the different scriptures; explains the difficulties found in their book; and never suffers any-thing b to be printed (F), without his approbation. He likewise corrects the faults of such pieces. In a word, he is the sovereign judge of whatever relates to the conduct of the Talapoy, and punishes them for their offences: but, as if there was something sacred in them, suffers none to vex them on any account.

WHENEVER the king sees any of them, his majesty salutes him first, by raising the right Talapoy indulged. hand, which is the usual mark of civility. He makes slaves of his vassals, and obliges them to serve in their temples, in lieu of the tribute due to him. He sometimes gives up whole town and villages to them, obliging the inhabitants to maintain the convents within their precincts; which they always submit to with reluctance, on account of the insatiableness and insolence of such masters: for they would choose to be slaves to others, rather than be dependent on them. However, the king, for the reasons above-mentioned, takes care to preserve their friendship, and overlooks many of their transgressions. In 1640 a Talapoy and his disciples having been detected in coining and uttering abundance of false money, the informations were carried before the council: but the king caused the indictment to be quashed by an order, in which, after taxing the laity with avarice, he praised the piety of the Talapoy; who, for want of being relieved in their necessities, and finding their temples to be quite deserted, had been obliged to invent a way of relieving themselves, by coining money, and, out of a little, making a great deal^f.

BUT this piece of lenity was infinitely more excusable than that which he shewed on another occasion. A Talapoy having cast a covetous eye upon the gold bracelets which two young Instance in an assassin. ladies, who were sisters, wore upon their arms, under some pretence got access to them, about nine or ten at night, and, thinking they were alone, murdered them both with a dagger. After this he fell to romage the chamber; in doing which, to his surprize, he found a servant girl hidden in a corner; and, to prevent a discovery, aimed to dispatch her also: but the maid, having made shift to avoid the blow, got out of the window into the street, and gave the alarm. The villain hereupon thought it time to withdraw: but was seen in his passage by three other servants, who, next morning, along with the girl, went to a magistrate, and gave evidence of the horrid fact. On this information the Talapoy was cited before the king, in the hall of audience: where, on protesting his innocence, and offering, who escapes punishment. in test of it, to undergo the ordeal trial, his majesty commanded, that he should remain seven e days in the woods; and if, in that time, he received no hurt, either from the wild beasts or venomous serpents, he should be declared innocent. The assassin accordingly repaired to the woods; but took care to engage a company of slaves to attend him as his guard; so that he came off unhurt. Upon this the king, though convinced of his guilt, said, that the devil, in shape of a Talapoy, must have been the author of that execrable deed, in malice to those priests, that they might no longer be considered as fathers and masters. After this acquittal, the murderer, to be revenged on the poor girl who was his accuser, prosecuted her so violently, that she was condemned to lose her liberty: nor did the king interpose in her favour^g.

As to magic and forcery, the other means by which the Talapoy have gained authority and Pretend to magic. reputation, our author represents them as greatly skilled therein. He says they do things which seem miraculous; yet blames the credulity of the people, who, on that account, think them to be more than men: that they make use of their art to hurt people, and often merely to divert themselves: that they catch and tame wild elephants, by means of a plaister or ointment put on the back and crupper of a female, whom they follow from the forests into the cities, without doing any harm; and that, as soon as the plaister is taken off they grow wild again, till made tractable by management and confinement: that they do not scruple to exercise their forcery on their benefactors, in order to obtain more by that means, than they could hope from their liberality; and frequently bewitch those who assist them, as well as those who do not, to oblige both parties to have recourse to them for relief: that when any person is seized with any distemper or sickness, the Talapoy is sent for, who cures him, only by taking off the charm. Our author is so weak as to believe all this stuff; and tells of a great man, no less silly than himself, who after taking medicines for some disorder without effect, fancied himself bewitched, and applied to the Talapoy. Those magicians, it seems, recovered him: but, as he was extremely liberal to them, they laid the spell on him, from time to time, in order to make their farther advantage of him.

^f MARINI, p. 415, & seqq.^g Ibid. p. 419, & seqq.(1) Marini does not explain what sort of printing is in use with the Lanjans.

Abuse the credulous.
Impose on the sick.

WHEN a poor man is sick, they agree to cure him for his weight in rice; and then send him one of their cast-off habits to wear, as a sovereign remedy. As they believe there is something sacred in the very touch of a Talapoy, the patient often sends a new garment for the priests to sanctify, by putting it on his back: but, instead of returning it, the priest sends him one of his own old ones; assuring him, that there is no remedy comparable to their tattered gowns. And, as daily experience shews that those sorts of relicks do not work miracles; the Talapoy, to save their credit, ascribe the cause to the poor man's covetousness, and want of faith^h.

Served by noblemen.

OFTENTIMES the chief officers of state do not disdain to serve the Talapoy in the most servile offices. They go in winter into the woods, fell timber, carry it on their shoulders to the city, and through the streets, to the convents, in order to let the people see, that it is an honour to serve those religious men; and that the sure way to recommend them to the favour of the king, is to imitate their own example. During the great heats, these great men carry also to the Talapoy vessels full of medicinal waters: accompanied with simples, and choice perfumes, for their use, when they go to bathe themselves.

Festival or jubilee.

THE principal revenue of the Talapoy arises from the offerings which are made in honour of Shaka, in April, which is the month of their jubilee, and plenary indulgence. On this occasion the idol Shaka is exposed to view upon an eminence, in a great court, accompanied with Talapoy; who receive the immense offerings which are made of gold, silver, rice, cloth, stuff, and all sorts of necessaries. Nor does our author doubt, but that the priests, who are appointed to guard the statue, purloin a large quantity of gold and silver, without being missed; the sums which they receive are so prodigiously great. All these alms and offerings are hung up in the temple; so that when the inferior Talapoy come to sweep it, they take a good share, over and above what they find on the ground.

Shaka's statue.

OUR author learned from a Tong-king lord, who was ambassador at the court of Lanjang, in the time of this great solemnity, that he observed a tower in the middle of the temple, about 100 cubits high, pierced on all sides, and adorned with many large windows, for the better view of Shaka's statue; which is placed in the middle, and surrounded with numerous leaves of fine gold, like tinsel, which hang about it, and, with the gentle motion of the air, make such a sweet and agreeable harmony, that one would imagine it was a concert of several musical instruments: they were hung there to serve as so many little veils, to hinder insects from getting to the idol. The ambassador informed Marini likewise, that the great altar was decorated with two pillars of solid gold, ten cubits high, and proportionably thick, which were always exposed to view, without danger of being stolen: although a missionary, from whom our author had a great deal of what he relates, never mentioned that particular.

Piety of the Lanjans.

NOTHING is more surprising than the piety and devotion of the Lanjans; who are so far from the thoughts of robbing temples, that they exhaust themselves with making presents, without desiring any-thing more than to have them acceptable to their false god, as they are assured by the Talapoy: whose words are as firmly believed as an oracle, or a revelation from heaven, out of a persuasion that it is impossible their priests should deceive them in an article of so great importanceⁱ. A persuasion which prevails no less among the Romanists: and almost every-where else.

§ 5. Preaching and commandments.

Art of the Talapoys.

THEY preach every day in the temple, during this month, to multitudes of people, and never change their text; which is to endeavour to persuade their auditors, that there is no time in the year so proper to render themselves worthy of the benefits both of this life and the next. In this hope they make every day a holiday: all business, as well public as private, is laid aside; and people mind nothing but to make presents, and visit the temples, which, at that time, are always open. To render the visit more agreeable, and draw even those whom devotion could not move, the Talapoy provide all sorts of diversions in the courts and porches of the temple, which are finely adorned. There the people are entertained with comedians, who recite verses, and act very agreeable farces. Others expose to view several sorts of workmanship. And, in short, every one does what pleases him most: some sing; others dance, or play on instruments: all in view of Shaka, annihilated.

Way of preaching.

To put an end to this feast with more pomp and magnificence, one of the most famous preachers among the Talapoy mounts the chair; where, having recapitulated all which had ⁱ Ibid. p. 427. & seqq.

^h MARINI, p. 416, 421. & seqq.

a been advanced on the subject, during the whole month, he adds an elegant discourse. The way of preaching here, as well as in Tong-king, is to stand up, motionless, like statues, the arms across the breast, held in that posture with great modesty (A), and never once stirring them. On these occasions they endeavour to persuade their hearers to renounce the world, and take the Talapoy habit, in order to preserve religion in its splendor, and prevent its ever failing. It is incredible how many advantages they promise, as well as how much fervour and zeal (B) they express on this occasion, so far as to load, with grace and benedictions from Shaka, the families which sacrifice their children, by devoting them to their convents. To excite them to this, they instance the example of their most ancient and pious Talapoy; who, when they have neither brothers nor nephews of the order, buy children of their nearest relations: that so their family may not want the imaginary blessings of Shaka, and may always boast of having one belonging to it in his service.

TOWARDS the end of the sermon, the preacher exhorts his auditors to an exact observance of the law, which consists in five negative precepts: 1. Not to kill any-thing which has life. 2. Not to commit adultery. 3. Not to lye (or deny the truth). 4. Not to steal. 5. Not to drink wine. But however obligatory these commandments may be, there is none who keeps them: and the Talapoy, who assume the power of giving dispensations, sell them at no small rate to such as solicit them, in order to avoid the guilt and punishment of breaking the commands. But the crafty priests never grant them for more than one precept at once; and that only for a certain term (C): so that when the time is expired, they are obliged to apply for a new licence to sin. These instruments, issued from this chancery, are written with an iron style, on palm tree leaves, in characters which none, perhaps, can read, but he who traces them.

IN one word, all the fruit of the Talapoy's preachment turns to the profit of him and the convent; never to the advantage of the auditors: because reducing the five precepts to one, the infamous priest, says our author, returns to his first lesson, and insists on the necessity of doing alms, from which there can be no dispensation. To enforce this the more, these cheats are continually telling the people, that if they will not observe this single precept, which is so easy to be performed, it is a sure sign that they do not believe in Shaka: that it is indifferent to them whether their holy faith and religion be preserved in the kingdom, or whether there be any Talapoy there to teach it, and pray for them. So that the poor Lanjan laity, to avoid such reproachful imputations, as well as the wrath of Shaka, pay to the priests, under the title of alms, not only yearly, but every month, the tithe of all which they get by the sweat of their brows.

THE better to secure themselves, and augment such considerable revenues, they have introduced a custom, seemingly to do honour to their benefactors; but, in reality, the more effectually to pick their pockets, and suck the very blood of the people. The day before the full moon, from whence they begin their month, according to their rubricks, is always consecrated to offerings, which, pursuant to their infamous policy, they accompany with the following ceremonies: first, they require, that every one should carry his present on his head, so that all may see it; and, as the people assemble on that occasion, the Talapoy send persons to sound the trumpet, and play on several other instruments: in order, as they pretend, not so much to do honour to the people who make the offerings, as to solicit the governors of heaven to receive them as alms given the Talapoy, in honour of Shaka. When they are going to offer them, they must raise them three times upon the head, to signify, 1. that both their mind and eyes are turned towards heaven: 2. that they implore aid from the ministers of its justice: and 3. that they pray to them not to refuse their protection, but to be kind to them in necessity. Lastly, they deliver the offering into the hands of the Talapoy; and then retire perfectly well satisfied^a.

WE have dwelt the longer on this subject, to give our reader as full an account as we could of the religion of Shaka, known, in the hither peninsula, by the name of Budda; in China by that of Fo, or She-kya; and in Tibet, whence it had its original, by the name of La. For although this religion is spread over the farther peninsle, it flourishes in no part of it so much as it does in Lao, or among the Lanjans; and our author Marini is the only one who has spoken of it in any detail, though neither so particularly, nor with such exactness, as could be wished. We shall therefore, before we quit it, add a few remarks more.

THE Indians, that is, the original inhabitants of all the countries and islands eastward of Persia, as far as the oriental ocean, seem to be divided between two religions, each of very

^a MARINI, p. 430—436.

(A) This, which the Romish clergy would have pass, and, among the laity, does pass, as almost an infallible proof of the holiness both of the priest and his religion, in their church; is here treated by the Jesuit as it ought to be, that is, no proof at all.

(B) Yet remember, for all these signs of religion and piety, that they are idolatrous priests, and of profligate morals: so that a sanctified outside may be consistent with a wicked heart, and is no proof of goodness.

(C) The Romish priests are more indulgent, and give much more extensive dispensations.

vastly extended.

great extent. For distinction sake, we shall call one that of the Brámmans; the other that of the Lamas. That of the Brámmans prevails over Hindistán, and the hither peninsula: where, although the Mogols are become almost wholly masters, yet it is computed that, in Hindistán itself, there are at least 100 idolaters, or image-worshippers, to one Mohammedan; consequently their numbers must be much greater in the peninsula, several countries of which are yet intirely under the dominion of the Rijabs. On the other hand, the religion of the Lamas is the established religion of Tibet, of all that part of Great Tartary called Western Tartary, of the whole farther peninsula of India, and of Japan. It has likewise spread over most of the oriental islands: and although it is not the established religion of China, yet it seems to be embraced by much the greater part of its inhabitants. So that the religion of the Lamas may be said to be extended over three or four times as much ground as that of the Brámmans.

Differs from the Brámmans.

THESE two religions, though agreeing in the moral precepts, the doctrine of the soul's transmigration, and the use of images (D), yet differ in several essential points: as the distinction of people into tribes, eating of flesh, frequent washings, and the like; but especially in the article relating to the Supreme Being (E): for the Lamas hold, that God himself assumed flesh, and actually dwells among them in a human shape; whereas the three incarnated deities of the Brámmans are inferior and created beings. Not but the sects which hold Wishnú or Isburen to be the Supreme God, seem, in this point, to differ but little from the Lamas.

Origin from Tibet.

WE have already spoken of the original of the Brámmans religion, in our description of the hither India: as to that of the Lamas, it seems to have had its rise in Tibet, where it has, at present, its principal seat. For there, we are told, that God himself, as the head of this religion, reigns in a human shape; so that the inhabitants of Tibet may be said to live under a real theocracy, according to their own belief. This god, in human form, is, in Tibet, named La; in China She kya, and also Fo; which name he assumed after his apotheosis, or deification: he is, in his own country, called Lama-Konjû (or Konchok), that is, the eternal father: he is also styled Dalay Lama, or the grand Lama, that is, high priest, pope, or head, of the religion^b.

Its several branches.

FROM this fountain all the other gods, or founders of religion, in the several countries professing the same, seem to be derived: as the Budda, or Boutta, of the hither Indians; the Shaka of Labo, or Lao, and Japan; the She-kya of China; Thikka of Tong-king; and Sommona Kodom of Siam. Some of these gods, or legislators, seem to be acknowledged the same with him of Tibet, particularly She-kya, or Shaka: the account likewise which is given by authors, of their origin and doctrines, internal and external, is nearly the same. It is true, none of those nations seem to acknowledge him for their god, who is at present adored in Tibet; although they derive their gods from some part of India, west of China (F): but rather consider him as coming from a distant country, and taking up his abode among them. Thus the Ho-shang, or priests of China, called, by Europeans, Bonzas, do not recognize the god of Tibet for the head of their religion; and bear a great enmity to the Lamas, whose footing in China they strenuously oppose. The worshippers, therefore, of She-kya, or Shaka, must look on the great Lama of Tibet as an impostor, and not as the real Shaka, whom they adore: for it does not appear, that they hold him to be existing any-where on earth visibly, and in a human shape.

Budda, the same

WITH regard to Budda, and Sommona Kodom, who seem to be the same, their votaries refer his original to the island of Seylan, or Ceylon; if they are not rather at a loss from what country to derive him. According to a Balli book, cited by Loubiere, the father of Sommona Kodom, called also Pouti Sat, that is, lord Pouti (Bouta, or Budda, as we conjecture), was a king of Seylan^c; whence it may be presumed, Kodom himself was a native of that island: although the Chingalasses of Seylan, who worship Buda, or Budda, as an inferior deity, say he was not born in that island, and that he died on the continent^d.

with Som-mona Ko-
dom.

Budda and Sommona Kodom seem to be the same, for two reasons: first, that the latter is, by the Siameses, called also Pouti Sat, or lord Pouti, which is doubtless the same with Budda: for, as M. La Croze well remarks, throughout the Indies his name is given to Wednesday; which, in the Samskret, or Samskrotam language, is called Boutta-varam; in that of Seylan, Bouda-dina; in that of Siam, Van Pouti; and in the Malabáric, Boudèn Kirúmei^e. The second argument (which we are surprised to find has escaped M. La Croze) is taken from the prænomen Sommona, which, in the Balli language, signifies a religious man of the woods^f; and answers both in term and signification to Sammanín, or Shammanín, a sect

^b See New gen. collect. of voyages and travels, vol. iv. p. 461. hist. Ceylon, aliquo loco.

^c LA CROZE Chret. des Ind. p. 500.

^d Relat. of Siam, p. 136.

^e KNOX,

^f LOUBIERE, part i. c. xxii. p. 130.

(D) See the conformity more at large in Loubiere's relation of Siam, p. 135.

(E) M. La Croze says, they differed in this point only.

(F) Alex. de Rhodes thinks, Shaka came from Siam: Navarrete says, from Ceylon.

a formerly in Malabâr, and other parts of the hither peninsula, who dwelt in woods, and adored Boudda, or Budda.

FROM what has been said in the preceding paragraph, it may be inferred, that Sommona ^{his origin.} Kodom is not only the same with Budda, of the western Indians, but that his worship was brought into Siam by the Sammanins, possibly on their expulsion out of the hither peninsula, whence they were driven by the Brâmmans, about 500 years ago^s.

b AFTER all, our knowledge of the Indians, and their histories, is so very imperfect, that we cannot determine whether Budda be the very same person with Shaka, and the god of Tibet; ^{anti-} guty. or whether he was not a different person, pretending to the same divine extraction, who possibly came out of Tibet, and introduced the religion of that country among the western Indians. However, this is certain, that his origin is of great antiquity: probably long before the birth of Christ. For, not to mention what authors say from the tradition of these eastern countries, we find him spoken of by several of the ancient writers, particularly Clemens Alexandrinus; who calls him Boutta, or Butta, and says he was worshipped as a god by the Sarmanes^b. St. Jerom, and others, writes Boudda, or Budda; and says he came into the world through the side of his mother, who still remained a virginⁱ: in the same manner as the Indians, at present, relate of him, of Shaka, and of Fo.

c THAT this Butta, or Budda, was not a person newly sprung up in the days of those pri- ^{The Sha-} mitive doctors, appears from hence; that, according to the first of them, he was worshipped ^{manes.} as a god, on account of his holy life, by the Sarmanes, of whom he gives the following account: "There are two kinds of Indian gymnosophists, or philosophers, one called " Sarmanes, the other Brachmans. Those of the Sarmanes, who are termed solitaries, " neither dwell in cities, nor make use of houses; but cover themselves with the barks of " trees, and feed on fruits. Water is their only liquor, which they drink out of their hand. " They abstain from marriage, and live after the manner of the Encratites^k (G). They " obey the commandments of Butta, and honour him as a god, on account of his holy life." These Sarmanes are the same with the Germanes, mentioned by Strabo^l, after Megasthenes, however the name came to be corrupted; for he speaks of them in nearly the same terms.

d THIS is a remarkable testimony of the antiquity, as well as eminency, of the sect of Sar- ^{Their learn-} manes, in the hither India; and a confirmation of what the Indians of Malabâr relate con- ^{ing.} cerning the Shammanes, or Shammanins, who, without dispute, are the same people. These Shammanes, according to the Malabâr authors, were the antient inhabitants of India, and anterior to the Brâmmans in the hither peninsula. They were skilled in arts and sciences; which the Malabârs had from them. Several of their books, still remaining, are in great esteem; and quoted by the modern Indians, in the same manner as the Greek and Roman authors are with us.

e THE Shammanes were divided into two sects, Buddergueuls, that is, the adorers of Budda, ^{Their sects.} and Shammanergueuls. They openly blasphemed the religion of Wishtnû and Isburen: they detested the sacred books of the Brâmmans; and compelled the Malabârs to embrace their doctrines^m. This accusation, perhaps, is brought to justify the proceedings of the Brâmmans against them. However that be, it is certain, that these latter, by degrees, gained over the Indians to their way of worship: and, as soon as they found themselves the stronger party, began to persecute the Shammanes, whom they at length drove beyond the Ganges, into the farther peninsula of the Indies. On this occasion, doubtless, it was, that the Brâm- ^{Extirpated by} mans have invented the fable of Wishtnu's sixth incarnation, into the Brâmmann Vegoud Dova ^{the Brâm-} Avataram, who, by means of twelve disciples, destroyed the two above-mentioned sectsⁿ (H). ^{mans.} But we learn from another quarter, that this great revolution was brought about by the Brâmmans, who, in several kingdoms of India, stirred up the princes to make a horrible massacre of them^o. Considering that the Malabârs have no regular cycle of years, and that their history is so blended with fables, it is hard to determine when this bloody tragedy f happened: but, as it appears by the books of the Shammanes, that 500 years ago there were yet some remains of them, on the Choromandel coast, it is probable that the idolatry of the Brâmmans hath not had the absolute dominion in that country above five centuries. However that be, we are told the religion of the Shammanes, at present, is to be found neither there, nor on the coast of Malabâr^p.

^s See LA CROZE, ubi supra.

^b CLEM. ALEX. STROM. l. i. p. 529. edit. Potteri. ap. LA CROZE, p. 492.

ⁱ Lib. i. adv. Jovin.

^k CLEM. ALEX. ubi supra.

^l Lib. xv.

^m ZIEGEN BALG. ap. La Croze

Chret. des Indes, p. 493, & seqq.

ⁿ Ibid. p. 497.

^o PONS ap. Lettr. Ediff. tom. xxvi. p. 247.

^p LA CROZE, ubi supra, p. 497, 499.

(G) Who are the followers of Tatian, and Justin Martyr.

(H) It seems not a little odd to us, that the end of Wishtnu's sixth incarnation should be to preach down the religion of Budda, and yet that he should personate him, or assume his form, in the ninth, as if he found no fault with Budda, but his worshippers.

Sommona Kodom.

ALTHOUGH, from the name of Sommona Kodom, chief lawgiver and idol among the Siameses, a we are inclinable to believe, that he was a Shamman, from the coast of Malabar, or Choromandel; yet his arrival in Siam is not to be dated from the expulsion of the Shammans, by the Brámmans: for the Siameses place his death from whence their æra is computed, about the year 544 before Christ (1). Neither must we conclude, although he established the worship and law of Budda in Siam, and seems to bear the name of Budda in that of Pouti Sat, or lord Pouti, as hath been before observed, that he was really Budda himself: for Budda seems to have been worshipped in the hither India, many centuries antecedent to that æra; and his religion settled in that peninsula long before the Brámmans entered the country. It must, therefore, be thought, either that the name of Pouti Sat was given to him, on account of having introduced the doctrine of Budda into Siam; or that he pretended to be Budda, b regenerated in the person of Sommona Kodom.

(1) M. Loubiere informs us, in his relation of Siam, chap. iii. that the year 1689, beginning in December 1688, was the 2233 from Sommona Kodom's death.

S E C T. VI.

Government and history of Lanjang.

§. 1. Government of Lanjang.

Chief officers.

THE country of Laos, as hath been already observed, is divided among several kings; c concerning whom we meet with nothing more than what hath been related, excepting him of Lanjang.

THE principal dignities and offices of this kingdom are eight. The first is that of viceroy-general, who manages one part of state affairs, and assists the king in all matters which concern the government. On the demise of his majesty, it is his business to assemble the council, convene the states, and, in short, take on him the quality of regent, until the successor is enthroned; all other officers or ministers being obliged to obey him. And, because the kingdom is divided into seven provinces, there are appointed seven other viceroys, with equal power, for the government of them: but they reside continually at court, as the king's companions in office, and his counsellors, where they enjoy the revenues, and other benefits, of d their respective departments, which they commit to the care of their lieutenants, or deputy-governors. Besides the provinces, there are other lesser governments, which depend on the greater, in respect both to civil and military affairs.

EACH province has its own militia, consisting of both horse and foot; whose officers depend on the viceroy or governor, he on the prime viceroy, and this last on the king. The troops subsist on revenues assigned them in each province, and are obliged to serve, on that consideration, on all occasions which the kingdom may require^a.

Their state.

THE governors appear with large retinues, and often oppress the people, seizing by force whatever they take a fancy to, especially of foreign merchandize: nor dare any oppose such violences. However, the king does not countenance such acts of injustice; and they are e punishable by the laws. His majesty, far from abusing his power in that manner, as soon as he is informed that a merchant has brought any curiosity into his kingdom, which he has a mind for, immediately orders him not to expose it to sale, and sends the full value of it, to prevent the ruin of commerce; the duties arising from which are of great advantage to his revenue^b. What is still more barbarous in these governors, they often enter into measures to destroy particular men: for, being infatuated with the belief in magic and witchcraft, they hire assassins to hunt and kill men in the woods, in order to procure their gall, for making charms^c, as hath been before related.

Laws few.

WITH regard to laws, the Lanjans have very few; nor need they many, where they have the customs of the country for the guide and rule of their conduct. Besides, the will of the king stands in place of laws, where they are wanting: nor does he exert that authority to the detriment of his subjects. And, in matters of dispute between the people, the opinion of the judges in former cases is made use of, as precedents. There is one custom almost peculiar to this country; for, though tolerated in Siam, it is not established there: this is, a certain subjection and dependence which every family has on one person, as the chief or superior: so that all the Lanjans, excepting the Talapoy, who do not descend in a right line from the principal branch of any family (be their condition what it will, dignified or not, rich or poor), must depend thereon during their lives, without ever having it in their power to free themselves. f ^b Ibid. p. 346, & seq.

^a MARINI hist. de Tunq. & La, p. 358, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 349.

a WHEN they, who issue directly from the main branch, come to marry, the family divides itself in such sort, that the male descendants follow the degree and branch of the father, the female race those of the mother. This dependence or subjection is very strict and incommo- Subjection of families dious. First, they are obliged, twice a year, to pay their acknowledgements, and make presents, to the head of the family: secondly, they are obliged to serve their chief in whatever he commands them, whether he wants to build a house, to celebrate an idol-feast, or take a journey, they are obliged to attend him at their own expence, to obey his orders, and contribute to the expence of the work. On the road some must serve him as soldiers, for his guard, and others as his domestics. This custom proves of great use to the king; who, in a short time, may raise a considerable army: for he has nothing to do but to gain over the chiefs of families. The worst of all is, that, by the same custom, if the chief happens to be convicted of any enormous crime, all those who, in the least degree of affinity, belong to him, are, at the same time, stripp'd of all their rights, and become more miserable than ever; for they are destined thenceforth to serve the king's elephants, to gather herbs for them every day, to keep them clean, and watch them in the night. to their chief.

b JUSTICE is not altogether well administered; and, because crimes are very rarely committed here, many laws are not required: however, they have a few, which prove sufficient to pre- Justice how administered.
serve peace and union among them. The severity, for instance, with which not only blows, but angry words, are punished, is a great means of keeping people in awe. With regard to civil matters, justice is in a very languid state. They have no comments to explain their laws: c so that they are all subject to the interpretation of the judges, who are not without their pre- judices, and may, on the slightest grounds, condemn the parties; who cannot appeal from their sentence, but must suffer the penalty which custom has established ^d.

THE king of Lanjan is an absolute independant prince, and acknowledges no superior either in temporal or spiritual affairs. The property of lands lies wholly in him; who disposes at pleasure of the effects belonging to his subjects: nor can any family in the kingdom inherit or possess any thing left them by will. The king.

ONE here meets with no kind of nobility; nor is it to be acquired either by birth, riches, or virtuous actions. Employments, honours, and wealth, depend solely on the king, who confers those benefits on whom he pleaseth; and resumes them at their deaths. The most he does in favour of their children, is to leave them in possession of the moveable effects: as for houses and lands, money and arms, they all return into the exchequer. No man can say he is master of one foot of land; only the *Talapoy*s can dispose of such spots as are inhabited: but as for the rest, the king distributes them among the governors and commanders, to some more, to others less. These farm them out for three years only to persons, who agree to give one half of the third year's produce to the king. No nobility.

EVERY viceroy has a very numerous retinue: but the court of the king, whose splendor is vastly set off by the magnificence of these grandees, appears chiefly in the incredible number of pages who compose it. These are always at hand to solicit for vacant places, to which they are promoted according to the years which they have served: but, generally speaking, they are advanced through favour, more than merit, as is the case in other countries. Besides the above-mentioned officers, there is an infinite number of others, who have their different occupations. The rank of all courtiers is distinguished by certain gold or silver boxes, which their pages carry after them where-ever they go. The prime viceroy has the privilege of riding upon an elephant richly harnessed, whenever he goes abroad; but the rest are allowed only to be carried in little chairs, adorned with cloth of gold, and accompanied with several footmen in handsome liveries. The other officers, let their quality be what it will, are obliged to go on foot; and although they have their boxes also, yet they must not be carried after them exposed to public view ^e. Viceroy's.

WHATEVER other monarchs may think of the king of Lanjan, he thinks them all his inferiors; nor will yield the superiority to the emperor of China himself. To inspire his subjects with the greater veneration for his person, he appears but seldom in public; and daily withdraws himself more and more from the eyes of his subjects, as if he was of a species something more than human. He is distinguished from others only by the holes made in the fleshy part of his ears, which are of an extraordinary size: they are made so wide by stretching the holes with pipes, putting in a larger every month, till at length the tips of his majesty's ears touch his shoulders. He wears no crown, but such as the ancient emperors used, which is a gold band or ribband, which serves also to bind his hair. King of Lan- jan

HIS Lanjan majesty shews himself but twice a year to his subjects: who, in return for that honour done them, strive all they can to divert him, by means of elephants trained to do a thousand little tricks; and wild beasts, which they set a fighting. They have also wrestlers and gladiators on this occasion, who exert their strength and utmost skill to please the king. seldom appears.

^d MARINI, p. 370, & seqq.^e Ibid. p. 357, & seq.

Visits temples. BUT the time to see the court in all its splendor, is when the king goes to visit some temple; on which occasion all the magnificence of the kingdom is display'd in the dress and equipage of the officers, as well as of his majesty himself, mounted on a lofty elephant most richly accoutred. The king is preceded by his chief officers, and followed by a multitude of horsemen, armed with muskets, and in good order. The cavalcade is closed with several beasts loaded with presents, which his majesty, in behalf of his people, is to make to the idol; whose temple, on that occasion, resembles an exchange, rather than a place of devotion. On this day the women are not permitted to stir out of their houses: but, when the king passes by, they appear at the windows, and sprinkle both him and his presents with the perfumed waters of Naffe; which wetting is very agreeable to him. His majesty is met at some distance from the temple by the Talapoy, dressed in their most pompous habits, who attend him through the ceremony, and, at the end, divide the most valuable offerings among themselves.

His audience. THE magnificence which appears in this festival exceeds that which is displayed at court, when an ambassador is to have his audience, or the petty kings, who are his tributaries, come to pay him homage. On this occasion he receives them in a great hall, sitting on a very high throne, and dressed in his robes of ceremony. He returns their compliments by the mouth of his chancellor; and never speaks to them but by an interpreter^f.

§. 2. History of Lanjang.

Ancient state, WE meet with very little in authors concerning the history and affairs of the Lanjans. It has been already remarked, that they were, many centuries ago, in subjection to China; as were all the other countries of the farther Indian peninsula: but, after they had shaken off the yoke, and were powerful, they formed themselves into a kind of republic, which continued till the year of Christ 600, when their state became a monarchy.

free and independent. For the country having become more populous by the great resort of Siameses, who, for that end, had leave to settle there; the Lanjans, to secure the power to themselves, elected a chief or commander, whom they invested with all the authority, and acknowledged for their sovereign. But factions arising among them, through the intrigues of the Siameses; these latter, having had a powerful party, procured one to be raised to the throne, who was of the family of the kings of Siam. From this prince the kings of Lao, or rather Lanjan, have been lineally descended, for above a thousand years; insomuch that they still retain both the language and dress of their ancestors. From this time, likewise, they seem to have continued independent, although some authors report that they pay tribute to the king of Tong-king^a. But that is a mistake, arising from a circumstance which they were not sufficiently acquainted with, and is as follows.

Subject to Ava. THE governor of a province of Lao having usurped the sovereignty, the king of Tong-king, to whom that province formerly belonged, invaded and obliged him by force to pay him tribute. This he did for some time: but, towards the end of the sixteenth, or beginning of the seventeenth century, the king of Ava, after conquering Pegu and Siam, made himself master, not only of that province, but of all Lao (or Lanjan), whose inhabitants he carried to Pegu, in order to people that country. The Lanjans, who bore their captivity with the utmost impatience, at length formed a general conspiracy, to recover their liberty; and rising on a day appointed, put the Peguers to the sword, where-ever they met with them. Their enterprise was attended with so great success, that, had they pursued their good fortune, they might easily have reduced the whole kingdom under their subjection: but the desire they had to return to their own country made them hasten thither, from whence they quickly expelled their enemies, who had it in possession. The news of this revolution coming to the ears of the natives, who had fled for shelter into the neighbouring mountains and forests, they presently returned, and re-peopled Lanjan, the capital of this kingdom, which soon recovered its former splendor, under its legitimate king.

Throne off the yoke, THE king of Ava and Pegu not being able, at that juncture, to revenge the insult, dissembled his resentment; and the better to compass his design by fraud, pretended to relinquish his right to the kingdom, and make an alliance with the Lanjans; contenting himself with a very small acknowledgement on their side. Mean time he, under-hand, made great preparations for war: but his death, which happened in the year 1647, frustrated his intentions. However, his successor, pursuing the same scheme, sent ambassadors to the Lanjans, with rich presents, and very obliging letters; by which he demanded, but in very moderate terms, a yearly tribute of only one choice elephant, and a beautiful maiden. The king of Lao, far from agreeing to the proposal, was so provoked, that he caused the ambassadors and their equipage to be seized as spies. At the same time he sent some of his best troops towards the

^f MARINI, p. 361, & seqq.

^a Ibid. ubi supra, p. 356.

^a frontiers of Pegu, where the king of Ava had his magazines filled with warlike stores, ready for his intended enterprise : but as he left them unguarded, in order to take off all suspicion, the Lanjans came on them by surprise, and burnt them to the ground. This unexpected blow ruined all the measures of that formidable monarch, who durst neither attack them, nor pursue their retreat, as well for want of ammunition, as for fear of a rebellion, knowing that his subjects hated him ^b.

THIS is all the account we are able to give of the affairs of Lanjan; as having received very little information from that country, since the middle of the last century, when the missionaries found it impracticable to propagate their religion among the inhabitants, who were too much under the influence of their Talapoy, or priests.

^b MARINI, p. 366, & seqq.

C H A P. VIII.

The kingdom of Siam.

S E C T. I.

Name, extent, mountains, rivers, soil, and produce.

^a THE name of Siam came into Europe by the Portugueses, who write also Sion, and had ^{its name.} it probably from the people of Pegu, or the Malayans, who call it Tsiam^a. This is not the appellation given to the country by the natives : but as Tsiam or Siam signifies free in the Peguan language, it seems to be a translation of the indigenous name of the inhabitants, which is Tay : and hence the country is called Mouang or Muang (A) Tay, that is, the kingdom of freemen, or Franks. They also call themselves Tay-noe, the little Tay, or Siams ; to distinguish them from the Tay-yay, or great Siams (B), who inhabit the northern mountains, and are reputed savages ^b. Pinto says, the true name of Siam is Sornau, or the empire of the Sornau^c : but we do not find that what he asserts has been confirmed by any traveller since his time.

^b SIAM is surrounded by high mountains, which, on the east side, separate it from the king- ^{Bounds.} doms of Kamboja and Lahos, or Laos ; on the west from Pegu ; and on the north from Ava, or, more properly, from Jangoma, which is subject to Ava ; on the south it is washed by the gulf of Siam, and has the peninsula of Malakka ; the north part (C) whereof is under its dominion.

THE general situation of Siam has been determined by the observations made in 1688 by ^{Situation and} the Jesuit missionaries, at the city of Siam and Louvo ; but its dimensions are uncertain. The ^{extent.} Abbe Choisy promised to draw an exact map of it^d ; and we are told, the king of Siam would have engaged the missionaries to have made a map of his own and the neighbouring kingdoms, but they were obliged to proceed for China^e. However, Mr. Loubiere has published ^c one at the head of his description of Siam, made by an Englishman, who went up the Menan, as far as the northern frontiers^f ; which, according to this map, are placed in the latitude of 22° 30'. This Mr. De l'Isle has followed in his maps ; and Mr. Bellin, in his map of the farther peninsula (D), extends them to the 23d degree. But the late map of China, published ^{Mistakes about} by the Jesuits, shews this to be a very great error : for in that case, instead of leaving room ^{them.} for the kingdom of Jangoma, and other provinces of Ava, which lie to the north of Siam, between it and China, its northern borders will be carried one whole degree within those of China. To avoid this error, Mr. Bellin has run into another, equally injurious to geography, by contracting the bounds of the province of Tun-nan, in China, above four degrees from voyage, ch. 47. p. 269.

^a KAMPFER hist. Japan. p. 25.

^b LOUBIERE hist. Siam, p. 6, & seq.

^c MENDEZ PINTO'S

^d CHOISY voy. de Siam, p. 552.

^e TACHARD voy. de Siam, p. 265.

^f LOUBIERE, p. 3.

(A) It is also written Meüang, or Mewang, Moang, Moan, Mong, and the like. Ger-vaise says, p. 42. that Meüang Thay, signifies a country of great strength ; they call it also the circuit of the visitations of the gods. Kampfer Japan, p. 25.

(B) Of these an account has been given before, p. 283.

(C) In consequence of this, it may be said to be washed on the west side by the gulf of Bengál : where it has some good ports, as Merguy, Junfalim, &c.

(D) Inserted in the Histoire generale des voyages, tome ix. under the title of Cartes des royaumes de Siam, Tunquin, Pegu, &c.

west to east. Would it not have been better to make Siam contiguous with China, since a Loubiere's map is not to be compared with that of the Jesuits for accuracy? On the contrary, that author confesses, that the person who made the map of Siam was not skilled enough to give the positions entirely exact. He should have gone farther, and said he had not taken any latitudes; at least he observed none on the northern frontiers, the situation of which, above all things, ought to have been settled.

Loubiere's
map faulty.

LOUBIERE places the southern borders of Siam in thirteen degrees of latitude; by that means curtailing it more on that side than he has enlarged it on the other. Joost Schuten (E), with more propriety, extends it northward only to the eighteenth degree, and southward to the seventh; where it confines with the kingdoms of Patane and Queda, which are its tributaries. However, we make its northern limits to touch the nineteenth parallel; nor durst we venture to give them a greater elevation; since, in so doing, we leave no more than three degrees for the countries lying between Siam and China. According then to our computation, Siam is situated between the seventh and nineteenth degrees of latitude, containing twelve degrees, or about 834 English miles in length from south to north; and between the 115th and 121st degrees of longitude: so that its greatest breadth from west to east is about 400 miles; but, towards the north, it is not much above half that breadth.

The mountains

SIAM being, as hath been already observed, surrounded with mountains, and having very few hills within the intermediate country, may be said to be one wide extended plain, with a great river, and its branches, running through it from north to south. It is remarkable, that these great mountains, which make two huge chains, one on the west and the other on the east side, diminish gradually as they advance southward. That on the west side, having passed along the borders of Pegu, runs through the middle of the peninsula of Malakka, and terminates at the cape of Sinkapura, the most southern point of all Asia, which separates the gulf or bay of Bengál from that of Siam. The eastern chain, which divides Siam from Labos and Kamboja, terminates at the cape of this last name, which makes the most eastern point of the gulf of Siam^b. The kingdom of Siam extends on each side of the gulf like a horseshoe, beginning on the east side at the river of Chantabon, which divides it from Kamboja: on the opposite side it reaches as far south as Quedab and Patana in the territories of the Malayans, of which Malakka was formerly the capital. Thus the coast runs about 200 leagues along the gulf of Siam, and 180 along that of Bengál, affording great conveniency for trade to the kingdom.

which surround it.

SEVERAL rivers, descending from these chains of mountains, fall into both gulfs, and render the coasts inhabitable. Hence the coast of Siam, in the gulf of Bengál, has ports and roads, which the opposite coast of Choromandel wants^b.

The river
Menâm.

THE principal river of all Siam is called Menâm, Menân, or Meynâm, that is, the mother of waters, by way of excellency; Menâm being an appellation given to all great rivers through the farther Indian peninsle. The source of this river is either unknown to most of the inhabitants of these parts, or they misrepresent it, in order to magnify its origin. Hence travellers have given such different accounts: some, as Mendez Pinto, say, it rises in a lake called Chiamay, near a city of that name, several days journey to the north of Siam; but Loubiere could not hear of any such lake^c. Gervaise says, it probably has its source in a great lake, discovered some years since in the country of Laos^k; which, if there be any such, may be the lake of Chiamay. According to Kæmpfer, the Siameses derive it from the high mountains of Imaus; and report that it divides into several arms, which run through Kamboja, Siam, and Pegu, into the sea. They farther pretend, that these arms are joined by other smaller branches, not only among themselves, but also with the Ganges, rising in the same mountains, if they are not rather to be deemed branches of this last river; and hence a passage might be opened for vessels to go from Siam into Bengál. But our author will not vouch for the truth of this account^l; and he is in the right of it, for it is contrary to experience.

Its origin.

As some make it a branch of the Ganges^m, so others derive it, still more extravagantly, from the *Indus*ⁿ. But we are told that M. Le Clerc, a missionary, who ascended the Menâm as far as the frontiers of Lao (F), found it there very narrow; and the inhabitants assured him, that three days higher it was no more than a small brook descending from the mountains^o. This seems to be the most likely account of its origin; and agrees with what Mr. Loubiere relates, that it is so small at its entrance into the kingdom of Siam, that for fifty leagues it carries only little boats, holding no more than four or five persons^p.

^b See LOUBIERE. p. 3 & 7.
Siam, p. 8.
ubi sup.

^c KÆMPFER, p. 43.

^o CHOISY, ubi sup.

^b LOUBIERE, ibid.

^l Ibid. p. 3.

^m CHOISY voy. de Siam, p. 536.

^p LOUBIERE, ubi sup.

^k GERVAISE relat. de

ⁿ See GERVAISE,

(E) He was director of the Dutch company in those parts, and wrote in the year 1636.

(F) Rather perhaps Jungama, then probably dependant on Lao, or Lanjang, a part of Lao.

- a Its course is from north to south, through the whole country of Siam. As it advances Its course. towards the sea, it is increased by other rivers, especially on the east side, and becomes very large at last, as it approaches the capital; from whence upwards, it is embarrassed with rocks and cataracts; but their praws (or large boats) may be taken to pieces, and carried by land till those obstructions are past ^a. This river, descending from the city of Ubiamay (G), and entering Siam, passes by the following cities: Me-tak, the first towards the north-north-west; then, successively, Tian-tong, Kampeng, or Kampeng-pet (H), which some pronounce Kampingue, Lakon-sevan, Chaynat, Siam (or Siyuthia), Talakoan, Talagueow, and Bangkok (or Fon); seven miles below which it falls into the gulf of Siam by three mouths, the most navigable of which is that towards the east ^r.
- b AT the mouth, by the Siameses called Pagnam Taufia ^s, it is a league wide; higher up it Bar at the diminishes to one fourth of that breadth; and every-where above, as far as the capital city, mouth. it is 200 paces over. Its channel all that way is deep, and pretty equal (I), carrying up vessels of 3 or 400 tons; and was it not for the bank or bar at its mouth, which has but eleven or twelve feet water in the highest floods, great ships might sail up it; but, on account of that obstruction, they are obliged to remain in the road, which is very safe. Its course from the city downwards is very winding, making several agreeable isles: the water is very clear, light, and good. It is full of fish, but has not such variety as the rivers of France. The chief of them is called by the Europeans kaboche, about a foot and half long, and ten or twelve thick, with a kind of flat and square head: there are two sorts; one ash-coloured, the other black: this last is best for keeping. They dry them in the sun, and have a great trade for them with the neighbouring countries. The fish of this river are not like those of France, but then they are rather more delicious. One often meets with crocodiles of a monstrous size; and a little venomous fish, which, on being provoked, swells like a toad. It is delightful sailing on this river, whose banks are green and very populous; but one is sadly tormented with gnats: in a word, its waters annually swell and overflow ^t. This Overflow happens in March, at which time the country is drowned for above 120 miles in circuit. To yearly. this periodical event the kingdom not only owes its yearly fertility, but has sometimes been obliged for its preservation: as it happened in 1587, when the vast army of Pegu, which besieged the capital city, was on a sudden surprised by the inundation, and the greater part of
- c it destroyed ^u.
- d THE map published by Mr. Loubiere exhibits another river called also Menán, which rising Other rivers in the mountains on the western borders of Labos or Laos, runs southward, almost parallel with the former; and passing through Menang Fang, Pichay, Porse'ouk, and Pichit, falls into the great river at Lakon-sevan. The journal of the Chinese merchants, often quoted before, mentions two rivers of this country which have their sources in the kingdom of Laos; one called the river of Siam, which rises in the mountain Kyang Darw, the other Kyang-hay, or Kyang-lay, which falls into the great river ^v: but which of these, or whether either of them, is the river passing by Muang Fang, we cannot pretend to determine.
- e THERE are two other rivers of note which fall into the great Menám, near its mouth; one falling into it. on the west-side, which rises near the city of Kambori, to the south-west of Lakon-sevan; and from thence descending towards Papri, divides into two branches; the most northern, called Mahapram, joins the great Menám, a little to the north of the capital of Siam; the other falls into the sea, near Pipeli, towards the western mouth of the same river.
- f THE river on the east side has its source a little above the city of Karazema, on the frontiers of the Laos: and, having passed by Kanayot and Perion, enters the sea at Banplasoy, near the eastern branch of the Menán.
- BESIDES the above-mentioned rivers, we meet with two other considerable ones, which That of Te- are, at present, within the bounds of this kingdom. The first is that of Tenassarim, which nasserim. comes from the mountains of Ava, and is of great length; but the navigation is rendered difficult, by rocks and branches of trees, with which its channel is full. It is likewise so rapid, that one cannot ascend it above three or four leagues a day: it passes almost due south to the city of Tenassarim; and then turning suddenly to the north-west, about thirteen leagues from thence, falls into the bay of Bengál, at the port of Mergbey.
- THE other river is that of Chantebon, which, though not so large as some of those before-mentioned, carries large vessels with greater ease than any of them; and notwithstanding River of Chantebon. there is a great bank of mud at the entrance, yet you have always fourteen or fifteen feet water ^y.

^a KÆMPFER, ubi supra, p. 26.^r LOUBIERE, ubi supra, p. 3.^s KÆMPFER, p. 13.^t GER-^v AISE, ubi supra, p. 7, & seqq.^u See PIMENTA apud Purch. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1746.^x DU

HALDE's description of China, vol. i. p. 62.

^y GERVAISE, ubi supr. p. 11, & seqq.(G) Doubtless Jamabay, capital of Jangama.(H) Probably the Kapimpr of Mendez Pinto.(I) Kæmpfer, p. 43. says it is very deep, rapid, full, and broader than the Elbe.

Soil and produce.

THE country of Siam may be divided into cultivated and uncultivated lands; of which latter it for the most part consists; being covered with woods of bambû, and other trees. The most profitable to the Siameses are those which produce cotton, oil, and varnish. These oils, mixed with plasters, render the walls of their houses as white, hard, and well polished, as marble. Their varnish is very good, but they know not how to make use of it. The forests afford timber for building ships and houses, for wainscoting and carving. There is both light and heavy wood; some easy to cleave, others which will not cleave at all: this is called Wood Mary, and is better than any other for the ribs of ships. Here is also the iron wood, very heavy and tough, of which anchors are made. It is said to have the quality of corroding iron in time. There is a wood as light as fir, and of the same colour, but more fit for carving, as it never splinters under the chissel.

Useful timber.

ABOVE all, the Siameses have trees so tall and strait, that one alone is sufficient to make a boat, or balon, sixteen or twenty fathom long. They have also the cinnamon-tree, the best next to that of Seylan; Sapan, and other woods proper for dyeing; the aquila, or aloes wood, better than what other countries produce, though not so good as the Kalamba of Kochinchina. This wood is found only in pieces; being nothing but rotten parts of certain trees. All trees of the kind have it not; nor is it always to be met with in the same part of those which have it: so that it requires a tedious search in the woods^a.

Mines.

No country has a greater reputation for being rich in mines than Siam: this appears from the multitude of statues, and other cast works; great numbers of which are of gold. The wainscot also, and roofs of their temples, are gilded. However, they have of late sought in vain for mines, either of gold or silver. The king had made a metal called tambuk, by mixing a little gold with copper. Mr. Vincent, a French physician, discovered a mine of very good steel, and another of chrystal; also of antimony, emeril, and other minerals: besides a quarry of white marble, and a rich gold mine; but concealed it from the Siameses, whom yet he instructed in many things, relating to the smelting and extracting metals from the ore. They have plenty of lead and tin, called kalin, which is sold throughout India. It is soft, and not well purified; but, to render it whiter and harder, they mix it with kadmia, a mineral easily reduced to powder; and it is this white tin which is called toutinague. The kadmia, melted with copper, makes it yellow: but both metals become more brittle by the mixture.

Tambuk
metal.

Kalin and toutinague.

Loadstone.

THERE is a mountain of loadstone near the city of Louvo; and another near the city of Jonsalam, on the bay of Bengâl: but the latter (and perhaps the former) loses its virtue in three or four months. The mountains afford very curious agate; and Mr. Vincent saw some pieces of sapphires and diamonds, with the *Talapoy*s, who busy themselves much in such kinds of searches. They have mines of iron, which they know how to smelt, but are bad forgers. They use wooden anchors to their galleys; and have neither chissels, saws, nor nails, nor even pins nor needles: for in building they use only pins made of bambû. They have some iron and copper padlocks, the first good, the latter very naught; but both sorts brought from Japan, for they make none themselves^a.

Overflowings advantage of.

THE land of Siam seems to be formed by the mud descending from the mountains; to which mud, and the overflowings of the river, the soil owes its fertility: for in the higher places, and parts not reached by the inundation, all is dried up and burnt with the sun, soon after the rains are over. Those parts are likewise subject to contagious distempers, and the annoyance of insects, which the overflowings destroy. However, the ants, to avoid them, make their nests in trees; and, for the same reason, partridges and pigeons, which do not perch in other countries, instructed by nature, do all perch in this. Among the insects are the white ants, the marin-gowins, a kind of gnats; the millipede, or palmer-worm, which carries a sting both in its head and tail. Lastly, little shining flies, with four wings: they have some light in their eyes: but their greatest splendor proceeds from under their wings when they fly.

Insects.

Three seasons.

THE Siameses reckon only three seasons in the year, winter, little summer, and great summer. The first, which lasts but two months, answers to those of our December and January. The second season is composed of the three following months: and the other seven form the great summer. Thus their winter happens nearly at the same time with ours; because, like us, they inhabit to the north of the line; but then it is as hot as our warmest summer: so that they always cover their garden plants against the heat of the sun, as we do against the cold in winter-nights: and yet the diminution appears to them not a little incommodious. The little summer is their spring; but they have no autumn. And as for their great summer, they might well make two of it, in imitation of the antient authors, who speak of the Indies; since they have the sun directly over their heads twice during that hot season^b.

Winter.

^a LOUBIERE, ubi supr. p. 11, & seqq.

^a Ibid. p. 13, & seqq.

^b Ibid. p. 15, & seqq.

a THEIR winter is dry, and their summer rainy. Was it not that the sun draws clouds and rain, and that the wind blows from one pole, when the sun is declined towards the other, the torrid zone would doubtless be uninhabitable. Thus in Siam, that great luminary being to the south of the line during winter, the north winds blow continually, and cool the air. On the contrary, in the summer, while he is to the north of the line, and vertical to the Siameses, the south winds reign in their turn; and thus either cause incessant rains, or dispose the weather to be rainy. It is this constant law of the winds which the Portugueses call Monçaos (K), and Monsoons, other nations after them Monsoons. From hence also it is that ships can hardly get to the bar of Siam, during the six months of north winds; or depart from it for the other six months, in which the south winds command.

b THE Siameses have no word to express week; but, like us, they call the seven days after the planets (L), and their Monday corresponds with ours; but the day begins six hours sooner there than here. They begin their year on the first day of the moon in November or December, according to certain rules; and make use of a cycle of sixty years, like most of the other eastern nations, which is composed of a lesser cycle of twelve years, to each of which they give a name (M), five times repeated. Their months are twelve, consisting each of thirty days; neither of which are expressed by names, but by numbers^c. Account of time.

c RICE, called Kaow, is the principal harvest, and chief food, of the Siameses: this is the produce of the low-lands; but wheat grows in those which escape the inundation. These lands they water with watering pots, or by overflowing them with rain water, kept in cisterns, raised on higher grounds. But whether it costs more to rear it, or is not so well liked as rice, the king only uses it; and that perhaps more out of curiosity, than for any other reason. What our author ate of the king's bread was so dry, that he preferred the rice boiled in water: however, some Europeans assured him, that the wheaten bread of Siam is good; and that its dryness might proceed from rice-flower being mixed with it. Their grain.

d THE Siameses, in their agriculture, employ both buffaloes and oxen: which they guide by means of a cord, run through the gristle of their nose, with a knot on each side, that it may not slip in drawing. It also passes through a hole or ring, at the end of the draught-tree of the plough. Nothing is more simple than this machine, which consists of three pieces of wood: one is a long beam, which serves for the draught-tree or pole; another is crooked, serving for the handle; the third is a shorter and stronger piece, which is fastened underneath, at the end of the handle. It is this which bears the share; and these four pieces are tied together with leathern thongs.

e ONE meets with Turkey wheat in Siam, but it is reared only in gardens. Their way is to boil or parch the whole ear, and then eat the inside. They have pease and other legumes, but different from ours. Mr. Loubiere saw excellent potatoes of the size and shape of parsnips; which, roasted under ashes, eat like a chestnut. He likewise met with siboules; but neither onions, garlick, cucumbers, citruls, water-melons, parsley, baum, nor sorrel. They have no true melons, strawberries, raspberries, nor artichokes; although they have plenty of asparagus, which yet they do not eat. They have no fellery, cauliflowers, coleworts, turnips, parsnips, carrots, leeks, lettuce: in short, most of the herbs, whereof we compose our fallads, are unknown to them. However, the soil of Siam may be proper for them, since they thrive about Batavia. Pulse.

f TUBEROSES and gilliflowers, amaranthus's and tricolors, are common in Siam; but roses and jessamins are very scarce. Excepting these, most of our flowers and plants are strangers there: nor have they so full a scent as those of Europe; the excessive heat dissipating the fragrant smell, as well as the rank taste of vegetables. And hence no good grapes can be produced in this country^d. This is all which we think necessary to relate concerning the natural history of Siam. As to animals, such as elephants, rhinoceros's, and tigers, scorpions, and serpents, which last are of a monstrous size, we shall pass them over, as common to other countries; and shall only take notice of certain birds, called by the Siameses Noktho, which are larger than ostriches, and whose bill is three feet long. Tachard saw one of a middling size, whose length, from the end of its bill to its feet, was four feet ten inches; and its wings, when extended, spread seven feet and a half. The colour of its feathers, on the neck and belly, was white; those on the back, partly inclining to grey, partly to red. The wings a mixture of grey and white, but the great feathers at the end of them were black^e. Flowers. Animals and birds.

^c LOUBIERE, p. 18, & seq.

^d Ibid. p. 17, & seq.

^e TACHARD VOY. de Siam, tom. ii. p. 266.

(K) From the Latin motiones æris, according to Officius and Meffi.

(L) Van Ait, Sunday; Van Chan, Monday; Van Angkaen, the day of Mars, or Tuesday; Van Pout, the day of Mercury or Wednesday; Van Pabaat, the day of Jupiter, or Thursday; Van Souk, the day of Venus, or Friday; Van Saow, the day of Saturn, or Saturday. Van signifies day.

(M) The names are those of animals, like the Oygûr, or Tartar cycle; as the little mare, great mare, ape, crow, &c.

S E C T. II.

Provinces and Cities.

Upper Siam. THE kingdom of Siam is divided into the upper and lower. The upper, which lies to the north, contains seven provinces; denominated, from their chief cities, Porcelouk, Sanquelouk, Lakontay, Kampeng-pet, Kokonrepina, Peshebon, and Pichay. Each of these provinces is subdivided into several other jurisdictions or districts; Porcelouk contains ten; Sanquelouk, eight; Lakontay, seven; Kampeng-pet, ten; Kokonrepina, five; Peshebon, two; and Pichay, seven. Besides these, there are in the upper Siam twenty-one other jurisdictions, which are so many lesser provinces or districts.

Lower Siam. IN the lower, or southern Siam, they reckon the provinces of Jor, Patana, Ligor, Tenasserim, Chantebon, Petelong, or Bordelong, and Chiay. Jor, is subdivided into seven lesser provinces or districts; Patana, into eight; Ligor contains twenty; Tenasserim, twelve; Chantebon, seven; Petelong, eight; and Chiay, two. The lower Siam has, besides the above mentioned, thirteen other small provinces or districts: and the city of Siam has a province peculiar to itself, situated in the heart of the realm, between the upper and lower Siam^a. Choisy reckons in the whole kingdom no more than the following provinces; Siuteya, Bankok, Porcelouk, Pitpri, Pichay, Kampeng, Rapri, Tenasserim, Ligor, Kamburi, Konrasema, and Loukonsevan^b. Conformably to this account Kampfer says, Siam contains twelve large provinces; and that the late king had added a thirteenth (doubtless Jangoma), taken from the Laos; but that a few years after it was re-conquered from him^c.

Provinces in each. IF you will believe the Siameses, their country is full of splendid cities: but, for all their boasts, Gervaise informs us, that there are not more than nine in the whole kingdom which deserve the name of cities; the rest being no better than country towns and hamlets, nothing equal to those in France, for either size or handsomeness^d. Choisy reckons up eight principal cities besides the capital; namely Tannasserim, Jonselang, Ligor, Pitpri, Bankok, Pourselouk, Kamburi, and Konrasema^e. Loubiere mentions about twenty. But these fall far short of the number reported by De Faria y Sousa, who, from Mendez Pinto, or some such romancing author, affirms, that Siam contains no fewer than 13,000 cities and towns, besides villages, all walled^f.

Me-tak city. THE first city of this kingdom towards the north is Me-tak, seated on the great Menâm. It is subject to an hereditary lord, called by some Paya-Tak, or prince of Tak; who they say, is a vassal to the king of Siam.

THE next city which occurs in the same river is called Tian-tong, which signifies true gold: but lay in ruins in 1688; supposed by our author to have been reduced to that condition by the wars of Pegu.

Kampeng. KAMPENG, or Kampeng-pet, which signifies walls of diamond, although they are but of stone (for the Siameses affect to give splendid names to their most indifferent towns), is by some pronounced Kampingue. It is famous for mines of excellent steel^g. This city, which stands on the Menâm, is very ancient; and not inferior, for largeness, to the capital of Siam. It is between 50 and 60 leagues distant from Porcelouk, and ten days journey from the kingdom of Laos. It is fortified in the best manner after the Siamese method; and might hold out a long siege against the Asiatics, though not able to defend itself half a day against the French^h. This is possibly the chief city of the country of Kapimper, mentioned by Pinto; who speaks of it as having no fewer than seventeen kings belonging to itⁱ.

Lakonsevan. AT Lakonsevan, that is, the mountain of heaven, the Menâm receives another river from the north-east, as hath been said before. This city stands about mid-way between the capital of Siam and Pitsanoulouk, corruptly called by the Portugueses Porcelouk: a distance computed to be twenty-five days journey, for those who ascend the river in a boat; but it may be performed in twelve days with a great many rowers. These cities, like all the rest in the kingdom, are only a great number of cabbins, frequently fenced with an inclosure of wood, and sometimes with a brick or stone wall; but very rarely the latter^k.

Pitsanoulouk. PITSANOULOUK (A) is situated on the lesser Menâm; this is the second city in the kingdom, and its name signifies pearl, or diamond encased. It is about 100 leagues more to the

^a LOUBIERE, p. 82.^b CHOISY, p. 523.^c KÆMPFER, p. 26.^d GERVAISE, p. 41.^e CHOISY, p. 5. ubi supr.^f DE FARIA Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 364.^g LOUBIERE, p. 4.^h GERVAISE, p. 48.ⁱ PINTO voy. p. 279.^k LOUBIERE, ubi sup.

(A) Loubiere places it in more than 19 degrees of latitude; but, according to our computation, it must be under 17 degrees. Choisy, who calls it Pourselouk, says it abounds with elephants, rice, sulphur, rhinoceros horns, skins of buffaloes, tigers, stags, &c. also with red gum, of which Spanish wax is made; sugar-canes, onions, tobacco, wax, honey, pitch-torches, and oil; timber for ships, cotton, Sapan wood, &c. Choisy, p. 525.

a north than Yutbia, in a more temperate climate and fruitful soil. It was built by Chaw Meuang Hing, who reigned about 250 years before Chaw Thong, founder of the capital, and gained many victories over the Laos. This city was formerly the usual residence of the kings of Siam, and one of their ancient palaces is still remaining. It is about one league in circuit; and the brick wall, which incloseth it, is one of the best in the kingdom. It is divided in two by the river which washes it¹.

SOME days journey to the north of it, on the same river, and frontiers of the kingdom, Meuang stands Meuang Fang, which some interpret, the city of the wood Fang, called by the Portuguese Sapan: but because a tooth is kept there, pretended to be a relick of their lawgiver Sommona Kodom, some give it the name of Meuang Fang, that is, the city of the tooth^m.

b BETWEEN Meuang Fang and Pitsanoulouk, at the distance of about forty-five leagues, but more to the east, on a river which falls into the lesser Menâm, is Lokontay, or Lokontaya. It is the last city of the Siameses towards the kingdom of Laos, although no less than fifteen days journey distant: for the road lies through inaccessible forests and vast desarts, where scarce a hut is to be met withⁿ.

ON the borders of the same country, but many days journey more to the south, stands Korazema. Korazema, which some call Kariffima, a place of considerable note^o. Choisy names it Konrasema, and says it abounds with elephants, rhinoceros's, eagle-wood, and other valuable commodities^p.

ON the frontiers of Pegu, towards Martabân, is situated the city of Kambori, or Kamburi, Kambori. c which has the same produce with Porjelouk, excepting sugar-canes and onions. Likewise in the lands which lie between the rivers above the city of Lakon-sevan, and on the chanel which pass from one river to the other, there are two considerable cities more; one called Sokotay, almost in the same latitude with Pichit; the other Sanquelouk, lying more to the north. It must be noted that almost all the cities, towns, and other habitations, of the Siameses, are built on the banks of rivers, or the canals of communication; the country being so hot, that it is inhabitable no-where else^q.

THE capital of Siam, to which the Portuguese gave the same name with the country, is, by Siam, or the natives, called Li-yo-tbi-ya (B), the o in yo, being closer than the French diphthong ou. Of Siyuthia, this foreigners have made Judia, Jutbia, and Odiaa. It is situated in an island, amidst d several others, made by canals cut by the natives; which island is, at present, all inclosed within its walls. So that, unless some great alteration has been made since the time of Mendez Pinto, we must place his account of it to the number of his falsities: for he says, the elephants of the king of Pegu, who besieged the city in 1548, approached the walls so nearly, as with their trunks to beat down the palisadoes, raised by the Siameses to cover themselves. It has almost the shape of a purse, the mouth of which is to the east, and the bottom to the west. The river meets it at the north by several chanel, which run into that which incircles it; and leaves it on the south; by dividing again into several streams. The king's palace stands to the north, on the canal which incloses the city: and, at the east end, there is a causey, by which alone, as by an isthmus, people may go in and out, without crossing the water.

e SIYUTHIA is spacious, considering the compass of the walls (C), but scarce a sixth part is large, but not inhabited, and that to the south-east only: the rest lies desert; where nothing is to be seen populous. excepting temples, which are erected in several places. However, some amends is made by the suburbs, which are inhabited by strangers. The streets are large and strait: in some places planted with trees, and paved with bricks, laid edgewise. Most of them are watered with strait canals, which have caused this city to be compared to Venice; but they are covered with a great many ugly little bridges, made of hurdles, and some of brick. The houses are low, and built with wood; at least those belonging to the natives; who, for those reasons, are exposed to all the inconveniences of the excessive heats.

f THE city was founded, according to the Siameses, in the 1894th year of their æra, which Its longitude answers to that of Christ 1351 (D). The latitude of it was found, by Thomas the Jesuit, to and latitude be fourteen degrees eighteen minutes; and the longitude ninety-eight degrees thirty minutes from the meridian of Paris, or one hundred and eighteen degrees thirty minutes from that of Ferro. This is an observation of great importance, as it serves to fix the situation of the whole farther peninsula of India; and is of use in settling that of the adjacent islands^r.

THE king of Siam's palace, called Prasjat, as well in this city as those elsewhere, has three The king's inclosures, so distant one from the other, that the spaces between look like vast courts. The palace.

¹ GERVAISE, p. 47.

^m LOUBIERE, p. 4. & seq.

ⁿ GERVAISE, p. 58.

^o LOUBIERE, p. 6.

^p CHOISY, p. 526.

^q LOUBIERE, p. 6. & CHOISY, ubi supra.

^r LOUBIERE, p. 7. & GERVAISE, p. 41.

(B) Choisy writes Sciayuthaia; Gervaise, Meuang Siyuthia; which signifies the city of Siyuthia.

(C) Gervaise says, p. 41, that the city is not above two leagues in circuit, exclusive of the palace.

(D) According to this computation, it was 338 years standing in 1689, when Loubiere wrote; Gervaise therefore is mistaken, who says it was built only about 200 years before.

innermost, called Vang, contains that monarch's apartments, with some court and some garden. ^a The Siameses never enter or go out of the Vang without prostrating themselves; neither do they ever pass before the Prassat: and if the current happens to carry them athwart it, they are sure to be pelted with pease, which the king's servants shoot at them from trunks. The French ambassadors landed at the first entrance of the palace, and left their umbrellas there. The gates are always shut; and, behind each, stands a porter, who, if any body knocks, informs the officer who commands in the first inclosure. For, without his permission, no person either goes in or out; and he examines their breath, to see if they have drank arak; as much care being taken to keep out drunken people, as those who bear arms.

Its several courts.

BETWEEN the two first inclosures, and under a pent-house, there is posted a small number of soldiers, but unarmed and stooping. These, named Kenbay, or painted arms, are both the ^b prince's executioners and his guards. They also row his balon, when he goes on the water. There may be about 600 in the palace, but many more through the kingdom. In the first inclosure are the stables of the best elephants and horses, to which the king gives names. In the Vang are some of those single halls, where the officers meet, either to discharge their functions, or to make their court to his majesty; who shews himself from a window, belonging to a higher chamber than that of audience. At the two corners of the hall, on the same side, and of equal height with the window, which is nine feet above the floor, are two doors, and two pair of narrow stairs to ascend. For the furniture, there are only three umbrellas, one before the window, with nine rounds, and two with seven rounds, on both sides of the window: the umbrella being, in this country, a mark of state, as the canopy is in Europe. ^c In this hall the officers receive their orders, by the intervention of forty pages (E), divided into four bands, consisting of eleven each: two bands prostrate themselves in the hall, at the king's right hand; the other two on his left^d.

Hall of audience.

The king's apartments.

THIS palace, which is built of brick, is about a mile and half in circuit. It is divided by several courts: in the two first are lodged the officers of the king's household; and in the others, there are still to be seen some old apartments of the ancient kings, esteemed as sacred places, with rows of trees before them, which render their habitation very delightful. There are likewise some old temples, which make a handsome figure. The king's apartment, which is in the innermost court, was but newly built, when the French ambassadors were at Siam: the gold, which glitters in a thousand places, distinguishes it from the other buildings. ^d Its figure is that of a cross; in the middle whereof there rises above the roof a pyramid of several stories, which is the mark of royal houses. It is all covered with tin: nor can anything be better done than the carved work, with which it is adorned on every side. The apartment of the princess, his daughter, who, after the death of her mother, was created a queen, was near the king's, and appeared very magnificent. Both looked into great gardens, well planted; whose walks were divided by little canals.

His pleasure barges.

WITHOUT the palace, on the river, to the left hand, are the great magazines, where the king's balons or pleasures-boats are lodged: they are 150 in number, all very magnificent. On the right lies a large park, where formerly the wild elephants were brought to be tamed; a diversion which the royal family took much delight in^e.

Siam often besieged.

THE city of Siyuthia, or Siam, hath undergone several sieges by foreign forces, since the Europeans first went to India by sea. In 1548 it was besieged by the first Barma king who conquered Pegu, with an army of 800,000 men: but, after he had lain before it four months, in which time several furious assaults were given to the place, and 150,000 of his men slain, he hastily raised the siege, and returned to suppress a rebellion, which had broken out in his absence^o. Odiaa, or Siyuthia, was attacked with better success by the second Barma king, who, in 1567, invested it with 1,400,000 men. But for all this power, we are told, he would not have taken it, if it had not been betrayed into his hands^z.

SIAM revolting on the death of that king, his son and successor, in the year 1585, besieged the capital with 300,000 men, 5000 elephants, and 30,000 guards. But the king of Siam ^f spinning out the time, under pretence of submitting on conditions, till the season of the inundation, the river overflowed, and destroyed most part of the Barma army^y. Notwithstanding this, the king of Pegu made several expeditions against Siyuthia, both in person and by his generals, but with no better success: and at length having, about the year 1590, sent his eldest son Maupa Râjab upon the same errand, with a very great army; that prince was slain in single combat by Api Râjab, called by the Portugueses the black king of Siam.

^o LOUBIERE, p. 96, & seqq.

^z GERVAISE, p. 43, & seqq.

^y PINTO's voy. p. 279.

^x CÆS. FREDER. ap. Purch. pilg. vol. ii. p. 1710.

^y FITCH & PIMENTA ap. Purch. ubi supr. p. 1733.

1746. See also before, p. 267.

(E) The same form is observed in the other countries of this peninsula.

- a FOURTEEN leagues from the capital, if you go by the great river, and only nine or ten by City of Louvo the canals, stands Louvo, commonly called Nokshebouri, which is to Siyuthia what Versailles is to Paris, or Hampton-Court to London. The ancient kings had here a pleasure-house; but it had been abandoned above 100 years, when the king, who reigned in 1687, ordered it to be rebuilt. This city stands in a plain, of the higher grounds, where the inundation never reaches; and may be about a mile and a half in length. Its figure is almost square, and it is inclosed with a wall of earth, strengthened with brick towers at certain distances. During the overflow it is almost intirely surrounded with water: at other times it is only washed on one side by a small branch of the great river, which is not deep enough for large boats. Its situa- Charming tion is so charming, and the air so good, that the king spends the greater part of the year situation.
- b there. The gardens and walks are extremely pleasant. It has only two inconveniences; one, that as it is very populous, provisions are dearer there than in any other part of the kingdom; the other is the want of water for four or five months, when the river is low and foul; at which time they use well-water, or that which is saved in cisterns after the inundation. The palace lately built by the king on the bank of the river, is the greatest ornament of Louvo; and, if it be not so magnificent as that in the capital, yet it makes a more gay appearance^a. Its latitude, as observed by the Jesuits, is 14° 42' 30".

- FIVE or six leagues east-north-east of Louvo, is Prabat, remarkable for a piece of supersti- Prabat. tion, from whence the place takes its name: for bat, in the Balli (or Palli) language, signifies a foot, and pra, any thing worthy of veneration and respect. This relick is the print of a man's
- c foot, ill cut upon a rock, thirteen or fourteen inches deep, and five or six times longer than the natural. The Siameses not only adore it themselves, but believe that the elephants, rhinoceros's, and other wild beasts, do likewise repair thither to worship it, when no person is present. The king goes once a year with great pomp, to pay his devoirs to it. The impression is Place of pil- covered with a plate of gold, within a chapel for the purpose. The Talapoy pretend it was grimage. made by Sommona Kodom, who, at the same time, had one foot here, while the other rested on a mountain in Lanka, or Seylâm, although the whole gulf of Bengâl lies between. They report also, that, by the pressure of his foot, he made the mountain flat and level, which before rose to a great height. But as the tradition of this miracle was not above ninety years old, when Loubiere was at Siam, he concludes the whole was an imposture of one of the priests of that age.
- d ABOUT eighteen leagues to the south of Siyuthia, and twelve from the sea, stands the city Fon, or Ban- of Fon, commonly called Bankok: but whence this last name is derived, our author could not kok. discover; although the word ban, which signifies village, enters into the composition of many local names in the kingdom of Siam. From the territory of this city, as far as Talakoan, four leagues higher, the capital is supplied with a great quantity of fruits^a. Bankok is certainly the most important place in the whole country; for there is no other place on all the coast which is able to make any resistance. It is not above a mile and a half long; but its breadth is far short of that extent. It is inclosed with walls only on the east and south sides, which are Strength and washed by the great river. At the point, where that river divides in two branches (which fall situation. by different mouths into the gulf), it is only defended by a half-moon battery, mounted with
- e twenty-five great pieces of brass cannon, which are very well made. Opposite to it, on the other side of the Menâm, there is another little fort, which seems to be of no great defence, although mounted with more than thirty great guns. These two forts, if such they may be termed, are guarded by 100 Mestizo Portugueses, creatures without any courage. The Chevalier De Chaumont, the French ambassador, left an engineer with the king to fortify Bankok^b: but the fort which he raised on the east side of the river was, in the succeeding troubles, demolished^c.

^a GERVAISE, ubi supr. p. 49, & seqq.
& seq.

^z KÆMPFER, p. 14, 42.

^x LOUBIERE, p. 4. & seq.

^y GERVAISE, p. 57,

S E C T. III.

Maritime cities, and tributary countries.

- f B A N K O K properly ought to be considered among the maritime cities or ports of Siam, Maritime which we come next to treat of. These are situated in the peninsula of Malakka. Some cities. on the east side, in the gulf of Siam. The first considerable port is that of Ligor, or Lugor. Ligor: This city was conquered by Râjab Api, called the black king of Siam, about the year 1603^a. It is an ancient city, but not very considerable. The Dutch have a factory here^b; its commodities being kalin, or tin, rice, fruits, and, in some years, much pepper^c. Ligor stands

^a FLORIS ap. nov. collect. voy. p. 439.

^b GERVAISE, p. 16, & 61.

^c CHOISY, p. 524.

Singor. in about the eighth degree of latitude ; and, about one degree lower, lies Sonkourat, Sangor, or Singor, which is large and beautiful, but otherwise not very considerable. About the year 1673 this city rebelled against the king of Siam ; who having reduced it by his forces, ordered it to be demolished ^d. It was the first town to the south belonging to Siam.

Patâna. NOT far off is Patâna, or Patâni, a considerable city, formerly capital of a kingdom, governed by queens. But it was at length conquered by the black king, about the same time with Ligor ^e. However, it still remains in possession of the king of Jokor, or Jear, who pays homage or tribute to the king of Siam ^f.

Mergui. THE principal ports belonging to Siam, on the west side of the peninsula of Malakka, are Mergui and Jonsalam. The first has its name from a little island, which the Siameses call Migri, and Europeans Mergui. This is one of the best and most secure ports in all the Indies ^g. It lies on the north-west point of the island, which is very populous ; and in the mouth of an excellent river, called Tannasserim ; from a city of that name, seated on its bank, about seventeen leagues from the sea. The river descends from the north ; and having passed through the kingdoms of Ava and Pegu, enters Siam, and falls by three mouths into the bay of Bengâl. The port lies between the isle of Mergui, and another which is to the west of it ^h ; and is defended by a fort built by the king of Siam ⁱ. Formerly a good number of English free merchants were settled at Merji or Mergui, and drove a considerable trade ; but the old East-India company, envying their happiness, ordered them to repair to Fort St. George ; and, in 1687, sent captain Weldon, in the Curtany, to Merji, to threaten the king of Siam with a war by sea, if he did not either deliver these merchants up, or force them out of his country. Weldon behaved very insolently to the governor ; and having, without any just cause, killed some of the natives, they one night designed to be revenged on him : but the aggressor escaping on board, they vented their rage on all the English they could find. Thus, through the villainy of one man, seventy-six others were massacred ; so that scarce twenty escaped to the ship. Before this, the English were in great esteem at the court of Siam : one Mr. White was made Shâb Bânder, or head of the customs, at Merji and Tannasserim ; and captain Williams admiral of the king's navy. But, after this tragical scene, they all removed to other places, where the company had factories ^k.

Tanasserim. THE city of Tanasserim, or Tenasser, is a city of note ; but not so considerable as it was formerly : the trade being, for the most part, removed to Mergui, about seven leagues distant ; which often goes under its name, as the port of Siam for the inhabitants of the gulf of Bengâl. This city is famous for Nipa, or Niper wine ; which is a spirituous liquor distilled from cocoa-nut water, the best in the Indies ^l. It was taken from Siam in 1568, by the second Barma king of Pegu, under whom it continued till about 1603, when it was recovered by the black king of Siam ^m. In 1614 it was besieged by the king of Ava : but he was frustrated in his design by the resistance of the Portugueses, who were in the place ⁿ.

Andemân islands. OPPOSITE to the coast of Tanasserim are the islands of Andemân, about eighty leagues distant, surrounded by dangerous banks and rocks. They are all inhabited by canibals, who are so fearless, that they will swim off to a boat, if she approach near the shore : and attack her with their wooden swords, notwithstanding the superiority of numbers, and the advantage of fire-arms, as well as missile weapons. It is customary with them, in their Praws, to make a yearly descent on the Nikubâr islands, and kill or take prisoners as many as they can overcome : They have no notion of a Deity, according to the report of one of them, who turned Mobammedan, and often went from Achîn to fetch quicksilver, with which those islands abound ^o.

Jonsalam. THE next place of any commerce on this coast, is the island of Jonsalam (A) ; although there are several good harbours between it and Merji (or Mergui) : but the coast is very thin of inhabitants, on account of freebooters, called Salleiters, who possess the neighbouring isles ; from whence they make descents on shore, and carrying off the people, sell them at Achîn in Sumatra. The north end of Jonsalam lies within a mile of the continent ; but the south end is above three leagues distant. Between the island and the main is a good harbour for shipping, in the south-west monsoons ; and on the west side of the isle is Puton bay, no less safe in the north-east winds.

^d GERVAISE, p. 16, 61, & seq. new acc. of E. Ind. vol. ii. p. 157.

^e FLORIS voy. ap. nov. collect. trav. vol. i. p. 439.

^f HAMILT.

^g GERVAISE, p. 14.

^h LOUBIERE, p. 8.

ⁱ CHOISY,

p. 524.

^k HAMILT. ubi supra, p. 63, & seq.

^l LINSCHOT. p. 30. CÆS. FREDERIC apud

Purch. vol. ii. p. 1712.

^m FLORIS, ubi supra, p. 439.

ⁿ DE FARIA, Portug. Afiz, vol. iii.

p. 197.

^o HAMILT. ubi supra, p. 64, & seq.

(A) Mendez Pinto calls it Jonsala ; Fitch, Junsalaon ; Linschoten, Gunsalam ; Gervaise, Jonsalam ; Choisy, Jonce-lang ; and Hamilton, Joukceloan.

a THE island affords good masts for shipping, and abundance of tin : but few people dig it, ^{Ports and trade.} for fear of the above-mentioned outlaws ; and the governors, who are commonly Chinese, so oppress the inhabitants, that riches would be but a plague to them. Yet the villages on the continent drive a small retail trade with vessels which come from the coast of Choromandel ^p. The port is very good, and a secure retreat for ships going to the hither peninsula, in the stormy months of July and August. Its only fault is want of depth for large vessels ; but that defect is supplied by a fair road near it. In short, Jonsalam is of great consequence for the trade of Pegu, Bengal, and other neighbouring parts ^a. Choisy says it abounds with kalin (or tin) and ambergrise ^f.

THE islands off this part of the coast are the Nikubârs, at the distance of about ninety leagues. Nikubâr b The northernmost cluster is low, and called the Kar Nikubârs ; which lying near the Andemâns, ^{islands.} are but thinly inhabited. The middle cluster is fine champain ground, and, all but one, well inhabited. They are called the Somerera islands by the Portugueses, from a hill on the south-end of the largest, which resembles the top of an umbrella, as that word signifies. This island seems to be well peopled, from the number of villages which appear at sea ; and the natives bring the product of their soil aboard of ships, to exchange for tobacco, which they are very fond of ; also old hatchets, sword-blades, and pieces of iron hoops, to make defensive arms of, against the Andemâners. They speak a little broken Portuguese ; and are exceeding courteous. The man's cloathing is about a foot and half of cloth, six inches broad, tucked before and behind within a string, which goes round their middle. Their hair is left on the c upper part of the head, and below the crown ; but cut so short, that it hardly touches their ears. The women, on the contrary, have their heads close shaved ; and wear a kind of short petticoat, reaching from the navel to the knee.

ABOUT six leagues to the southward of the said Somerera island, lies Tallang-jang, an unin-^{Tallang-jang}habited isle, where an English ship was lost in 1708 : but the men were saved, and relieved by the inhabitants of Ning and Gouri ; two fine islands about four leagues to the west of Tallang-jang, and eight to the southward of the greatest Somerera. They, in a very humane manner, carried them, with the little things they had saved, to their islands, and treated them hospitably : but this compassion was soon turned to hatred, by the ingratitude and insolence of the captain, named Owen. This man, having laid a broken knife carelessly by, one of the natives made d bold to take it, yet did not offer to hide it. Owen seeing it in the poor Indian's hand, not ^{ingratitude punished.} content to get it from him, bestowed some kicks and blows by way of punishment. This was taken very ill by the people in general, who discovered their dissatisfaction, and reproved those who brought the English to their islands. In effect, next day, as the captain was sitting under a tree at dinner, about a dozen of the natives advancing, discharged a shower of darts, and killed him in an instant. The rest, being sixteen, escaped by the care of their benefactors, who kept guard about their house till next morning : and then providing them with two canoes and victuals, made signs to them to be gone. One of the canoes, with half of the men, were drowned by the way. The other got safe to Jonsalam, where our author received them aboard.

e THE southern cluster of the Nikubârs is mountainous ; and the inhabitants partake of their ^{South cluster.} unpolished nature ; being more uncivil and surly than those of the northern. As to the rest, their islands produce the same sorts of necessaries as the others do ; that is, hogs, fowls, cocks ; fish, fresh, salted, and dried ; excellent yams, potatoes, parrots, and monkeys ^f.

THE next place of note to Jonsalam, southward, is Quedah, which is honoured with the ^{Quedah king-}title of a kingdom, although both small and poor. The town, which bears the same name, ^{dum.} stands on the banks of a small navigable river, deep but narrow, about fifty miles from the sea. There the king resides, who shews no marks of grandeur besides arbitrary sway. The people are deceitful, covetous, and cruel : their religion is Mohammedan, much mixed with Paganism. The produce of the country is tin, pepper, elephants, and their teeth, canes, and damar, a f gum used in making pitch and tar for shipping. The king, who is proud and beggarly, never fails to visit merchants at their coming to his port ; and then must have a present : the stranger must make him another when he returns the visit, or has any business with him. His majesty, in requital, honours him with a seat near his sacred person ; and having chewed a little betel, sends it fresh from his royal mouth, on a small gold saucer, by the hands of a page, to the merchant ; who must receive the morsel with all the signs of satisfaction, as well as humility, and chew it after him. This petty king was, for many years, tributary to Siam (B), but is at present independent ^f.

^p HAMILTON, p. 67, & seq. ubi supra, p. 68, & seqq.

^a GERVAISE, p. 15. ^f Ibid. p. 71.

^f CHOISY, p. 524.

^f HAMILT.

(B) It was tributary in 1686, according to Choisy, p. 523 ; but possibly, the kings of Siam always reckon as their tributaries, those states which have at any time been so. The city of Quedah was destroyed by the Portugueses under James de Mendez Furtado, in 1614. De Faria, Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 197.

Kingdom of Johor.

THE remaining part of the peninsula of Malakka properly belongs to the kingdom of Johor,^a or Joar, which begins at Perab, the next country to Quedab southwards. It produces more tin than any other in the Indies: but the inhabitants, who are untractable and rebellious, are likewise treacherous and bloody; so that no European nation can keep factories there with safety. The Dutch, having had theirs cut off the first year they settled in the place, fixed another on Pulo Ding-ding, an island at the mouth of the river Perab: but, about the year 1690, that factory was also cut off; since when, no attempt has been made to settle there. Several other places along the Malacca coast produce tin, of which Salangor and Parfalar are the most noted; yet but little frequented by Europeans, because not much more to be trusted than Perab.*

Malakka, its ancient state, and situation.

MALAKKA is the next place which occurs on this coast. Before the Portugueses arrived in^b the Indies, it had been the residence of the kings of Johor: but those new-comers, being denied commerce in the country, resolved to obtain it by force. Accordingly, in May 1510, the famous viceroy Alphonso de Albuquerque set out from Kochin with nineteen sail of ships, and 1,000 fighting men, 800 of them Portugueses, and the rest Malabars. The city, at that time, stretched along the shore about three miles, in the same manner as Lisbon; and was divided by a river in two parts, which were joined by a bridge. The palace and mosque were of stone; the other buildings of wood. It afforded a pleasant prospect to the sea, and was well secured with fortifications. As it was the great mart of all those parts, the viceroy found the port filled with ships*. The city was founded 230 years before the Portugueses arrived in the Indies, by Paramisera, a Javan prince: who having murdered his nephews, and usurped the throne, was expelled by the natives, and fled to Sinkapura: where, at that time, reigned^c Sangasinga, son-in-law and vassal to the king of Siam. Sangasinga gave a kind reception to the fugitive; who, in return, soon after murdered him; and, by means of his Javans, and 2,000 Sellati, who live by fishing and robbing, seized the kingdom: but being driven out soon after by the king of Siam, he went and settled on a hill called Butan, near the river Muar, and gave it the name of Malakka, which signifies a banished person, in the Malayan language, and from that time took its rise.

Taken by Albuquerque.

THE adjacent country was subject to inundations, and full of thick woods, infested with tigers, and other dangerous animals. The men were courageous, the women wanton: but the trade of the east rendered the city rich and populous. The appearance of the Portuguese^d fleet struck the inhabitants with fear; and king Mahamet pretended much kindness, the better to surprise Albuquerque by treachery: but the viceroy demanded leave to build a fort, and to have the charge of his expedition delayed, as that king's faithless dealings had brought him thither. On Mahamet's refusal, the Portugueses attacked Malakka by the bridge; and the second day took the city, with vast slaughter of the enemy; though there were employed in the enterprise no more than 800 Portugueses, and 200 Malabars. All the Mohammedans being killed or driven out, it was repopled by strangers, and some Malays. The king retired to the island of Bintan, leaving behind 3,000 pieces of cannon, out of 8,000, which he had to defend the place; but was soon obliged to quit that post. Albuquerque immediately built the fort at Malakka, which he called Famosa, for its beauty^e. The victors inclosed a little hill with a stone wall, about a mile round; and this they made their new city. The king was glad, however, to make peace with them, allowing them their fort, and as much ground round it as their cannon could sling a shot.

Attacked by the Dutch.

THUS Malakka, by its advantageous situation, as lying in the center of trade, became famous all over the known world. But the insolence of the Portugueses increasing with their power and riches, they became odious to their neighbours, whom they insulted and oppressed*. Mean time the Dutch, having found their way into the Indies, began to disturb them in their possessions. In 1605 Cornelius Matelief appeared, with eleven ships and 13,000 soldiers, before that city; where, having first seized four ships in the road, he set fire to the suburbs, and battered the walls for two or three months. At length a considerable fleet arrived from^f Goa, consisting of sixteen galliots, fourteen galleasses, and fourteen smaller vessels, with 3,000 men on board them, which Matelief ruined, and then departed. Next year the king of Johor brought an army against Malakka, of 60,000 soldiers, but with no better success than the Dutch. However, these latter, in 1640, made themselves masters of it, after a siege of six months; and, besides a vast booty, found a great cannon, which carried a sixty-four pounder.

Fine harbour.

THE harbour of Malakka is one of the finest in the Indies; and ships may safely ride in it at all seasons; an advantage which scarce any other in those parts enjoys. When the Portugueses possessed it, it was the richest city in the east, next to Goa and Ormuz; being the key of the China and Japan, the Molukkas and Sunda trade. What greatly contributes to this is, that all ships, passing from the north to the west, or from the west to the north, are under a^g collect. voy. vol. ii. p. 178, & seqq.

* HAMILT. p. 73.

* DE FERIA, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 175, 177.
DE FERIA, ubi supra.

† NIKERHOFF, apud Church.

- a necessity of sailing through the straits of Malakka and Sinkapura. Hence the Portugueses exacted ten per cent. of all vessels passing this way, which produced a vast revenue: but the Dutch have abolished this custom, as a very unreasonable imposition. The natives of Malakka, and the adjacent country, called Malayans, are tawny complexioned, with long black hair, flat noses, and great eyes; which are quite different from those of the Javans, from whom they derive their origin. They go naked, all but a piece of cloth wrapped about their waist. They wear gold bracelets on their arms, and jewels in their ears. The women wear silks, The Malay- embroidered with gold and precious stones, which also adorn their hair, twisted in very long ans. locks. They are extremely proud, and expect more ceremony than any other females of the Indies. There is another peculiar species of men in Malakka, who can see only in the night, and therefore sleep all day till sun-set, when they get up to work. They, in shape as well as complexion, resemble the Europeans, having grey eyes, and yellowish hair, which reaches to the women's hips; only their feet turn inwards. People of the same kind are found in some other places of the Indies, and also in Africa^a.
- b

THE fort of Malakka is both large and strong, the sea washing one third of its walls; and The fort. a deep, rapid, but narrow river, the west side. The rest is defended by a broad and deep ditch. The governor's house is both beautiful and convenient. There are several other good buildings, as well in the fort as in the town: but as the shallowness of the sea obliges vessels to lie above a league off, the castle is at too great a distance from the road to protect the shipping. The country produces nothing for a foreign market but a little tin and elephants teeth; yet strangers meet with several refreshments, as swine's flesh, poultry, roots, and excellent fruits; such as limons, oranges, mangos, pine-apples, mangustians, rombustians, durians, cocoa nuts, and the like.

c IN Malakka the straits are not above four leagues in breadth, and always smooth as a Monakabos mill-pond, except when ruffled with wind. From a very high mountain, north eastwards people. of the city, descend several rivers, and, among the rest, that of Malakka, which all afford small quantities of gold-dust, found in their channels. The inland people, called Monakabos, are of a savage kind; and delight so much in mischief, that if the Malayan peasants sow grain in any ground but what is well fenced, they come and burn it. They are whiter than those who dwell in the low-lands; but so untractable, that the king of Johor, whose subjects they are, could never civilize them^b.

d THE Malaya tongue is formed out of the languages of the different nations which resort Malay lan- thither, by selecting the choicest words in each. Hence it is reckoned the most agreeable and su-ge. elegant in all the Indies; which quality, joined to its use in trade, causes it to be learned by the remotest eastern people.

e IN the straits of Malakka stands the city of Jor, Joar, or Johor, giving name to the king- Jor, or Johor, dom, which formerly included that of Malakka; but at present lies to the south of it, and kingdom. of Paban or Pain. The ancient city was very large, and magnificently built; but having been destroyed by the Portugueses in 1603, the king, in 1609, caused another to be built, somewhat higher up the river, which he called Batusabar, whither most of the chief inhabitants of Johor retired. The country is very fertile, abounding in fruits, pepper, cinnamon, and game. The inhabitants are naturally brave, but very lascivious, liars, great dissemblers, and proud beyond measure. Their complexion is inclinable to a light blue, with broad faces, hooked noses, and very black teeth; an ornament acquired by chewing betel. The common people have only a cloth to cover their members, which hangs down to their toes. The better sort wore callico frocks, of any colour, shaped like our shirts, with wide sleeves, and open before, reaching only to their knees. To complete their dress, they have two silken strings, of the same colour with their frock, one for a girdle, the other for a head-band. They paint their nails yellow; and by the length of them, distinguish their quality.

f THE king of Johor has many petty kings, his vassals, under his jurisdiction. Formerly they were princes of considerable power; and, even since the Portugueses were settled at Malakka, extended their authority over that city, as happened in 1609, in the reign of John de Paratuan^c.

JOHOR LAMI before-mentioned, which is sometimes the residence of the king, has the The capital benefit of a fine deep river, which admits of two entrances into it: the smaller, which is from city. the westward, is called by Europeans the streights of Sinkapura; but, by the natives, Sallatadebrew. It runs along the north side of the island of Sinkapura (between it and the main), for five or six leagues together; and ends at the great river of Johor.

THE territories of Johor reach from Perab to point Romar or Romano, which is the most southern promontory of all Asia, it lying but one degree to the north of the equator, about three leagues from Johor river. This country is in length about one hundred leagues, and in breadth eighty.

^a NIEUHOFF, ubi supra, p. 1-8. & seqq.

^b HAMILT. new acc. of E. Ind. vol. ii. p. 79, & seqq.

^c NIEUHOFF, ubi supra, p. 180, & seqq.

The inhabitants.

THE inhabitants are lazy, perfidious, and cruel. The land very woody, being daily refreshed with showers and breezes. It abounds in tin, gold, elephants teeth, pepper, aga/a wood, and canes: but very little rice or other grain is sown by the natives. The inland people subsist mostly on sagow, the pith of a small twig, split and dried in the sun: they also rear poultry; and feed on roots and fruits, which grow all seasons of the year. On the sea-coast their food is chiefly fish and rice, brought from abroad. The only people of industry are the Chineses, of whom about 1000 families are settled amongst them, besides those who drive a foreign trade. Their religion is a corrupt Mohammedism; and they have their priests from Surât. a

The king tyrannical.

THE king of Johor, who reigned in 1695, was about twenty years of age, and very viciously inclined. Our author having presented him with a pair of pistols and a little powder; he tried, on a poor fellow in the street, how far they would carry a ball into his flesh, and shot him through the shoulder. He was a great sodomite, and had taken many sons of his Orankayas, or nobles, into his palace, for that execrable purpose. One day a Moorish merchant fled on board captain Hamilton's ship, to secure his son from that disgrace. Presently a guard came in a boat to demand him: but using threatening language, our author obliged him to leap into the river; and bad the interpreter tell the king, that if he offered the least violence to any who belonged to him, he would fire his palace about his ears. His Johor majesty, unused to meet with contradiction, much more with threats, sent for his Orankayas, to know if the captain was a king or not; and, by their persuasion, removed to a village twenty miles distant, till the ship's departure. A year or two after, his mother, to break him of that unnatural vice, sent a beautiful young woman to visit him, when a bed; but he was so far from being pleased with her conversation, that he ordered his black guard to break both her arms, for offering to embrace his royal person: and next morning sent for her father's head. Not finding so much submission as he expected, he went himself in a great rage to fetch it: but, as he was entering the door, the Orankaya passed a lance through his heart, and so made an end of the beast. b

He is slain.

His successor's indolence.

THE kingdom remained in confusion without a king for three years: after which, in 1700, they chose another, named Soltân Abd'ollah Jalib, who was cousin-german of the former, a prince of great moderation and justice: so that he was beloved by his people, and trade flourished for nine years; till, leaving the government to Rajah Moudab, a younger brother, of a covetous tyrannical disposition, all things fell into disorder. In 1703 captain Hamilton calling at Johor, the king made him an offer of the island of Sinkapura, which he refused, as of no use to a private person; though every way fit for a company to settle on, as lying in the center of trade. In 1708 Rajah Moudab persuaded him to leave Johor, and reside at Rio, in the island of Bintang, about three leagues off Johor river, where he engrossed the trade with more security into his own hands, buying and selling at his own prices, and punishing those who opposed his measures. c

The people rebel.

AT length, in 1712, the people, no longer able to endure his oppression, broke into rebellion; on which the prince, without taking leave of the king his brother, fled in a galley, with his wives and children, to Johor Lami. But finding a small army of Monakabos, called-in by the people, were encamped there, he fled with his family to the woods; leaving his galley, and in it a tun-weight of gold, a prey to them. As he knew there could be no long safety in the forests, and despairing of mercy from the injured people, he resolved to put an end to all their miseries at once; but when he had killed his wives and children, he began to hesitate about killing himself. A page, who was but twelve years old, surprised at his cowardice, asked him, "If he chose rather to be butchered by a slave, than die like a prince; adding, that he who was innocent, and might expect mercy, would yet shew him the way to die." At the same time laying hold of a Kris, or poniard, he ran himself through the body. The tyrant, shamed into courage, by the bravery of a boy, followed his example, and immediately expired. But the Monakabos, who came up soon after, found the boy alive, and carried him to Johor, where he recovered of his wound. e

He is expelled.

THE king, on the news of what had happened, came out of his palace, and offered to restore the state to its former tranquility: but the people told him he was too religious to make a good king; adding, "that he might retire either to Pabâng or Trangano; but that as for Johor, and the islands between it and Sumâtra, they would consider what to do with them." The discarded king departed with his family; and such as chose to follow his fortune in vessels, which his former subjects furnished him with: but, in his way to Trangano, where he proposed to fix his seat, was received by the inhabitants of the islands Pulo Aura, Tinji, Pissâng, and Timûn, as their lawful sovereign. He put his eldest son, a youth about twelve years old, ashore at Pabâng, to keep that country from revolting, and went to the f a place designed for his new residence, where afterwards our author had the honour to see him^c.

* HAMILT. ubi. supra, p. 92, & seqq.

THE city of Pabán, Pabáng, or Pán, by the Portugueses called Paon, and by others, after Kingdom of Pabán, the Arabs, Fán, is situated about a league from the sea, and inhabited only by the nobility, the people dwelling in the suburbs. This place, which is not very large, is inclosed with a wall made of the trunks of trees, joined close together, and about twenty-four feet in height, strengthened at each angle with a bastion, but not filled with earth. The streets are fenced on both sides with hedges of reeds, and planted with cocoa and other trees: so that Pabán looks more like an assemblage of gardens, belonging to a suburbs, than a regular city. The houses likewise are generally built with reeds and straw, only the king's palace is of wood: for Pabán b was formerly the capital of a kingdom, which lay between Johor and Patáney; but, at present it makes a part of Johor. The river is very broad; but not navigable for galleys, except at high water. The adjacent country is very low, but fruitful enough; producing pepper, eagle and kalambak woods, coarse gold, nutmegs, mace, Japan wood, diamonds, and hog stones, reckoned more efficacious than the bezoar stones. Deeper in the country elephants are very numerous^f.

THUS we have given our readers an account, not only of the dominions actually subject and tributary to the king of Siam, but also of those which were formerly subject or tributary to him, in the peninsula of Malakka. We shall only add farther, with regard to the numerous islands which lie upon the coasts, and have excellent ports, fresh water, and woods, fit for colonies to settle on them, that the king affects to be styled lord of them; although never inhabited by his subjects on the continent, who are but thin; and he has not strength enough at sea, to hinder strangers from entering them^g.

^c HAMILT. ubi supra, p. 96, & seqq. relat. of Siam, p. 7.

^f NIEUHOFF, ubi supra, vol. ii. p. 181, & seqq.

^g LOUIERE,

S E C T. IV.

Inhabitants of Siâm, their manners and customs.

d S I A M, considering its extent, is but indifferently peopled; nor are the cities, even the capital, very populous: for it is at present inhabited chiefly along the rivers; the country being, as yet, almost intirely overgrown with woods^a; which, in all likelihood, would not be the case, were the inhabitants as numerous as they are in some of the neighbouring countries. Notwithstanding this scarcity of people, the Siamites hardly make one third part of the whole: for of the three sorts of people by whom the country is occupied, Siameses, Labos, and Peguers, the latter are almost equal to the other two. These Peguers are the descendants of such as, in the distractions which for a long time formerly afflicted their country, fled hither for refuge; or who had been taken prisoners in the frequent wars which subsisted between the two nations. Besides, the king gives great encouragement to the Peguers to settle in Siam, because they are more active, and better soldiers, than his natural subjects^b.

As to the origin of the Siameses, they say their laws and kings at least came from the Labos; who, on the other hand, will have it that their laws are derived from Siam^c. Choisy observes, that the Labos are half Chineses; and Methold declares, that all the inhabitants of Pegu and Arrakan, as well as Siam, seem to be descended from the same fountain, their features and customs being so nearly alike^d.

AT Siam all persons are freemen, or slaves; and may either be born or become such. One may become a slave either for debt, by being taken in war, or by way of punishment. They sometimes sell themselves and children for victuals, and even for sake of eating a delicious fruit called durion. Their slavery is very gentle, as in cultivating of lands, tending gardens, or some other domestic services; or rather they permit them to work for themselves, paying a tribute to their masters, from about three shillings and six-pence, to seven shillings a year. A slave for debt has his liberty again, on making satisfaction; but the children born during this slavery continue slaves. A person is born a slave, when the mother is a slave. If she converses with the father, without her master's consent, all the children are his; if with his consent, they are divided, as in case of divorce. The first, and every odd number, belong to the mother's master; the rest, or even numbers, to the father, if he be free, or to his master, if he is a slave. The difference between the king of Siam's slaves and his subjects, is, that he maintains his slaves, who are continually employed: whereas his free subjects owe him only six months service in the year, but at their own expence; nor is there any service due to him from the slaves of these latter.

^a LOUIERE, relat. of Siam, p. 11. KÆMPEER, p. 25.

^b CHOISY Journ. p. 536.

^c LOUBIERE,

^d METHOLD apud Purch. pilgr. vol. v. p. 1005.

Freemen their privileges.

AMONG the freemen there are not properly two ranks or conditions of people; since nobility^a is nothing but the actual possession of places: and although families, who enjoy them for a considerable time, become more illustrious and powerful than others, yet this is rare, and lasts no longer than they are in office; which being deprived of, they have nothing to distinguish them from the common people. So that often the grandson of a great lord, and sometimes his son, is seen rowing a boat. As the freemen are all soldiers, they are carefully registered, that none may avoid doing his duty. This militia is divided into men on the right hand, and men on the left; each of which great divisions is subdivided into bands, with every one its Nay, or chief; who does not always lead his band to the war, no more than to the six months service: he is obliged only to furnish out of his band so many men as may be required for those particular occasions. There are seven degrees of these Nay, one^b superior to the other, according to the number of people contained in the respective bands: as Pa-ya, Ok-pa, Ok-pra, Oklouang, Ok-kown, Okmeuing, and Ok-pan. These are so many dignities or titles by which all officers or placemen are distinguished. But how many men belong to these bands our author could not discover; only as Ok-pan, which is now disused, signifies the head of a thousand men, and Ok-meuing, the head of ten thousand men, he judges that every other title denotes the number of men contained in the band subordinate to its chief. There is another title without function, viz. Ok-meuang, which signifies chief of a city; and with which a person must be qualified before he can be made a governor, whom they call Ghaw-meuang, that is, lord of a city. On this occasion it must be noted, with reference to the six dignities aforesaid, now in use, that there are in Siam six orders of cities, which^c anciently were determined according to the rolls of the inhabitants. Thus the most populous had Pa-yas for governors; the next sort Ok-yas; and so the rest, in proportion to the inhabitants which they contained.

THESE titles are given to all officers in the kingdom, as well as governors, because they are all Nay; but as the same person may have two titles, in consequence of being possessed of two different offices, and the offices themselves may change their titles, which are not inseparably annexed to any of them; this distinction, for want of being observed by travellers, has sometimes bred confusion in their relations^e.

Siameses their character.

THE Siameses may be pronounced good men: vices are detestable with them. They are^d so far from getting drunk, that every man, who is above the dregs of the people, accounts it a shame to drink arak. They pay great respect to age; the younger, though higher in office, yielding precedency to his elder. Children are exceeding dutiful to their parents. Begging is reckoned very shameful, and therefore the poor are maintained by their relations: but robbing is held much more ignominious than begging; and therefore they take little care to secure their doors, either in the day or night. However, it must not be supposed that the Siameses never steal; and the outlaws, who withdraw into the woods for shelter, frequently rob passengers: but then they never murder them, as they often do in Europe. On the other hand, their fidelity is inviolable in all sorts of traffick: but usury, not being restrained by laws, is practised without bounds; for avarice is their essential vice. Yet, what is strange, they gather riches not to use, but bury them. They have very few civil suits; but many^e criminal causes, which arise from hatred or revenge. The Siamites have naturally an aversion to blood; so very rarely commit murder: but generally their quarrels end in abusive language, or a few blows at most. They are courteous, polite, timorous, and careless. They have no curiosity, and never admire any thing. Insolent to the humble, and humble to the insolent. They have more moderation than Europeans; being born philosophers: but are withal given to dissimulation^f.

The women virtuous.

ADULTERY is very rare in Siam: which is owing, not to the husband's power over his wife, whom he may sell or kill for such an offence; but because the women are not corrupted, either by idleness (for they maintain the men by their labour) or luxury. They neither game, nor receive visits from men. Plays also are very rare at Siam; nor is there any public theatre^f for the purpose. Custom has made restraint very easy to them. They look upon a greater liberty as scandalous; and would think themselves despised by the husbands who should allow it them. The women of Asia have generally a high sense of modesty; and, in time of war, would rather their husbands should kill them, than let them fall into the hands of the enemy. Not but there are women here who give a loose to their passions, as well as in other places; though not so many. The Siamese lords are no less watchful over their daughters than their wives; and if any of them commits a fault, they sell her to a certain man, who has a privilege to prostitute them for money, in consideration of a duty which he pays the king. It was said, when our author was in Siam, that he had in his custody 600 young creatures, all daughters of considerable officers. He likewise purchases wives, when convicted of being^g unfaithful to their husbands^h.

^a LOUBIERE, p. 77. & seqq.

^f Ibid. p. 73—76.

^e Ibid. p. 73. & seqq.

^a THE Siameses are rather small than large, but strait, and well proportioned; owing, Their persons. doubtless, to their not swaddling their infants, or forcing nature as we do. Their faces are rather of a lozenge shape than oval. The cheek-bones are broad; from whence the forehead suddenly contracts, and terminates in a point, as much as their chin. Their eyes are slit a little upwards, and small; not very brisk, and the white inclining to yellow. Their jaws are hollow, as their cheek-bones are too high. Their mouths large; lips thick and pale; their teeth black, and complexion brown, mixed with red, to which the sun contributes not a little. The great men are said to affect making their legs blue, perhaps with gunpowder (A): but the women neither paint nor patch. The noses of the Siameses are short, and round at the end: their ears naturally larger than ours; and the larger the more handsome. Their ^b hair is black, thick, and lank. Both sexes wear it cut short, even with the top of their ears; under this they are close shaven. The women generally raise it on their forehead; and some let it grow behind, in order to braid it. The young unmarried clip their hair very close to the crown of the head, where plucking it up in a small circle, about a quarter of an inch broad, they let the rest grow down almost to their shoulders. There is only one defect in the women, that they have hanging breasts, which often reach to their navel ^h.

THE Siameses go all naked, from head to foot, only girding their reins and thighs, down Dress of the to their knees, with a piece of callico or silk, about two ells and a half long, which the Portugueses call pagne, from pannus, cloth. The officers or placemen wear, besides, a muslin shirt, as a kind of vest: it has no neck-band, and is open before: the sleeves are two feet ^c wide, without plaits, and reach almost to their wrists: but the body thereof is so tight, that, not being wide enough to slip down over the pagne, it sits in wrinkles. In winter some put over their shoulders a breadth of stuff, or painted linen, like a mantle or scarf, the ends of which are neatly wound about the arms. The king, in this season, under his shirt wears a brocaded satin waistcoat, adorned with lace, whose sleeves are very tight. None must wear such a vest, excepting such considerable officers as he gives it to. He sometimes also bestows on them a scarlet vest, to be worn only in war or hunting, which reaches to the knees, and buttons before, with wide sleeves, but so short, that they do not touch the elbows. On those two occasions, the king and his retinue appear in red; the soldiers having muslin shirts given ^d to them, dyed of that colour. They likewise wear a cap of ceremony, which is white, and high, pointed like a sugar-loaf. The king's is adorned with a circle, or crown, of precious stones; and those of his officers have several circles of gold or silver, to distinguish their dignities. They wear them only before the king, in their tribunals, or on some solemn occasion. They fasten them with a stay under the chin; and never pull them off to salute any person.

THE Mohammedans have introduced the use of papushes, or slippers, a kind of pointed shoes, without either quarter or heel; which they leave at the doors of the houses they enter, to avoid dirtying the rooms. They approve of hats for travelling; but very few of the people cover their heads from the sun, excepting on the river, where the reflexion most incommodates; and then they do it only with a piece of linen.

THE men, after wrapping the pagne about their waist, put one end back between their ^e thighs, and tuck it in behind; so that it resembles breeches. The other end hangs before; and, as they have no pockets, serves to tie up their purse for betel. The women wrap their pagne about their middle, and let it fall down broad-ways half-way the leg, like a kind of close coat. All the rest of their body is naked; only the rich wear a scarf, putting the middle part single over the bosom, and letting the two ends hang down behind, over the shoulders; though sometimes they wrap them about their arms.

FOR all the Siameses go so naked, yet no people in the world are so scrupulous of shewing Their modesty. the parts of the body which are covered. They have affixed infamy to nakedness; and hence modesty renders the custom of bathing in rivers almost insupportable among the women; and but few among them can resolve to practise it. They never pull off the pagne to lie ^f down; and children go without it till they are four or five years of age. Their ears are no less secured against immodesty than their eyes: for, by the laws of Siam, obscene Chinese figures and paintings are equally prohibited with lewd songs. For ornaments, the people of Siam croud the three last fingers of each hand with rings; and wear pendants of gold, silver, or vermilion gilt. The boys and girls of condition wear bracelets on their arms and legs; till six or seven years of age; but no longer ⁱ.

THE Siameses are very clean and neat. They bathe three or four times a day, or oftener, Cleanly and if visits require it. This they do, either by going into the water, or having it poured over neat. their bodies with ladles, which they sometimes continue for an hour together. They, after this, perfume themselves, and put pomatum on their lips. They wash their hair with water and sweet oils; comb themselves; and keep their black teeth clean. They pluck their beards, of which they have but little: but they let their nails grow without cutting; and the dancers sometimes put on very long copper nails; for what makes them look like harpies, the esteem a beauty^k.

^h LOUBIERE, p. 27, & seqq.ⁱ Ibid. p. 25, & seqq.(A) Loubiere saw one of them marked in this manner: or that lord might have been a Lalos, or a Barma, who both use that custom.

^k LOUEIERE, p. 26.

S E C T. V.

Their houses, diet, diseases, diversions, carriages.

Their houses

THESE people are no less plain in their houses, their furniture, and diet, than in their dress. Their houses are raised on four or six bambú posts, thirteen feet high, and as thick as a man's leg, to avoid the inundation: across these they lay other bambú posts for a foundation: hurdles of split bambú, often not closely compacted, make the floors, walls, and roofs: the stairs are likewise a bambú ladder, which hangs without, like that of a wind-mill. And as their stables are built in the air, as well as their houses, they have climbers made of hurdles for the cattle to ascend. The houses, which are small, and only of one story, for more privacy, stand single, surrounded with pretty large grounds, which serve for courts and gardens, inclosed with a bambú wall. The great officers have timber houses, in which each lives, with his principal wife, and their children: every one of the other wives, with her children, and slave with his family, has a separate apartment, yet within the same inclosure. The palaces of Siyuthia and Louvo, as well as several temples, are also of brick; which way of building seems to have been taken from the Europeans, Chineses, or Moors, who build here with the same kind of materials.

and furniture.

As their houses are built of such slight materials, they are soon finished. Three hundred, which were burnt in our author's time in the capital, were rebuilt in three days: and three others were removed, with all their furniture, in less than an hour. The furniture of the Siamese houses is very plain, and consists in but a few moveables^a. Their bedstead is a wooden frame, matted, but without either head or posts: it has sometimes six feet, sometimes none at all: but the generality have no other bed but a mat of bulrushes, laid on the floor. The bedstead is very narrow; because the man and wife have separate beds, except among the vulgar. The better sort use a mattress, but no upper sheet; the coverlid, which is a single cotton cloth, serving for it. A long pillow serves for the bolster; and a curtain before the bed completes the sleeping-place. Those who can afford it have cabinets, with drawers, both for use and ornament. Their table is like a drum-head, with the edges raised, like tea-boards, but no feet. They have no chairs or seats, but bulrush mats: no carpets, but what the king bestows on them. The rich, indeed, have cushions; but they are used only to lean on, never to sit on.

Their utensils.

THEIR vessels are either of china or earthen ware; with some few of copper: wood, plain or varnished, cocoa, and bambú, afford them all the rest. Scarce any have gold or silver plate, excepting some officers of the court, from whence it comes, and that very little. The king's furniture is almost the same with that of particular persons, only more rich and sumptuous. In all the entertainments at the place, the ambassadors saw great store of silver plate, especially huge basons, round and deep, in which were large round boxes, about eighteen inches diameter: these, containing the rice which was served at table, were covered, and had each a foot to stand on. The fruit was served in gold plates: but china is more common at his table than either metal; which is a general custom in all the courts of Asia^b.

Halls and chambers.

IN some houses, built on purpose for the ambassadors (wherein hurdles laid on piles, and covered with bulrush mats, made not only the floors, but the area of the courts), the halls and chambers were hung with painted cloths, and the cieling with white muslin, the extremities of which hung sloping. In the chambers where the ambassadors lay, tapestry carpets were laid over the mats. Neatness appeared every-where, but no magnificence. Their hearth or chimney is nothing but a basket full of earth, supported with three sticks for feet; and they make their fires not in the houses, but the courts.

King's palace.

THEIR palaces are too low to make a figure, being but one story; and the temples not high enough in proportion to their bigness: nor has either any exterior ornament, excepting the roofs, which they cover with tin or tiles, varnished with yellow. It is not in the ornaments of architecture, which the Siameses know nothing of, that the real dignity of their buildings consists, but in some being higher than others. Thus in the palace, the king's apartment is more elevated than the rest, which are gradually lower, in proportion as they are farther from it; so that there are always a few steps to ascend from one to another, for they

^a LOUEIERE, p. 29.

^b Ibid. p. 34. & 115.

a all join, and stand in a row. It is this which causes the inequality in the roofs, which are all high ridged, and seem to bear one on another. But the principal ornament of the temples consists in several pyramids of brick; the tallest are as high as our steeples, and the lowest not exceeding two fathom: they are all round, and gradually diminish as they rise; so that each terminates like a dome. When the pyramids happen to be very low, there proceeds from the top a tin spire, very small, and sharp pointed, but proportioned to the rest^c.

THE usual diet of the Siameses is rice and fish, in which they are more abstemious than Euro-Their diet.
peans. The sea affords admirable fish, of sorts unknown to us; lobsters of all sizes, excellent little turtles, and delicate small oysters. Their rivers also yield plenty of good fish, especially eels: but they are not fond of fresh fish; rather choosing that which is ill-seasoned and dry:
 b nor are they displeased with stinking fish, any more than rotten eggs. They eat even lizards, locusts, rats, and most insects, which nature doubtless inclines them to, as being of easy digestion; and which, perhaps, are not so disgusting as we imagine. A pound of rice, which costs but one farthing, and a little salt-fish, of no greater value, serves a Siamese for one day's food. Their sauce is only a little water, relished with some spices, garlick, or other herb: but that which they esteem most, is called kapi: it is liquid, like mustard, and made of cray-fish corrupted (A, because ill salted; for meats hardly take salt in very hot countries: yet the pots of it which they gave to a French officer had no bad smell. Instead of saffron they use Crocus Indicus: but as they have neither nuts nor olives, they have no oil but what comes from the cocoa; which, though a little bitter, is very good when fresh; but it presently c becomes very strong. They use buffalo's milk, which yields more cream than that of our cows: but make no cheese, nor scarce any butter, which hardly takes any consistence for the heat.

THEY disguise dried fish many ways, without varying the preparation: but of more than Provisions thirty dishes, wherewith the ambassadors were served, our author, though far from being plenty.
 squeamish, could not eat of one. The Siameses rarely eat flesh; and, when they do, they choose the guts and intestines, which, to Europeans, are most loathsome. Indeed all animal food there is tough, and juiceless. Nor do they take care of their poultry. As for wild-fowl, they never eat or kill them: and are so far from destroying crows and vultures, that they feed them, even with the flesh of children, who die before they are three or four years old.
 d Pigs flesh is the best of all in Siam: but so fat, that it is distasteful. A sheep is worth four crowns in the metropolis, a goat two or three, and a cow not above one; but in the country it will sell for ten-pence. A pig, in the capital, may be had for seven-pence, because the Mohammedans do not eat any. Hens sell for twenty pence a dozen: and so many ducks for a crown^d.

FOR all this temperance in the Siameses, yet, to the discredit of sobriety, saith our author, Their diseases.
 they do not live longer than Europeans, nor are freer from diseases. Those which are most dangerous and common among them are fluxes and dysenteries; which yet Europeans are more subject to on their arrival, because they cannot live sober enough. They are sometimes attacked with calentures; but other fevers and inflammations are rare, and kill nobody.
 e Coughs, squinancies, defluxions, and rheumatisms, are as frequent at Siam, where it rains so much, as elsewhere. But the gout, falling-sickness, apoplexy, phthysic, and all sorts of cholic, especially the stone, are there very rare. On the other hand, cancers, abscesses, and fistulas, are very common. So are the fresipeli, to such a degree, that nineteen in twenty are infected with it. There is no scurvy or dropsy to be met with; but one hears of many of those extraordinary distempers, which people are apt to impute to witchcraft. In a word, there are some contagious diseases; and, among the rest, the venereal. But the real plague of this country is the small-pox, which often makes dreadful ravages: and then they bury the bodies, for three years at least, before they burn them: for, they say, if they are taken up sooner, the contagion breaks out afresh^e.

f WHILE the men are employed for six months by the king in all kinds of work, the wives Lazy life.
 maintain the family at home. They plough the land; they sell and buy in the city: so that when the husband returns he has nothing to do. He neither works, walks abroad, nor hunts. He does scarce any thing, but continue sitting, or lolling, eating, playing, smoking, and sleeping. His wife wakes him at seven, and serves him with rice and fish: after this he falls to sleep again: at noon he eats another meal, and sups towards night. What business he has to do, he does between the two last meals; and spends the remainder in conversation or play^f.

As the Siameses have but little to do, they spend much of their time in diversions, of Diversions.
 which they have many, which are common in Europe; as puppet-shews, tumbling, rope g and ladder dancing, in which they far excel our artists. They have wrestling and boxing; aces of oxen instead of horses; and rowing of boats; at which wagers are laid. Cock-fighting and kite-flying are in great esteem, and deemed amusements for the monarchs of Asia. They are very fond of plays and fire-works, which are well performed by them; and which, with their annual feast of lanthorns, as well as other customs, seem to have come to them from the Chineses. Like these also they are excessively given to gaming, so as often to make themselves and children slaves. Their usual games are chess and tick-tack; which last they call saka. Smoking tobacco is one of their greatest pleasures; to which the women are chiefly addicted.

^c LECUBIERE, p. 30, & seqq.^d Ibid. p. 35, & seqq.^e Ibid. p. 38, & seqq.^f Ibid. p. 50.(A) The same kind of sauce is used in Arrakan and Pegu.

Elephant hunting

and fighting.

THE king frequently recreates himself with most of the above-mentioned diversions: but the pastime in which he takes greatest delight, is the catching and fighting of elephants. The taking of these animals is much after the same manner as in other countries. They decoy them, by means of the tame females, into a narrow passage, between two high banks of earth, lined on each side with trunks of trees, so large, and close set, that the elephant can neither pull them up, or get between them: so that men, placed between the banks and the trees, may with safety lay ropes to catch their hind legs in running knots; and then, entering into the narrow passage, provoke them forwards to a little inclosure, also of trees, to which they tie them. When they set elephants to fight, they do not give them liberty to close, as in the great mogul's court, but keep them at a distance, with ropes tied to their hinder feet, and fastened to great posts: so that they can hardly cross each other's trunk in the combat, much less reach the men who are mounted on their backs to animate them. Neither do they let them fight long; for, after five or six attacks, the females are brought in to part them. At Siam they neither expose the life of men nor beasts by way of sport.

Their carriages.

BESIDES the ox and buffalo, on which the Siameses commonly ride, the elephant is their sole domestic animal; and their hunting to catch them is free for every body. For ordinary services they use only the females, reserving the males for war. The elephant is the carriage for every person who can take in hunting, or purchase, one. The king has a white elephant, but never mounts him; because they say the white elephant is as great a lord as himself, as having a king's soul. Horses are scarce, and good for little here, the country not being proper for breeding them. The king keeps about 2000, which he has mostly from abroad, but seldom rides them; as the elephant looks more grand, and is better for defence. They have neither asses nor mules in Siam, but there are some camels brought by the Mohammedans.

Chairs.

THEIR chairs or sedans are square, flat seats, more or less high, which are placed on biers, carried on the shoulders of four or eight men, according to the quality of the person. Sometimes these seats have a back and arms; sometimes only encompassed on three sides with a small ballister about six inches high. Some are open at the top, others covered with an imperial or canopy: but, at present, only two or three lords have permission to use those chairs; and the palankin is allowed to sick persons, or diseased old men. Neither are any suffered to use umbrellas (B), but whom the king pleases; and yet all these prohibited things are allowed to Europeans. The umbrella granted to officers is single, or has but one round, upon a staff or handle: the king's only has more rounds, one above another. The Sarkrats, or superiors of the *Talapoy*s, are indulged with an umbrella of one round, with two or three painted cloths hanging down from it; and the *Talapoy*s themselves have umbrellas, in form of skreens, which they carry in their hands, made of palmito leaves, cut round and folded. These they call talapat, from whence, it is likely, comes the name Talapoy.

Balons, or boats.

BUT to return to the conveniencies for carriage: the annual inundation of the river renders the boat and balon the most universal voiture. It is made out of a single tree, and very narrow, though from sixteen to twenty feet in length; some of the king's balons, and those of considerable officers, have a hundred or a hundred-and-twenty rowers each, who sit cross-legg'd, ranged two and two on benches: those of the inferior officers have only sixteen or twenty pagayes, or oars, according to their different sizes. This pagaye is a short oar, which the pagayer, or rower, holds with both hands; one in the middle, the other at the upper end. This he plunges directly downwards, with a motion of the arms and shoulders, which is vigorous, but easy and graceful; and although the oars can only sweep the water, yet as it is done with force, and by so many hands, the balon flies with exceeding swiftness. They strike all at once, drawing the oar towards them, so that they look towards the place they are going to. A very long pagaye serves for a rudder; which is not fixed to the balon, but held perpendicularly by the steersman: who only moves it sometimes to one side of the vessel, sometimes to the other, according as he would direct its course. The balons of the ladies are rowed by women slaves. The ordinary balons have a cabin in the middle, made of bambú; but in the balons of ceremony or state, there is only a single seat, which is higher or lower, and covered with an umbrella or canopy, according

² LEOBIERE, p. 44

(B) This is the case through all the farther peninsula, particularly in Java, whose king styles himself lord of the twenty-four umbrellas. See before p. 230 a to the degree of the officer to whom it belongs. These canopies are all over gilded, as well as the pagayas : they are supported by pillars, and adorned with carved works in pyramids. It cannot be imagined how delightful it is to see a great number of such balons rowing together in good order ; and our author confesses that he was surprised with the beauty of the shew, on his entering the river of Siam ^b.

^b LOUBIERE, p. 39. & seqq.

S E C T. VI.

Their marriages, education, learning, arts, trade.

b THE Siamese women have children at twelve, and sometimes sooner, but seldom after Their mar- forty ; they therefore marry young. If the parents of the maid like the match, which riages.
 is commonly proposed by women in years, they consult the fortune-teller, to know if the party be rich, and the marriage will prove happy. If the answer turns out to their liking, the young man makes three visits ; and at the third the relations on both sides meet, when the portion of each party is delivered to the bridegroom ; who, without any more ceremony, goes to bed to his wife. The Talapoy have no hand in the matter ; only, a few days after, they go to the house of the new-married couple to sprinkle holy water, and repeat some prayers. The wedding, as in all other countries of the east, is accompanied with feasting and shews, where hired dancers divert the guests. The greatest portion at Siam is a hundred kati, c which make 15,000 livres. A man may have several wives ; but the rich only have more than one, and that more out of grandeur than debauchery. There is always one of them who is the chief, and called the great wife, the rest are termed the lesser wives ; and, though legitimate, are yet slaves, as being purchased. Marriage is forbidden in the first degree of Degrees for- kindred ; yet a man may marry two sisters, one after the death of the other. The king of bidden.
Siam, who reigned in 1687, married his own sister. The succession in private families is in the children of the great wife ; and the heir can sell the little wives and their children, who have only what he pleases to give them, or the father, before his death, thought fit to bestow on them. As to the daughters of the little wives, they are sold to the best bidder, to be little wives themselves ; they may also be sold by the husband in his life-time : but he can only d divorce his principal wife. After this divorce, each party may sell the children who fall to his or her share, according to the division of the odd and even number before-mentioned. Widows inherit the power of their husbands, so far as relates to the children of the odd number, who belong to them ; but they cannot sell those of the even number, if the father's relations oppose it, for the children themselves dare not. Neither does the power of parents extend so far as to kill their children ; nor of husbands to kill their wives.

ALTHOUGH intimacies between freemen and women are not deemed scandalous at Siam, yet parents carefully watch their daughters ; nor are children allowed to dispose of themselves in marriage without their consent. The Siameses are too proud easily to give themselves to foreigners ; at least to invite them, as do the Pegu women ^a living in the country, who have more e spirit and vivacity than the Siameses. It is an established opinion in the Indies, that the people have more or less vigour and spirit, according as they are nearer to, or farther from, Pegu ^b.

THE Siamese children have much docility and sweetness in their disposition. They are Education of educated in extreme modesty of behaviour ; which is ingrafted by the respect due to parents, children.
 and the six months service owing to the prince. Civility is so great throughout the East, that an European, who has lived there long, finds much difficulty to re-acustom himself to the familiarities common in the West. The Siameses never say any thing to displease, nor affect to appear more knowing than you, though a stranger, even in matters which relate to themselves. Parents are the more careful in the education of their children, as they are accountable for their offences ; and the son, though fled, never fails to surrender himself, f when the prince has seized his father, mother, or eldest relations.

SLAVES and servants before their masters, and the common people before the lords, keep Postures of on their knees, sitting on their heels ; their head a little inclined, and hands joined above their respect.
 forehead. In passing by one another in the street they go upright, or stooping, with their hands raised more or less, according to the quality of the persons they salute. In visits, the inferior prostrates himself, and sits in the same manner, silent, till he is first spoken to. The person visited always offers his place to the visitant, and treats him with fruit, preserves, arak, betel, and tea. The breach of these ceremonious duties being punishable by the person offended, preserves respect, and prevents indecent behaviour, which in Europe produces quarrels. In short, ceremonies are as essential, and almost as numerous, in Siam, as in a China.

^a See before, p. 224.

^b LOUBIERE, p. 51. & seqq.

Marks of honour.

AT Siam the right hand is more honourable than the left. In some things they seem to break the rules of decency with us; for they make no scruple to belch without restraint; and wipe the sweat off their faces with their fingers: for they use no handkerchiefs. Yet they must not spit on the mats or carpets, but carry with them a spitting-box for the purpose. In the king's palace they neither spit, cough, nor wipe their nose. The highest place is with them the most honourable; and they avoid going under the houses, which are built on piles, that none may tread over their heads. It is also the highest affront to touch any body's head, or his hair: even to handle his bonnet, if laid down any-where, is a great piece of incivility: yet, to lay any-thing on one's head which is given or received, is, in Siam, as well as other countries of Asia, a very singular mark of respect. In a word, standing is a much more honourable posture than sitting¹.

Learning.

THE Siameses put their children, when seven or eight years old, into a convent, and make them assume the habit, which yet they can quit at pleasure. Here they learn to write, and read, and cast accounts; after which they are taught the principles of their morality, and the fables of Sommona Kodom: but neither history, law, nor any science.

Languages.

THEIR languages are two; the Siamese, or common, and the Bállì, which is their learned or sacred language. The first has thirty-seven, the latter thirty-three letters, all consonants, and both are written from the left to the right. The Siamese resembles the Chinese in several respects: it consists mostly in monosyllables, and has neither declensions nor conjugations, which are supplied by four or five particles, placed either before or after the verb. They have likewise a great deal of accent, like the Chinese, and almost sing in speaking. In other respects, however, the two languages differ considerably: among the rest the Siameses have the letter r, which the Chinese want.

Arithmetic.

ARITHMETIC, after reading and writing, is their principal study, in which they use ten characters, as we do. They are very quick of apprehension, and dextrous in casting accounts; presently resolving very difficult questions, through the clearness of their imagination. They imitate any-thing immediately; and, from the first day, are tolerably good workmen: but their indolence, owing to the heat of the climate, hinders all progress. They are naturally poets, but no orators; and yet our author praises the speech of the Siamese ambassador to Lewis the Fourteenth, at his audience of leave, as an excellent composition.

THEY are strangers to all parts of philosophy, except some principles of morality: and have no sort of theology. They study no laws, but those of their country, and such only as relate to the employment they are advanced to: at which time a copy is delivered to them of the laws which concern it; as is practised in Spain, though their laws are public.

Medicine.

THE Siameses are quite ignorant of anatomy, and every kind of chirurgery, excepting blood-letting. Their whole practice of physic consists in using certain receipts, handed down from their ancestors. Their first prescription is to have the sick man trampled on by one skilled in the business: and big-bellied women get children to trample on them, to procure an easy delivery. They make use of purgatives, and highly applaud sudorifics. Their remedies are generally hot; as they find, to augment the natural heat, is beneficial to them. The sick are nourished with boiled rice, extremely liquid: but meat broths are mortal at Siam, because they too much relax the stomach. Pigs flesh is what is given them when they can eat any-thing solid.

Chemistry.

THE Siameses understand nothing of chemistry, although they passionately affect it; and some boast of profound secrets, because there are credulous persons in Siam, as well as other countries. The father of the king (who reigned in 1687) spent two millions in search of the philosophers stone. They are likewise no less addicted than the Chinese to the folly of seeking out an universal remedy (C), which may render them immortal; at least proof against any kind of death but a violent one. Upon this principle, impostors have forged stories of many pretended immortals, who have withdrawn from the sight of men, to secure themselves from danger; and there are fools enough in Siam to believe them^m.

Astronomy.

THESE people know nothing of geometry and mechanics, because they can do without them; and astronomy concerns them no more than as they conceive it may be assistant to divination. They know only some practical part thereof, which they use in the horoscopes of the people, and in the composition of their almanack, which is a kind of general horoscope. It appears that they have twice caused their kalendar to be reformed by able astronomers; who, to supply the astronomical tables, have taken two arbitrary epochas, remarkable for some rare conjunction of the planets: the first refers to the year 545 before Christ; the second

¹ LOUBIERE, p. 54, & seqq.

^m Ibid. p. 59, & seqq.

(C) The sect of Tau, among the Chinese, pretend to be masters of this secret, called the liquor of immortality; which some of the emperors have been so silly as to confide in a to the 638th after Christ. Both these served as grounds for calculating the account of the places of the planets; and the latter being found most commodious, they have left off the former, which they pretend marks the death of Sommona Kodom, in astronomical calculations, although they still make use of it in their dates.

THEY know nothing of the system of the world, and believe, like all the East, that eclipses are caused by some dragon, who devours the sun and moon. They hold the earth to be square, on whose extremities the arch of the firmament rests, like a glass bell for covering plants. They say the earth is divided into four habitable parts, separated by seas, like so many different worlds. 84,000 yods, of 8000 fathom each, asunder. In the middle of the four worlds they suppose a square pyramidal mountain, from whose top, which touches the stars, to the surface of the earth, they reckon the same number of yods; the like number from the mountain to each of the worlds; and from the surface of the sea down to the foot of it. Now the world we inhabit, which they call chiampon, lies to the south of this mountain: and the sun, moon, and stars, incessantly turning round it, make day and night. At the top of the mountain is a heaven called intratirásba; over which is the heaven of angels. Notion of the world.

MUSIC is no better understood at Siam than astronomy: they use no notes; and compose, as well as sing, by ear. They use violins with three strings, and very shrill hautboys; on which they play tolerably well; accompanied with copper basons, struck with a stick. They have, besides our drums, two sorts of their own; one beaten with the fist, the other sounded in a very odd manner by turning a stick run through the sides of it. They are fond of our trumpets; theirs being small and harsh". Music.

THEY have no companies of trades in Siam, nor do arts flourish there. No person desires to excel in any business, because there is no price for ingenuity, and every one is afraid to appear rich. Besides, should any one distinguish himself as an artist, he would the risk of being obliged to work gratis for life for his prince, who has already six months of his labour: they therefore content themselves with knowing a little of every kind of work, which the king employs them in. Thus they are pretty good joiners, but bad carvers and statuaries. They make excellent mortar, and understand masonry; yet their brick buildings do not last, because they never lay any foundations. They are excellent gilders, and gold-beaters; making leaves of it as thin as fine paper, on which the king's letters to other princes are written, with a bodkin. With such thin plates of gold or silver they sometimes cover their images, often of a monstrous size; also sword-hilts; but cannot polish. They know how to smelt metals, and cast some works in molds; but are bad forgers: hence their horses are not shod. Their stirrups are of rope; but the saddles deserve no better. Arts.

THEIR manufactures are very few and mean. The art of tanning and dressing leather is unknown to them. They make neither silks, woollen stuffs, nor tapestry; and but very little cotton cloth, of a very coarse kind, and ill painted: but they embroider to please the fancy. They paint only in water colours, and that badly, after the Chinese manner, varying from nature; to follow which they deem too mechanical. The most general professions in Siam are fishing, for the common people; and merchandize, for those who are able to engage in it: but as the king engrosses to himself the foreign commerce, the home trade is so inconsiderable, that it is impossible to grow rich by it. In loans they give promissory notes of repayment; but neither seal nor sign, excepting with a sort of cross for a mark. The integrity of the people is so great, that, in the markets, neither the seller counts the money, nor the buyer the goods, he receives: and they were much scandalized to see the French buy the least things with more caution. The market hours are from five in the evening to eight or nine. Manufactures and commerce.

THEY use no measures in trade; because muslins and other linens are sold by the piece: but in serving the poorer sort, who want smaller quantities, they measure with their arm. In buildings, and surveying land, they use the fathom. For grain and liquors they use cocoa-shells; also a kind of bushel to measure corn, and a pitcher for liquor. They are not more exact with regard to their weights: but the pieces of their money are better regulated, though frequently counterfeit and light. Their silver coins are all of the same figure and impression, but of different sizes. Their tikal, which weighs no more than half a crown, goes for three shillings and sixpence. Gold is a commodity, and twelve times the value of silver. They use for small money the kori shells, which they call lia, 7 or 800 of which are scarce the value of a penny". Measures and weights.

THE Siameses bury their dead bodies in wooden coffins, varnished and gilded on the outside. Sometimes they make use of leaden coffins: these they set on a high place, or bedstead, with feet, and burn perfumes and tapers. Every night the *Talapoy*s come to sing hymns on the occasion, in the Balli language, for which they are entertained, and receive some money. The place for burning the corpse is in the fields, near some temple, where a square spot is Their funerals.

^a LOUBIERE, p. 64, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 69, & seq.

surrounded with a bambu inclosure, like that of an arbor. It is adorned with painted or gilded papers, representing houses, moveables, and animals, which are for the use of the deceased in the next world; where they are supposed to become the things they represent. In the midst of this inclosure, the funeral pile is made, of odoriferous wood; and, if the persons are rich, a scaffolding is erected of a considerable height, on which earth is laid, and on that the wood. On the day appointed, in the morning, the body sets out, under the sound of instruments, attended by the family and friends, all in white.

and interrments.

WHEN they arrive at the place, the body is taken out of the coffin, and laid on the pile: then the *Talapoy*s sing for a quarter of an hour, and so retire: after which the shews begin, set-off with fireworks. About noon a servant of the *Talapoy*s sets fire to the pile, which burns for two hours, yet only roasts the body, without consuming it. If a prince of the blood, or a favourite lord, dies, the king himself sets the pile on fire, by a rocket sent along a rope, from the palace to the pile. The family entertain the company attending the burial, and, for three days, bestow alms on the *Talapoy*s. The remains of the body are again put into the coffin, and deposited under one of the pyramids which encompass some temple. The poor inter their dead bodies without burning them; or expose them in the fields on a scaffold, where the vultures and crows devour them. The Siameses never burn the corpses of persons executed, infants still-born, women who die in child-bed, those who destroy themselves, or perish by thunder, or such extraordinary accidents; believing that such misfortunes never happen to the innocent ^p.

^p LOUBIERE hist. Siam, p. 122.

S E C T. VII.

Religion of the Siameses.

AS the religion of the Siameses is the same, or nearly the same, with that of the Labos, which we have already circumstantially described; we shall here only touch upon a few particulars, relating to the Indian doctrine of the soul, and other matters, which have not yet been brought in view.

All souls alike.

ALL souls appear, to the eastern Pagans, to be of the same nature; nor do they believe, like Christians, that they are physically united to the body, so as to make one with it. They are so far from thinking that the souls have a natural inclination to be in bodies, that they hold the transmigration to be a penance, as hath been often mentioned already. On the other hand, it is very difficult to convey to a Siamite the idea of a spirit, or an immaterial substance. All believe, indeed, that there remains something of man, after his death, which subsists separately from his body; but they give form and extension to the remains: in short, ascribe to it all the same members, with the same solid and fluid substances, whereof human bodies are composed. They suppose only that the souls are of a matter subtile enough to be free from touch and sight; yet at the same time hold, that if any of them be wounded, the blood which flows from the wound may appear. Such were the manes and shades of the Greeks and Romans. The Chineses chose to suffer death rather than shave their hair after the manner of the Tartars, who conquered them, that they might not appear before their ancestors in the other world without hair; imagining, that they shaved the head of the soul, in shaving that of the body. After all, they cannot tell why they attribute the human figure, rather than any other, to the soul; which they suppose able to animate all sorts of bodies, besides that of man ^a.

Of human form.

Notion of spirits.

As the oriental people believe that they may be helpful to the dead, by providing for their necessities in the next life, in the way before-mentioned, of burning the paper-figures of several things; so they imagine that the dead have the power of tormenting and succouring the living. Hence comes their care about the funerals of the deceased: for it is only in this that they are munificent. Hence also it is that they pray to the dead, so high as their great great grandfather; supposing their ancestor, in the degrees beyond, to be so dispersed by divers transmigrations, that they can hear them no more. The orientals are afraid of spirits, as well as the Christians, but in a more limited manner; for they neither hope nor fear any-thing from the dead out of the precincts of their family, profession, ward, or city, at farthest ^b.

Paradises and hells.

THE most common opinion is, that there are nine places of happiness, and nine unhappy places: the nine first over our heads, or above this world; the nine unhappy places under our feet. The highest of the first nine is the place of most bliss; and the lowest of the second nine the place of most misery. But however great may be the felicity of the ninth paradise, yet that felicity is not eternal, nor exempt from inquietudes; since it is a state in which one a is not only born, but also dies. The true paradise of the Indians is of another kind. If, after several transmigrations, a soul, by the good works done in each new life, arrives at so much merit, that there is not, in any of the worlds, any mortal condition which is worthy of it, they say it then enjoys the Nireupan; that is, it has disappeared, and will ^{State of Nir-}return no more to any world, but remains in a state of eternal inactivity, and real impassibility^{reupan}. This word Nircupan the Portugueses have translated it is annihilated, and it is become a god; although, in the opinion of the Siameses, this is neither a real annihilation, nor an acquisition of any divine nature. In like manner, their true hell is not in any of the nine unhappy abodes, in some of which they suppose eternal flames and torments; but consists in the soul's never arriving at the Nireupan, and being doomed to eternal transmigrations.

^a LOUBIERE, p. 120, 129.

^b Ibid. p. 120. 122.

b BEFORE the soul disappears, or enters into the supreme felicity, they believe that, as soon as he hath merited the Nircupan, he enjoys great privileges in this life: as, that he acquires a prodigious knowledge, particularly of what happened to him in his several transmigrations, and what shall happen till the time of his death; that he shall be endued with invincible strength, and the power of doing miracles. His death too must be of a more noble kind than the common sort: he disappears, say they, like a spark, which is lost in the air. And it is to the memory of these perfectly beatified men that the Siameses consecrate their temples. ^{Its privileges}

Now although the *Talapoy*s pretend that several have arrived to this supreme felicity (to ^{Enjoyed by} the end, in our author's opinion, that several others may hope to arrive thereat), yet they ^{several} honour only one, whom they deem to have surpassed all the rest in virtue. This is him whom c they call Sommona Kodom. Kodom, they say, was his proper name; and that Sommona signifies, in the Bali (or Palii) language, a Talapoy of the woods.

According to them, there is no true virtue out of the Talapoy profession: and they believe the Talapoy of the woods to be much more virtuous than those of the cities.

AND this, our author says, is the whole doctrine of the Siameses, in which he finds no traces of a divinity. They have no idea of a being who created all things; nor consequently of any deity: so that their whole religion may be reduced intirely to the worship of the dead^d.

THE sacred books of the *Talapoy*s, written in the Balli language, on longish leaves of a ^{Balli book} tree, fastened together at one end, are filled with extravagant stories, grafted on the metempsychosis, and other doctrines of their religion. For instance, their principal book, believed to be written by Sommona Kodom (A), relates, that a certain elephant had thirty-three heads, each head seven teeth, each tooth seven pools, each pool seven flowers, every flower seven leaves, every leaf seven towers, every tower seven other things, and so on, still proceeding by the number seven^e. But let us leave these foolish conceits, to consider the morality of the Siameses.

IT has been already observed, in our account of the religion of the Labos, or Lanjans, that ^{Moral pre-}the principles of the Indian morals are reduced to five negative precepts. We shall here con- ^{cepts}sider in what latitude each of them is understood by the *Talapoy*s, particularly those of Siam.

e THE first precept, Kill nothing, is extended to vegetables and seeds, as well as animals: 1. ^{Not to kill,} because they believe the seed contains the plant; or is only the plant itself under a cover. He therefore who keeps the precept can live solely on fruit; which they consider only as part of a thing which has life, and which suffers not by having its fruit plucked. But, in eating the fruit, he must avoid eating either the kernel or stone, because they are seeds: nor must unripe fruit be eaten, because that is to render the seed which the fruit contains abortive, by hindering it from coming to maturity. The precept goes still farther, even to forbid destroying any thing in nature: because they think every thing is animated, or rather has a soul; so that to destroy any thing is to dispossess a soul. Thus they believe that to break a branch of a tree, is like breaking the arm of an innocent person, and offends the soul of f the tree; but when once the soul has been dislodged from any body, they think no harm can be done in feeding on the latter. The *Talapoy*s do not scruple to eat of what is dead, but only of killing what they believe to be alive.

In several instances they testify a greater abhorrence of blood than of murder. They are ^{nor dispossess,} forbidden to make any incision from whence blood may flow; as if the soul was the blood, or ^{souls} principally lodged in it. The Siameses scruple to go a fishing, except on the days when the *Talapoy*s shave their heads. At those times they fancy that they commit no crime; saying, that they only pull them out of the water, and shed not their blood; but the smallest evasion serves to elude the precepts. Thus they imagine killing in war to be no sin, because they shoot not directly at the enemy; although, in reality, they endeavour to kill. For all this,

^c LOUBIERE, p. 120.^d Ibid. p. 130.^e Ibid. p. 135.A) This probably is the Vineh: a fragment of which text, called Patimouk, is given by Loubiere, p. 157.

Self-murder lawful.

if they are told, that murder in some cases appears laudable, since it may deliver a soul a from a miserable life, they answer; first, that forcibly to dispossess souls is always to injure them: secondly, that by being dispossessed they are relieved; because they re-enter the like bodies, in order to live-out the time appointed them in that state. As to self-murder, the Siameses think it not only lawful, because masters of themselves, but also meritorious; judging it a sacrifice which acquires the soul a great degree of virtue and perfection. In this persuasion they sometimes hang themselves out of devotion: but some great discontent is generally the true motive; as was the case of a Peguer, who burnt himself publicly in a temple at Siam, about the year 1680.

Second.

Third.

WITH regard to the second precept, Steal nothing, our author has nothing particular to observe: but the third, Commit not any impurity, extends, he says, not only to adultery and b fornication, but also to marriage; which (with the Talapoys) is a state of sin, as celibacy is a state of perfection.

Fourth.

THE fourth precept, Lye not, in Loubiere's opinion, merited an explanation; but he was not furnished with materials for the purpose.

Fifth.

THE fifth and last, Drink no intoxicating liquor, prohibits not only drinking strong liquors till one is overcome with them, but the drinking at all of any inebriating liquor, though ever so moderately ^f.

If idolaters,

As the Siameses acknowledge no author of the universe, so they acknowledge no first legislator. They erect temples to the memory of certain men, concerning whom they believe a thousand fables, which the superstition of their ancestors has invented. And these are they whom c the Portugueses have called the gods of the Indies; imagining that whatever was honoured with public worship could be no less than a god (A). The Indians indeed have allowed these men to be called gods; but the reason is, that they do understand the true meaning of the word god. The erecting statues to men, and giving them exterior worship, is not always a mark of divine honour, since the like hath been, and still are, often given to magistrates; as statues have even been set up in churches, and honoured with incense, as well as other exterior forms of worship. Therefore the Indians are not to be accused with idolatry for the like practice; much less, as it does not appear that they acknowledge any deity: for, this reason they ought rather to be termed atheists than idolaters. On the other hand, when it is d considered that they offer vows and sacrifices to those who are not gods, they cannot well be excused from idolatry.

hold all religions good.

THE Indians are persuaded, that different people must have different religions; and therefore have no notion that one ought to extirpate another. They do not hold, like Europeans, that faith is a virtue. They believe, because they know not how to doubt: much less are they persuaded, that there is a faith and worship, which ought to be the faith and worship of all nations. The priests do not preach that a soul shall be punished for denying their traditions, because they do not find that any do deny them. They are willing to believe all foreign religions, how incomprehensible soever, to be true: but cannot be persuaded that their own is false; or to reject their sacred books, although they sometimes acknowledge that there are inconsistencies in them. In this they act but like Europeans, who do not, on account of e some falsity, reject every historian, or book of physick. They do not believe their doctrine to have descended from heaven, or to have come from the infallible mouth of truth. They hold it to have been born with the man, and written by some endowed with extraordinary knowledge; but who never sinned, or were capable of being deceived, although they were not inspired ^g.

^f LOUBIERE, p. 126.

^g Ibid. p. 139, & seq.

(A) Then they must believe their own images to be gods: but it is the iniquitous art of Romish priests of all nations, to accuse others with idolatry, though free from the charge, in order to cloak their own.

S E C T. VIII.

Of the Talapoys, or priests.

Talapoys, kinds of.

THERE are two sorts of Talapoys in Siam, as every-where else; some dwell in woods, f and others in cities. Gervaise distinguishes the Talapoys into three orders or degrees: Balwang (or Pat-lowang), Chaw-kow, and Pe-kow; which may arise from some difference between the Sankrats and Talapoys. However, Loubiere always understood Balwang, written Pat-louang, to be only a title of respect; and Chaw-kow, which signifies lord, or my lord, to be the name of the Talapoys in Siam; for they have no other there^a. However that may a be, the *Talapoy*s, considered as religious, will admit of another division, like the regulars of the Romish church, namely, into that of monks and nuns; for there are Talapoyneſſes, or the *Talapoy*s, who have their particular rules, or way of living.

^a LOUBIERE, p. 114. 118. 134.

WITH regard to the *Talapoy*s of the male ſex, thoſe of the woods are reckoned more holy than thoſe of the cities. They have neither convents nor temples; ſo that, having no places of ſecurity to retire to, the people admire the ſecurity in which they live from wild beaſts: but poſſibly they may, in the night, make fires, and chooſe the cloſeſt thickets to live in. Doubtleſs alſo the woods are not ſo dangerous as they report; ſeeing ſo many families ſeek ſanctuary there againſt the government. Theſe are our ways of accounting for the matter: but the Siameſes have quite other notions of things. They believe that theſe Talapoy are expoſed continually to the moſt imminent dangers; and that nothing but their extreme ſanctity could protect them. They imagine, that the tigers, elephants, and rhinoceros's, reverence them, and lick their hands and feet, when they find any of them aſleep. Should they find the remains of ſome man, who had been devoured by thoſe animals, they would never believe that he was a Talapoy, unleſs there appeared ſome evident proof: on which occaſion they would preſume (as, in the like caſe, many as bigotted Chriſtians do), that this Talapoy had been wicked, without ceaſing to believe that the wild beaſts have a profound reſpect for the good and virtuous ^b.

As any perſon may be a Talapoy, he, who has a mind to enter into the profeſſion, firſt Talapoy how agrees with ſome ſuperior to receive him, and then goes to demand the habit of ſome Sankrat; ^{made}.
c in caſe the ſuperior he is to remain with is not one himſelf. The Sankrat appoints ſome afternoon for his admiſſion, when the party, his relations and friends, come accompanied with muſic and dancers; neither theſe latter, nor the women, enter the temple; where the Sankrat waits to receive the new member: for whoever ſhould oppoſe his admiſſion would commit a ſin. When he has been ſhaven, he puts on the habit given him by the Sankrat, who, in the mean time, repeats ſeveral words in the Balli language. The ceremony being ended, the new Talapoy repairs to the convent where he is to reſide, accompanied by his kinsfolks: but from this time he muſt take his leave of muſic and dancing. Some days after, the relations give an entertainment to the convent; and exhibit ſhews before the temple, which the *Talapoy*s are prohibited to ſee ^c.

d THE *Talapoy*s go with bare heads and feet like the people. Round their loins and thighs ^{Their habit.} they wear the pagne alſo, but of yellow linen, which is the royal colour (A). They have no muſlin ſhirt or veſt. Their habit conſiſts of four pieces: the firſt is the angſa, a kind of ſhoulder-belt, of the ſame ſort of linen, five or ſix inches broad: they wear it on their left ſhoulder, and button it with a ſingle button on the right hip, than which it goes no lower. Over this belt they put another great yellow cloth, which they call pa ſhivon, or the cloth of ſeveral pieces, becauſe it ought to be patched in ſeveral places. The Portugueſes call it the pagne of the *Talapoy*s. It is a kind of ſcapulary, which reaches to the ground both behind and before, and which, covering only the left ſhoulder, returns to the right hip, leaving the two arms, with all the right ſhoulder, free. Over this is the pa pat, another cloth four or five inches broad, which e they likewiſe put over the left ſhoulder, but like a hood, deſcending to the navel before, and equally low behind. The Sankrats, and moſt ancient *Talapoy*s, wear it red. To keep the angſa and pa ſhivon, which muſt always be yellow, in a poſture, they gird their middle with a yellow cloth called rappakod: and this completes the four pieces whereof their habit conſiſts.

THEY ſhave all their beard, head, and eyebrows. The Siam razors are of copper. The ^{The tonſure.} ſuperior is forced to ſhave himſelf, becauſe no perſon can touch his head without ſhewing him diſreſpect: but when he is very old, another is permitted to do that office. By the ſame rule, a young Talapoy dares not ſhave an old one: but the old may ſhave the young; that is, the Nens or children committed to their education, who know not how to ſhave themſelves. The ſhaving days are thoſe of the new and full moon, on which they faſt, that is, f eat nothing from noon. They uſe a chaplet, or beads, of 108 grains, on which they recite ^{Beads and ſan.} certain Balli words ^d.

THE Talapoyneſſes, who are called Nang-chi, are clad in white, like the Tapakaw, or ſer-Talapoy-vants; nor are they, in a ſtrict ſenſe, eſteemed religious. A ſimple ſuperior ſuffices to give them the name, as well as the habit. They are obliged to continence; yet are not burnt, like the *Talapoy*s, in caſe they break the rule. On being convicted of the fact, they are delivered up to their parents, to be baſtonado'd; becauſe neither the *Talapoy*s, nor Talapoyneſſes, are permitted to ſtrike any perſon ^e.

THE Siameſes do not believe that real virtue is deſigned for any but the *Talapoy*s. How-^{Talapoy} ever, they hold, that what is ſin in itſelf, is ſin in every perſon who commits it; and the ^{without ſin.}

^b LOUBIERE, p. 115, & ſeq.^c Ibid. p. 118.^d Ibid. p. 116.^e Ibid. p. 119.(A) It is the ſame in China.

*Talapoy*s esteem nothing a sin in their order, which is not a sin to all the world: but then they say it is the business of the laity to sin, and of themselves not to sin. They say also, that it is their office to repent for those who sin. They likewise think that they who are destined to expiate the sins of others by penance, ought to be more pure than others; and that the punishment due to sin may pass from the guilty to the innocent, in case the innocent will voluntarily submit himself to deliver the guilty.

Make the laity sin.

NOTWITHSTANDING this, the *Talapoy*s have very gross conceptions concerning the nature of sin: for although they abstain themselves from actions which they deem wicked, yet they scruple not, for lucre sake, to make the laity commit them. Thus, because rice being a seed, they cannot boil it, without sin, as that would be to kill it: yet they order their servants, who are laymen, or else the Talapoy children whom they educate, to commit this pretended sin; and then eat the rice which they have cooked. They are likewise forbidden to piss either on the fire, water, or earth; because that would be to extinguish the fire, or corrupt the other two elements: but after they have made water in a basin, they give it to their servant, to throw where-ever he pleases. Whatever sins the laity commit, they expiate them by their good works; which principally consist in bestowing alms on the temples and the *Talapoy*s, according to the ancient custom, prevailing almost every-where, and so frequently repeated in scripture, that alms-deeds ransom sin.

Their moral maxims;

impossible to be kept.

OUR author has published the moral maxims of the *Siamese Talapoy*s, in which one sees the great respect which they have for the elements, and for all the parts of nature. They are forbidden to speak injuriously of any natural production; to dig a hole in the earth, and not to fill it up afterwards; to boil the earth, as to boil rice; to kindle a fire, because it is to destroy that with which it is kindled; or to extinguish it, when it is once kindled. By those maxims it appears that the *Talapoy*s pay as much regard to purity and decency, as to real virtue: and that they have some ideas of all the virtues, but no just notions of any of them; because they strain some too far with their superstitious scruples, and do not live up strictly to others. They see it is impossible for all persons to keep these maxims; since it is necessary for somebody to make a fire: yet think they keep them, by shifting the sin off themselves upon the laity, and, on that account, pretend to be pure: as if there was no harm in obliging others to do a sinful action, provided they keep from doing it themselves. On this false purity, purchased at the expence of the laity, is grounded all that pride which the *Talapoy*s shew towards them: for they seated themselves higher than secular people; never salute them; and affect never to bewail the death of any person, even of their parents. They have a kind of confession; for, from time to time, they seem in private to render an account of their actions to their superior. But instead of confessing themselves sinners, they declare themselves free from sin: I have not stolen, say they; I have not lied; and so of the rest.

Confession of no sins.

A TALAPOY sins, if, in the street, he has not his senses composed; or if he meddles with state-affairs; if he coughs, to attract the eyes of a woman; if he beholds a woman with complacency, or desires one; if he uses perfumes, puts flowers in his ears, or adorns himself with too much care. He is to have but one garment, and that not shewy; is to keep no victuals from the evening till next day; nor to touch, or even desire, gold or silver. But as they may abandon their profession when they please, so they take care to gather wherewith to live at their ease, when they leave the convent^a.

Rules of the order.

THE spirit of the institution of the *Talapoy*s is to keep themselves from the sins of the people, to lead a penitent life for the sins of those who bestow alms upon them, and to live on alms. They eat not in common, and are very hospitable to the seculars of all religions: yet they are forbidden to share among their companions the alms which they receive, at least to do it immediately; every one being supposed to repent sufficiently, and not to have occasion to expiate his sins, by bestowing alms. However they are allowed to give things sometimes to their brethren, and assist them in real necessity. They have two lodgings, one on each side of the door, to receive passengers who desire a bed^b. Their way of begging is like that used in Pegu and Labos.

Talapoy's their origin.

THE *Talapoy*s are obliged strictly to keep celibacy, so long as they continue in their profession, on pain of being burnt; and the king never pardons them in this case, when convicted^c.

Talapoy privileges.

As to the origin of the *Talapoy*s, it is like that of the Brámmans and Bonzas, so obscure, that it will be difficult ever to discover it. They are ignorant of the founder of their order; but say, that all those whose statutes are honoured in their temples, were of it: and the people believe, that both they and their doctrine are as ancient as the world itself^d.

THE *Talapoy*s have great privileges; among the rest, that of being exempted from the six months service. The king, therefore, to diminish the number of these privileged persons, whose power he has reason to fear, causes them, from time to time, to be examined as to their

^a LOUBIERE, p. 123, & seq. p. 134.

^b Ibid. p. 114.

^c LA CROZE Chret. des Indes, p. 115.

^d Ibid.

a knowledge of the Balli language, and its books: if they are not learned enough, he reduces them to a secular state; as he did several thousands, about the year 1687. They were examined by a lay-officer; but those of the woods refused to be examined by any but one of their own superiors^c.

It is one of the privileges of the *Talapoy*s that they cannot be put to death. When the present king's father seized the crown, he thought it impossible securely to make an attempt on one of the princes of the blood, till he had first artfully prevailed on him to quit the Talapoy habit which he wore. In like manner, when that usurper died, his son turned Talapoy, to secure himself against his uncle, who had taken possession of the throne^f.

THE functions proper to the *Talapoy*s are to educate youth, as hath been related; and to Functions explain their doctrines to the people, out of their Balli books. They preach the day after every new and full moon, and the people constantly frequent the temples. When the river is swelled, till the inundation begins to sink, they preach every day, from six in the morning till dinner-time, and from one in the afternoon till five. The *Talapoy*s relieve one another in Preaching this office, the preacher sitting cross-legged, in a high chair of state; and when he has finished his sermon, the people give him alms: so that they who preach frequently throughout the year, soon become rich.

THIS time may be called the Lent of the *Talapoy*s. Their fasting is to eat nothing from Lent fasting noon, unless they may chew betel: but when they do not fast, they only eat fruit in the afternoon. The Indians are so sober, that a fast of forty, nay of an hundred days, does not appear c incredible to them. Van Twijt, a Dutch author, affirms, that some have fasted the first number of days, without taking any thing but a little liquor mixed with a little bitter wood reduced to powder: and the Siameses speak of a Talapoy who fasted 107 days, but then ascribed it to magic; saying it was easy to live on grass, provided certain words were uttered over it.

AFTER the rice-harvest, the *Talapoy*s go for three weeks to watch in the fields by night, Watch in the under small huts, set round their superiors, made of branches of trees; and in the day return fields to visit the temple and sleep in their cells. They make no fires on this occasion, to scare away the wild beasts; so that the people look on it as a miracle that they are not devoured. But it must be considered, that this is a time when the wild beasts meet with much forage; and the *Talapoy*s know how to choose the safest ground, as well as secure themselves by inclosures.

d However, our author knew not the reason either of this watch, or their Lent^g.

ON the full moon of the fifth month the *Talapoy*s wash the statues with perfumed waters, Washings. all but the head, which must not be touched, out of respect: they afterwards wash the Sankrat. The people likewise wash him, and the other *Talapoy*s. In particular families the children wash their parents, without regard to their sex; for the son and daughter wash the father and grandfather, as well as the mother and grandmother.

THE *Talapoy*s being raised in the morning by the sound of their bells (for they have no How they clock), the first thing they do is to wash themselves, as soon as it is light enough to see their spend way, lest in walking they should kill any insect without perceiving it. After this they go with their superior to the temple for two hours; there they sing, or repeat a passage out of their e Balli books: but the people have no prayer-book. Their posture, while they sing, is to sit cross-legged, and continually to toss their talipat, or fan, as if fanning themselves, in measure with their words; which they pronounce in equal time, and in the same tone. At their entering in, and going out of the temple, they prostrate themselves three times before the statue; and the laity do the same.

AFTER prayers, they go into the city for an hour to beg alms. Their method is to stand the day at the gates, without saying any thing; and, in a little time, if nothing is given them, pass on: but it is rare that the people refuse them a benevolence; and their relations never fail them. At their return to the convent they breakfast; sometimes presenting to the statue what they eat. Till noon they study, or divert themselves, and then dine. After dinner they read f a lecture to the little *Talapoy*s; and then go to sleep, or take a walk in the city. In the evening they sweep the temple, and sing there, as in the morning, for two hours; after which they lie down. If they eat a supper, it is only of fruit.

BESIDES the slaves which the convents may have, each has one or two servants, called Servants. Tapakaw, who are laymen, tho' dressed like *Talapoy*s, excepting that their habit is white, and not yellow. They receive all the money which is given to their masters, because these latter cannot touch it without sinning. They have the care of the gardens and lands belonging to the convent; in short, these Tapakaw do for the *Talapoy*s whatever they conceive ought not to be done by themselves^h.

EVERY convent is under the direction of a superior, called Chaw Vat, that is, lord of the Superior. g convent: but all the superiors are not of equal dignity. The most honourable are those whom they call Sankrat; and he of the palace convent is the most reverend of all: yet no superior

^c LA CROZE Chret. des Indes, p. 115.
p. 117, & seq.

^f Ibid. p. 135.

^g Ibid. p. 115, & seq.

^h Ibid.

nor Sankrat has authority or jurisdiction over another. This body would be too formidable a if it had but one head, and acted always unanimously, or according to the same maxims.

Sankrats.

THE missionaries have compared the Sankrats to bishops, and the simple superiors to parish priests: they fancy also that Siam formerly had some Christian bishops, to whom the Sankrats have succeeded. But although the Sankrats only can make Talapoys, as none but bishops can make priests; yet they have not any jurisdiction or authority, either over the people or the Talapoys, which are not of their respective convents. Every convent, designed for a Sankrat, is distinguished from others by stones, bearing some distant resemblance to a mitre set on a pedestal, which are planted round the temple near its walls. The dignity of the Sankrat is denoted by the number of these stones, which are never fewer than two, nor more than eight: it was the figure of these stones which gave rise to the notion of the missionaries. The king b gives to the principal Sankrat a name and an umbrella, with a sedan, and men to carry it¹.

Respect paid them.

THE Talapoys never walk out of their convent, or return, without going to salute their superior, by touching the ground with their forehead; and because he generally sits cross-legged, they take one of his feet with both hands, and put it on their head.

Their election.

WHEN the superior, whether he be a Sankrat or not, is dead, the religious elect another; and commonly they chuse the oldest Talapoy in the convent, or at least the most learned. Persons who build temples chuse a superior for the convent, but build no houses for the Talapoys, only as they come and settle there².

Talapoy convents.

THE Talapoys live in convents, called Vat, which are always erected near some temple (B), named Pihan by the Siameses: both together take up a very great square piece of ground, encompassed with an inclosure of bambú. The temple stands in the middle; and the cells are c ranged at the corners, and along the inclosure, like the tents of an army, the rows being sometimes double or triple. These are little huts or single houses erected on piles; and that of the superior a little larger and higher than the rest. Each convent has some gardens and arable lands, with slaves to plough them. All their lands are free from taxes; and the king never touches them, although the real property of them lies in him; unless he gives them away by an instrument in writing, which he scarce ever does³.

Lands free.

Talapoyneffes.

THE Talapoyneffes have no convents of their own, but live in those of the Talapoys; for being all advanced in years, the Siameses think they may be trusted with the men. In those convents, where any are (for they are not in all), one of the sides of the outward inclosure is d allotted for their cells, without any other separation from the rest.

Talapoy children.

THE Nens, or Talapoy children, are dispersed in the cells of the Talapoys, and serve those under whom they are placed by their parents. No Talapoy ever takes more than two or three: these are not all young, for some grow old in this condition, which is not entirely religious. The oldest of the Nens is called Taten, whose business it is to pluck up the weeds which grow in the ground of the convent, and which the Talapoys think they cannot do themselves without committing sin.

THE school of the Nens is a hall of bambú, standing alone; besides which there is another, where the people carry their alms, on the days when the temple is shut, and where the Talapoys assemble for their ordinary conferences. e Temples and steeples.

THE temple is surrounded with pyramids standing near it; and the ground on which they are situated is higher than the rest. It is likewise square, and inclosed with a wall; between which and the cells is an empty space, which serves for a court to the convent. Sometimes along the inner inclosure there are covered galleries, like the cloisters in Romish monasteries; and on a counter wall breast-high, which runs along these galleries, they range images, sometimes gilded. The steeple of the temple is a wooden tower, standing alone, which they call horakang, or the belfry. The bell, which has no clapper, is sounded with a wooden mallet^m.

Festival days.

THOSE days on which the Talapoys shave, the people abstain from fishing; seemingly, as an employment not wholly innocent: for they do not abstain from any other sort of work. They likewise carry alms to the convents, which consist of money, fruits, pagnes, or cattle. f If the cattle be dead, the Talapoys eat the flesh. If not, they let them live and die about the temples, eating them only when they die of themselves. Near certain temples there is a pond for the living fish, which are offered to such temples. Besides these festival days, common to all the temples, every temple has a particular day appointed to receive the alms, as if it was the feast of its dedication.

THE people voluntarily assist at these festivals, and make a shew with their new cloaths. One of their principal charities is to give liberty to some animals, which they buy of those who take them in the fields.

¹ LOUBIERE hist. Siam, p. 114. p. 113, & seq.

² Ibid. p. 117, & seq.

³ Ibid. p. 113, & 117.

^m Ibid.

(B) A late author says, there are 50,000 belonging to the temples in and about Siam. Hamilton's new acc. of E. Ind. vol. ii. p. 163.

- a WHAT the people offer to the statue is not done by themselves, but it is delivered to the *Talapoy*s; who present it either by holding it in their hand before the image, or laying it upon the altar: and a while after, they take it away, and convert it to their own use. Sometimes the people offer up lighted tapers, which the *Talapoy*s fasten to the knees of the statue; and this is the reason why one of the knees of a great many images are ungilt^a.

^a LOUBIERE, p. 116, & seq.

S E C T. IX.

Of Sommona Kodom, the founder or restorer of the Siamese religion.

- b THE Chineses say that a Siamese, named Sbe-kya, was the author of this religion and the Religion, metempsychosis; but the Siameses themselves pretend no such thing (A); imagining origin that this doctrine is as ancient as the souls themselves. The Japaners call the Sbe-kya of the Chineses Sba-ka; which words nearly agreeing in sound, seem to be derived from Chawka and Chawkow, which signify lord, or my lord; the name, as hath been already observed, given to the *Talapoy*s in Siam: so that, says our author, the Chineses seem to have taken the general name of the profession for the proper name of the founder.
- c THIS conjecture would be very probable, provided we were sure that the Chineses received the religion of Sbe-kya, or Sba-ka, from the Siameses: but, according to them, they had it from a country to the west of their empire, which seems to be Tibet; and though it was not known in China till sixty-five years after Christ, yet they make its founder Sbe-kya, or Fo, to have lived above 1000 years before the Christian æra: whereas the Siameses place the death of their lawgiver almost 500 years later.
- d THE Chineses therefore, in making Sbe-kya the founder of the Siamese religion, honour it from Shékya, with greater antiquity, and, in effect, are right, since it is the same with that broached by Sbe-kya, several ages before Sommona Kodom, the lawgiver of the Siameses; who, to avoid confessing that he was beholden for it to another, pretend that their religion is as old as the world. But we know, from authentic history, that it was professed by the Sammans, or Shammans, in the hither India, and had for its author Budda^a, who was either the same with Shékya, or another propagator of the same religion, long before Sommona Kodom appeared in Siam^b.
- e SOME Balli books do relate, that Sommona Kodom was born of a flower, issuing from the Sommona navel of an infant; who, they say, was the leaf of a tree, in form of an infant biting its toe, Kodom, and swimming on the water, which alone subsisted with the deity. This is the very same original which is ascribed to their god Brámma, by the Indians of Palikatta, on the coast of Choromandel^c: and as the Balli or Palli language seems to be the same with that spoken in the last-mentioned country, and particularly at Palikatta, as may be presumed from the word Pali, which is found in the name; it is probable that the first Sammans, with Sommona Kodom, whose name seems to denote his being one, as hath been already remarked^d, passed from Palikatta into Siam. We are informed by Mr. Loubiere, that the Siameses say Kodom His name, was the proper name of that lawgiver of theirs; and that Sommona is an appellation which signifies, in the Balli, or Palli, language, a Talapoy of the woods^e. Now Sammán, or Sammána, signifies the same thing in the Malabár language; a farther proof that Kodom came from the hither India. The Siameses give him also the name of Pouti Sat, that is lord Pouti^f, or Budda, who was the founder of the Sammán sect: but as the founder of a religion must be more ancient than his successors, who propagate it, and it is probable Kodom left the hither India with the Sammans^g, who were expelled by the Brámmans; this last is a name bestowed on him in commemoration of Pouti, or Budda, the original author of this religion; or because it may have been imagined, that the soul of Budda was revived in him. However that be, the same author tells us, that the Siameses call him also Pra Poute Chaw, which he says literally signifies, the great and excellent lord^h.
- f How wonderful soever the Siameses pretend the birth of Sommona Kodom was, yet they fail His parents, not to give to him both a father and mother. According to some of their Balli books, his father (B) was king of Teve (C) Lanka, that is, of the famous Seylan, or Ceylon. His mother's name was Maba (D) Maria, or the great Mary. But it is found written Mania, as ^a See before, book xiv. ch. 8. p. 335.

^e LOUBIERE, p. 130.
p. 134, & 138.

^b LOUBIERE relat. Siam, p. 134.
^f Ibid. p. 155.

^c Ibid. p. 136.
^g See before, book xiv. ch. 8.

^d See before,
^h LOUBIERE,

(A) Nor indeed do the Chineses, according to the later missionaries; though some of the early ones, thro' mistake perhaps, relate that they do.

(B) He is named Tawfautat in the life of Thevetat, given by Loubiere, p. 145.

(C) Teve seems to be a corruption of Dive, or Div;

by the Portugueses written Diu, which signifies an island: but Lanka is by many of the Indians reckoned only a part of Seylan. Mr. Gervaise makes Sommona Kodom a native of China.

(D) Maba is great in the Malabár language; as Maha Dew, the great god; Maha Rájah, the great Rájah.

often as Maria; which almost proves that Mania should be two distinct words, as Man ya; a because the Siameses confound the n with the r, only at the end of words, or else of syllables followed by a consonant. However, this circumstance has engaged the attention of the missionaries; and perhaps given occasion to the Siameses to believe, that Jesus, the son of Mary, was brother to Sommona Kodom; namely, the wicked Thevetat (E), whom they report to be tormented in hell, with a punishment which participates somewhat of the cross.

His death.

As the Balli books are without either dates or the author's name, they can be of no more authority than any tradition, whose origin is unknownⁱ. Neither does it appear from Mr. Loubiere, that they mention the time when Sommona Kodom lived. All we gather touching this matter, is from one of the Siamese epochas, which commences from the death of that saint^k (as they say) in the year 544 before the Christian æra. But this puts the migration of Kodom into Siam many centuries earlier than the expulsion of the Shammâns, or Sammâns, out of the hither peninsula of the Indies.

His history.

BUT let us quit these uncertainties, to see what the Siameses reported concerning Sommona Kodom, out of their Balli books, to our author; for he could not procure a translation of one. It is said that his charity, not being satisfied with bestowing all his estate in alms, he not only plucked out his eyes, but slew his wife and children, to give the *Talapoy*s to eat^l. To induce the people more strongly to bestow alms on the priests, the contrivers of this story make the founder of their law act against one of the chief precepts of it, as well as all the ties of nature. However that be, Sommona Kodom being freed by those alms-deeds from all the bands of life, devoted himself to fasting, prayer, and the other exercises belonging to the perfect state. But as the performance of such duties are possible only to the *Talapoy*s, he therefore embraced the profession: and having filled up the measure of his good works, immediately acquired all the privileges consequent thereto.

Miraculous power.

FOR instance, he found himself endowed with so great strength, that, in a duel, he vanquished Pra Swane, another man of consummate virtue; who doubting the perfection to which Sommona Kodom was arrived, challenged him to fight. He had likewise the power of doing all sorts of miracles; could make himself as big as he pleased, or so little, as neither to be seen nor felt by any person, though standing on his head: could enjoy the Nireupan, or disappear, by placing another man in his stead: he, of a sudden, and perfectly, understood all things in the world; had a knowledge equally of things past and to come; with a surprising agility of transporting himself from one place to another, in order to preach virtue to all nations.

His disciples.

SOMMONA KODOM had two principal disciples, who on altars are both placed behind him, close together; Pra Mogla on his right hand, and Pra Skaribout on his left. Behind them are placed the officers within Kodom's palace; those without his palace are ranged along the galleries or cloisters of temples. They say Pra Mogla, at the request of the damned, overturned the earth, and took hell-fire in his hand, in order to quench it: but as he could not effect his design, because the fire dried up the rivers, and consumed every-thing it came near, he beseeched Pra Pouti Chaw, or Sommona Kodom, to extinguish it. This Pra Pouti could easily have done, yet would not; saying, men would grow too wicked should he destroy the fear of this punishment^m.

Kills a Man,

FOR all this great perfection to which Sommona Kodom was arrived, yet he happened to kill one of the Man (F), his enemies; as a punishment for which fault, he life exceeded not eight years, at which time he died, by disappearing on a sudden, like a spark which is lost in the air: for one day, as he ate pig's flesh, he was seized with a cholic-fit, which killed him: and it was necessary that he should die by a pig, because the soul of the person whom he had slain was then in the body of a pig.

and disappears.

SOMMONA KODOM having ordered some temples and statues to be consecrated to him, at his death entered into that state of repose which the Siameses express by the word Nireupan, as hath been already mentioned. This is not a place, but a state, of being (G): for, to speak truly, they say that he is no-where, and enjoys not any felicity: that he is without power, and in no condition to do either good or evil to mankind. At the same time they reckon him happy; offer prayers to, and demand of, him whatever they want. Whether their doctrine in this point be inconsistent with itself, or that the Siameses extend their worship beyond their doctrine, it is certain, that, in whatever sense they ascribe power to Sommona Kodom, they ⁱ LOUBIERE, p. 136.

^k Ibid. p. 8, & 64.

^l Ibid. p. 136.

^m Ibid. p. 137, & seq.

(F) Loubiere, in his relation of Siam, p. 145, has inserted the life of Thevetat; which is full of fictions, no less idle than incredible.

(F) The Siamesis write Mar and Man, but always pronounce Man; they call these people Paya Man: and because they suppose this people were enemies to so holy a person, they represent them as a kind of monsters with very large faces, teeth horrible for their size, and serpents on their heads instead of hair. Perhaps these Man may be the Mons of Mendez Pinto.

(G) Elsewhere, the Nireupan seems to be explained the possession of the universe.

- a believe that he has it only over themselves, and that he concerns himself not with other nations, who adore men besides him^a.

As the Siameses report nothing but fables of their Sommona Kodom, and respect him not as Sommona the author of their laws, but as the person who re-established them among mankind; in short, Kodom fictitious, as they have no authentic memoirs concerning him, Loubiere is of opinion, that there never was such a man; but that he is a fictitious person, set up by the *Talapoy*s as a pattern of virtue; and that, in the same manner, they have in Thevetat (whom they make to be his enemy as well as brother), feigned a wicked character, to deter men from vice. They represent both as *Talapoy*s; and suppose that Kodom, in the several transmigrations of his soul, has passed through all things, and been always excellent, whether a pig, an ape, or a king^b.

- b THE Siameses speak of several other perfect men, who were contemporary with Sommona Kodom, Other perfect men as Pra Swane before-mentioned, and Pra Ariasera, of whom they report, that he was forty fathoms high; that his eyes were three and a half broad, and two and a half round; that is, less in circumference than diameter, if, says our author, there was not some mistake in the original^c. The Siameses likewise expect another Sommona Kodom, that is, another miraculous man Another Kodom expected like him, whom they have already named Pra Narotte. They say that this person was foretold by Kodom; that he shall kill his two children for the *Talapoy*s to eat; and that, by this pious charity, he will consummate his virtue. This expectation of a new perfect man, makes them watchful and credulous (as the Jews are with relation to the Messiah): so that they are apt to believe Pra Narotte is come, whenever they hear of any extraordinary person, especially if he happens to be intirely stupid; because that sort of condition nearly resembles the inactivity of the Nireupan. An instance of this kind happened but a few years ago, on occasion of a boy who was born dumb. This child, having been found so stupid that he seemed to have nothing human about him but the shape, a report presently spread throughout Siam, that he was one of the first men who inhabited the country, and would one day become a perfect man. The people, prepossessed with the superstitious expectation of Pra Narotte, immediately flocked from all parts of the kingdom, to adore and make him presents; till the king, fearing the consequences of this folly, put a timely stop to it, by punishing some of the infatuated multitude^d.

- d TACHARD hath related many other matters relative both to the religion of the Siameses, and their god Sommona Kodom; but as his account is full of extravagances, of which enough have been related from Loubiere to give our readers a sample, not to say a surfeit, we shall content ourselves to refer them to that author^e, without expatiating further on these subjects.

^a LOUBIERE, p. 137.

^b Ibid. p. 138.

^c Ibid. p. 137.

^d Ibid. p. 136, & seq.

^e See

TACHARD's first voy. book 4. p. 275, & seqq. Engl. edit.

CHAP. IX.

The government of Siam.

SECTION I.

Degrees of honours, laws, punishments.

- a THERE are several degrees of honour and dignity in Siam, all subordinate to that of Nay, which signifies chief. For as the people, being a militia, are consequently all Titles of honour. Taban, or soldiers, they are divided into bands, each of which has its Nay; whence the Portugueses render the word captain: although the Nay does not lead his men either to war, or six months service; it being enough that he furnish out of his band the number required. The Nays are of different power, according to the number of soldiers in their respective bands: and as the number of soldiers in a band is not fixed, neither are all those of the same band of the same company in the army. The people are not slaves to their Nay: but may become so, by borrowing money of him, and becoming insolvent.

- b THERE are seven degrees of these Nay, distinguished by the number of their bands, which Degrees of alone makes offices and employments important in Siam. These dignities are Pa-ya, Ok-ya, Ok-pa, Ok-louang, Ok-kounne, Ok-meuing, and Ok-pan: but our author could not learn either the signification of the words, which are Balli terms, or number of men assigned to any of these dignities, except in the two last: for Ok-pan (now out of use) signifies chief of a thousand; Ok-meuing chief of ten thousand. Yet Ok is not Siamese; the indigenous term for chief being being Howá, which properly signifies the head; so the king's standard bearer is called Howa-pan, chief of a thousand. Pa-ya is a title often given to princes; whence the Portugueses render it prince; but the king confers it also on the officers of his court; nor bestows it always on the princes of the blood. These degrees of the Nay in Siam are like those in the Great Mogol's court, where the lords are denominated one thousand, two thousand, and so on to ten thousand, as who should say, lords of so many thousand horses^a.

among the officers.

THERE are in Siam six orders of cities, which formerly had a governor according to its rank: thus a very populous place had a Pa-ya for governor; and such as were less populous an Okya. The Portugueses have translated those titles, king, viceroy, duke, marquis, earl, and the like, according to their fancy; and given the title of kingdom to Metak, Tenassarim, Pong-louk, Ligor, and Pipeli; either on account of their having hereditary governors, or because they have been, like Pipeli, the residence of the kings of Siam. The above-mentioned titles are given not only to the governors, but to all the officers of the kingdom, because they are all Nays: but the same title is not always joined to the same office. If a person has two offices, he may have two titles.

No salaries.

WHENEVER the king makes any considerable officer, he gives him a new name; a thing common in other countries of the east. The law of the state is, that all offices should be hereditary, as in Laos; but few families enjoy that privilege long. The least flaw in the patent, fault of the possessor, or caprice of the prince, being grounds to deprive them of it. The selling of offices is not permitted in Siam; nor is there the same temptation to buy as in other kingdoms; since no officer has any salary. The prince, indeed, gives them houses, with arms, a balon, some beasts, slaves, and arable lands: but all return to him, with the office, at the possessor's death. The principal gain of the offices consists in extortions, because there is no justice for the weak: all the officers correspond in plundering the people: and the corruption is greatest in those who should remedy the evil. The trade of presents is public: the lesser officers give to the greater under the name of respect; and a judge is not punished for receiving presents, provided he be not convicted of doing injustice, which is not easy to effect.

Oath of fidelity.

THE form of the oath of fidelity consists in swallowing the water, over which the Talapoy pronounce some imprecations against him who drinks it, in case he fails in the fidelity which he owes to his king: and all persons, of what nation or religion soever, who enter into his majesty's service, are obliged to take it.

Laws.

THE public laws of Siam are written in three volumes. The first, called Pra tam Ra, contains the names, functions, and privileges of all the offices: the second Pra tam Non, is a collection of the constitutions of the ancient kings: the third, Pra Royja Kammanet, contains the constitutions made by the father of him who reigned in our author's time. As an extract of these volumes would have given a thorough knowledge of the constitution of Siam, Loubiere endeavoured to procure a translation, but could not so much as get a copy of them^b.

Judges.

THE whole tribunal of judicature, in the several jurisdictions contained in the provinces, consists properly in a single officer, the chief or president, who is the governor of that department, and even commands the garrisons: so that the most powerful and remote from court may, without difficulty, throw off their obedience; as he of Jor, or Johor, has done.

Governors.

THERE are two sorts of governors, one hereditary, the other by commission. The first, are styled Chaw-meuang, that is, lord of the city, or province. These the kings of Siam have ruined and destroyed, as much as in their power, and substituted the second sort in their stead. To the Chaw-meuang belong several legal rights; as equally to share with the king the rents of arable lands; the profits of all confiscations, and ten per cent. on fines; customs on merchant ships in maritime towns; levy taxes on the frontiers; exercise commerce by their deputies; and appropriate the best fish, when ponds are emptied.

Kind of.

THE commission governors, called Pouran, who are appointed for three years, have the same honours and authority as the hereditary ones, but not the same profit. The Chaw-meuang, or Pouran, is president of a tribunal of judicature, and has under him several officers, according to the different matters which lie before them^c.

IN the metropolis there is no other Chaw-meuang than the king. The functions of governor and judge are divided into two offices: and the subordinate offices, which compose a tribunal, are distributed among the principal officers of state. This tribunal, to which all appeals in the kingdom are made, is held in the king's palace, except when his majesty removes from thence, at which time the president renders justice in a tower, without the royal inclosure. To him alone belongs the determinate voice; yet still there lies an appeal from him to the king. In this case the indictment is examined by the council of the king, who is present only a when the necessity of passing sentence requires it: but, before he pronounces judgment, he enquires into the whole proceedings, and debates the matter well with his council^d.

^a LOUBIERE relat. Siam, p. 78, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 80, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 82, & seqq.

ALL matters in suit may be said to be criminal; as some punishment is inflicted on the party Siamese who is cast, in order to prevent litigation. The prosecution is in writing, by way of the petition, which is delivered by the plaintiff to his Nay, who is one of the officers of the tribunal, and he presents it to the governor, who admits or rejects it, as he sees reason, after hearing the matter debated by the Nay, who act as council for the parties. Every suit ought to end in three days; but some last so many years. They have no attorneys; but the parties either speak themselves, or by some relation, not more distant than a cousin-german. What each says is taken down in writing, by the governor's clerk, who also receives the deeds and titles in pre-b sence of the court, who count the lines, to prevent frauds.

IN accusations, when the evidence is not sufficient, they have recourse to several sorts of Proof by fire, torture; but chiefly to proofs by water and fire. The way by fire is to fill a ditch with faggots, five fathoms in length, and one in breadth. Over the length of this heap (when burnt to coals), both parties are to walk with naked feet; generally each is attended by two men, who press hard, one on each shoulder, to hinder him from passing over too quickly: but this weight they lay, instead of helping to burn him, stifles the action of the fire; so that often they who do not endeavour to go over lightly, and in haste, escape being hurt, which is the sign of innocence. If this ever happens, it may likewise be owing to the hardness of the soles of the feet, which become callous, like horn, by going continually barefoot^e.

c SOMETIMES the proof by fire is performed with oil, or other boiling matter, into which the parties thrust their hands. On this occasion Loubiere relates an odd story. A Frenchman, from whom a Siamese had stolen some tin, was persuaded, for want of proof, to put his hand into the boiling metal, and drew it out almost quite consumed: whilst the Siamese came off without being hurt, and so was acquitted. Yet six months after was, in another suit, convicted of the robbery, wherewith the Frenchman had accused him. A thousand instances of this kind happen; yet the Siameses will not abolish their custom (A). Another method.

THE proof by water is to see who, of the parties, can stay longest under it. Sometimes emetic pills are given them by the Talapoy, accompanied with imprecations; and he who does not cast them up is concluded to be innocent. If both parties escape in trying one kind of proof, they have recourse to another. The king sometimes has them exposed to tigers. If the beast spare one, he is held to be innocent: if neither, both are accounted guilty: but if both are spared, some other proof is tried; or rather they wait till the tigers resolve to devour one or both of them. The resolution with which the Siameses are reported to undergo this kind of death is incredible, in persons who express so little courage in war.

THE provinces often appeal from one to the other, and an inferior to a superior tribunal, where all matters are determined; only in capital cases the power of pronouncing sentence, and ordering the punishment, is reserved solely to the king; who sometimes delegates it to judges extraordinary, sent into the provinces for that purpose. The usual punishment for robbery is to pay double, and sometimes treble, the value of the goods stolen, by equal portions to the judge and the party (B). What is more singular than unjust, every person who wrongfully keeps possession of another's estate, is considered as a robber; so that, when ejected by law, he not only restores the inheritance to its right owner, but pays the full value thereof besides, half to the injured party, and half to the judge. In case the judge hath leave granted him to put the robber to death, he can yet, if he pleases, commute the punishment into a pecuniary mulct^f. Robbery how punished.

FOR rebellion or mutiny, they are ripped up alive; then their entrails being taken out, their carcases are woven up in a twig case, and tied to a stake, for ravenous fowl or dogs to feed on. Our author saw eighteen one morning going to be executed in this manner for mutiny: each was put on a triangular seat, with their necks and hands in wooden fetters, and carried by three slaves, in chains, through the streets to the place of execution. Some were weeping, others joyful, that they were near the end of a miserable life. But they were all very meagre, as if they had been almost starved in prison. Rebellion and mutiny.

FOR treason and murder, elephants are the executioners. The condemned person being made fast to a stake driven into the ground, the elephant is brought, who views him, and goes twice or thrice round him: then, at the command of his keeper, he twines his trunk round the criminal, and pulling up the stake with great violence, tosses both into the air. In their fall down he receives the man upon his teeth; then shaking him off again, claps one of his feet on the carcase, and crushes it flat. However, there may be a mitigation of punish- Treason, murder.

^d LOUBIERE, p. 88. & CHOISY, p. 531.

^e Ibid. p. 85, & seq.

^f Ibid. p. 87.

(A) Why, for the same cause, is not the proof by torture abolished in Flanders, and other countries of Europe?

(B) According to Captain Hamilton, beheading is the common punishment for robbery.

ment, according to the degree of the offence, as appears from the case of our author, who had Capt. Hamilton tried. like to have experienced it through the villainy of his own countryman. In 1719, Captain Hamilton being at Siam, and talking to Oya Sennerat, a man in power, about some alteration made in the English treaty of commerce, happened to say the king was imposed on by those who advised him to it. Now, it seems, that to say the king is capable of being deceived or imposed on is treason there. For those words, therefore, the captain was a few days after summoned to the court of justice by that officer: and as Sennerat's servants were not admitted to be witnesses, the only evidence against him was one Collison, resident for Collet, governor of Fort St. George, who had procured the said alteration. Collison affirmed he heard the captain speak the words in the Hindistán language: but on being asked by the judge, at the instance of Hamilton, if he understood that language? declared he did not: and by that means the accused was cleared, otherwise he must have been cast: the consequence of which would have been, not only the loss of his life on the spot, the executioners being ready, but his ship and cargo would have been confiscated, and the crew become the king's slaves. A shocking story!

From this trial of captain Hamilton we learn two or three circumstances relating to the laws of Siam, which we do not meet with elsewhere; 1. that a stranger is not exempt from the penalty annexed to the transgression of the laws, on account of his being ignorant of them: 2. that the law admits not of a servant's testimony, either for or against his master: 3. that advocates or counsel are allowed the accused.

Capital punishments. SOMETIMES the king exposes, to an enraged bull, the criminal, who is armed with a hollow stick; which, if it does not frighten the beast, cannot hurt him. Sometimes he gives offenders only to be tossed by his elephants, which they do so dextrously, as to throw them from one to the other, receiving them on their trunks or teeth, without hurting them. But the ordinary chastisements are such as have some relation to the crimes. For instance, extortion, or embezzlement of the royal treasure, will be punished by swallowing gold or silver melted: lying, or revealing a secret, by sowing up the mouth, which they will slit to punish silence, where it is not to be kept. Faults in the execution of orders, are corrected by cutting the head with a sword, called there pricking the head, as it were to punish the memory. The sword is used, not only to cut off the head, but to cut the body in two through the middle. The bastonado is sometimes also employed as a punishment of death, and, at best, is often very rigorous.

Princes, how executed. IN putting princes to death, whether a king would rid himself of some relations, or an usurper extinguish the royal race, they take care not to shed the royal blood: but, in such case, they either starve the party, sometimes by diminishing his food a little every day, which gives a lingering death, else by stifling him with rich silks; or rather, by laying him at length on a scarlet cloth, and thrusting a stake of sanders-wood into his stomach.

Lesser punishments. BESIDES the above-mentioned punishments, there are some others less dolorous, but more infamous: as that of exposing a man in some public place, loaded with irons; or else with his neck put in a kind of pillory, called La in Siam, and Kangbe in China. This machine is like a ladder, whose two sides are six feet long: but it has only two steps or rounds, which are placed in the middle; and between these the prisoner's neck is locked. The ends of the sides are fastened to a wall, or posts, by means of cords, so as to slip up and down at pleasure: and the party may either sit down or stand, if the ladder be not too weighty for his shoulders. But sometimes the four ends are fixed upon four posts: in which case he is, as it were, hung by the neck, for he scarce touches the ground with the tips of his toes. Besides this engine, they make use of stocks and manacles. What is most singular, the most infamous punishment is reproachful no longer than it lasts: he who suffers it one day, is as much respected as ever the next, and qualified for the highest employs. Nay, the Siameses boast of the punishments which they receive by the king's order, to whom they pay compliments, and make presents, after the bastonado is over. To be degraded from a higher place to a lower is reckoned no disgrace; although some hang themselves in despair, when reduced, by such a fall, to extreme poverty. As a father answers for the offences committed by his son, so an officer is punished for the faults of another officer, who is subject to his orders. Thus Loubiere saw a Brámyman, who was three years after of the king's council of state, exposed in the pillory before-mentioned, with the head of a malefactor hung about his neck; because the man's crime was imputed to his negligence in not watching over the conduct of a person who was subject to him.

THE worst is, that the least appearance of guilt renders an action criminal; and that to be accused is almost enough to make a man culpable. Hence the disgraces of the principal officers are so frequent, that they could not reckon up all the Barkalons which the king had in thirty-two years of his reign.

^a HAMILTON, E. Ind. vol. ii. p. 80, & seqq.

^b LOUBIERE, p. 104, & seqq.

S E C T. II.

The nobility, and officers of state.

a NOBILITY at Siam goes not by birth, but by riches, and the favour of the prince, Theron who makes them; giving them, as a badge of their honour, an employment and a new name, with the Bouffette, which is a kind of a little gold or silver box to hold their betel. They are generally the sons of the officers of his household whom he thus honours: though sometimes he confers nobility on the meanest of the people; and even strangers who have served him well in any capacity.

Each of the five degrees (A) of nobility among the Siameses has its proper mark of distinction. The Oyas (B), who are the first, possess the highest places of trust, and the principal governments in the kingdom. Their Bouffette is much better wrought than those of other noblemen: and, when they go in the king's train, the gold circle which surrounds their pointed b bonnet, in form of a crown, is decorated with flower-work and roses.

THE second order, or that of the Ok-pras, at present more numerous than the Oyas, because Badges and these latter having much more power, have given umbrage to the king on certain occasions. employments. From the Ok-pras his ambassadors extraordinary are chosen. Their Bouffette, though of gold, is not so beautiful as that of the Oyas; and the gold circle on their cap is adorned only with leaves.

OUT of the Ok-loüans, who make the third rank of nobles, his majesty appoints his ambassadors in ordinary, and lesser governors. Their Bouffette, or Betel box, is only of silver; but it is enchaîné with festons and branches. The circle round their cap is no more than two inches broad, and much less wrought than that of the Ok-pras.

OUT of the Ok-kowns and Ok-munes, who compose the fourth and fifth orders, the king c appoints intendants of his shipping, keepers of his palaces, lieutenants of his prime officers, judges of country towns; in short, the less considerable places at court are filled with them. Their Bouffette and circle are of gold or silver, quite plain, without any ornament.

THERE are many of these lords, who are peculiarly attached to the service of the king's Other distinctions. person. These are called Kang Nay, that is, within the palace. Others who are employed without, to govern affairs, and preserve good order among the people, are named Kang Nok, implying, without the palace. The rank of each nobleman, when he appears in public, is distinguished not only by the badges before-mentioned, but also by the richness of his sword, by his balon, or pleasure-boat, and number of his slaves. The ladies are distinguished by the same kind of tokens; and are allowed by their husbands, who seldom accompany them in their d diversions, a freedom, which they rarely abuse, especially as their lords have power to put them to death, when caught in the fact^a.

ACCORDING to the Abbé De Choisy, there are seven great officers of state in Siam: 1. The Officers of Maha Ommarat, who is next to the king in authority, and sits in his presence. 2. The Chakri, State. who regulates the affairs of war and justice. 3. The Aabowm, who is general by land and sea. 4. The Ok-ya Vang, who superintends the affairs of the palace. 5. The Ok-ya Praklang, called by Europeans Barkalon: this officer has the care of foreign affairs, and the king's magazines. 6. The Ok-ya Pollatop, who has charge of the revenues. 7. Ok-ya Jombarat, who judges all criminal matters. Besides these, is the Ok-ya Pakdi, who is great treasurer. These prime officers, with the king's approbation, dispose of all other posts in the realm, and are responsible for the faults committed in them^b. Let us see what Loubiere says of some of the great e officers.

THE Maha Ommarat (C), otherwise called Maha Obarat, is the chief of the nobility, and Maha Om- first officer of the kingdom. He is, as it were, a viceroy, who represents the king, and per-marat. forms the regal functions in his majesty's absence, as at war. He is at present styled Chaw Pa ya Maha Ommarat^c.

THE Chakri orders all the interior policy of the kingdom. The affairs of all the provinces The Chakri. come before him, as the person to whom the several governors are obliged to render an account, and from whom they receive orders. He is likewise president of the council of state.

THE Kallabom (named, by Choisy, Aabowm), has, by office, the sole management and The Kalla- command of the war and armies: yet the king may name whom else he pleases for general. hom. He has the care of the fortifications, arms, and ammunitions. He likewise issues out all orders which concern military affairs. But, in our author's time, the command of the elephants and horses, which formerly belonged to the Kallabom, and in which the chief forces of the king consists, was in the hands of a different officer. Some report the number of his elephants to be 10,000; but there is no believing people who are apt to tell falsehoods for the honour of their country ^d.

^a GERVASE relat Siam. p. 121, & seqq.^b CHOISY, p. 535.^c LOUBIERE, p. 95.(A) Loubiere, as before observed, makes seven degrees.(B) Called O' yas, by Loubiere.(C) This seems to be a compound of the Indian word Maha, great, and Ommarat, or Ommat, the plural ofthe Arabic Amir, commander, which is used in the court of the Great Mogol; and from hence the Portugueses probably have deduced their term Mandarin, which they confer on all the officers of princes to the east of Hindustan.

Praklang, or Barkalong. PRAKLANG, or Barkalong (D), is compounded of Pra, which signifies whatever is worthy of respectable, and Klang, a magazine. This officer superintends commerce, both foreign and domestic, and is the minister for foreign affairs; because they almost all relate to trade. He likewise receives the revenues of the cities ^e.

Their attendance. ALL the officers belonging to the government residing in the city, whose number generally amounts to 3000, must daily attend in the palace, except they have leave to be absent, under pain of being severely whipped with split rattans, which cut pretty deep in the flesh. The larger the marks are, the greater is reckoned the honour. Nay, the pretty ladies themselves are not exempt from this kind of flagellation, for very small faults; and are so far from concealing them, that some, whom our author saw, exposed their backs to let the welks be seen, seeming to glory in being so much taken notice of by the greatest king on earth ^f.

and examinations. THE king of Siam examines his officers about the Pra tam Ra, which is the book containing their duties; and causes those to be bastinado'd who do not answer exactly: like a school-master, who chastises his boys when they cannot say their lesson.

Ambassadors how received, AN ambassador, throughout the East, is looked on no otherwise than as a king's messenger; not as representing his person: the chief honour is paid to the letters of credence, of which he is the bearer. Thus while the king of France's letter was carried in a balon, or boat of the body, his ambassador extraordinary made his entrance in one of an inferior rank. The Orientals make no account of ambassadors, envoys, or residents, all whom they consider in the same light as messengers; and every one who carries a letter from his sovereign is reputed an ambassador. An evidence that an ambassador is treated like a mere messenger, the king of Siam, in the audience of leave, gives him a recepisse of the letter he has received; and if he returns an answer, he sends it by his own ambassadors, who are never more nor fewer than three ^g.

and treated. EVERY foreign ambassador is lodged and maintained by the king during his stay, and may exercise merchandize: but cannot treat of any affair till he has delivered his credentials, and communicated his original instructions; although this last article was dispensed with in the French. He cannot enter the metropolis, till he goes to audience; nor abide in it, till after the audience of leave; in going from which he departs out of the city, and negotiates nothing more. Therefore, the evening before this last audience, the king demands, whether he hath any thing farther to propose: and, in the audience, asks him, if he is contented. ^d

Their audiences. SOLEMN audiences are always given in the capital, and with great magnificence, especially that of reception: out of the city every audience is accounted private, and performed without ceremony. In all audiences, the custom is for the king to speak first: in those of ceremony he confines himself to a set number of questions; after which the ambassador is ordered to address himself to the Barkalon, upon all the propositions which he has to make. This monarch loves not long speeches: he thinks the longer an ambassador speaks the first time, the less he is honoured. When the king has spoken to the ambassador, he gives him arek and betel; also a vest, which he puts on immediately; and sometimes a sabre, and chain of gold. ^e

Embassies coveted. BUT how lightly soever they set by ambassadors, all the eastern princes reckon it a great honour to receive embassies, and to send the fewest they can themselves: because they look on them as a kind of homage; and for this reason they detain ambassadors at their courts as long as they can ^h.

^d LOUBIERE, p. 89.

^e Ibid. p. 93.

^f HAMILT. vol. ii. p. 178. CHOISY, p. 530.

^g LOUBIERE, p. 103.

^h Ibid. p. 102, & seq.

(D) Hamilton, and some others, write Parkalong, as if the same with Parka longa; in imitation of which the Portuguese seem to have corrupted Praklang.

S E C T. III.

Of the king, his authority, forces, revenues, and commerce.

King's name concealed. THE kings of Siam are, by their authority, perfectly despotic. It is not easy to know their name, which is superstitiously concealed, lest any enchantment should be made on it. Others report, that their kings have no name till after their death; and that it is given by their successors ^a. Choisy says none dare pronounce the name of the king ^b.

^a LOUBIERE, p. 101.

^b CHOISY, voy Siam, p. 532.

a THE king of Siam, besides his kindred to the heavenly luminaries, is a god on earth (A), His title. in whose court are to be found justice, mercy, and benevolence to mankind; with a train of such-like extravagancies, which conclude in declaring him king of the white elephant: a title, however, which the king of Pegu, who is equally fond of such lofty flourishes, disputes with him^c.

SPEAKING of the king, the Siameses style him Pra Maba Krassat: Pra signifies respectable, or reverend; Maba great; and Krassat living: the Portugueses, mistaking the word Pra for God, say they call him the great living God: the words are of the Balli, which is the learned language, not always well understood by themselves^d. As the same Europeans have given the title of king to the governors of certain places, who held them by hereditary right, as b Tenasserim, Porcelouk, Pipeli, and the like; so they have conferred on the king the title of emperor, according to the notion of the Spaniards, who think that style due to kings who have other kings for their vassals: and hence some kings of Castile have been termed emperors^e.

THE kings are fond to be thought men of parts and address. When his wives and concubines would flatter him most agreeably, they tell him, not that he is an hero, or the greatest general in the world; but that he is more politic and witty than all the princes he has had to do with^f.

THE kings of Siam marry, at least often, their own sisters; such was the wife of the king His women. who reigned in Loubiere's time. His other wives, who are in general called Chaw Vang, or ladies of the palace, pay obedience to her as their sovereign; who judges and chastises them c when they do amiss, for there is none else to do it. They are continually taking up ladies for the service of the Vang, or to be the king's concubines. But as the Siameses are unwilling to part with their daughters, they redeem them with money as long as they can. The officers employed in this business frequently carry away virgins, with a view only that they may be ransomed by their parents. If they have many wives in Siam, it is more for conveniency than debauchery: and the king who reigned in the time of the French embassies, thro' parsimony, had not more than eight or ten.

THE queen has her elephants and balons, with some officers to take care of, and attend, her, The queen. when she goes abroad: but is seen of none, excepting her women and eunuchs: for, on that occasion, she goes out in a chair made up with curtains, so as to see and not be seen. The d people get out the way as she passes, or turn their back, by prostrating themselves. The queen has likewise her magazine, her ships, and her treasures. She likewise trades as well as the king; and has her share both of the domestic and foreign commerce.

THE eldest son of the queen ought always to succeed by the law: but as the older cannot The succession. brook to prostrate themselves to the younger, the law is often set aside by force, and sometimes the king leaves the crown to the son of a favourite concubine. As for daughters, they succeed not to the throne, being scarcely looked upon as free^g.

THE king's guards are of several sorts. The first are called painted arms, of whom there King's guards. may be about 600 in the palace. These watch the king's person; are his executioners; and indeed are all the foot-guard which he hath: but, on days of ceremony, he causes his slaves c to be armed for shew. Anciently the king had a Japanese guard, consisting of 600 men: but as these few foreigners were able to make the kingdom tremble when they pleased, the father of him who reigned when Loubiere was in Siam, after he had made use of them to invade the throne, found a way to get rid of them, more by policy than force.

THE king's horse-guard is composed of men from Laos, and another neighbouring country, whose chief city is called Meen, who serve him by six months. Besides this, he has another foreign horse-guard, of 130 gentlemen: namely, two companies, each consisting of thirty Moors of Hindústán: these are of an excellent countenance, but reckoned cowards. One company of twenty Chinese Tartars, and two of Râjapouts, or Pagan Indians, each containing twenty-five men. These two nations are famous for their courage. The king, besides fur- f nishing these with horses and arms, pays each Moor about 540 livres a year, and gives him a red stuff vest. The captain of each company has 840 livres, with a scarlet vest. The Râjapouts are maintained at the same rate: but each Tartar costs him no more than 45 livres a year, and their captain 112^h.

THE true officers of the king's chamber are women; for none else have admittance there. Attended by They make his bed, and dress him; prepare his victuals, and attend him at table: nor ever women. stir out, but with his majesty, who is said to have only eight or ten eunuchs in his service, both white and blackⁱ.

^c HAMILT. new account of E. Indies, vol. ii. p. 176.

^d LOUBIERE, p. 7.

^e Ibid. p. 80.

^f Ibid. p. 109.

^g Ibid. p. 101.

^h Ibid. p. 96, & seq. CHOISY, p. 527.

ⁱ LOUBIERE,

p. 100.

(A) Pinto says, p. 285 of his voyages, that this king's sovereign title is Pra Chaw Salew, that is, a holy member of God.

Procession by land.

HIS majesty bestows his annual blessing on his people in September, when he passes through a the city, with a numerous train of elephants, dressed in their finest trappings, and accompanied with musical instruments. Among them is the white elephant (B), which yet is only of a cream colour; and our author had seen several at Bangaria, a village near Jonkseylin, as white as he. All the while this procession lasts, the people lie prostrate, till the king is passed by; after which they may look upon his back-parts or sides.

Another by water.

IN the month of November he also shews himself on the river, in a balon or barge, thirty or forty yards long, about two broad, and two feet deep: with a throne placed in the middle, seven feet high, covered with a rich canopy, where he sits; his greatest lords resting underneath. He is rowed or paddled forward by fifty or sixty men, in carnation-coloured vests, with fine caps or turbans on their heads. There are above 1000 other barges to wait on his majesty, besides several thousand common balons; so that, for five or six miles, the river is covered with boats, except near the king's barge, which has half a mile of the river left clear for it to move in. About four or five in the evening, he goes in his barge to a temple, about three miles above the city, on the opposite side of the water, where the priests pray for him, and present him with two yards and a half of cotton cloth; which must be both spun and woven the same day that his majesty comes to receive it. After sun-set he embarks again (leaving some royal bounty behind), and returns in state to his palace. His reason for honouring the river and his people at this time of the year, is to forbid the water to rise above such a number of inches in height, or to continue increasing above such a number of days as he appoints: yet sometimes it disobeys his royal commands ^k.

Lives in distrust.

THE distrust in which the king of Siam lives appears from the precautions which he takes to prevent secret caballing among the great men; to keep the gates of their palace shut; to permit no armed person to enter; and to disarm their own guards. A gun, fired by accident, or otherwise, near enough to the palace for the king to hear it, is a capital crime ^l.

No courtier dare appear before the king, without being sent for: this is a law made for the prince's security. When they meet, they must speak loud to be heard, and in presence of a third person; so jealous are those monarchs. In short, every man in Siam is an informer, and obliged to discover whatever he hears said in the least regarding the king, under pain of death. However, the king is not over hasty in giving credit: he commonly requires two witnesses; and, for better discovering the truth, has his secret spies every-where. These precautions are a great check to caballing; but if the kings be unactive or negligent, no law secures them ^m. By these means also the king seems to be in little danger of being deceived; and indeed to say the king may be deceived or imposed on, is rank treason, as hath been before observed.

Yet easily deceived.

FOR all this, it is easy to deceive him; for all informers are dishonest, and the Indian princes love to be flattered, nor care to hear what may displease them. Thus the courtiers study to conceal their true sentiments from the king, and he endeavours to conceal his opinion from them. They will not tell him ill news, or that he wants any-thing, but let them come to his knowledge by degrees; they will not tell him that he must alter what he has done amiss, but will persuade him to do it better some other way. By this equivocal way of proposing things to him, they avoid the danger of giving bad counsel, or, which is considered in much the same light, advice which is not attended with good success ⁿ.

Rigour to his brothers.

THE jealousy of these kings makes them cruel to their own brethren, as in other countries of Asia: they maim them several ways, deprive them of sight, or weaken it by fire; lame them by dislocation of their joints, render them stupid by liquors given them to drink, and the like.

The people easy.

AFTER all, the evils of this kind of government extend properly no farther than the nobility, or officers of the crown, and do not reach the people, who enjoy liberty, and other pleasures of life, which their superiors are strangers to; nor are they so liable to be oppressed by the great men as in many other countries, since the ways of carrying complaints to the throne are all open; so that they can seldom fail of coming to the king's knowledge, notwithstanding the combined artifices of the ministers to prevent them.

^k HAMILTON, ubi supra, p. 176, & seq.

^l LOUBIERE, p. 105.

^m Ibid. p. 103.

ⁿ Ibid.

(B) The Siameses have a great veneration for elephants, especially white elephants. The king always keeps one in his palace. That which Mr. De Chaumont saw being dead, it was reported that another was born the 9th of December 1697, in the woods, a little before Loubiere's departure; so that he saw none. They are not white, but of a flesh-colour: whence Van Uliet calls it the white and red elephant. The Siameses say, that these rare animals are found only in the woods of their country; and believe the soul of some prince is lodged in them. Loubiere, p. 58. Tachard saw, a league from Siam, a little white elephant, designed for the successor of him who is in the palace, near 300 years old, as they report. This little white elephant is not much bigger than an ox. First voyage, p. 197. Chaumont, who saw the first, says nothing of its age. It died, before Loubiere's arrival, two years after.

HOWEVER, as these absolute monarchs oppress the subjects with taxes, as well as tyrannize their reigns over the nobles, who indeed are all their creatutes, they seldom have the love of either; so treacherous that, if attacked by an invader or a rebel, none are zealous in their defence, as they consider their condition would be no worse under one than the other. As the whole power is united in the prince, instead of being distributed among the great officers and magistrates, he has none, in case of need, who are able to support him. His chief dependence for his authority seems to lie in his seal and great treasure; the first he intrusts to none: but as both are liable to be seized, whoever gets either in his possession may easily dethrone the reigning princeⁿ.

THE king of Siam has no other troops in pay than his foreign guard. His armies are composed out of the militia, who are obliged to six months service; and thus his garrisons are The king's supplied by people, who serve or relieve one another in turn. As they have no horses, the king not being possessed of above 2000 at most, their armies consist only in elephants and infantry, naked and ill-armed. Their order of battle and encampment is thus. They range themselves in three lines, each composed of three great square battalions: the king, or general, has his post in the middle battalion; and every chieftain of a battalion keeps in the middle of that which he commands. If the nine battalions are too big, each of them is divided into nine less^o.

THE army being thus ranged, every one of the nine battalions has sixteen male elephants in the rear: these are called elephants of war, and each carries his particular standard, and is accompanied with two female elephants; both kinds are mounted, each with three armed men. His elephants. There are some elephants also for carrying baggage. They rely much on elephants in battle, altho' this animal, for want of bit or bridle, cannot be securely governed; and he frequently turns on his own master when wounded. He likewise dreads fire to such a degree, that, although trained to stand it, he is scarcely ever brought to perform that service. The battle begins with Siamese way discharging the artillery, of which they have but little; and in case those instruments of death of fighting. do not put an end to it, they then advance within reach of their small shot and arrows, but never come to a close engagement. Besides, as their religion inspires them with horror of blood, they, to avoid killing, do not shoot directly at one another, but higher; yet so as that the shot may fall among the enemy, and oblige them to retreat; which one party fails not long to do, when they perceive it to rain darts or bullets. Indeed, when they find themselves pursued, d they shoot lower, in order to stop their adversaries; who, if slain, are then thought to be guilty of their own death, by approaching too near: for the order which the king gives his troops is, Kill not, that is, unless their own safety makes it absolutely necessary. As for sieges, they are wholly incapable of carrying them on, excepting by corruption, or famine; being afraid to attack a place ever so little fortified.

IN short, the armies of Siam, and indeed all the neighbouring countries who hold the Avoid shed- metempsychosis, busy themselves only in making slaves: and the usual way among them of ding of blood. making war, is to invade each other's dominions in different parts at the same time, and carry off whole villages into captivity. One Cyprian, a Frenchman of Provence, who served as gunner in an expedition against the Chaw Meuang, or, if you will, king of Singor, on the e western coast of the gulf of Siam (C); having received orders not to shoot directly upon the enemy, imagined that the general intended to betray his master; and, wearied with seeing the Bravery of a two armies so long in fight without coming to blows, resolved to seize the Frenchman. Chaw Meuang in his tent. This he effected, by venturing alone one night into the enemy's camp, and so put an end to a war, which had subsisted in that manner for twenty years. The king intended to have rewarded this piece of service with a quantity of sapan-wood: but, by some intrigue of the court, the brave Frenchman got nothing, and retired to Surât; where he put himself in the company's service^p.

AFTER all, this way of making war is well suited to the timorous disposition of the Siameses: Siameses not for the sight of a naked sword is sufficient to put a hundred of them to flight; and there needs fit for war. only the resolute tone of an European, who wears a sword by his side, or a cane in his hand, to make them forget the most express orders of their superiors (D). In short, these people are destitute of courage; and indeed the same may be said not only of all the Indians in general, but of all those born in the Indies, though of European parents, of which the Portugueses are an instance. Hence Loubiere supposes, that as they were subdued by a society of Dutch merchants from Europe, so if other Europeans went to seek out the Dutch, born in their Indian ⁿ LOUBIERE, p. 106, & seqq.^o Ibid. p. 91, & seq.^p Ibid. p. 90.(C) Towards Patana, some leagues to the north of it.(D) The Dutch have, from experience of the Indians, thought fit to imitate the Portugueses, in treating them with much haughtiness and little confidence; because, being bred up in a spirit of servility, they are humbleto those who behave loftily, and insolent to such as use them gently. The king of Siam says, his subjects are of the temper of apes, who tremble so long as one holds the end of their chain, but disown their master when the chain is loosed. Loubiere, p. 110.

settlements, they would not be found more valorous. According to that author, excessive a hot countries are not fit to nourish courage, which is the produce of temperate and hardy climates. But besides the torrid zone, and phlegmatic aliments, the Siamefe have a despot government to cow their spirits and effeminate them.

No fortified places.

THERE are no places in Siam which may properly be said to be fortified; for the castles they have, which are small and ugly, would scarce sustain the first shock of European soldiers. The reason they gave our author for not having places well-fortified was, that, in case they should lose them, they should not be able to retake them; nor, if they had a mind to make fortifications, could they tell how to go about them. The king, some few years before Louliere's embassy, wanting to have a wooden fort built on the frontiers of Pegu, could pitch on no better an architect than brother Rene Charbonneau, in the service of foreign missions, b who knew little or nothing of the matter: but his Siamefe majesty would be obeyed; and and rewarded his work, such as it was, with the government of Jonsalam, which he discharged for three or four years with great approbation. The French afterwards built forts at Bankok.

King's naval power.

As to the king's naval power, he is yet more feeble by sea than land. He, with much ado, has become master of five or six very small ships, which he employs both in merchandize and at war, as privateers, when occasion requires: but the officers and seamen, in whom he confides, are foreigners. These were English and Portugueses, till of late that he had made use of some French. In his naval expeditions he proposes only to make reprisals on such of his neighbours who injure him in trade; and his corsairs have the same orders, not to kill, as his land forces: c they are however to do their best to take prizes, in which they go to work by artifice and surprise. Besides these ships of double character, his majesty has fifty or sixty gallies, which are no better than boats for making bridges of. They have wooden anchors, and carry fifty or sixty men to row and fight, which they do by turns. There is only one to an oar, who is obliged to row standing; the oar being so short, for lightness sake, that if not held perpendicularly, it would not touch the water. These gallies only coast it along the gulf of Siam ¹.

Ships of war and gallies.

His revenues.

THE king of Siam's revenues are of two sorts; those of the cities, and those of the country: which are all reduced to the following heads, or duties. 1. On cultivated lands. By the law, whoever ploughed not, paid nothing; but, to promote agriculture, the king who reigned in our author's time, exacted the duty from those who neglected cultivation. From the same principle he gave lands and cattle to strangers, who were inclined to settle in his dominions. 2. d On balons, or boats. 3. On all commodities imported or exported; and on ships, according to their capacity. 4. On arak, or rice brandy, or rather on the still-head; the sellers likewise, both by wholesale and retale, pay a duty for licence. 5. On fruit-trees, viz. the durion, betel, arekier, the coco, orange, mango, mangoustanier, and pimentier; but there is no duty laid on pepper, in order to encourage planting it. 6. Confiscations and fines. 7. The six months service, which is often bought off with money or goods.

His demesnes.

BESIDES the above-mentioned duties, the king has, in several parts of his dominions, gardens and lands, which may be considered as his demesne. The produce goes to maintain his slaves and cattle which are upon those places, and the surplus he sells. The presents which this prince receives may be considered as a casual revenue; as well as the legacies which his e officers bequeath him at their death, or which he takes from their successors. In a word, the extraordinary duties which he exacts from his subjects on several occasions, as for the maintenance of ambassadors, and building of public works, forts, and the like.

Trade of Siam, engrossed by him.

THE king of Siam has undertaken to enlarge his revenue by commerce, which he carries on both with his subjects and strangers. He has, in effect, engrossed trade wholly to himself; so that he may be called the only merchant in his dominions: nor is he content with selling by wholesale, but has shops in the markets for retailing his goods. The chief of these is cotton cloth, which he sends into his provincial magazines. His predecessors used to send them thither only once in ten years; so that when they were sold off, his subjects had liberty to trade for the rest of the term: but now he continually furnishes them himself; and when f his magazines are overstocked, obliges the people to cloath their children before the accustomed age. Before the Dutch found the way into Laos and the adjacent countries, the king of Siam had the linen trade with them in his own hands. The other commodities which he vends are kalin, or tin, ivory, saltpetre, lead, sapan-wood, arek, and skins, which last he sells, by treaty, to the Dutch only. Powder, sulphur, and arms, which are prohibited goods, may yet be purchased at his magazines. However, many of these things are clandestinely sold by the people to the Hollanders.

THE commodities in which his subjects are permitted to trade are rice, fish, salt, brown sugar, sugar-candy, ambergrise, wax, the gum with which varnish is made, mother-of-pearl, edible birds nests, gum-gutte, incense, oil, coco, cotton, cinnamon, nenuphar, some- g what different from the French, cassia, dates, and several other kinds of produce.

¹ LOUBIERE, p. 90, & seq.

- a To conclude, it is said that the king's revenue at present amounts to 600,000 crowns; whereas formerly it did not exceed (E) 317,000^r.

^r LOUBIERE, p. 93, & seqq. CHOISY, p. 527.

(E) Pinto says, that in his time, about 1546, the settled revenue was twelve millions of gold, besides other accessories, which amounted to as much more. Pinto's voyage, p. 278.

CHAP. X.

The history of Siam.

SECT. I.

Its ancient kings, and modern state; wars with Chiamay and Pegu; the king poisoned by his queen in 1545.

- b THE Siamese history is full of fables, and the books thereof very scarce: some report this to be owing to their affecting to conceal their affairs: but our author Loubiere doubts the truth of this; since they have no more reason to be cautious of publishing their history than the Chineses, who do not scruple it. However that be, they who have been able to read their book affirm, that it ascends not very high, with any character of truth. The Siameses give a very dry and insipid account of their kings, and the original of their monarchy, as follows.

- c THEIR first king, they say, was named Pra Poat-bonne Sourittep-pennaratui sonanne and very im- bopitra. The chief place where he kept his court was called Chay Pappé Mahanakon (A), and he began his reign in the year 1300, according to their epocha, which begins from the death of Sommona Kodom (B), as they pretend; although Loubiere thinks it has quite another foundation. Ten other kings succeeded; the last of whom, named Ipoja Sanne Thora Thesma Teperat, removed his royal seat to Tasoo Nakora Louang, a city built by himself. The twelfth king after Ipoja Sanne, whose name was Pra Poa Noome Tbele Seri, obliged all his people, in the year 1731, to follow him to Lokontay (C), from whence this prince removed his seat to the city of Pipeli; which he built towards the western mouth of the Menâm. Four kings more succeeded him; the last of whom, Rhamatilondi, began to build the city of Siyutbia, or Siam, in 1894, and there fixed his court. The king, who was on the throne in 1619, was the twenty-fifth from Rhamatilondi; so that they then reckoned fifty-two kings in the space of 934 yeas, but not all of the same blood^a.

- d THIS is all we can yet learn of the Siamese history, from those who have visited the country, till about the middle of the sixteenth century, when Siam began to be known on account of its wars with Pegu, and other neighbouring countries. The first author who speaks of these affairs is Mendez Pinto, who, in many things, may be suspected; but, for want of a better, we must follow him. According to this traveller, about the year 1546, the king of Siam (whose name is not mentioned) kept his court in the city of Odiaa, or Siyutbia, that is, Siam.
There he received intelligence, that the king of Chiammay, allied with the Timokoubos, Labos, and Gueos, all independent and wealthy people, who possessed the parts north-eastward above Kapimper and Passiloko (D), had besieged the town of Quiterwam; where he had slain 30,000 men, and, among the rest, Oya Kapimper, governor and lieutenant-general of all that province.

e THE king of Siam, alarmed at this news, immediately crossed the river, and encamping in tents, by proclamation ordered all in the city, who were able to bear arms, to attend him within twelve days, under pain of being buried alive, and other punishments, equally grievous.
This order included not only the natives, but foreigners, who were obliged to comply with it, or quit the kingdom in three days. To the Portugueses his majesty sent a formal message, desiring them to accompany him, as the only people he could trust to guard his person, with great promises of rewards, and liberty to build churches in his kingdom. This encourage-

^a LOUBIERE relat. Siam, p. 8.

(A) The situation of this place, and the following, was unknown to our author.

(B) In the year 544 before Christ.

(C) A city seated on a river, which descends from the mountains of Laos, and falls into the Menâm; a little above Pitsanculuk, or Porfelouk; from which Lokontay is forty or fifty leagues distant.

(D) Possibly Kampirpet and Porfelouk, two cities of Siam. See the description of Siam.

ment so prevailed on them, that, out of 130, which was their number, 120 agreed to go to the war, among whom was our author. At the end of twelve days the long set forward, with an army of 400,000 men, whereof 70,000 were strangers. They embarked all in 300 servos, lauleas, and jangas; so that, in nine days, they arrived at Suropifem; a frontier town, twelve or thirteen leagues from Quitervan; which the enemy had besieged. There he stayed seven days, waiting for 4000 elephants, which marched by land. Mean time he was informed that the place was greatly pressed by the enemy, who had on the river 2000 vessels, with an army of 300,000 men by land, whereof 40,000 were horse; but no elephants.

The enemy defeated.

THE king, on this advice, began his march from Suropifem, his army being increased to 500,000 soldiers. At the end of three days, proceeding not above four or five leagues each, they arrived at the valley of Siputay, one league and an half from the place where the enemy lay encamped. There the forces, with the elephants, being ranged in line of battle, by the three quarter-masters, two of whom were Turks, and the third a Portuguese, named Dominigos de Seixas, they advanced towards Quitervan, where they arrived before sun-rise. The enemy, on their approach, came forward to meet them, and, with their horse, which was the vanguard, fell furiously on the king of Siam's rear, composed of 60,000 foot, with so much fury, that they defeated them in less than fifteen minutes, with the loss of three princes slain on the spot. The king perceiving his men routed, changed the order of the fight, which he had before resolved on, and fell on the enemy with his whole army at once. This was done with such impetuosity, that they were defeated in less than half an hour, by means of the elephants sustained by the harquebusiers, and the field-pieces: the horse, in which their principal strength consisted, being thus routed, the rest of their forces began instantly to retreat. The Siamejes pursued them to the river-side; but there the enemy forming a new body of 100,000 men, supported by their ships, the king of Siam durst not attack them; and was well pleased to find that they took advantage of night to retire along the river side^b.

Quibem kingdom made tributary.

THE king of Siam lost in this battle 50,000 men, but of no great account; and the enemy, 130,000. After he had fortified the city, and put it in a good posture of defence, he was persuaded by his lords to make war on the kingdom of Quibem, fifteen leagues to the north, whose queen had given passage through her country to the forces of Chiammay. Pursuant to this advice, he, with an army of 400,000 men, besieged Fumbakor, a town of Quibem; and having quickly taken it, put all the inhabitants to the sword. From thence he continued his voyage to Guitor, the capital of the kingdom, where the queen governed as regent, during the minority of her son, a youth of but nine years of age. The queen finding herself too feeble to hold out long against so great a power, after a short siege sued for peace, and agreed to pay him annually 5000 turmes of silver, equal to 60,000 Portuguese ducats, advancing five years tribute in hand. Besides this, the young prince did him homage as his vassal, and was carried by the king to his capital Siam.

The king invades Chiammay.

THE siege being hereupon raised, the army marched north-eastward, to the town of Tayfiran; where news was brought, that the king of Chiammay was fallen off from the confederates. Mean time the Siamese monarch, who had advanced six days march into the enemy's territories, sacked all the places which came in his way, without sparing the life of any male inhabitant. At length he arrived at the lake of Sinjipamor, commonly called Chiammay (E), where he stayed twenty-six days. During that time he took twelve places of consequence, surrounded with ditches and bulwarks, after the Portuguese fashion, all of brick and mortar: for, in that country, they do not build with lime and stone; neither had they any artillery, excepting some falconets, and brass muskets. But as winter began to approach, and it was very rainy weather, the king, who likewise found himself much indisposed, returned to Quitirvan, where he rested three-and-twenty days; in which time he made an end of fortifying that city with strong walls, and wide ditches. After this, he embarked his army in the vessels which brought him thither, and so returned to his capital, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy by the people^c.

Poisoned by his queen.

BUT this joy was soon changed into sorrow: for, during the six months in which the king of Siam had been absent, the queen had been intimate with an inferior officer of the household; and finding herself four months gone with child by him, to prevent a discovery, poisoned her husband with a mess of milk, which carried him off in five days. During this short space of time the king made his will, in which he settled the most important affairs of the state. Among the rest he acquitted himself of the obligation he lay under to the foreigners, who had served him in the war of Chiammay; in particular, he ordered that the Portuguese, who had been his guard during that expedition, should receive half a year's tribute of Guibem; that

^b PINTO voy. p. 270, & seqq.

^c Ibid. p. 271, & seq.

(E) Of this lake, Loubiere, after much enquiry, could find no tidings. And indeed all which is said relating to this expedition to Chiammay (the same probably with Takamay, the capital of Takomey), is very likely a fiction.

a their merchandizes should be custom-free for three years: and that their priests should be allowed to preach their law through his dominions: besides other privileges of an inferior nature. His majesty likewise directed, that his eldest son should be proclaimed king before his death; which was immediately put in execution. After the Oyas, Konbulis, and Monteos (F), the three prime dignities in the kingdom, had taken the oath of allegiance to the young prince, they shewed him from a window to all the people; and setting a rich crown of gold, in form of a mitre, upon his head, put a sword in his right hand, and a pair of scales in his left; a custom which, says our author, they always observe on such an occasion.

b THEN Oya Passiloko, who was the greatest lord in the kingdom, falling on his knees before the new king, made a speech, in which he exhorted him to govern his people justly, under pain of being punished by God, in the infernal regions. To which the young monarch weeping answered, Sham Shaimpom, or Amen; and Mastinau, I promise; which is a kind of coronation oath. This set all the people a weeping. After which came a Talagrepo, or priest of the first dignity, above 100 years old, and, prostrating himself at the prince's feet, tendered him an oath, upon a golden bason full of rice. This done, they put him into the bason, after they had created him thus a-new: for time would not allow them to hold him there any longer, in regard his father was at the point of death; and, in effect, he died the next morning, in presence of the greater part of the grandees^d.

c THE death of this prince caused an universal mourning, for he was said to be endowed with many virtues: he was charitable to the poor and distressed; liberal to those who served him well, or had merit; compassionate, and merciful: but, at the same time, as he was a great lover of justice, he punished wicked men according to their deserts. In short, if what the people said of him in their lamentations was true, there never was a better king on earth. Pinto relates two or three instances of his goodness, which fell within his own knowledge. The first is, that Pedro de Faria, governor of Malakka, having, by order of John III. king of Portugal, sent an ambassador to Siam, in the year 1540, to redeem Dominigos de Seixas before-mentioned, and sixteen Portugueses more, the king not only granted his request, but bestowed on them a thousand turmes of silver, amounting to 12,000 ducats; apologizing, at the same time, for the smallness of the present. Seixas was, at that time, general of the frontier, and resided at the town of Goutaleu, where he had 30,000 foot and 5000 horse under his command; with a pension of 18,000 ducats per annum. But the king of Portugal having occasion for his service in Europe, the king of Siam generously parted with him: for which favour the ambassador, Don Francisco de Coasto, made three prostrations before his Siamite majesty, with his head bowed to the ground. A custom observed towards this king, who was more absolute than others.

d IN 1545 he ordered a Portuguese ship, which had been wrecked in the port of Charis, five leagues from Lugor, to be restored, with seventy-four men and boys: and the same year did another piece of public justice: for Siam having been invaded on the Passilikon's side, by the king of Tuparahos, who, having sacked several lesser places, resolved to attack Shivau and Lautor. Hereupon he sent some of his colonels all over the kingdom, to levy men, with strict orders not to excuse any under threescore years of age, excepting such as were maimed, or otherwise unable to bear arms. One of these officers, named Quiay Raudiva, who was appointed to raise recruits at Blancha (or, as it is afterwards written, Bancha), disregarding his prince's order, took bribes of the rich inhabitants, amounting to 5000 turmes, and press'd 3000 of the poorer sort to go to the war. The king, on their arrival, being surpris'd at the wretched figure they made, enquired into the cause; and the whole affair having been discovered to him by the people themselves, he ordered five turmes of melted silver to be poured down the colonel's throat, uttering, at the same time, some reproachful expressions, suitable to the occasion; then sending to his house for the turmes which he had received at Bancha, he distributed them among the old and impotent recruits, whom he sent home again. As for those who had paid that sum, to be excused from going to the war, he ordered them to be attired like women, and banished to the island of Pulbo (or Pulo) Katon: not content with this, he confiscated their estates, and divided them among those who had served well in that expedition. When at Lautor, perceiving one of the Portugueses to behave ill, in recovering the principal fort belonging to that place, he sent him to Odia (or Siam), and forbade him to assume the name of a Portuguese, on pain of being banished in the same disgraceful dress. To the rest of his countrymen he gave treble pay, with other bounties^e.

f SOME time after the king's death, all the priests of the capital city, to the number of 20,000, in concert with the principal men of the kingdom, having settled the ceremonies relating to the funeral, a mighty pile was erected, composed of sandal, kalamba, aloes, and ^d PINTO, p. 272, & seq.

^e Ibid. p. 273, & seq.

(F) These two last titles look suspicious, as we find them not in other authors; and so indeed does the whole ceremony.

benjamin, on which the body of the king was laid, and consumed by fire. The royal ashes, a inclosed in a silver shrine, were put on board a laulea, richly equipped, which was accompanied by forty seroos full of Talagrepos, besides a great number of smaller vessels filled with people. These were followed by a hundred small barks, laden with divers images, in the form of adders, toads, lions, elephants, bucks, vulturs, geese, and other animals, all carved to the life. In another great ship was the king of thole idols, called the gluttonous serpent of the profound pit of the house of smoke. This monster, in shape of an adder, was as thick in circumference as a hoghead, and twisted in nine circles; so that, extended, it measured an hundred spans in length. Its neck stood erect; and out of its eyes, throat, and breast, issued flames of artificial fire, dreadful to behold. On a stage, three fathoms high, and richly gilt, stood a beautiful boy, four or five years old; covered over with pearls, and b bracelets of precious stones. He had wings, with hair of fine gold; and held in his hand a cutlace, representing an angel sent from God, to imprison thole demons, that they should not steal away the king's soul, before it arrived at the mansion of glory, prepared for it above, to reward his good works done in this life.

with great pomp.

ALL the above-mentioned vessels stopt at a temple called Quiay Poutor, where the silver shrine being placed, fire was put to the barks, which, being filled with pitch, and other combustible matter, in an hour's time were all consumed, with the images in them: during which time there was a horrible din, made by the shouts of the people, mixt with the firing of cannon and small arms, beating of drums, ringing of bells, blowing of horns, and the like noises. Several other expensive ceremonies were performed; after which the people returned c to their houses, where they remained, with their doors and windows shut, for ten days: so that none were seen in the streets, excepting some poor, who begged alms in the night, with great lamentation. When the ten days were expired, the temples were adorned with standards, banners, and rich hangings; while horsemen, clad in white damask, rode thro' the city, and, at the sound of music, invited the people to come forth, and rejoice in the new king, whom God had sent them. At this invitation the inhabitants came forth, and went to the temple of Quiay Tanarel, that is, the God of the joyful; where the better sort offered perfumes, and the poorer fruits, hens, and rice, for the support of the priests. The same day the new king shewed himself, in a progress through the city; and as he was but nine years old, the queen mother was constituted regent, during his minority, by the twenty- d four Brakalons (G) of the government.

Young king seized.

THINGS went on peaceably for four months and a half; when the queen, being delivered of a son whom she had by the purveyor, gave great scandal to the whole kingdom. For all this, she resolved to marry the father of him, with whom she was much enamoured; and even to destroy the king, to make way for the bastard to inherit the throne. To effect her wicked purpose, she desired of the privy-council a guard for the person of the king, under pretence of his greater security; which having obtained, she, to the 600 kauchins (H) and Liqueos, which was the ordinary guard of her house, added 2000 foot, and 500 horse, over whom she placed Fileubakus, a kinsman of her gallant. Thus strengthened with forces, she began to take revenge on the grandees, who she knew despised her. She first caused to be seized two deputies of the government, under pretence that they held a secret correspon- e dence with the king of Chiammay, and had promised to give him a passage through their lands into the kingdom. They were both executed by her order; and their estates being confiscated, one part was given to her favourite purveyor, and the other to a brother-in-law of his, who had been originally a smith. But as these lords were put to death hastily, and without any proof, the rest of the nobility murmured greatly, representing to her majesty the personal merits of the parties, and their royal descent. These remonstrances she was so far from giving heed to, that soon after, in a full council, on pretence of indisposition, she renounced the regency, and conferred it on Uquumchineraa, who managed affairs at pleasure, and filled all places of importance with his creatures. The queen had now an opportunity of executing all her designs; so that, in eight months time, she caused most of the great f men in the kingdom to be put to death; and confiscating their lands and effects, distributed them among such as she daily gained to her party. Nothing now remained, but for her to get rid of the young king; which she did, by giving him poison, in the same manner as she had done to his father. All obstacles being now removed, she, to complete the whole, married her favourite paramour, and caused him to be crowned in the city of Odia, the 11th of

A. D. 1545. November 1545. But these usurpers did not long enjoy the fruits of their iniquity: for, on A. D. 1546. the 15th of January the next year, being invited by Oya Passiloko, and the king of Kambodia, to a feast prepared in the temple called Quiay Figrau (or Frigau), that is, the god of the † PINTO, p. 276, & seqq.

(G) By Brakalons, doubtless, is to be understood than one officer of that denomination.
Barkalons: but we do not find that there is ever more (H) Doubtless Kachinchinges.

- a atoms of the sun, whose festival it was, they were both slain by those two princes, with all their party : and thus things became quiet again, though with the destruction of most of the nobility^s.

^s PINTO, p. 277, & seqq.

S E C T. VII.

The reign of Pretiem. Siam conquered by the Barma king of Pegu. Râjah Api throws off the yoke : his character and death. The revolution which followed.

- b THE next thing to be considered was to choose a successor; which, with the assistance of four or five more lords, they affected. The person whom they cast their eye on was a religious man, named Pretiem, natural brother of the late king's father. He was a Talagrepo of a temple called Quiay Mitrau, where he had resided for thirty years; but being brought from thence by Oya Passiloko, he was, on the 19th of the same month, crowned king, with great magnificence. New king elected.
- c THE Brama (or Barma) king of Pegu, who, at that time, reigned in the city of Anapleu, being informed of the deplorable state to which the empire of Sornau (or Siam) was reduced, and that the new monarch was ill beloved of his subjects, for his cowardly, as well as tyrannical disposition, resolved to lay hold of the favourable opportunity, and invade his dominions. A. D. 1549.
Barma invasion.
- d Accordingly, on the 7th of April 1548, he set out from Martabân, with an army of 800,000 men, of whom 40,000 were horse, and 60,000 harquebusiers. These were accompanied with 5000 elephants, and 1000 pieces of cannon, drawn by a thousand couple of buffaloes and rhinoceros's. There were likewise as many yoke of oxen, for carrying the provision; besides a vast quantity of baggage. Among these forces there were 1000 Portugueses, commanded by Diego Suarez de Albergaria, nicknamed the Gallego, who had the title of the king's brother, and governor of Pegu, with a yearly pension of 200,000 ducats. The army never stopt till they entered the dominions of Siam; where, after five days march, they arrived at the castle of Tapurau, containing about 2000 houses, which was attacked three times in one day, without success. But Suarez, who was general of the camp, having caused it to be battered with forty pieces of heavy artillery, a breach was made, of twelve fathom width; which being entered by 12,000 foreigners, in half an hour 6000 Siameses, of which the garrison consisted, with their commander, who was a Mogor (or Mogol), were all cut to pieces. The Brama king, not content with this slaughter, ordered all the women likewise to be put to the sword, to revenge the death of above 3000 of his men^a.
- e AFTER this cruel execution, he marched directly to Sokotay, five leagues thence, situated on the river Lebrau, one of the three arising from the lake Chiammay (A), on the bank of which he encamped. But being advised by his lords not to lose time and men, by attempting any other place, till he got to the capital of Siam, he next day departed, by roads made through the woods, by 60,000 pioneers sent before for that purpose. When he came to Tilau, hard by Junfalan, on the south-west coast, near Quedah, he took guides; and, in nine days, arrived in sight of Odiaa (or the city of Siam); where he pitched his camp, which he inclosed with ditches, and strong palisadoes. During the five days that these and other preparations were carrying on, the besieged never offered to stir: of which seeming contempt of so great an army, Diego Suarez, the camp-marshal, was at a loss to know the cause; and therefore determined to give an assault to the city, towards the two points on the south side, where the wall was weakest. He began the attack the 19th of June, an hour before day, with two bodies, each consisting of 6000 men, who endeavoured to scale the walls with 1000 ladders; but the besieged defended themselves so valiantly, that, in half an hour, 10,000 fell on both sides. The king of Barma then founding a retreat, ordered the attack to be renewed with his 5000 elephants of war, divided into twenty troops. These carried, in their castles placed on their backs, 20,000 select Moens and Chaleus (B), who had double pay, and were furnished with small cannon, as well as muskets, besides a sort of scythes, eight or ten feet long; with which they made such havock, that, in less than fifteen minutes, most of them were beaten off the walls, from whence the elephants, with their trunks, tore down (C) the target-fences, with served for battlements.
- f

^a PINTO, p. 278, & seqq.

(A) If there be no such lake, as hath been already shewn, the source of this river must be uncertain; nor do we meet with the name of Lebrau in the French relations of Siam.

(B) An account of these people see before, hist. Pegu, p. 252.

(C) Loubiere, with good reason, looks upon this relation to be a fiction: for, as the city takes up the whole island in which it is built, the walls, which encompass the island, leave no room in front for an enemy to approach them; whereas, according to Pinto's account, the city could not have been washed by the river on the south side.

The enemy repulsed:

THE wall being thus cleared, the enemy once more set up their ladders, which they had a quitted: and mounting to the top, planted their standards, with shouts of victory. The Turks, desirous to signalize themselves on this occasion, asked leave of the king to enter first; which, by advice of Suarez, who was always so kind as to put them on the most dangerous services, desiring nothing more than to see their numbers lessened, was readily granted. Having thus obtained their desires, 12,000 of them, among whom were some Abissins and janizari's (D), mounting the wall with great outcries; and sliding down on the other side, descended, through a bulwark, into a place below, with intent to open a gate, and give admittance to the king of Barma, who had promised 1000 bisses of gold, amounting to 500,000 ducats, to those who should do him that important service. But while they endeavoured, with two battering-rams, to break the gate, they were suddenly charged by b 3000 resolute Jaos (E), and, in little more than a quarter of an hour, were all cut to pieces.
The Jaos, flushed with this success, immediately mounted the wall, and attacked the enemy whom they found there, so furiously, that, having slain most of them, they threw the rest headlong to the ground^b.

renew the assault:

THE Barma king, far from being discouraged at this disaster, ordered the assault to be renewed, imagining, that the elephants alone would be able to open his troops a way into the city. At the noise of their approach, Oya Passiloko, captain general of the forces within, with 15,000 men, most of them Luzons, Borneos, and Champaas, with some Menankabos, ran to the gate through which the enemy proposed to enter; and setting it wide open, sent the king of Pegu word, that having heard his majesty had promised 1000 bisses to the person c who should open the gate to him, he had now performed that service, and hoped the king would be as good as his word, to send him the money. The answer which the Barma monarch gave to his sneer, was by a furious attack, which he ordered to be made forthwith upon the place, with such good success, that, in three hours space, the gate was twice forced open, and gave the assailants admittance into the city. At this alarm, the king of Siam perceiving that all was in danger of being lost, hastened with 30,000 choice soldiers, and began a most bloody fight. The conflict lasted above half an hour, during which our author knew not what passed:
only he observes that the cries of the combatants, intermixed with the noise of martial instruments, roaring of cannon, and yelling of elephants, were so terrible, that it deprived those d who heard them of their senses, as well as courage. Nor was the sight which appeared at the gate less dreadful and stupefying to the beholders; for the place which the enemy had been masters of was all covered with dead bodies, drowned in their blood, which flowed in streams on all sides.

are again repulsed:

SUAREZ, seeing the Barma forces intirely repulsed, and the elephants frightened with the fire, as well as most of them hurt, prevailed on the king to sound a retreat; which he did, though unwillingly, with a resolution to give a fresh assault the next morning: but this was put off, by reason of a wound with an arrow, which he did not feel in the heat of the action, and which obliged him to keep his bed twelve days. As soon as he was well again, he attacked the city a second time, with no better success than the first; yet being obstinately bent to take it, if he perished in the attempt, he assaulted it five times more, in the open e day. But, although assisted by the ingenious contrivances of a Greek engineer, yet he was always forced to retire. The siege had already lasted four months and a half, with the loss of 140,000 of his men; he therefore determined to storm the city in a more effectual manner. For this purpose he ordered twenty-six strong wooden castles to be made: each was sixty-five feet long, fifty broad, and twenty-five high, strengthened with double beams of timber, covered with lead, and accommodated with twenty-six iron wheels, to run upon:
each of them likewise was filled with wood and pitch, and had long massy chains fastened to the fore part^c.

and again attack.

THE machines being finished in seventeen days, in a dark and stormy night, attended with a heavy rain, the Barma king ordered all the artillery in his camp, as well as other arms, f great and small, to be discharged three times. This was answered in like manner from the city; so that the noise made by so many arms, at least 100,000 in all, shot off without intermission, for three hours together, intermixed with that of thunder and lightning, as well as of the tempest, is not to be described; nor the dread it threw upon the whole army to be expressed: yet, in the midst of this horrible storm, the castles, which had been brought close to the walls of the city, were set on fire, and flamed so horribly, that none durst come within a stone's cast of them. At the same time the enemy attempting to scale the walls, a bloody conflict ensued; but as they gained no advantage against the besieged, after four hours attack, the castles being burnt to the ground, they retired to their camp.

The siege
continued:

THE king of the Barmas called a council of war, to sound the opinion of his lords; and g finding that they agreed, in sentiments with himself, to continue the siege, the rather, as they

^b PINTO, ubi supra, p. 280, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 282, & seq.

(D) We cannot conceive how janizari's should come here.

(E) Perhaps Laos.

- a observed the Siameses were so weakened with their losses, that they were not able to stand another attack, he rewarded his advisers; and then consulted with Suarez, and the Greek engineer, how to conduct the enterprize. The method they advised for battering down the remaining fortifications, was to raise a mount of earth, higher than the walls, and thereon plant a considerable number of cannon; which counsel was immediately put in execution: 60,000 pioneers being employed, who, in twelve days, finished the fort or platform, whereon were planted forty pieces of artillery. But next day, just when the battery was going to be played off, an express arrived in the camp, with news that the Shemíndoo had begun a rebellion in Pegu, and already seized on the principal places in the kingdom. At this news the king was so moved, that he immediately raised the siege, and embarked himself on the river
- b Pakarau, where he stayed only that night, and the day following, which he employed in drawing off his artillery and ammunition: then having set fire to his camp, he departed, on the 15th of October the same year, for Martabán, where he arrived after an expeditious voyage of seventeen days^d.

THE Barma king of Pegu, named Para Mandara by some authors, intended, as soon as the affairs of his kingdom had been settled, again to have invaded Siam, whose conquests he was bent upon; but he was slain presently after his return, by another rebel, who set up in opposition to the former. However, the design of annexing Siam to the empire of the Barmas, did not die with him; for Chaumigrem, otherwise called Mandaragri, his successor, after he had subdued all the neighbouring countries, and extended his dominions to the frontiers of China, turned his arms against Siam, which he entered with an army of 1,500,000 men (E); and proceeding to Odiaa, the capital, closely besieged it: but for all this prodigious force, authors relate that he could not have taken it, had not one of the gates been opened to him by the treachery of some within the city. This happened, according to Linschoten, in the year 1568; and thereupon the whole kingdom submitted to the conqueror. What was the king's name who reigned at this juncture is not mentioned: we only learn farther, that he became tributary, and that the queen, with his two sons, were carried to Pegu. The eldest of these was named Rájah Api, that is, the fiery king; but he was, by the Portugueses, called the black, and his brother the white king.

- d SOME years after, the king of Pegu gave the two princes leave to return to Siam, to visit their father; with whom they continued till the death of the Barma monarch, which happened in 1583. His successor, Pranjinoko, ascending the throne, the king of Siam revolted, refusing to pay him either homage or tribute, which he sent to demand. Instead of this, while he was at war with his uncle, the king of Ava, who had likewise set up for himself, and aspired to the dominion of Pegu; the king of Siam's (F) son arrived, under pretence of putting himself under the protection of the new Barma monarch. He brought with him fifty elephants, and 800 armed men. The great Barma, or captain-general, who was left behind, to govern affairs in the king's absence, directed the prince to conduct his troops towards Ava, there to join the Barma army: but instead of taking that route, he changed his road, and returned to Siam.

- e THE prince having made report to his father of what had passed in Pegu, and how the great Barma had taken upon him to direct his motions, the king laid hold of this opportunity to throw off his dependency; and sent Pranjinoko word, that since a slave had presumed to give an answer to his son, whom he had sent to join his majesty in the war, he would no longer pay any regard to him, or acknowledge him for his superior (G). Hereupon the king of Pegu sent the great Barma, at the head of a powerful army, into Siam: but that general lost a great number of men before the capital city, which he besieged, as well by the excessive heat of the weather, as bravery of the garrison. This obliged him to return with his forces. However, the king of Siam sent him of Pegu word, that, if he had taken the field himself, he would have paid him his compliments; but that he would not
- f design to submit to a person who was his inferior. To this the Barma king made answer, that it was his will the least of his slaves should subdue the greatest prince who was his subject^e.

THE king of Pegu, resolving to give his neighbour no rest, sent his brother-in-law, with a much greater power than the former, to invade Siam: but this served only to make the ^d PINTO, p. 282, & seqq. vol. ii. p. 1746. FLORIS ap. collect. voy. 4to. vol. i. p. 439. DE FARIA Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 118, & seq.

^e BALBI viag. Ind. Orient. p. 110, 115. PIMENTA ap. Purch. pilgr. Portug. Asia, vol. iii. p. 119. This Banna, perhaps, is the same whom Balbi names the great Brama (or rather Barma).

(E) Balbi elsewhere, p. 115. says only 800,000 men.

(F) Perhaps this was Rájah Api, or the black prince, the king of Siam's eldest son.

(G) According to De Faria y Sousa, the king of Pegu sent to demand the tribute of him of Siam, which the black prince refused to pay; and this gave occasion to war; in which he first employed his favourite Banna.

Rajah Api
king.

overthrow more signal; for the Siamese army, commanded by the black prince, meeting the enemy in the field, cut 200,000 of them to pieces, and gained a complete victory. This new defeat only exasperated Pranjinoko; who, determined if possible to reduce his revolted vassal, raises an army of 1,700,000 men, accompanied with 80,000 horse, and 1500 elephants. The command of this vast power he gives to his eldest son Maupa Rajab; and, as if already sure of the victory, confers on him the title of king of Siam. At the news of this formidable force all Siam trembled, excepting the valiant black prince, now king, who marched against the enemy, and gave them battle. In the fight the two kings happened to meet, and encountering on their elephants, Maupa Rajab was struck dead to the ground. At this sight his troops immediately fled, and were pursued for a whole month by the Siameses, who destroyed the greater part of that vast army.

The white
king.

THIS remarkable victory happened about the year 1590; after which Rajah Api was freed from farther molestation on the side of Pegu, by the dreadful calamities which ensued in that kingdom. At length the neighbouring kings taking advantage of the distress to which Pranjinoko was reduced, about the year 1399 invaded his dominions on all sides: among the rest Rajah Api, desirous to revenge the several devastations which that prince had made in his territories, entered Pegu with a considerable army, and laid siege to the city of Uncha, or Pegu, the capital: but, after lying two months before it, he was obliged to retire, and returned to Siam, with the loss of 100,000 of his forces. On Pegu's ruin, which happened in the year 1600, Siam began to recover its former power, under this warlike king; who, in the space of about five years, subdued the countries of Kamboja, Lanjang, Jagomay (or Jangoma), Lugor, Patane, Tanasserim, and several others.

His son succeeds.
A. D. 1612.

IN 1605 the black king died, and left his dominions to his brother, called the white king; who was a covetous prince, but yet enjoyed the throne in peace, till 1610, when he likewise departed this life. He left several children behind him, which occasioned much distraction, whereof he himself was the first and chief occasion: for, on his death-bed, he caused his eldest son, a young prince of great hope, to be slain, at the instigation of Jokkrom-meway, one of the principal lords of Siam; who, having been possessed of a great number of slaves, thought to have made himself king. However, he missed of his aim: for the white king's second son ascended the throne after his father's decease, being then about twenty-two years of age; and soon after dispatched Jokkrom-meway. That traitor had, among other slaves, 280 Japaneses, who thinking to revenge their master's death, and achieve some memorable exploit, ran to the palace, and, surprising it, compelled the new king to deliver into their hands four of the principal nobles, whom they slew, as the chief advisers of their master's death. Having, after this, used the king for some time at their discretion, they forced him to sign, with his own blood, such conditions as they proposed to him; and to give them some of the chief *Talapoy*s, or priests, for hostages. This done, they committed great outrages, and departed with immense treasures, the Siameses not being able to prevent them.

Several kingdoms revolt.

UPON this occasion, the kingdoms of Kamboja and Lanjang revolted; as did also one Banga de Laa, a Peguan. The year before the king of Lanjang entered Siam, and advanced within three days journey of Odiya, the capital city; hoping to find the country still embroiled with the Japan slaves. But as they were departed before this invasion, the king of Siam set out to meet his enemy, who thereupon thought fit to retreat. He was threatened with another invasion in April 1612 following, from the two other revolting princes^f.

A. D. 1616.

BUT our author did not stay long enough in the Indies to know the event; nor do we know from others how long this king reigned, or who succeeded him, to the middle of the same century. All we can do is to fill up the chasm with such particulars, as are to be met with in authors, during that period. The first which occurs is, that, about the year 1615, Zangomay, or Jangomay, with other provinces, taken from the king of Pegu and Ava, were again recovered by that monarch^g. The next year the king of Siam sent ambassadors to Goa, who acknowledged the favours received from the Portugueses; and, in answer to the letter delivered by James de Mendoza, his majesty offered the port of Martaván for the king of Portugal to build a fort there; likewise to maintain the garrison, and a small fleet of ships, to cruize on that sea against the king of Dika.

Portuguese ambassadors.

THE ambassadors were splendidly entertained; and F. Francis, a Dominican frier, sent to accompany them back with the same character, and a costly present. The ambassador, who was received with great marks of satisfaction, proposed to the king, that both nations should join their forces to subdue the king of Ava; that there should be a free trade between Siam and Malakka; and that he should not admit the Hollanders into his country. The Siamite answered, that the Portuguese merchants might freely resort to his ports, and be exempt from all duties; that his subjects should trade to Malakka, and that the reason they had done it of late, was

^f FLORIS, ubi supra, p. 439, & seq. DE FARIA, ubi supra, p. 120.
p. 1006.

^g METHOLD, ap. Purch. vol. v.

- a the ill usage they found there, whereof he alleged sufficient instances ; that he had admitted the English, Dutch, and Malays, into his ports, on account of the great respect they shewed him, and the need he had of them ; that he had assisted the Portugueses against the Dutch, and was no way concerned for the harm those of Malakka had done the queen of Patane, because she was a mad-woman ; but that, she being now dead, he had placed one of more sense in her room, and desired there might be a free trade with her, as well as with Siam : that the goods of such Portugueses as died in his dominions, should go to their heirs ; and that such of them as committed any crimes, should be tried at his court, to prevent any wrong being done them by the prejudice of magistrates. Thus the Dominican was dispatched, and two Spanes sent back with him by the king, to go his ambassadors into Spain ⁿ.
- b DE FARIA Y SOUSA, the Portuguese historian, speaks of another embassy, which was sent ^{The king's character.} to Goa in 1621, by the king of Siam, desiring some Franciscans would come to preach in his dominions. F. Andrew, of the Holy Ghost, being sent, his majesty built a church for him, at his own expence, and offered him great riches ; which, to the great admiration of that prince, says our author, he constantly refused. This monarch De Faria calls the black king, perhaps mistaking him for Râjab Api before-mentioned, and speaks of him as living in the year 1627, bestowing on him the following character. This prince, says our historian, was small of stature, of an ill presence, and of a disposition partly very wicked, and partly generous. Though cruel men are generally cowards, yet he was very valiant, as well as cruel ; and whereas tyrants are commonly avaritious, he was, on the contrary, exceeding liberal ;
- c so that, in some things, he shewed as much goodness, as he did barbarity in others. He was not content to put thieves and robbers to death in the ordinary way, but caused them to be torn to pieces for his pastime, by tigers and crocodiles (H). Understanding that a king, ^{His great cruelty,} his vassal, intended to rebel, he shut him up in a cage ; and having, for some time, fed him with morsels of his own flesh, torn from his body, had him fried in a pan. With his own hand he cut seven ladies through the middle, only because, as he said, they walked too fast ; and ordered the legs of three others to be chopped off, because they stayed too long when sent for money to bestow on the Portugueses. Thus to walk either too fast or too slow, were crimes with this capricious and bloody king.
- His severity extended even to brute beasts. He cut off the paw of a favourite monkey, ^{even to brutes.} because the silly animal happened to put it into a box, wherein were some curiosities. A horse, no less prized by him, had his head struck off in the stable before the rest, because he did not stop at his majesty's command. The crows making a noise over his palace, he caused 500 of them to be caught ; some of which were killed, others imprisoned in cages, and the rest turned loose, with yokes about their necks. In short, a tiger, which did not immediately seize a criminal who was cast to him, was, by his command, beheaded as a coward. Thus much of the wicked part of this prince. Now to speak of his virtues. He kept his word inviolably ; was strict in the execution of justice ; liberal above measure ; and very merciful to those who, in his opinion, committed pardonable faults. A Portuguese being sent by him to Malakka, to purchase commodities, lost them all at play, and yet had the boldness to
- e return to the king, who received him kindly ; saying, he valued the confidence reposed in his generosity more than all the goods which the man could have brought. He shewed great respect to the Portuguese priests ; and encouraged planting the Romish religion in his territories. To conclude his eulogy, his courage was unspeakable ^{His generosity.}.
- THIS prince seems, by his character (I), to be the same Râjab Hapi (or Api) mentioned by Mandelslo, who says he lived about the year 1614 ; and, at that time acknowledged the sovereignty of the king of Pegu : but a few years after threw off his dependency. For entering the kingdom of Pegu with a powerful army, he laid siege to the city of Arrakan (K), making a vow not to depart till he had reduced it : but not being able to take the place, he built a house near it, where he died.
- f RAJAH HAPI had a favourite named Oki (L) Kronwi, who aspiring to the crown, brought ^{A revolution.} 4 or 500 Japaneses into the kingdom, clothed like merchants, in order to murder the king. This design, however, took no effect ; for Râjab Api died a natural death, as before-mentioned. But after his decease, Oki Kronwi seized the throne, and caused himself to be proclaimed king.
- HOWEVER, the son of Râjab Hapi, by the assistance of his friends, found means to expel the usurper ; but was not fortunate enough to keep the crown in his possession ; for he was ⁿ DE FARIA, ubi supra, p. 237, & seq.ⁱ Ibid. p. 361, & seq.

(H) Perhaps this king first brought those cruel deaths in use, or inflicted them oftener than his predecessors had done.

(I) For Mandelslo represents him as notorious for his cruelty ; of which he relates, as an instance, that it was reported of him, that one time, when he was sick, hearing two of his concubines laugh in an adjoining chamber, he commanded that they should immediately be cut to pieces.

(K) This seems to be a mistake for the city of Pegu.(L) Oki, or Ok-ya, perhaps.

likewise slain, and was succeeded by his younger brother, who continued to reign in 1639, a when our author was in the Indies ^k.

THIS king had taken so great an aversion to the Japaneſes, on ſuſpicion they had a deſign upon his perſon, that he put ſome to death, and expelled the reſt: yet afterwards permitted them to return and enjoy their antient poſts; but they exceeded not the number of 5 or 600 ^l.

Siam in diſ-traction.

WHEN this prince began to reign, or how long he continued on the throne, does not appear from our author Mandefſlo; who informs us, that the laſt war which the kings of Siam made on thoſe of Jangoma and Lanjang (M), was purely out of ambition to ſupport the ſovereignty which they pretended to over thoſe kingdoms. He proceeds: it is not long alſo ſince the king of Kamboja, who was tributary to this monarch, revolted; hereupon the king of Siam entered his territories with a potent army, but was oppoſed ſo vigorously that he was forced to retire. The country, after this, enjoyed a long peace, till the death of the king; who, having cauſed his brother to be murdered, in order to ſettle his ſon on the throne, one of the princes of the blood took occaſion to uſurp the crown.

The uſurper's craft.

THIS uſurper made ſhew as if he would eſpouſe the intereſt of the ſtate againſt the kings of Pegu and Ava, but chiefly him of Kamboja; yet this was all pretence, for he did not enter into open hoſtilities with any of them, although he kept an army on foot as if for that purpoſe; his true deſign being to ſtand on his guard, and oppoſe any attempts which, he had reaſon to apprehend, the heirs of the deceased king would make to recover their right.

A. D. 1624.

He continued the ſame friendſhip for the Hollanders, which his predeceſſor had teſtified for them; whereof he gave a proof in the year 1624. For Fernando de Silva, governor of The Manillas, having ſet upon a Dutch frigate in the river Menam; this king ſeized on his ſhip, and forced him to reſtore the frigate: for which favour the Dutch always aſſiſted him againſt his enemies, and particularly the Portugueſes; who, after that, took occaſion to diſturb the trade of the Siameſes to China. Patany likewiſe having revolted ſome years after (N), they aſſiſted him with ſix ſhips to ſubdue the rebels ^m.

Diſagreement
among authors.

IN what has been cited from Mandefſlo, we find two accounts of the ſucceſſion of theſe kings, not reconcilable either with each other, or with what has been related from De Faria: they both commit the ſame error with reſpect to Râjab Api, unleſs we may ſuppoſe there were two princes of this name or title. De Faria ſays, Râjab Api was living in 1627; but, according to Mandefſlo, he muſt have died before the year 1624, at which time we find an uſurper on the throne. In his ſecond account, he ſpeaks of a king murdering his brother, to make way for his ſon to ſucceed him, on which an uſurper ſteps in: but there is nothing like this in his firſt account, nor can we tell what to make of either; in ſhort, they ſeem to be a jumble of events collected from Floris, De Faria, and other authors.

^k MANDELSLO VOY. p. 127.

^l Ibid. p. 125.

^m Ibid. p. 126.

(M) In the Engliſh translation of Mandefſlo, it is miſ-printed Langsgaugh.

(N) Our author ſays lately, ſpeaking with reference to the year 1639, when he was in the Indies.

S E C T. III.

Reign of Chaw Paſa-thong. He depoſes the king, and uſurps the throne. His daughter's funeral: the cruel executions which attended it.

Chaw Paſathong

HOWEVER, the king who reigned in his time muſt have been the famous Chaw Paſa-thong (A), mentioned by later writers; for we are told that he died in 1657, after a reign of thirty years, which carries back the beginning of it to the year 1627. But, in this caſe, if, as we are aſſured by ſucceeding authors, that Paſa-thong was an uſurper, he could not well be the ſecond ſon of Rajab Api, but muſt have been the prince who immediately ſucceeded him: unleſs we could ſuppoſe, that, after the death both of the uſurper and his elder brother, he aſcended the throne the year laſt-mentioned, in which Rajab Api muſt have died; for De Faria ſpeaks of him as living, at leaſt in the beginning of it. Van Vliet (B), who wrote the hiſtory of this prince, ſays he was an uſurper, and of the royal blood, though not that he was the brother of the former king. But Loubiere, who allows him to have been an uſurper, charges Van Vliet with a miſtake, in aſſerting that he was of the royal race ^a. However that be, his acceſſion to the crown in 1627 is farther confirmed by the age of his ſon Chaw ^e uſurps the throne.

^a LOUBIERE relat. Siam, p. 9.

(A) Chaw Paſa-thong, according to Gervaiſe, ſignifies the king of the golden language.

(B) Jeremy Van Vliet, who wrote the revolutions which happened in the kingdom of Siam. It is printed in French, in 4to, after Sir Thomas Herbert's Travels, Paris 1663. But we have it not immediately before us.

a Naraya, who was twenty-four years old at his father's death^b. This places his birth in the year 33; consequently his father was then on the throne, because his mother, who was daughter to the deposed king, was not married to him till after his usurpation. Now as some time must have passed before she married him, on account of her reluctance, and she likewise had a daughter before she had that son, it is very probable that his reign was as long as Loubiere makes it.

ONE remarkable circumstance in his usurpation is, that, having entered by force of arms into the palace, he compelled the king to quit, and fly into a temple: from thence he had the unfortunate prince dragged, and carried back again a prisoner to the palace: where he caused him to be declared unworthy of the crown and government, for having deserted the same, as if he had done it voluntarily^c.

b THIS king, before his usurpation, had been Chakri, or chancellor; in which post he gained so much credit, and wealth, as opened the way for him to the throne. To establish himself the firmer thereon, though already married, he espoused the daughter of his predecessor. This princess, who had a great deal of spirit, as well as virtue, did all she could to avoid the match, unable to endure the thoughts of wearing a crown, in prejudice to four brothers, whom she tenderly loved. The resistance which she made on this occasion, and the affection which she openly expressed for her brothers, made the tyrant resolve to put them all to death: but having had notice of their danger, they, by assistance of some faithful servants of their family, who still were employed at court, escaped out of the palace where they were shut up. Two of them took refuge in the kingdom of Laos (or Labos), where they were kindly received: but the other two, hoping to find an asylum at Pipeli, perished there, by the treachery of those on whom they depended for protection and assistance^d. This is the account given by Gervaise: but, according to Loubiere, Chaw Pasa-thong put to death all the princes of their blood. Two indeed escaped the slaughter longer than the rest: but, in the year 1650, the last of them, who was then twenty years of age, underwent the same fate as the others, with one of his sisters, upon an accusation notoriously false^e; the particulars whereof are related by Struys, who was an eye-witness, on the following occasion.

THE funeral of the king's only legitimated daughter being to be performed on the 23d of February 1650 (C), six months after her decease; the king sent to invite the Sieur Van Muyden, consul for the Dutch company, to attend the ceremony of burning her corpse. Preparations were made in the middle of the court or parade, before the palace, where were erected five towers of wood, and upon each a pole: that which stood in the midst was thirty fathoms high; the other four, which formed a square, only twenty each. The fabric of these towers was very artificial: round about under the architrave, they were neatly painted with foliage, raised with gold, and depressed with amber and burnt ivory. On the stilobat were carved heads of leopards, tigers, and panthers. Under the projecture there were supporters in antic-work, and emblematical to the occasion. The cornice was adorned with close leaves, suitable to the frieze and architrave, either carved or painted. Within the great tower, which stood in the middle, was a very costly altar, covered with gold, and set with precious stones, about six feet from the ground. On this altar was placed the body of the princess, in a coffin of gold, an inch thick. She was standing: her hands joined: her face turned towards heaven: her robe had a long train, and was all beset with jewels: her crown, her necklace, and her bracelets, likewise covered over with diamonds, were of an inestimable price.

WHEN those who attended on this occasion had taken their places, on scaffolds made on purpose, all the grandees of the kingdom, with their ladies, apparelled only with a white cloth, without any ornament, passed along; scattering flowers and perfumes round the body and the altar with a sad countenance. After this the corpse was carried twenty paces from thence in a chariot, whose richness equalled that of the altar. The great men and ladies, having paid her the same honours as before, wept as bitterly as if they had lost what they held dearest in the world. This mournful scene having lasted near two hours, the chariot was drawn very slowly towards the funeral pile, attended by the same lords and ladies, who were still weeping. Before them marched the king's eldest son, aged about twenty, only brother of the deceased princess by the same mother. He was dressed in white, as well as the lords who attended him, and mounted on an elephant, whose housings was embroidered, with chains of gold on his neck. On his sides were his two brothers, by different venters, riding on elephants accoutred like the first; each holding a long scarf of white silk, one end of which was fastened to the horse. On the sides of the horse walked fourteen more of the king's

^b Gervaise hist. Siam, p. 244.
p. 242, & seq.

^c LOUBIERE, ubi supra, p. 9.

^d Gervaise, ubi supra,

(C) Glanius, in his voyage to the East Indies, putting himself in the place of Struys, or some other person, pretends he was present at this funeral, and the executions which followed it; although he did not leave Europe till 1668; that is eighteen years after.

sons on foot, cloathed also in white, and with branches of palm in their hands; all well a instructed in the art of weeping.

Funeral pile.

ON each side of the way, along which the herse was to pass, there were stages or scaffolds, where the lords, of inferior rank than those mentioned before, expected the convoy. When the body was arrived over-against them, some threw several kinds of habits among the people, and others oranges full of fikols or mases: two pieces of money, the first worth about half a crown, the latter but half that sum. The body being at length come to the funeral pile, the grandees took it with great respect, and laid it thereon, several instruments sounding in the mean time; whose mournful notes, accompanied with the lamentations of all the court, were capable of softening the hardest hearts. This sad concert being ended, they covered the body with sandal and aquila wood: then having cast thereon a great quantity of perfumes, b the king and nobles returned to the palace; leaving the ladies with the corpse, which was not to be burned till two days after^f.

Female mourners.

THE hardest task therefore fell on them: for though they must have been already sufficiently tired with weeping, yet they were obliged, by the ceremony, to continue that sad exercise for those two days, without intermission. This was a severe penance, from which those of the greatest quality were not excused; and, to see that it was punctually performed, certain old women were mixed with them, who, with a kind of discipline or scourge, lashed those, who, oppressed with sleep or weariness, slept but one moment, and thus made them shed real tears, instead of counterfeit. During this dismal situation of the ladies, round the deceased princess, the priests were mounted on scaffolds, in the court where the first tears were shed, praying c night and day for her soul. While the body was there exposed, they interrupted their prayers often, to cast among the people garments of all sorts, utensils for house-keeping, instruments serviceable to artificers, beds, mats, and other moveables.

Fire-works.

ON the side of the court there were erected twenty other towers, made of reeds, lined within and without with paper of several colours. These were filled with variety of fire-works, which were played-off for fifteen days successively. During this interval the king caused large alms to be given both to the poor and to the priests: the expence of which, added to the preparations already mentioned, according to the king's agent's accounts, amounted in the whole to 5000 kalfi, which make about 66,000 pounds English. In this account we do not reckon the several statues of gold and silver; among which there were two of the first metal d four feet and an half high, and an inch and half thick. These were set up, for the honour of the deceased princess, in the beautifullest temple in the country; and were all made out of gold, silver, and jewels, which she had received during her life, as well from the king her father, as from the principal lords of the court^e.

The body burnt.

THE body having reposed two days upon the sweet-scented wood which served to burn it, all the court went to relieve the doleful ladies, whom their penitential fatigue had rendered very lean. The ceremony began with prayers and speeches made by the priests. When they had finished their offices, the king took a lighted wax-candle from the hands of the arch-priest, and set fire himself to the funeral pile, on which the body was consumed, lying in the gold coffin, wherein they had left the jewels and other rich ornaments which were about it. When e they came to gather up the ashes, in order to inclose them in an urn of gold, there was found a piece of flesh, of the bigness of a young child's head, which the fire had not touched. The king, who was one of those who took up the ashes, looking upon that piece of flesh, said to the lords who were present: What think ye, is it out of respect, that the flames have spared these remains of my daughter's body? Then waiting for their answer, one of them said, that his majesty had too much understanding to doubt what he saw.—How! reply'd the king, all in a fury, I have but too much reason now not to doubt any longer, what I have a thousand times suspected, that my daughter was poisoned. In finishing these words, he gave orders for securing all the women who had served the deceased princess, without excepting one.

Nobles, falsely accused,

THESE were put to the torture to extort confession: but although they all disavowed the f crime, yet that did not save their lives, nor allay the king's fury. On the contrary, it augmented every day, and gave rise to new suspicions; so that a number of innocent people were imprisoned, and underwent the same cruelties. When the court was drained, and the king found none about him on whom to discharge his fury; he, on various pretences, sent for the greatest men in the kingdom, whom, with their wives, he ordered to be confined as soon as they arrived at court. The torture employed to discover the guilty among these, was that of fire, already mentioned. He caused several pits to be dugged round the city, about twenty feet square, wherein great fires were kindled; and thither the prisoners were sent, loaded with chains. They were first made to stand in tubs of hot water, to soften their skin; and the soles of their feet being afterward scraped with sharp irons, they were carried g before the judges, who examined them concerning the pretended poisoning. They who still a denied the fact were obliged to walk bare-footed upon burning coals; and if their feet were found to be burnt or blistered with the fire, they were deemed guilty. Some, who being overcome with the heat of the fire, fainted and fell down, perished there miserably, none daring to help them.

^f STRUYS'S VOY. ch. viii. p. 41. & GLANIUS VOY. p. 152.

^e Ibid. ibid.

THE guilty were put to various kinds of deaths. Some were tied to posts, and killed by ^{put to various} elephants, in the manner before described^b. Others were buried in the road to the city, up ^{to the chin,} b to the chin, and all passengers ordered to spit on them: nor durst any, under pain of death, give them the least relief, or hasten their death, which those miserable creatures most ardently demanded^c. Among other punishments which, according to Glanius, were inflicted upon these unhappy innocents, there was one which is frequently executed on notorious malefactors. The criminal is bound so tightly about the waist with a napkin, that a man may grasp him there with his hands: after this they prick him with engines as sharp as needles: not so much to draw blood out, as force him to hold in his breath. Then watching a proper time, they, of a sudden, cut him through the middle, and clap the upper part of his body upon a burning hot plate of brass; which preventing the effusion of blood, by searing or stopping the vessels, the patient remains a considerable time alive, in far greater torments than can be imagined^d.

THESE cruel executions continued four months; during which they took away the lives of ^{Executions} an incredible number of persons. One day, in less than four or five hours, our author ^{related.} Struys avers, that he saw above fifty put to death, and the like number in a forenoon. During this time it was reckoned that 2500 lost their lives, though some computed 300 more: and it was thought few of the nobility would have escaped, if they had not absented themselves from court on this occasion. All this tyranny was acted, under pretence of their having had a hand in this sham poisoning, or been privy to it: but it was afterwards well known that the king had, of a long time, formed the design to cut off all the chief officers of the state, whom he began to stand in awe of; and the better to effect it, without danger of a rebellion, he had newly raised an army of 250,000, giving out that he intended to declare war against the Chinese.

ON the 28th of February 300 persons, who had served the deceased princess, were carried ^{Late king's} to undergo the fiery trial. But as it was said to have spared those domestics, I know not ^{daughter} how, says Struys, they were by that means released. And now comes on the last act of this ^{A. D. 1670.} tragedy, though first resolved on, and to which the former executions were only preparatory. This was the death of two of the preceding king's children; of whom, at this time, there remained no more than three, two daughters and a son. They began with the elder princess, and her household, who was one of the youngest of his children, and who was suspected of the pretended poisoning, because she could scarce forbear to laugh when all others wept at the funeral of the deceased. She had likewise frequently complained that the king slighted her, and therefore she was not treated with the respect due to the royal blood (D). On the first of March she was brought forth, with a great number of ladies, who were all led through the fire; but, according to report, none of their feet were blistered, excepting those of the princess. Hereupon she was cast into a dungeon, loaded with chains of gold, and none were ^e suffered either to see or speak to her. Next day she was brought again to the hall of audience in the palace; where, upon being threatened with the torture, whether out of fear, or to acquire glory, she told her judges: that in case the king would promise to put her to death, without exposing her in public, she promised, on the honour of a dying princess, to discover the whole affair, without farther trouble.

SEVERAL of the old courtiers, who loved her father, were so moved with this declaration, ^{put to death.} that it was thought they would have interceded for her pardon, if the king's fury had not restrained them. However, they reported what she had said, and the king granted her request. On this she declared, that the fact was committed by her and her nurse, who had employed certain sorceries, which occasioned the piece of flesh to remain unconsumed. She added, ^f that her ignominious death did not trouble her so much as the miscarriage of her good design; which, in case it had succeeded, would have restored the small remains of her family to their former state, and freed the nation from the slavery of so cruel a tyrant. On farther examination she protested, that the poison was not provided for the innocent princess who was dead, but for the king himself. When this confession was reported to the usurper, he ordered the executioner to cut a piece of flesh out of her body, and force her to eat it. The lady suffered her flesh to be torn away with amazing patience: but when he tendered it to her to eat, she refused, crying out, O wretched tyrant! thou mayest tear my body to pieces, but hast no power

^b See before, p. 345.

^c STRUYS ibid. ch. ix. p. 44, & seqq.

^d GLANIUS ibid. p. 140.

(D) These are the words of Glanius, who seems to have taken his account from the same source: in the English Struys, they are perplexed. It is there said, she complained, that her daughter (who was also the king's daughter) was had in contempt; and his eldest daughter, in her life-time, promoted to great honour: as if the complaint came from the mother of the princess, who was the dethroned king's consort.

Her courage. over my mind. She added, Know that I defy thy cruelty; and that the goddess of Siam, who will speedily appear, when the remaining virtue of my royal race shall avenge thee and thy tiger brood. With these, and the like speeches, she continued to revile the king; till, by a second order from the palace, she was hacked in pieces (E), and thrown into the river.

Her brother put to death. THE same day her only brother, aged twenty years, was brought to execution. The Dutch were told he had been pardoned, on account of madness, which he had counterfeited during the course of this tragedy. But as soon as he mounted the scaffold, it appeared that he had all his senses about him: for he behaved with such grace and modesty, that some of the courtiers could not forbear shedding tears. He likewise, in a bitter speech, so vilified the king, and vindicated himself, that the populace were almost moved to an insurrection. He concluded his harangue with severe reproaches; and declared himself more concerned for the ill success of his sister's attempt, than his own death. So soon as he saw the executioner approach, he cried out, Innocent indeed I am, as was my sister: but now, thou inhuman tyrant, since it is thy will it should be so, I scorn, was I sure of obtaining it, to desire thy pardon, that thou mayest not hope for the least pity from the hands of them who shall hereafter revenge my death. With these, and the like words, he seemed to declare his innocency; yet uttered some expressions which contradicted those protestations (F), and were probably spoken, faith our author, only to exasperate the king. Thus was all the race of the former king extirpated, excepting one daughter, who was not capable (G) of doing any-thing against the interest of the reigning prince¹.

His bravery. THIS is all we meet with in the authors (H) before us, concerning this prince; who died in the year 1657, after a reign of thirty years^m. He had by his first wife one daughter and four sons; and by his second one daughter and one son. This son, who was twenty-four years old when his father died (his mother having deceased some time before), seemed to be the only prince living intitled to the crown, as all his mother's brothers, who only had a right to dispute it with him, were dead. But all his hopes, as well as the wishes of the people in his favour, were eluded, by the artifices of his father's brother, Pra Sitama Racha (I): who, although he had no right to succeed an usurper, yet making a handle of the custom of the country, which authorizes the brothers of the deceased king to succeed him, in exclusion of his own children, took possession of the throne. The young prince deeply resented this ill usage in his heart; but thought it prudence to smother his disgust (K) till a favourable opportunity of shewing it, which not long after presented itself. For the brutish uncle having resolved to take his sister for a concubine, the young prince opposed it with so much courage, that the tyrant determined to cut him off: but being informed of his design, by the very persons who were to have assassinated him, he took the field, and desired assistance from the foreigners residing in Siam.

Pra Sitama Racha. THE Portugueses were the first who joined him, on his promises to favour their commerce, and reward their services handsomely. He had scarcely gotten together 1000 men, when, not to give his enemy time to stir himself, and assemble his troops, he marched with them directly to the palace; where, having put to the sword all who opposed his passage, he opened himself a way to the king's chamber. The usurper, being in no condition to defend himself, had changed his dress, with an intent to get-off in that disguise, among his domestics, who fled on all sides: but being discovered by a Portuguese, the prince fell upon, and killed, him with his own hand (L).

THE heads of the conspiracy were arrested; some of whom he punished for examples, and made friends of others, by his generosity towards them.

THIS event happened, according to Loubiere, in the year 1657; but Kämpfer places it on the 9th of October 1656, three months after Sitama Rasia's usurpationⁿ.

¹ STRUYS voy. ubi supra.

^m LOUBIERE, p. 9.

ⁿ GERVAISE hist. Siam, p. 245, & seq.

(E) It is not likely that she suffered such an ignominious death as this is reckoned in the East; besides, it is not usual to shed the blood of princes, especially by the hands of an executioner.

(F) His sister did the same. Perhaps they held themselves innocent, as they did not design the death of the prince, but of the king himself.

(G) According to Glanius, she was not ten years of age: but this could not be, if the daughter of the preceding prince, who was dethroned in 1627; unless he had been suffered to live several years after, which is not likely.

(H) For we have not Van Vliet, who gives the revolution made in Siam by this prince.

(I) Kämpfer calls him Rasia, Resia, or Racha, Sitama Ratia. Hist. Japan. book ii. ch. 2. p. 23.

(K) Loubiere says, that to secure his life, he took sanctuary in a cloister, and cloath'd himself with the inviolable habit of a Talapey.

(L) Loubiere says, that he was slain with a musquet by a Portuguese, as he was flying from the palace on his elephant: but Kämpfer writes, that he was beaten to death with clubs.

C H A P. XI.

Reign of Chaw Naraya.

S E C T. I.

He attacks and kills his uncle, who had usurped the throne.—Quells several revolts.— Bishops sent to India.—Mission of Siam.—The Jesuits form a design to convert the king, and all his subjects.—War with Kamboja.

^a AS soon as this prince, named Chaw Naraya (A), saw himself in peaceable possession of Chaw Na-the kingdom, he solemnly married his father's daughter by his first wife, and had her ^{declared} declared queen, with all the usual ceremonies. His own sister he gave in wedlock to one of his half-brothers, who was a very honest man, and had no hand at all in the conspiracy, as the four others were suspected to have had, on which account they were disgraced. Two of them died of grief some time after: he who was married survived them ten or twelve years, and then left the world, like them, without issue (B). The other two lived till the king's death, and were sacrificed by the usurper who succeeded him. One of these two, that he might take from his brother all occasion of distrust, became a Talapoy, or religious man. He lived in a great temple near the palace, whither the king went often to visit him, and offered ^b him the chief posts in the state, which he always refused. This gained him the intire confidence of his majesty, and veneration of the people, who looked on him as a saint. The ^{other} ^{brother} other brother, who was paralytic, led an obscure and languishing life, in a little castle ^{belonging to the capital, where he remained shut up, without being allowed to go to court.}
Whenever he appeared, he affected to stutter, and talk wildly (C); for fear, perhaps that the king, who always distrusted, and did not love him, should take other measures with him, in case he thought him in a condition to do him any mischief ^a.

THE two princesses, his own sister and his wife, died about the year 1680, within three ^{or four months one of the other;} ^{The queen dies.} or four months one of the other; and their bodies were burnt in the palace, on the same funeral pile. Ever since then the king was so afflicted for the death of the queen, whom ^c he passionately loved, that he never would marry a second time, but contented himself with a few concubines.

THE princess, who was the issue of that marriage, inherited all the virtues and great ^{qualities of her mother.} ^{The princess:} qualities of her mother. She was of a good size, and handsome, excepting that her nose was a little too flat. She was extremely agreeable, and had a great deal of vivacity, accompanied with solid judgment. This account our author Gervaise had from those who had seen her, before she was fourteen years of age: for, after that, the princesses see no men, except the eunuchs; their own brothers not being suffered to talk to them, unless through a curtain.
The king, who knew her good qualities better than any-body else, had a mind, about the year 1684, to make a trial of them twice; by putting the crown (to which she was pre^d sumptive heir) on her head, and resigning to her the government of his kingdom for twenty-four hours. In the execution of this arduous task she exceeded his expectations: for she reasoned on the most difficult affairs of state, proposed by his council, as if she had been ^{her great ta-} bred up to them; and, what she wanted in experience, was supplied by the depth of her ^{lents.} capacity. There was only one thing with which she might justly be reproached; and that was her too great severity to her maids of honour, whom, for the smallest faults, and even for little abusive words spoken to one another, she caused to be shaved in her presence, and thus dishonoured them, during the remainder of their lives.

THE king had an adopted son, who was very handsome, and had a great deal of spirit. Mompe
He had rendered himself very popular, by his obliging carriage, and was loved exceedingly ^{To-so, his} ^e by his majesty. He was treated as if one of the king's own children: he had a sherolle, or ^{adopted son,} pavilion, on his elephant; was as richly drest as the king himself; entered at pleasure into ^a GERVAISE, p. 246. & CHOISY, p. 398.

(A) So called by Gervaise and Loubiere; but Kæmpfer gives his name more at large, Pro Narees Naraye Fin Chaw.

(B) According to what we shall find afterwards in Kæmpfer, he had at least one son, who usurped the crown after Chaw Naraya's death.

(C) In 1685 the eldest was thirty-seven years old; and though of a very weakly constitution, was yet haughty, and capable of giving disturbance, if his body had been able to act. The other was only twenty-seven years of age; he was well-made, but dumb; though some said it was only a political muteness. Choisy, p. 398.

designed for the princess.

